

Cambridgeshire Memories and Reflections

by

Mike Petty

Dedicated to Cambridge's first librarian,
John Pink
its greatest Chronicler, Charles Henry Cooper and their great creation

The Cambridgeshire Collection at Cambridge Central Library

June 2016

Memories with Mike Petty

Visit Mike's website at www.cambridgeshirehistory.com/MikePetty for free advice on researching Cambridgeshire and the Fens. Email: mikepetty13a@gmail.com

Thanks for all those wonderful memories

MEMORIES are about looking back and now it is my time to reflect on some of my writings in the News over the years.

It was more than 20 years ago that I was asked to stand in for Rodney Tibber's History Roundtable feature. Having already spent 20 years exploring the material held in the Cambridgeshire Collection at Cambridge's central library I knew there was much that could be shared. My first article appeared on June 30, 1984. It was the story of witchcraft at Haverhill in 1916, the most was about the living conditions in Swavesey as recorded by James Bowd in September 1889.

By then the News had launched a series of weekly titles and from February 1965 my Looking Back articles started to appear regularly. One in July 1986 featured the memories of an Irish labourer building the runways at Wicken airfield in 1943.

But the Cambridgeshire Collection was more than just books: from August 1986 to October 1988 I featured the various engravers who had depicted the area since the 1660s. These were followed later by nearly two years of similar articles about the region's photographers, once more drawing on its extensive holdings.

In between there were 100 Stories from a Year based on topics that the News had reported in what was then its 100th year. A centenary book, Cambridge in Pictures 1888-1988, combined images from the Collection with some of the News' photographs from the 1960s. Memory Lane, Cambridge, Memory Lane: Dy and Vanishing Cambridgeshire followed.

Meanwhile I recycled some of the articles in weekly broadcasts on BBC Radio Cambridgeshire which, with regular talks to groups, resulted in the 'Librarian of the Year' award. Strangely I've just rediscovered the report of the Westminster presentation when researching my Looking Back column for 25 years ago!

By then it was getting difficult to think of things to write about, but the answer was obvious. Old and new items arrived daily at the Collection, why not reflect on the recent acquisitions and the people who'd given them? Thus the weeks from November 1992 to May 1996 were filled.

But by then my professional involvement with the Cambridgeshire Collection was coming to an end. I'd started a new series inspired by one of its thousands of playbills for performances at the Theatre Royal on Newmarket Road. This was headed 'Mr Pickwick's first visit to Cambridge'. So I took the view that if he had really visited - and he must have done because it said so on a piece of paper and everything written on paper must be true! - then he would have kept a scrapbook about the people he'd met. For the next 750 weeks I can that really be over 14 years! I turned the pages of Pickwick's Cambridge Scrapbook, 1838.

At first I could draw on that remarkable collection of material amassed since before Charles Dickens himself lectured in the Guildhall. But then Lion Yard Library closed for refurbishment, a process that should have taken weeks and indeed took years. Unable to access its resources, I needed to discover another source of first-hand accounts of local life in the 1830s. I found it on the internet. The myriad of websites, some of which are freely available, do indeed allow one to read a vast amount of Cambridgeshire publications. But I know that there are many, many more that are not online.

By then I had a daily Looking Back column which involved going through the original files of the News' papers (despised you know where), working and copying information I had not remembered seeing elsewhere.

And then there was this weekly Memories page. This has relied on the letters you've written and the folk I've met at talks. I am privileged to have been able to share your recollections through the pages of our local newspaper. To find some of the old articles filed away in scrapbooks is always rewarding. But most moving of all has been to attend funerals where some of the last words said about a former correspondent have mentioned something from my columns.

You may not have cut and kept all, or any, of those thousands of articles and snippets. But you can still read, search and download them. For as my thanks for all your assistance over the last 50 years I have placed them all on the world-wide-web. Google 'Internet Archive' and search 'Mike Petty Cambridge'.

However, I know so many of us do not use the internet. But there is still the telephone, the post and the voice. Please still drop me a line or give me a ring. I'll help if I can.

And, of course, the paper edition of the Cambridge News will continue to reflect reminiscences of our area. I will continue to read them with great interest, safe in the knowledge that any little errors are not now of my making!

Looking Back by Mike Petty

Thatcher spells out vision for Europe

FROM THE NEWS 1990
At the Kingsgarden conference at St Catharine's College, Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher spelled out her vision for the future of Europe. Britain and Germany did not yet see eye-to-eye on this and she was not ready to withdraw all our troops. News should continue to have nuclear weapons based there. German Chancellor, Dr Helmut Kohl said he would press for faster progress towards political union.

Village perfect for us says elderly group

FROM THE NEWS 1985
Fifty tenagers of Lode were all friends at school 90 years ago.
"I think the oldest people in Cambridgeshire live in Lode. It is a quiet out-of-the-way village with very little development, just right for a peaceful life," said Hepthorn Wells, who at 97 is the oldest. Billy Harvey, 96, still enjoys a pint at the Cow and Horse while Elizabeth Potts is 96. Maud Tuck 92 and Philipp Cornwell is aged just 95.

Banks cope better with heavy rainfall

FROM THE NEWS 1940
During the last winter they had been through four serious floods, and had not had the gale winds they'd had in other years. The sluice keeper at Denver had never seen the water go through as fast as it had this year. But the banks are much stronger now than at any time within the memory of living man. H.G. Martin told the Ouse Catchment Board.

Well-known cyclist is badly hurt in fall

FROM THE NEWS 1915
AG Markham, the well-known Cambridge cyclist, met with a serious accident. He was riding a cycle along Victoria Road and while about to pass some horses ridden by soldiers, when one of the animals shied and, backing into Mr Markham, knocked him on to the tarmac. The result was he was badly thrown, dislocating his shoulder.

Reflecting our Cambridge past

ROLLING BACK THE YEARS: Left, Mike in 1998 with Roy Burgess of Cottingham who prepared old films taken by 'Uncle David'. Above, the illustrations feature ran from 1966-68.

This file contains the text of various series of articles published in the Cambridge Evening News and Cambridge Weekly News. Each was illustrated by photographs or engravings. These are omitted from this text but copies can be supplied if required.

It will be apparent that this file would benefit from editing and there are inevitably various errors. However I believe it contains a great deal of information not previously available in one place and which you might find of use.

There are over 2,150 pages. Do not print them all. But do search by any name, place or word and download anything of interest.

Please make what use of it you may. Kindly remember where it came from. Contact me if I can help

Mike Petty
Mikepetty13a@gmail.com
www.mikepetty.org.uk
June 2016.

Contents

Pages 6-1723

Memories: weekly articles drawing on memories from readers, new publications etc, 1997-2015

Pages 1724-1904

Reflections: new material arrives daily in the Cambridgeshire Collecton; Mike Petty reflects on recent discoveries, 1992-1996

Pages 1905-2007

Stories from a year: 100 articles based on the events of each year from 1888, 1986-1992

Pages 2008-2037

History Revisited: the earliest articles, 1984-1986

Pages 2038-2152

Our Time: more detailed articles published in the 'Our Time' magazine, 2004-2005

Cambridgeshire Memories and Reflections by Mike Petty

Introduction

It was in 1984 that I was asked to stand in for Rodney Tibbs' 'History Revisited' feature. Having already spent 20 years exploring the material held in the Cambridgeshire Collection at Cambridge's central library I knew there was much that could be shared. My first article appeared on 30th June 1984. It was the story of witchcraft at Horseheath in 1916, the next was about the living conditions in Swavesey as recorded by James Bowd in September 1889.

By then the News had launched a series of Weekly titles and from February 1985 my 'Looking Back' articles started to appear regularly. One in July 1986 featured the memories of an Irish labourer building the runways at Witchford airfield in 1943.

But the Cambridgeshire Collection was more than just books: from August 1986 to October 1988 I featured the various engravers who had depicted the area since the 1660s. These were followed later by nearly two years of similar articles about the region's photographers, once more drawing on its extensive holdings.

In between there were 100 'Stories from a Year' based on topics that the News had reported in what was then its 100th year. A centenary book, "Cambridge in Pictures 1888-1988", combined images from the Collection with some of the News' photographs from the 1960s. "Memory Lane Cambridge", "Memory Lane Ely" and "Vanishing Cambridgeshire" followed.

Meanwhile I recycled some of the articles in weekly broadcasts on BBC Radio Cambridgeshire which, with regular talks to groups, resulted in the 'Librarian of the Year' award. Strangely, I've just rediscovered the report of the Westminster presentation when researching my 'Looking Back' column for 25 years ago!

By then it was getting difficult to think of things to write about. But the answer was obvious. Old and new items arrived daily at the Collection, why not reflect on the recent accessions and the people who'd given them? Thus the weeks from November 1992 to May 1996 were filled.

But by then my professional involvement with the Cambridgeshire Collection was coming to an end. I'd started a new series inspired by one of its thousands of playbills for performances at the Theatre Royal on Newmarket Road. This was headed "Mr Pickwick's first visit to Cambridge". So I took the view that if he had really visited – and he must have done because it said so on a piece of paper (and everything written on paper must be true) - then he would have kept a scrapbook about the people he'd met. For the next 750 weeks (can that really be over 14 years) I turned the pages of "Pickwick's Cambridge Scrapbook, 1838".

At first I could draw on that remarkable collection of material amassed since before Charles Dickens himself lectured in the Guildhall. But then Lion Yard Library closed for refurbishment, a process that should have taken weeks and instead took years. Unable to access its resources I needed to discover another source of first-hand accounts of local life in the 1830s. I found it on the Internet. The myriad of websites, some of which are freely available, do indeed allow one to read a vast amount of Cambridgeshire publications. But I know that there are many, many more that are not online.

By then I had a daily 'Looking Back' column which involved going through the original files of the News' papers (deposited you know where), seeking and copying information I had not remembered seeing elsewhere.

And then there was this weekly 'Memories' page. This has relied on the letters people have written and the folk I've met at talks. I am privileged to have been able to share their recollections through the pages of our local newspaper. To find some of the old articles filed away in scrapbooks is always rewarding. But most moving of all has been to attend funerals where some of the last words said about a former correspondent have mentioned something from my columns.

You may not have cut and kept all, or any, of those thousands of article and snippets. But you can still read, search and download them. For as my thanks for all your assistance over the last 50 years I have brought them together and placed them all on the world-wide-web. Google 'Internet Archive' and search 'Mike Petty Cambridge' or click <https://archive.org/search.php?query=mike%20petty%20cambridge>

However I know so many of us do not use the Internet. But there is still the telephone, the post and the voice. Please still drop me a line or give me a ring. I'll help if I can

And of course the paper edition of the Cambridge News will continue to reflect Memories of our area. I will continue to read them with great interest, safe in the knowledge that any little errors are not now of my making!

Mike Petty

Phone: 01353 648106

Email: ikepetty13a@gmail.com

Website: www.mikepetty.org.uk.

June 2016

Memories:

Looking back on aspects of Cambridgeshire, Past and Present.

A series of weekly articles in the Cambridge News,

Memories February 1997 to December 2014, compiled by Mike Petty

A series of weekly articles in the Cambridge Evening News featuring memories from all sorts of people on all sorts of Cambridgeshire topics

Note:

This text is a mixture of the text sent to the editor of the Cambridge News (complete with various instructions) and copies of the actual articles as published.

There are a few missing articles: 1998 Oct 29, 1998 Dec 24, 1998 Dec 31, 2002 Dec 11 & 25, 2006 Dec 6

Memories 1997 in one sequence

Memories no.1: 19th February 1997

Memories is a weekly column written by local historian and lecturer Mike Petty. Each week he will look in depth at an item mentioned in his Looking Back column which appears each weekday on Page 7 and features news which appeared in the News 100, 75, 50 and 25 years ago.

Today he sets the scene with a general look at 1897, 1922, 1947 and 1972.

In Nothing New, at the bottom of the page, he will show how issues making the news headlines today have reared their head in the past.

He also wants YOUR memories and pictures. Write to Mike Petty, Memories, Cambridge Evening News, Winship Road, Milton, Cambridge CB4 6PP

THE story so far ... 1897

Queen Victoria was nearing the celebration of her Diamond Jubilee and throughout the country people were planning how best to mark the event; her reign had brought tremendous inventions — electricity, motor cars, telegram, telephone and efficient post office —but in latter years agricultural depression due to bad winters and wet summers and the arrival of cheap American grain -imports led many farmers to switch from corn production to cattle farming.

Prime Minister was the Marquis of Salisbury.

Local MPs were Sir Robert Uniacke Uniacke Penrose Fitzgerald (Cambridge), Walter Greene (Cambs West), Harry McCalmont (Cambs East) & Richard Jebb & Sir John Eldon Gorst (university).

Cambridge was making progress with its new sewage scheme — though this was attracting great complaints; there was agitation for a new railway station to be built on part of Coldham's Common and a new bridge near Abbey Road — echoing the Victoria Bridge opened a few years earlier. Despite all this Chesterton residents voted 3-1 against proposals for an amalgamation with Cambridge.

Blizzards swept the country — causing a death at Saffron Walden, but allowing skating matches at Littleport, though the thaw saw widespread flooding and the bursting of the banks of the river Nene at March.

1922

King George V was king.

Prime Minister was David Lloyd George, local MPs were Sir Eric Geddes (Cambridge), E S Montagu (Cambridgeshire) and J.F. Rawlinson and Sir J Larmer for the university.

Headlines: Influenza was sweeping the country with 804 deaths in one week alone, and Foot and Mouth disease was wiping out cattle.

Locally the deaths were announced of Ephraim Gautrey, seed grower and merchant of Cottenham, Mrs Moyes of the Lion Hotel, Cambridge, E P Frost the Squire of West Wrattling, and inventor of an early flying machine, musician Hague Ingram and Ernest Shackleton who died in South Georgia during his fourth expedition to the Antarctic.

Proposals for a new bridge over the Cam at Chesterton were once more opposed and a new motor ambulance was provided for townspeople.

1947

King George VI was king.

Prime Minister was Clement Atlee, local MPs were A L Symonds (Cambridge), A E Stubbs (Cambridgeshire) — both Labour and K W M Pickhorn and H W Harris (university).

Headlines: a strike by road haulage workers was causing shortages of food.

The coal industry had been nationalised on January 1 but was meeting opposition from unions and prompting a fuel crisis with electricity cuts threatening the jobs of 2,500 Pye Radio employees. It all added to the misery of a prolonged spell of freezing weather with 4ft snowdrifts at Longstanton.

Experimental new one-way traffic schemes introduced for two weeks in Sidney Street, St John's Street and Trinity Street linking with the established system in Market Street and Petty Cury proved successful.

Cambridge's worst ever fog blanketed the city on January 21 with bus conductors walking at the front of their vehicles to guide them back to their garages.

The deaths were announced of Ernest Terah Hooley, one-time High Sheriff of Cambridgeshire and owner of Papworth Hall died — from multi-millionaire to convict, his life was crowded with more spectacular and romantic incidents than any melodrama, and Col Louis Tebbutt a county councillor for 47 years

1972

Queen Elizabeth II reigns.

Prime Minister was Edward Heath, local MPs were David Lane (Cambridge) and Francis Pym (Cambridgeshire) — the university no longer had its own MPs.

Headlines: The miners strike had led to a state of emergency with power blackouts, industry was working a three-day week and householders were asked to heat only one room.

Britain joined the EEC and unemployment rose above a million.

Abroad: The Tokyo Winter Olympics began, America intensified its bombing campaign in North Vietnam and Queen Elizabeth, the retired luxury liner, was ravaged by fire in Hong Kong harbour.

Locally: Work was progressing on the Lion Yard car park and shoppers paying 10p to park in Queen Anne were offered a 3.5p bus trip to city centre in a trial scheme.

An inquiry opened into a proposed Western bypass – the M11

Petty Cury became the first pedestrian precinct and a city councillor dined in the street.

The first twin screen cinema — ABC 1 and ABC 2 were opened in St Andrew's Street by Mayor Jean Barker.

NOTHING NEW

Detective work can pinpoint locations

THE report in Saturday's News that Sherlock Holmes was once more prowling the streets of Cambridge recalls that there were at least two of Conan Doyle's stories with a Cambridge setting.

In one, The Missing Three Quarter, the great detective endeavours, without success, to locate a disappearing undergraduate rugger player in time for the Varsity match.

Such is the detail supplied by Dr Watson that it is possible to locate the very inn that Holmes stayed at, the shop from which he hired his bicycle and the route that he followed in his pursuit of the elusive sportsman.

Having explored Oakington, Waterbeach, Cherry Hinton and Coldham's Lane the mystery is finally solved in ... see next week's Memories.

Memories by Mike Petty, 25th February 1997

Memories of the Day

February 24th

1897

LIBERAL MEETING IN ROMSEY TOWN

Mr Wisbey referred to the roads question. They had been defeated but the authorities had seen that Romsey Town people were a force to be reckoned with. Hitherto they had been looked upon as a naughty dog, always barking and making a noise but without any bite. (Laughter).

Mr Quinney referring to the sewage scheme said he applied for work and was told by the engineer that they did not want men who understood the work as they would know too much if things went wrong. (Laughter).

1922

A GROCER & HIS WIFE s separation order granted within a year of marriage.

Unpleasantness occurred a few weeks after marriage. In July she purchased a motor cycle combination for £119. When she asked him to take her for a ride he struck her on the jaw.

Husband said it was his wife's suggestion that he should have a sum of money and the motorcycle combination and go away from her up North again

1947

CHRISTMAS DAY OFFENCES s

A London company secretary who left his Chrysler car on King's Parade during the night of Christmas Eve and the morning of Christmas day was summonsed for obstruction and for leaving it without lights. PC Tasker spoke of getting a hurricane lamp from the police station and attaching it to the car to warn other traffic. He was fined 10/- in the first case and 20/- in the second

1972

UNIVERSITY WAGE TALKS

Cambridge University members of the National Union of Public Employees are planning a large-scale membership drive in the University. Their Secretary said today that a claim by the union for a £20 basic weekly wage for manual & ancillary staff in universities would not apply to Cambridge workers. Meanwhile Melbourn Discount Warehouse offered a Hotpoint Twin-tub washing machine for £108 - £12 less than recommended price - but more than five times their weekly wage

February 25th

1897 HAVERHILL CURCH ORGAN

The contract for the new organ for Haverhill parish church has been placed in the hands of Messrs Miller & sons, Cambridge. The construction of the organ will be specially arranged to keep the view of the stained glass window perfectly clear which necessitates part of the organ being a considerable distance from the main portion, and which has been specially arranged for by the builders

1922

ELY CORONER'S WARNING.

"I have told people repeatedly at inquests that they had far better buy an old orange box to use as a cot than let children sleep with their parents. People are very apt to smother them unconsciously". The mother said it was not a really strong child for it had a wheezing cold since birth on January 15th. She fed it on bread slops and the breast generally. The weight of the child was below average being 6lbs 3ozs against the usual weight of 7lbs for a girl, 8lbs for a boy. Death was due to natural causes

1947

ANOTHER BLOW FOR HOUSEWIVES

Housewives are dealt yet another blow today. Cambridge University & Town Waterworks Company will reluctantly be compelled to close down the water softening plant at Cherry Hinton. Cambridge's water will then be about twice its present hardness. There have been drastic reductions in the coal required to evaporate the brine at the salt works in Cheshire. Mr Philip Porteous, managing director of the company told a reporter "The Government takes the view that water softening is one of those amenities without which we can manage in times of crisis, but we appreciate only too well the difficulties of the housewife in these days of soap rationing"

1972

CAMBRIDGE TOWNSCAPE

The visual quality of New Square is totally spoiled at present by its use as a car park., When new multi-storey car parks are built in the Fitzroy—Burleigh area however the square will be returned to grass and will once again be a valuable part of the Cambridge townscape"

February 26th

1897

LITTLEPORT EJECTMENT

The clerk to the Ely Guardians applied for the removal of Tabitha Camm, an eccentric old woman aged 72 years who is living in a tumbled—down old hovel in Littleport-Fen. The place was filthy in the extreme. She has lived there all her life and she tenaciously sticks to it. PC King said the walls were tumbling down and the bricks had no mortar between them. The rain penetrated and soot and dirt covered the place. The lady is independent in every sense of the word and would-be sympathisers are quickly ordered to decamp

1922

THE RENDEVOUS CINEMA, Hertford Street

"All next week. Super attraction! Mary Pickford can no more grow up than Peter Pan & that is why her latest production "Through the back doors" is just the type of charming picture you will want to see ... the kind that made her famous ... brimful of heart interest ... intensely effective. Special music programme. Perfect projection. Warm & comfortable"

1947

FALCON CLUB ARSON CHARGE

Between 60 and 70 persons were in an upstairs room when the Falcon Club was alleged to have been maliciously fired by a former member. Company Officer James Myden of the N.F.S. spoke of receiving a fire call at 9.21 pm. The structure of the staircase was of dry matchwood and it would have burst into flame in about another ten minutes. A former committee member said "I did it out of spite" ... some of the members had not been kind because "I was not dressed as well as them"

1972

REGENT STREET BLOCKED BY STUDENT PROTEST

Undergraduates at Downing college today continued a 24-hour occupation of the dining hall despite a warning that violent protest could close the college for the rest of this term. They are protesting against the expulsion of two undergraduates and the rustication of a third for their part in sending an obscene leaflet to Downing College dons and undergraduates. A march last night by more than 500 students blocked Regent Street for more than an hour with demonstrators seated in the road outside the college

February 27th

1897

GUILDHALL FLOOR

The Guildhall floor has become so unsafe that when a ball is held in the large room the most elaborate precautions have to be taken to support the beams in the ceiling of the Free Library beneath. This shoring-up process costs something like 30/- each time and is a sheer waste of money

1922

ANOTHER VILLAGE HALL.

Long-felt want supplied in Great Shelford. The hall is a converted army hut built on the public recreation ground. Great Shelford was to be congratulated in that its ex-Servicemen had joined with the Women's Friendly League to build the hall, a result which was eminently satisfactory for the village. If the ex-servicemen were prepared to pull together for the places where they lived there was a great future for the country

1947

MORE CAMBRIDGE RENTS CUT

Mrs Thurlborn of 29 Victoria Road rented a bedroom and sitting-room at £1.15.0 a week in December. It included gas and electricity and she and her husband had the use of the coal shed. Recently a cold water basin had been put in. Her landlord told the Tribunal he paid

£1.10.0 a week rent for the house. He wanted the rooms for his family as he, his wife and two children, the elder aged nearly five all slept in the same room. The rent was reduced to £1.5.0

1972

SWITCH TAKES CONCORDE WORK AWAY FROM CITY

Production of the noses of the Concorde supersonic airliner, which was planned to be in Cambridge, has been taken away by the British Aircraft Corporation. All the research and development work on the nose has been done by Marshall's at Cambridge airport. The senior shop steward is to see the Cambridge MP, Mr David Lane, to try to get the decision reversed

February 28th

1897

ADVERTISING TROLLEY

To let: a large advertising trolley to parade the principal streets of Cambridge. For terms & particulars apply Cambridge & District Advertising and Bill Posting co (ltd) Downing House, Regent St, Cambridge

1922

HOUSING ITEMS

Cambridge Town Council Housing Committee ,,,,,, approve the lay-out proposed of thirty houses next Milton Road and Union Road with white brick facings,, solid walls & slated roofs,, The windows to be sash ones with larger squares of glass

1947

DRIVING BAN ON CAR DEALER

Twelve months' disqualification from driving was amongst the penalties imposed on a "freelance motor dealer" against whom there were four summonses. The first was for driving a motor truck at a dangerous speed in Victoria Avenue (50 mph), the second for exceeding the permitted speed for that class of vehicle, the third for driving without third party insurance in force and the fourth for driving without a current driving licence. When spoken to defendant told police "I am afraid I was over the limit" but claimed he had the vehicle in full control. His brakes were perfect and he could have stopped if necessary. He was fined a total of £10.10.0

1972

CITY HOME SOLD FOR £23,000

A four-bedroomed detached house at 35 Luard Road, Cambridge was sold for £23,000 at an auction sale in the city. The house, built in 1937, includes three-quarter of an acre of gardens with 36 bearing peach trees. The lawn is big enough for tennis and the house has been described as being in the most sought-after residential situation in Cambridge

MEMORIES by Mike Petty March 4th 1997

LOOKING BACK REVISITED : NEW SQUARE CAR PARK

New Square was built in stages, the southern side constructed between 1829 and 1830, the east in 1834 and the north in 1835. It was constructed as an open-sided square like the college courts and looked out onto a large grassed area, linking with Christ's Pieces to provide a green walkway to the newly growing developments in Fitzroy and Burleigh Streets.

But as Cambridge entered the motor age so there came demand for parking places. Proposals to take a strip of Christ's Pieces for a bus station and car park at Drummer Street caused great controversy but went ahead nonetheless. Then in 1929 eyes were turned to New Square, readers asking the Cambridge Daily News to lead an attack against the proposals. No so. Looking back on the Drummer street protest the editor reflected that "Now it is all over body seems one penny the worse. The only fault is that Drummer Street was not big enough. Hence the need for further accommodation". Others however felt that Butt Green would be a better site and the discussion was joined.

Eventually however in March 1932 the paper could report that "With only the avenue of trees which bisects it to suggest that almost recently it was a green island of pastures, New Square car park, a wide expanse of concrete was opened by the Mayoress". The car containing the Mayoral party broke a band of pale blue ribbons stretched across the entrance and immediately afterwards, braving the heavy rain, Mrs Raynes declared the car park open and hoped it would be profitable to the town and bring about less congested streets and police courts.

Over 260 cars took advantage of the new facility over the Easter holiday but soon they were joined by a less welcome visitor a caravan.

Times however change and it became a goal to return the car park back to grass. The hopes expressed in 1972 came to fruition in June 1983 and Cambridge regained an area of open space once surrendered to the motor car.

READERS ASK

Did you attend the Cambridgeshire High School for Boys in 1971-72? If so do you remember Tim Farley who now lives in the USA? He has made contact via the Internet and is trying to locate a school chum from that period who name is NIGEL MELLOR. He believes the family came from Coton and that Nigel may be in the Stoke on Trent area. Can you help put him in touch? Write to Mike Petty at the News

Was your grandmother a swans down worker? If so what did she do? A reader searching through the 1891 census enumerators returns for the village of QUY had found several references to this trade being carried out by elderly ladies. What was it, how was it organised. Write to Mike Petty at the News

Last week I mentioned an arson attack on the FALCON CLUB, in Falcon Yard, Cambridge. A reader has asked for more information about the club. Were you a member, how long did it continue? Write to Mike Petty at the News

READERS ANSWER

In July 1942 German bombers made one of their raids on Cambridge and caused extensive damage in the Bridge Street area, the Union Society building being hit. German propaganda claimed that Cambridge had been badly damaged with fires raging and clouds of smoke trailing far beyond the city, and that later reconnaissance had shown that flames had become wholesale conflagrations.

Not so said the fire watchers, it was all lies.

But now A.E. Impey of Earith feels that what the Germans may have witnessed was the effects of the smoke machines which previous readers had remembered around Cambridge. Certainly when enemy planes approached the strategically manufacturing area of Luton such "Smokies" were fire up and large fans blew the smoke over the town, hiding the factories from the planes above. Sometimes however high winds blew the smoke away from the town and at other times they made it so dark that schoolchildren were unable to see to study.

Donald Flory recalls similar devices near his house in Bexley Heath, Kent which were set off to block out the River Thames and prevent the bombers following the river route to London. The burners were about six feet in height, the chimney being about a foot and a half in diameter with a cap to spread the smoke on top. They were placed between 12 to 15 feet apart, each reservoir filled with crude diesel oil by the Army's Pioneer Corps. They burned throughout the night with a low pitched humming noise until the fuel ran out. He includes a drawing of the burner. [DRAWING ATTACHED]

Mr Flory has memories too of the horrible smell they made, making it quite impossible to keep any window open, even during the hot weather.

Patrick Mills writes to say he saw one near the Rolls Royce plant in Derby but do you remember them in this area. Write to Mike Petty at the News

SAME OLD NEWS

Reports that East Cambridgeshire District Council have introduced a new system for recycling refuse call to mind a proposal in Cambridge in July 1911 when the Town Council proposed requiring landlords and householders to provide metal dustbins for the reception of domestic rubbish. Currently "Old boxes, tubs and baskets almost anything that will hold the refuse without better more than half of it leak out of its numerous holes, chinks and crevices - are pressed into service, with the result that our streets periodically present an appearance more picturesque than pleasing. Some of the crazy old wrecks that decorate the edges of the pavements are worse than eyesores, they are outrages"

However some councillors were not sure it would be a good idea. Ungrateful tenants would "use them as substitutes for wheelbarrows, coal scuttles, or even for the purpose of giving the baby its bath!"

I trust this is not a problem East Cambs will encounter

TRACKING HOLMES (from last weeks "Memories")

From Coldham's Lane the trail turned hard to the right, back in the direction of town; the road took a sweep to the south of Cambridge and continued in the opposite direction to that in which we started. There stood a lonely rustic cottage ... Vicarage Farm, Trumpington, now disappeared from the maps ... or was it - you track down the "Missing Three Quarter" in your local library and work it out for yourself.

MEMORIES by Mike Petty, 11th March 1997

MAIN PHOTO FEATURE: CAMBRIDGE IN FLAMES NB: PICTURE SHOWS CAMBRIDGE HIDDEN IN SMOKE BUT IT WAS TAKEN 1903 - AND IS NOT WAR-TIME

In July 1942 German bombers made one of their raids on Cambridge and caused extensive damage in the Bridge Street area, the Union Society building being hit. German propaganda claimed that Cambridge had been badly damaged with fires raging and clouds of smoke trailing far beyond the city, and that later reconnaissance had shown that flames had become wholesale conflagrations.

Not so said the fire watchers, it was all lies.

But now A.E. Impey of Earith feels that what the Germans may have witnessed was the effects of the smoke machines which previous readers had remembered around Cambridge. Certainly when enemy planes approached the strategically manufacturing area of Luton such "Smokies" were fired up and large fans blew the smoke over the town, hiding the factories from the planes above. Sometimes however high winds blew the smoke away from the town and at other times they made it so dark that schoolchildren were unable to see to study.

Donald Flory recalls similar devices near his house in Bexley Heath, Kent which were set off to block out the River Thames and prevent the bombers following the river route to London. The burners were about six feet in height, the chimney being about a foot and a half in diameter with a cap to spread the smoke on top. They were placed between 12 to 15 feet apart, each reservoir filled with crude diesel oil by the Army's Pioneer Corps. They burned throughout the night with a low pitched humming noise until the fuel ran out. He includes a drawing of the burner. [DRAWING ATTACHED]

Mr Flory has memories too of the horrible smell they made, making it quite impossible to keep any window open, even during the hotweather.

Patrick Mills writes to say he saw one near the Rolls Royce plant in Derby but do you remember them in this area. Write to Mike Petty at the News

SAME OLD NEWS (not quite!)

A community paper such as the News always contains announcements of matches, matches and despatches but few can have been as dramatic as that recorded in its predecessor, the "Cambridge Chronicle" in June 1768 when reporting the inquest on an Oakington horsekeeper who had hanged himself. "As it did not appear to the coroner's jury that he was disordered in his senses ... he was accordingly buried in a cross-way, with a stake drove through his body".

READERS ASK

Do you remember the penny? M.B.Wallis of King Street, Cambridge, recalls when her entire pocket money was just 2d. Half of it could be spent - perhaps on a currant bun or doughnut from the baker's van which stopped by the back gate whilst the horse had his horse bag or on an ounce of sweets which soon stuck to their white paper cornet once they were out of the jar, or lemon sherbet or liquorice bootlaces or ...

The other half went into the money box with its stiff lid though the savings had to be supplemented handsomely before a B.S.A. bicycle with its back-pedal brake (it was safer) could be bought for £5.10.0 in 1933 to go to school on.

Strangely though in those days it didn't occur to parents to get children to buy their own socks, school dinners or busfares and so learn to know the value of money. It was a lesson that had to be learned once she was at work and bringing home the princely sum of 7/- a week!

WHAT DID YOU BUY WITH YOUR POCKET MONEY, WRITE TO MIKE PETTY AT THE NEWS

READERS ASK :

Colonel Louis Tebbutt who died in 1947 was a well-known member of county society, a sportsman holding a record for long-distance skating on the fens and a director of the Barrington cement works. In 1913 he gave to the Cambridgeshire Beekeepers Association a beautifully carved wooden trophy in the form of a hive which has been keenly competed for ever since. But what connection did the Colonel have with Honey, did he ever keep bees. The Association who are now researching their history would love to know, and would also appreciate other memories of the early days of beekeeping.

WRITE TO MIKE PETTY AT THE NEWS

ITEMS BELOW CAN BE USED IF THERE is SPACE; IF NOT USED I WILL INCLUDE THEM NEXT WEEK ... UNTIL NEEDED

REEVES' TALES

For many years Albert Edgar Reeve and his son Frank compiled notes and scrapbooks of little-known aspects of Cambridge's history which they shared through the pages of this newspaper. Now I share again some of Reeves' tales

College dinners in Victorian times

" During the quarter of an hour preceding 4pm students come flooding into their colleges to prepare for dinner. Undergraduates are not admitted within the screen until the fellows & fellow-commoners are assembled. Tables are supplied with an abundance of plain joints, vegetables & beer and ale ad libitum besides which soup, pastry & cheese are brought in for an extra charge. But the crowd, confusion & indifferent serving makes the hall dinner resemble steamboat meals". - C.A. Bristed. "Five year in an English University". 1857

THAT WAS THE YEAR : 1397

In 1397 during the reign of Richard II the Cambridge Council decreed that if any one elected to any office be rebellious or non-obediant to the mayor he should forfeit £10, half to the use of the mayor & half to the commonalty"

MEMORIES 18th March 1997, by Mike Petty

MAIN PHOTO FEATURE: READERS WRITE PHOTO IS OF FALCON CLUB FOOTBALL TEAM 1948/49 AND HAS BEEN SENT IN BY MR K.F. MALTBY 105 ARBURY ROAD, CAMBRIDGE CB4 2JD. RETURN TO MIKE PETTY FOR RETURN TO HIM

In "Memories" on 4th March I asked for information on the Falcon Club off Petty Cury, Cambridge. This brought back happy memories for Mrs J. Jenner of Bourn who writes: "My friend Betty and myself were in the A.T.S. stationed on Donkey Common (now Parkside swimming pool) in 1947. Our boyfriends, later our husbands, were members of the Falcon Club and enrolled us and paid our first monthly subscription. The cards were dark blue with a Falcon in the centre with the words Falcon Club, Falcon Yard, Cambridge underneath"

Another member was Mr K.F. Maltby of Arbury Road, Cambridge. He recalls that the main club was over MacFisheries shop in Petty Cury with the entrance in Falcon Yard. Almost next door was the British Legion Club which Falcon members used for Old Tyme Dancing Instruction with Mr & Mrs Caddick, They had a Football Team with fixtures against Pest Control and the Cambridgeshire Technical College and he includes a snap of team members taken in 1948/49. Some members formed a cycling section and on one occasion, on a trip to Biggleswade, the group included a 4-seater bicycle hired from a shop in King Street.

The Club was formed during the war and catered for people who were evacuated to Cambridge with their companies and, as it had its own laundry was a great help for people living in digs. It closed down in 1949 or thereabouts.

So plenty of memories here - do you remember the wartime huts on Donkey's Common, were you in a factory which was evacuated to Cambridge, do you recognise anybody in the photo. And just what was the A.T.S., were you a member and what was your role in wartime Cambridgeshire

WRITE TO MIKE PETTY AT THE NEWS

READERS WRITE

"It has been 25 years since I last saw or spoke to Tim so you can imagine my surprise when my mother phoned me after reading your article in the Cambridge Evening News ("Memories 4th March). I would very much like to get in contact with Tim again ..." So writes Nigel Mellor following our appeal on behalf of a long-lost friend in the USA to put them in touch. Another success for the News.

SAME OLD NEWS

A community paper such as the News always contains announcements of matches, hatches and despatches but few can have been as dramatic as that recorded in its predecessor, the "Cambridge Chronicle" of June 1768 when reporting the inquest on an Oakington horsekeeper who had hanged himself. "As it did not appear to the coroner's jury that he was disordered in his senses ... he was accordingly buried in a cross-way, with a stake drove through his body". Burial by the roadside was common for suicide victims and the stake was thought to prevent the ghost from rising according to Robert Halliday in the Proceedings of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society for 1995 (available in the Cambridgeshire Collection)

THAT WAS THE YEAR: 1397

In 1397 during the reign of Richard II the Cambridge Council decreed that if any one elected to any office be rebellious or non-obedient to the mayor he should forfeit L10, half to the use of the mayor & half to the commonalty"

REEVE'S TALES :

From the notes of A.E. & F.A. Reeve comes this comment on student fashions in 1788 when a pamphlet entitled "Remarks on the Enormous Expense in the Education of Young Men in the University of Cambridge" urged "That the dress of Undergraduates be taken into most serious Consideration : Being in its present state Indecent, Expensive and Effeminate"

MEMORIES by Mike Petty, 25th March 1997

MAIN PHOTO STORY: READERS WRITE

The 50th anniversary of the 1947 fen floods has generated many memories but one of the aspects of the story not generally recounted however is the soldier's tale. Ken Jay, now of Brentwood, was stationed at Colchester barracks expecting to spend the weekend celebrating his cousin's wedding to a G.I., American soldier. Instead he found himself on a lorry heading for the fens. Eventually they stopped and one of the soldiers shouted to an elderly woman asking where they were. "The last place on God's earth", she replied, "Southery".

It looked like a scene from the First World War as high sandbagged walls stretched along the side of the main A10 road from Littleport, holding back the advance, not of German troops, but of water which had surged across the fen following a breach in the bank of the River Wissey. It was then a race to see which could rise faster, the flood water or the sandbagged barrier which was holding it back.

But before long the soldiers were once more packed into trucks and sent off to Earith where the river bank had burst. Eventually they arrived at a small railway station, Bluntisham, and boarded a train that took them a few hundred yards along the track and across a bridge over the swollen river. Although it was the darkest of nights the scene was brilliantly illuminated by searchlights by whose glare men were labouring with yet more sandbags.

The British troops were ably assisted by German prisoners of war and a new word passed into the soldiers' vocabulary. For when work had to cease the shouted command "Halt" was echoed by the Germans in what sounded like "Shtoppen" so "stoppen" it became.

Together they were assisting in a completely new kind of military operation. The breach in the bank of the Gt Ouse was so large that the only way to check the rush of water was to construct a dam around the gap, and the only things big and heavy enough were amphibious army personnel carriers, known as Beavers. It became "Operation Neptune"

Ken heard the throbbing of their engines coming up the river, running along the line of an osier bank. Then when the tank-like Beavers were positioned across the gap he was amongst those rushing on board with large rolls of Submarine netting. This was unwound into the water and covered by tarpaulins and on to this was stacked up yet more clay bags. As day broke they were still labouring, though the Germans who had been working the previous day as well, were by now becoming a little rebellious. Eventually reinforcements arrived and with it the order "stoppen".

Fifty years later Ken learned that his work on the sandbag wall at Southery had been in vain as a culvert had burst under the road blowing it apart. And some felt that the "Neptune" operation was also an unnecessary failure as water seeped under the Beavers. But both were most gallant attempts to fight that oldest of the fenman's enemy, flooding and both gave the hope that the land would one day be reclaimed from the water

SAME OLD NEWS

The reports that people in Littleport are seeking to have their railway station relocated nearer the village brought to my mind that when the line to Kings Lynn was opened in 1849 and brought Littleport into the railway age the residents rejoiced in the excitement of seeing the first train packed with dignitaries from Lynn and Ely travelling through their village at the outrageous speed of 15 mph in coaches painted a chocolate colour and decorated with Union Jacks. According to one tale many people who were attending a funeral due to take place just before the train was scheduled to arrive did so with one eye on the clock, hoping the parson would not go on too long. In the event they were able to get away, rush out of the bottom gate of the churchyard, tear down Station Road and get there just in time to cheer the train on its way.

READERS WRITE

Mrs Barbara Wootton has sent a snap of Abnett's hairdresser's shop in St Neots. There, as Barbara Gilbert, she started work in 1940, biking four miles from her home in Roxton, Bedfordshire. She worked from 9am to 7pm earning, as a 14 year-old, the princely sum of 5/- a week, rising to 7/6 in the second year and then up to 10/-

She remembers Arthur Abnett who did the gentleman's hairdressing side of the business, Gwen his wife and their son Brian. After Mr Abnett died it was taken over by Jimmy Mosca. Barbara remembers it as a happy establishment - proved by the memories she still treasures

Memories by Mike Petty 3rd April 1997

The other evening I was walking along Trinity Street when I met a veritable convoy of Cambridge's latest manifestation of bicycle transport - the cycle-pulled rickshaw. Surely this is something new.

Not so. Pictures in the Cambridgeshire Collection indicate that a very similar mode of transport was often seen in Cambridge 80 years ago. Harry Newell of Trumpington was the proprietor of a cycle shop and when his father was confined to a wheelchair Harry devised a means of attaching it to his bike and together they travelled far and wide, even on one occasion visiting London. When his father died Harry would take the bicycle and chair on outings organised for the village children and would give them rides as part of the entertainment

Another exponent of this form of travel was Dr Thomas Brooks Bumpsted who died in 1917. Formerly a medical practitioner in Petty Cury Cambridge, where he became well known to all, he took early retirement and lived the life of a country gentleman at Trumpington. He married an Italian lady of the noble family of Doria whose diamonds, which were heirlooms, were long remembered by those who saw them.

Failing eyesight restricted his shooting and international travel but he could get around locally in a cycle-towed wheelchair, propelled by his faithful servant Wynhall

But two other pictures reveal an extension of this idea. The problem with bicycle-power is that it takes an amount of effort by the peddler. From Littleport comes a modification - a rickshaw pulled by motorbike. Who was it, when was it - do you remember something similar - or any other interesting versions of cycle-power - write to Mike Petty at the News

(PICTURES SCANNED: Harry Newell with the bicycle-pulled wheelchair which he built to take his father on expeditions and a motorcycle rickshaw from the Littleport area about 1900. Credit Cambridgeshire Collection)

Readers Write

"I remember the Folk Museum when it was the White Horse Inn. When I was about 10 years old my father brought me in from Over, where we lived, on his motor bike and sidecar and we parked in the yard of the White Horse Inn. I remember it well, the old stable with a cart, a one legged pet chicken called Peg and an old cat which looked as though it had been made up from bits of other cats, but very friendly. The publican was named Hay.

"Reginald Lambert started the Folk Museum and one day he said to my father 'There is a window at the back which I cannot account for' My father suggested there may be a hidden room, I was there when my father and Reg walked up the stairs tapping the wall, and sure enough, at the top of the stairs they found something though nothing was visible in the plaster. Reg with the help of an odd job man knocked down the wall and they found an empty room which had been sealed up. It was fairly clean with just one wooden chair standing in the middle of the room. It was very strange and very cold. Reg couldn't find out why the room had been sealed" - Joan Summers, Newnham. Have you had a similar discovery - write to Mike Petty at the News

"I lived in a detached house on Shelford Road, Trumpington, which had an underground concrete air raid shelter built in the back garden underneath a rockery. It was made of solid concrete, a small tunnel inserted on one wall and a metal meat safe on a shelf. I stored a lot of wine in bottles and demi-johns down there in a temperature of about 45 degrees both summer and winter" - Kathleen Paul, Hauxton. Do you have memories of air-raid shelters - write to Mike Petty at the News

"In 1947 Wilburton fens were flooded like a sea. Victims were sent clothes etc from Canada. They were shared among the needy and with the rest they had a jumble sale. I remember buying a large winter coat, but to my surprise it had six layers of material. Quite a find in those days with clothing coupons in force and £1 weekly for housekeeping. The top layer was a thick plaid with which I covered a small easy chair. The next layer made curtains for my kitchen window. The lining made cushion covers. There was a wadding padding which I stuffed the cushions. The rest I used for brass cleaning. Not bad for a few pence and no coupons!" - Mrs I.M. Gothard, Wilburton

"I was most interested in the "Looking Back" feature of 24th March 1922 suggesting Nyasaland tobacco planting had prospects as my father was one of the first white people to grow tobacco there in 1926! Father flew out to Africa and in 1926 bought 60 acres at Kasungu which he worked with the help of African villagers. It was virgin soil and the bricks were made of mud and water 'on site'. Our house was also built by father of anything to hand - I can picture it still - I was four years old" - Lavena Hawes^

Readers ask

"I find it surprising that there were still German prisoners of war during the floods, nearly two years after the end of the war in Europe. Were they kept as a useful labour force or a bargaining counter? And roughly when were the last repatriated" - answers to Mike Petty at the News

Memories by Mike Petty, 10th April 1997

The News had hardly hit the doormat before people were remembering the huts on Donkeys Common, where Mill Road meets Parker's Piece in Cambridge, which housed members of the A.T.S. during the Second World War. Mrs Joyce Taylor of Stretham was one of the Auxiliary Territorial Service girls who occupied them. She was working in army stores at Thompson's Lane, Gwydir Street and Brickfields munitions factory (more details please) whilst Mrs J. Jenner of Bourn worked on tanks, scout cars and Bren gun carriers at the A.T.S. depot just past the Golden Hind on Milton Road, Cambridge.

Joyce recalls there were 12 girls plus a Corporal to each of the wooden huts. She remembers the billets as being quite warm - just as well for although out of bounds to male soldiers were not properly secure - one Easter Sunday morning she awoke to find her clothes had been stolen overnight.

This would have proved an embarrassment to women such as Dorothy Perry of Cambridge one of the A.T.S. Provost, or Military Police. They patrolled the streets in pairs to try and keep things in order also going to the dances at the Dorothy and the Labour Hall off East Road - strictly in the line of duty. She has sent a picture of herself and colleague Hazel Tilly in Emmanuel Street, Cambridge in 1944

When the A.T.S. left Donkey Common in 1948 squatters moved in by night, turning the army huts into temporary homes as Cambridge struggled to cope with the post-war housing problems. Finally they were demolished but not only the memory lived on - as Fred Chapman of Sawston can testify • his garden shed is made up with parts from one of them, as he helped with the demolition of the huts in the early 1950s.

By complete co-incidence another letter arrived recalling memories of living in old wartime huts - but these were from the First World War. Mrs Violet Brown of Meadowlands lived for about four years in the buildings of the First Eastern General Hospital on the site of what is now the University Library. They were pressed into use to house homeless people and some were finally sold off as chicken sheds.

The huts had a long corridor down the middle and the old wards were divided into five homes with kitchen, living room, bedroom and spare room. There was a communal wash house and toilets. The estate was served by horse and cart coalmen, grocer, fruit and veg seller and, in summer, by a tricycle selling Eldorado ice cream whilst Mr Ley had a general store just inside the gates from Burrell's Walk.

Mrs Brown wishes she had some photographs to help her recall more of what were "good days". Fortunately the Cambridgeshire Collection has several dozen, one of which I feature here and copies of others have been sent to her

READERS WRITE

On another vaguely military theme do you remember when Soham Grammar School Army Cadets went ball-room dancing in their Army boots at Ely High School for Girls. I do and so does Janice Clarke (nee Parr) who would like to invite schoolgirls from the September 1958 intake for a reunion in May. If you've not had your invitation please contact Mrs Christine London (Lem) at 18 St David's Road, Southsea, Hants, PO5 1QN

It is a little-known fact that King Charles is buried in Stretham churchyard - as is his wife. Not the King Charles of course but a one-time owner of the "Royal Oak" pub. Do you know of more eccentric, famous or notorious folk who are commemorated in local churches or churchyards? If so Ian Wilkes of 20 Park Drive, Romford, Essex RM1 4LH would like to hear from you in connection with a new book he is writing - and so should I Did you get your pinta from Keith Wright's dairy at Fenstanton - or more importantly do you have pictures of the old dairy or any of their lorries. If so Jean Ding of Grove Cottage, 28 Bell Lane, Fenstanton, PE18 9JX would appreciate the opportunity of copying them for an exhibition to be held at Fenstanton United Reformed Church on 5th April. Other snaps of old Fenstanton would be welcome - to join those you can see at her display during the afternoon.

PHOTOS SCANNED ON DISK : the shop and news agent at the First Eastern General Hospital - as remembered by Mrs Brown (pic from Cambs Coll) and 2 A.T.S. Provosts in Emmanuel Street, Cambridge in 1944 - from Mrs Perry

MEMORIES by Mike Petty 15th April 1997

"More damage was caused to University buildings in last week's November 5th riots than was caused by enemy action throughout the war".

This was the headline of the undergraduate newspaper "Varsity" on 13th November 1948 over a story recalling how the interior of the Senate House was severely damaged by an explosive charge and about 70 panes of glass broken. In addition three motor vehicles were damaged and four constables and at least four civilians were injured. Two constable's helmets had been returned anonymously to the Police Station during the week.

This seems hardly the date to record university rag incidents but was prompted by a letter recently received from Bob Constable of New South Wales, whose mother lives in Cambridge. It reads "During a recent visit to Cambridge I was browsing in Heffer's Bookshop when I came across "Images of Cambridge" and to my amazement found a photograph of myself as a student taking part in a rag in 1952". When prompted to recall further incidents he confessed that his stockings kept falling down since his fiancée drew the line at providing him with a suspender belt!

The Police Constable that the student Constable was annoying has also been identified. He is Robin Martin of Histon who recognised his old collar number - 135. He had joined the Cambridge Police in August 1951 and must have been in some trepidation at such a potentially explosive occasion,

But who were the other people. Just to remind you it was on Cambridge Market Hill in November 1952, a crisp sunny morning. Drivers into Cambridge were stopped by a stern-faced "policeman" (somewhat younger than PC Martin) and not allowed to pass until a contribution had been exacted for the Poppy Day appeal. Traffic was so congested that bus passengers got off and walked, accosted by half-naked natives, sheikhs, Ruritanian generals and undergraduates carrying chamber pots. Others were attempting to ease traffic congestion by using a decrepit and unlikely-looking steam roller to lay a "spine relief road" with wallpaper.

Perhaps you purchased one of the harem of captive Girton girls (one marked 'slightly soiled, price reduced') who were auctioned for prices ranging from 3d to one shilling, or were threatened by a man with a foaming shaving brush,

If so you will, not remember, because such things were commonplace at Rag Day. But perhaps the photograph will jog your memory. Write to Mike Petty at the News

Dorothy Perry has recalled other memories of a policeman's lot in wartime. "Some American servicemen were selling home made whisky and would meet in the Mitre Pub. It was affecting the soldiers' eyes if they drank it. A civilian police-woman, Nellie Noakes, used to dress as an old lady and sit in the pubs to find out about this. She was a good police-woman and tried out her disguises on the A.T.S. Provosts before going out. She should have a statue set up for her". Do you have memories of Americans in wartime? Write to Mike Petty at the News

"The account of the World War I huts on the University Library site has taken me back many years. I visited the huts when working as a call-boy for the old London and North Eastern Railway about 1927. A railway Goods Guard lived on the site and had to be called. A wooden veranda ran in front of each row of huts. It creaked noisily when I walked on it. I was very unpopular when I woke all his neighbours as well

As a call-boy I worked from midnight to Sam. Those eight hours were spent cycling round Cambridge with a list of names, addresses and calling times. There was no tea break. I used to eat anything I had in shop doorways. All the street lights were out by 11pm and some nights were pitch black. My biggest danger was falling asleep on my cycle - something I managed to do twice" - A. Mansfield, Cambridge, Did you have an unusual job - write to Mike Petty at the News

"I was most interested in the "Looking Back" feature of 24th March 1922 suggesting Nyasaland tobacco planting had prospects as my father was one of the first white people to grow tobacco there in 1926! Father flew out to Africa and in 1926 bought 60 acres at Kasungu which he worked with the help of African villagers. It was virgin soil and the bricks were made of mud and water 'on site'. Our house was also built by father of anything to hand - I can picture it still - I was four years old" - Lavena Hawes, Cambridge

Readers ask

"I find it surprising that there were still German prisoners of war during the floods, nearly two years after the end of the war in Europe. Were they kept as a useful labour force or a bargaining counter? And roughly when were the last repatriated" - answers to Mike Petty at the News

FROM THE NOTES OF A.E. & F.A. REEVE

About 1790 two well-known Cambridge characters were Paris a bookseller and Jackson, a bookbinder. Both were remarkably corpulent but never ate bread. Instead they indulged in meat, poultry and fish. One day when walking a few miles from home, being hungry, they entered a public house where the only provision available was a clod of beef weighing about 14 lbs which had been in salt a day or two. This they consumed, aided by buttered potatoes and pickles. Upon the landlord telling of this the two ever afterwards were called the Cambridge clods - from "Granfields Remarkable Persons", 1819

How many recognise this most unusual picture of an area now dramatically different. Kathleen Goode has written of her memories of the Correspondence College, a terrace of red brick buildings where she had an office on the ground floor. She has a great interest in the various chimney pots in Cambridge streets, but will not have seen these pots from this angle. The picture was taken from the top of the spire of the Cambridge Catholic Church about 1890 and looks down Gonville Place to the junction with Mill Road and the open space of Donkey Common, where we now know army huts were built during the war and the Parkside Swimming Pool now stands.

The picture is part of a panorama which stretches from Downing College across Parkers Piece and Fenners cricket ground to the newly constructed Mill Road railway bridge. It was taken by Scott and Wilkinson, then newly arrived in Cambridge who had their shop in St Andrew's Street, near the New Theatre. This print survives in Downing College but did they take their panoramic camera to other vantage points - if they looked north from the Catholic spire, did they also turn around and look down Hills Road? If you can help write to Mike Petty at the News

MEMORIES by Mike Petty 22nd April 1997

Recently I joined the Mayor, Coun. John Durrant/ on a visit to St Luke's school, Cambridge as part of the process of judging for this years "Trubshaw Prize", the award instituted for research into various aspects of the history of Cambridge

I never cease to be amazed at what schools and their pupils can do with material they find in the Cambridgeshire Collection. There were many old pictures of Market Hill but they were complemented with the children's own interpretations, analysis and surveys - even quizzing stall-holders on their views and passing their comments on to the City Council - what better opportunity than directly to the Mayor himself

But there was yet more to their study. As well as researching the Market they had also turned their attention to the area much nearer to their school in French's Road, nestling in the shadow of the old windmill which is now the centrepiece for a diverse range of businesses. Part of that history involved speaking with old residents and recording their comments. In 1991 they had interviewed Mr & Mrs French and taped their Memories.

"You know the Corn Exchange in Cambridge, well that was a corn market. All the different corn merchants and millers from all around Cambridgeshire used to have stands, like a desk - like your school desk, but high. It had a sloping desk and the lid lifted up, and the front had a little sort of table part sticking out on the front where you used to put all your samples. And when you went to the market you would take a sample of flour, middlings, bran, and then all the different wheat, barley, oats, all those things in little bags, stitched up bags made of cotton calico, and you would fold the top all round and set it there so they could see the corn, and feel it. And the farmers all used to come to the market and bring their sample of wheat and they'd go round all the different millers seeing who'd give them the best price.

"And then Christmas, at the last market of the year we always used to have a real good bit of fun there because we'd start the market off normally at half-past-two and about half-past-three somebody'd let a firework off. Bangers, mind you, bangers and rockets. We didn't have any fancy, pretty ones. And they used to light a rocket on one of the stands down the end of the corn market, put a match to it and it used to go right down the whole length of it and bash into the wall. All the young men used to have a bit of fun there and they'd throw the samples about as well, get a sample of flour and throw it right across. They used to get their suits covered in flour.

"There isn't a corn market any more. Taking samples and dealing, it's all gone. I mean the farmer just rings the miller up and says have you got so many sacks of wheat and the miller turns round and says right I'll send a lorry for it, and it's all bulk. About the fifties it started to die out and then the Corn Exchange was closed down" (I believe in 1965)

I have never found a description of activity in the Corn Exchange before - but thanks to the work of St Luke's children this important aspect of local life has now been recorded. Perhaps you can add to it. Incidentally this forms just one small part of one panel - well done St Luke's, and good luck in the Trubshaw competition.

Meanwhile Morley Memorial School is nearing its 100th birthday and would like to research its history. So if you used to go to Morley and have memories you can share please write to Michael Porter and David Gibson of year 5 at Morley School, Blinco Grove, Cambridge CB1 4TX

READERS WRITE

Memories of bicycle-towed bathchairs ("Memories" 8th April) have come in from Miss Foreman of Sturton Street, Cambridge. She writes that her two of her aunts used one on trips around Cambridgeshire. On one occasion as they struggled up the long hill before Royston the chair came adrift, ran backwards and deposited the elderly aunt in the ditch!

Mrs J. Gill of North Arbury recognised her grandfather and uncle, (Harry Newell) in the photograph, which was one she had never seen before. Flo Larkin of Milton has also ordered copies for her family album and is now seeking a picture to recall memories for her husband, Percy. He was born 80 years ago at the Old Jolly Brewers public house in Union Road, Cambridge. If you can help write to Mike Petty at the News

Can you help with another enquiry, from Judith Butcher of Cambridge over something that has been niggling her? She writes "I find it surprising that there were still German prisoners of war during the 1947 floods, nearly two years after the end of the war-in Europe. Were they kept as a useful labour force or a bargaining counter? And roughly when were the last repatriated"

I know there was a camp at Trumpington and they issued their own 1025 Company newspaper (though I have never seen one). In August 1947 I believe some extra 1,300 prisoners and British staff were transferred there from Radwinter and in April 1948 four British girls joined the cast of a play, performed in German, before the prisoners went home in June. But further information please to Mike Petty at the News

Memories by Mike Petty 29th April 1997

Weekly News reader Mrs Breen of St Neots found memories flooding back when she saw a picture of Grantchester Mill in one of my recent "Pickwick" articles. For her Grandfather used to work there until the traumatic day in 1928 when disaster struck.

It was about 4.30pm on Tuesday 30th October when one of the mill hands filled the oil-engine which worked the machinery when water power was low. A few moments later the room was full of smoke so dense he could not re-enter and this suddenly burst into flames.

Men attempting to fight the fire were beaten back and forced out of the building, leaving their coats and bicycles behind to be consumed by the flames.

Within half an hour two Cambridge fire engines were on the site. They experienced difficulties getting their big Dennis pump working but were soon pouring water from the mill pond over the blazing building, flames now shooting through the windows and the road blocked by the heat.

From everywhere people flocked to watch, cars jammed back towards Trumpington and into Grantchester, hundreds of cyclists arrived from Cambridge, held back by fireman's ladders across the road to act as barriers. Whilst some strove to help firemen, others lamented that they had left their cameras behind. Not so photographer Ted Mott from Trumpington who captured the scene.

It was all too obvious that the battle to save the 13th-century structure was already lost. First the wooden grain hoist on the front of the machine fell with a tremendous crash, blocking the road, then sections of roof gave way, the cracking of red-hot tiles when reached by water reminding some of machine-gun fire. About 200 gallons of petrol were stored in tanks beneath the mill and great efforts were made to prevent this exploding, though at 6.30 a great bang from the Trumpington side indicated that a paraffin tank had burst. By 7.15 ladders could be placed against the walls and soon afterwards firemen could enter for the first-time.

Meanwhile sparks and ashes were showering into the sky to drop in Newnham and to cause motorists to flee from the danger of their cars igniting.

By next morning the mill presented a forlorn spectacle; charred woodwork, twisted heaps of machinery - much of it newly installed and of the most modern pattern - collapsed walls and the stench of smoke told the tale of what had happened. Maize wheat and other grain inside the sack room was still red hot. The mill cat and her kitten had perished in the inferno and onlookers reported hearing the squeal of rats who suffered the same fate

The damage was reckoned at over £15,000 but the loss of such an ancient structure - thought to be that featured in Chaucer's "The Reeve's Tale" was complete. No longer would visitors echo William Wordsworth's sentiments from "Prelude" - "Beside the pleasant Mill at Trumpington, I laughed with Chaucer in the hawthorn shade", and Mrs Breen's Grandad Keates had to look for other employment

Village magazines can be marvellous methods of spreading memories of the history of the locality. The Dry Drayton Newsletter is an excellent example carrying regular contributions from Sid Martin, who at aged 86 has known the village from his schooldays. He has been encouraged to dredge into his fund of memories to recall the people and places he knew when young - including that most important of institutions, the post office and general store.

Sid remembers when it housed the only telephone in the village and was kept by Fanny Walker and her brother Fred, who was the postman. He always rode a lady's cycle which he said was easier to mount and dismount. Fred married the village school teacher and when she died he married her sister. When his second wife also died, Fred married Janet Scambler and they lived in one of the two cottages they owned on Pump Green. When Fred died Janet took over the post round, but she distributed the letters from an old pram.

Nowadays water comes from taps - do you remember when you had to pump it up for yourself?

Another contributor, disguised by the penman "Dryton" (but doubtless known to real locals), recalls the walk to school, a good mile from home. The journey could be long but seldom tedious as there were queen bumble-bees, March hares and large black slugs four-inches long to observe en route. Sometimes there might be a lift to be hitched in a passing tumbrel cart, the driver enjoying the company and the children's' chatter. Sometimes they would whip a top all the way to school and at other times trundle a hoop. These could be obtained from the local refuse tip (a disused pond). The rim of a bicycle wheel was ideal for the purpose and a short stick would push it along quite effortlessly. In those days there was no traffic to avoid; it would not be recommended along the Huntingdon Road today!

Memories of those long-past days are displayed behind the cash tills in the Tesco at Bar Hill - which Sid remembers when it was just open fields. They are large blow-ups of pictures from the Cambridgeshire Collection - an excellent way of recalling days past and bringing history to life.

IF YOU ARE SEEKING A PICTURE TO REVIVE A MEMORY visit the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library or write to Mike Petty at the News

READERS WRITE

Mrs A. Pluck has happy memories of the old Festival Theatre on Newmarket Road, Cambridge, where her husband used to work back-stage. She was able to go behind the scenes and meet many of the actors, some of whom became big stars. She particularly recalls a play called "Love on the Dole" and Kent Walton who took a very good part. She was sad when the Theatre had to close and hopes that it may one day be revived again

DID YOU USED TO GO TO THE FESTIVAL, or were you involved in Amateur Dramatics in days past - write to Mike Petty at the News

MEMORIES 6th May 1997 by Mike Petty

I was opening the Ely Museum the other day (as one does when one writes for the "News") when somebody started talking politics.

There could surely be no political disagreement over the brilliant new Ely Museum with its recreation of the actual cells in which villains were imprisoned - and complete with original graffiti depicting the convict ships which were to carry some to their banishment on the other side of the world or the gallows which were to transport others beyond earthly woes.

By co- incidence I met a relation of the Littleport rioters at Mildenhall the other evening and he will now be visiting the Old Gaol in Market Street, Ely, to see whether his ancestor added his own name to those scratched on the walls. It is open each day except Monday, 10.30-4.30

But the politics under debate revolved around a small broach containing a portrait of a candidate and inscribed "Vote for Morrison-Bell". So who I was asked was he?

According to his campaign literature in the Cambridgeshire Collection you should vote for E.W. Morrison-Bell because he prefers taxing the Foreigner to taxing You, believes that British Work should be kept for British Workmen and is opposed to Socialism, and the loss of individual liberty which would ensue from the tyranny of State officialdom.

He was a Conservative candidate who stood against Liberal the Hon E.S. Montagu in the West Cambridgeshire constituency at the Parliamentary Election of January 1910 and lost by 505 votes. Perhaps Montagu had the better party organisation and certainly he managed to appeal to the younger element of the population if the snap of the goat-powered campaign cart is any guide - was this the forerunner of the 'Battle Bus'?

The election returned a Liberal government but was followed by another in December that year by which time Morrison-Bell had given up. Jack Overhill remembered the December contest in the Saxon Street area of Cambridge, "Nearly eight years old, I went out early with the blue-and-buff ribbons of the Liberal Party pinned on my jacket. Voting fever was high and I exchanged jeers with political rivals sporting the pink-and-white colours of the Tory party".

His two clarion calls "Pink and White - I hate the sight" and "Blue-and buff - I love the stuff" soon got him into trouble with boys supporting the rival party. But he loyally cheered the cart-horses decked with the Liberal colours and booed those bearing the colours of the Tories and in between chanted

"Vote, vote vote for Mr Buckmaster,
Turn old Paget out of town,
For Bucky is the man
And we'll have him if we can,
If we only put our shoulders to the wheel",

Buckmaster lost. It all left a lasting impression on Jack. What are your earliest election memories, Write to Mike Petty at the News

Memories of the German Prisoner-of-War Camp at Trumpington have been flooding in. George Blows of Queen Edith's Way, Cambridge, remembers how St Columba's church organised a committee to befriend the Germans, One of the leading members was A.S. Harris who worked at the "Cambridge Daily News".

He understood their problems for he had been a P.O.W. in Germany in the 1914-18 war and spoke the language. He helped the Germans obtain an old flat bed printing press and with his assistance the prisoners published a camp news sheet for the 1025 people accommodated there. The P.O.W.s also made toys which they sold to camp staff or gave to people who had helped them

By the time the war was over many German cities had been badly damaged, others were in Russian hands and many prisoners who had no family left to go home to elected to stay in England. This is true of one such ex-inmate of the Trumpington camp who now lives in Cherry Hinton. He remembers the Nissen huts, near the old Plant Breeding Institute, which accommodated about 60 people in bunks and where everyone spoke German. From there they were taken out in lorries to work on local farms under an English foreman and to help build a new camp at Bourn.

He may have been escorted by Albert Ablett who served in the Royal Pioneer Corps and now lives in Akeman Street, Cambridge.

For he was one of the English soldiers who took the German prisoners to work on the Bourn camp, and conveyed them to their work in the fields. He also helped guard the camp gate morning and night, though by then there was no hostility and both were young men who had served their country and were anxious to get on with their lives away from military discipline.

They both met and married local girls, one at a Guildhall dance, the other in the Red Cow nearby and both share memories of the hardship of post-war life in Cambridge

Josel Jakobs was one German who came to Cambridgeshire before the war ended - in fact he dropped in by parachute, landing in a field at Warboys in January 1941. There he met Charlie Baldock, Harry Coulson and fish shop owner Harry Godfrey, They were pleased to see him - though the feeling was not reciprocated. For Charlie and his friends were members of the Home Guard and Josel ended up in the Tower of London, where he was shot as a spy.

The story is one of many memories in "Warboys at War 1939/45" compiled by Harold Shelton of 38 Jubilee Avenue, Warboys, PE17 2RT. Harold is anxious to hear from others who can add to his record and assist in his quest to ensure the story of those who fought for their country from country airfields is not forgotten

Are you researching some aspect of Cambridgeshire history; write to Mike Petty at the News

Memories 13th May 1997, by Mike Petty

"An undergrad. hailing from Cheddar
Found his nose getting redder and redder.
For the whisky he drank would have floated a tank! -
He didn't leave much for his 'bedder'"

The limerick was written in January 1922 and featured in one of eight albums full of similar nonsense rhymes which were found on a Cambridge market stall. All were entitled "Soltises sans sagesse" (foolishness without wisdom) and compiled by "Shadrach, Meshach & Abednego"

The mystery sent the buyer, Ruth Jacques of East Road, Cambridge off on a hunt to discover the originators. There was a name in each of the albums - E.H.L. Jennings, with an address in Bournemouth, but that approach drew a blank. There were some clues in the drawings which accompany the poems. One showed a street which might be King's Parade - in the background the name "The Bull." could be seen on an inn sign. Only an insider would know that there was a hotel of that name alongside King's College.

Then a flower seller recognised the Jennings name - and one thing led to another. Slowly it became clear. The words had been written by Harold - then a 19 year-old undergraduate reading modern languages at King's College who enjoyed the work of Edward Lear. The sketches had been made by his twelve-year old sister Peggy -who was to go on to the Royal College of Art, whilst "Abednego" was the baby of the trio, Bridget, then nine, who was in her turn to gain a place at Girton College. Much later Harold had moved back to Cambridge and died in 1986, whilst Peggy still lives here.

But what, I wonder, drove the undergraduate to drink. Perhaps the answer lies in another of the limericks, dated 4th May 1922 - and in the events of the year before

"There once was a freshman from. Merton,
Who loathed anything with a skirt on;
But his views he revised (and who would be surprised?)
When he'd visited Newnham and Girton!"

For in 1921 Cambridge University and its undergraduates were in turmoil. Plans had been announced to allow women to gain the reward of a Cambridge University degree should they sit and pass the same examinations as the male students. It all became a heated debate, and when the decision was agreed led to the burning of the gates of Newnham college and a colossal mock funeral marking "The death of the Varsity" with the corpse of the last male undergraduate being borne on a bier surrounded by aged mourners whose long grey beards dragged in the dust.

Yet the whole issue had also been debated in May 1897. Then undergraduates urged the Senate (the University's ruling body) to reject the proposals with a petition containing over 2,100 signatures, followed by a mass meeting at which only 138 undergrads supported the plans, whilst 1,083 rejected them.

When the day of the voting came special trains were run to and from London to bring Graduates in for the occasion and the Senate House where the vote was to be held was besieged. Dons were bombarded with fireworks, rockets being fired into the building through the windows whilst others "skied" over the roof of the University Library alongside.

When the results of the vote were announced however, and it was seen that the women's cause had been lost by nearly three to one, the massed ranks of students cheered wildly - and pelted the Senate House windows with fireworks, eggs and oranges as the mob on King's Parade forced themselves through the Senate House gates and over the sacred grass

An effigy of a Girton student on a bicycle which had been suspended, from the window of a house on the corner of Trinity Street was ripped down - bringing part of the balcony of the house with it. The figure lost her head and hands and showed what it was made of. It was rushed away and on the Market Hill appeared on the top of a cab, an excited mass of undergraduates surging below.

The cabby struggled frantically, for about a dozen men were soon in the cab, on the top and on the horse. After some persuasion the horse was taken out and with about a score of men tugging at the shafts the cab with the remains of the figure, the bicycle and the cabby on top proceeded on a journey around the town, accompanied by horn blowing, wooden rattles and the discordant noises from human throats.

Yet, said the newspaper, the demonstrations were kept within bounds - but things got much more lively next day!

Press comments on the actual vote was much more severe, "The decision shows a small-mindedness which is utterly discreditable in a body charged with public responsibilities. After this vote it is more than ever apparent that we must look for University reform", said the "Daily Chronicle". The student magazine "Granta" saw things differently: "We have won a great victory at great loss of energy. We have won peace. The big threshing will do much to recommend a Women's University to the authorities at Newnham and Girton. They will not risk another threshing by raising an agitation similar to the last one".

Yet the issue was raised again in 1947 - and that time they won.

Ruth Jacques would like to see the limericks published. If you think you can help write to Mike Petty at the News and I will pass your letters on

READERS WRITE

Mrs Coker of Chesterton recalls the Grantchester Mill fire of 1928 ("Memories" 29th April). "I can remember the incident as if it was yesterday. I was only young at the time - about eight years old. We lived at Newnham and the blaze could be seen there. To a young girl it was quite a sensation, not realizing the danger of it all"

Ken Ward of Ontario, Canada, has appealed to readers for assistance in reviving his memories of Romsey School, Cambridge, between 1940 and 1941 - in particular for any photographs of the time. The head was a Mr Elbourne - from whom he got the cane for mucking about - whilst Mr Stearn was the art master, and there was a Miss Gunn. Ken was there when the brick wall between the girls and boys playground was taken down. He also recollects that on Coldham's Common there was an aircraft crash dump where bits of planes were stacked and this was something of a magnet for lads at the time, although it was patrolled by RAF police their dogs.

If you can help Keith would like to hear from you - and so would I. Please write to Mike Petty at the News

Do you recall a visit to Ely RAF Hospital by the King and Queen during the war years? There is a half-remembered feeling that either on the day before or the day after the visit - which was of course kept secret at the time - a German fighter flew down Lynn Road, Ely, machine gunning everything in sight at precisely the time the Royal entourage had been due to travel that road. Is it true - does anybody know? Write to Mike Petty at the News

Memories 20 May 1997 by Mike Petty

Local historian Michael Bentinck, who has so ably recorded the story of those who fought the enemy, the climate, the conditions and the hard labour in the Far East during the Second World War as now turned his attention to another group of largely unrecorded warriors - the Women's Land Army

E.M. Barraud was one of the first to enlist on the first day of war. She was then working in London as an Insurance Clerk on a wage of £5 a week and with the promise of a pension at the end of it. Instead she filled in a form in the National Service Handbook and found herself accepted in the new Army, her battleground the fields around her home at Eversden.

In the early hours of Monday, September 11th 1939 her employer led her out to his orchard to start picking Monarch plums. "There he left me with a completely uncontrollable ladder, two cob baskets to pick into and a bundle of empty half-sieves. I felt more alone, lost, desolate and incompetent than ever in my life before. I nearly killed myself lugging the ladder about. It seemed to have an overwhelming desire to lie down on the ground, and when I did manage to coax it into position, as soon as I set a foot on the bottom round, it lurched sickeningly, with ominous cracking and creaking of branches. In my complete ignorance and working alone, I did not discover for a week that it was a local custom to knock off for half an hour at ten o'clock for lunch & when I found out I hadn't the courage to tell the truth and claim my money for those extra half hours"

Soon however she looked forward to sitting in the cart lodge on upturned fruit baskets to eat her sandwiches, drink welcome hot tea from a thermos, talk scandal and curse the weather with the other workers.

She learned new skills - handling a farm horse, pitching sheaves in the fields, milking cows - "every fresh job meant a fresh set of unused muscles to break in, till I began to think I should never come to the end of the possible pain". Summing up her first experience she could only conclude that if anybody had realised just how utterly ignorant and inept she was she would never have survived. But she lasted and enjoyed her war work, sharing her experiences with readers of the "Manchester Guardian" and later publishing them in the book "Set my hand upon the plough"

But there must be more memories of Land Army girls than this. Gill Rushworth certainly discovered some when she interviewed three ex landgirls at Swaffham Bulbeck in November 1988. They recalled the hardships: "There was sugar beet - it wouldn't come out of the ground, we used to have to kick it, to pick it up", "We used to pull it out of the ground,, and used to bang two together, then used to lay them in a row one way and then when you came back you'd got to lay the others in another row. Then you went back and had like a scythe affair and chop the tops off and put them in a pile. Your gloves were wet through, your trousers were wet, stayed wet all day, it's no wonder we've all got rheumatics"

"We had some laughs though. We had some fun. Although the first few mornings after you started you couldn't get out of bed; you used to fall out. Then when we used to have a bath you hadn't got to be proud - it used to be sometimes three in a bath. Then you wanted to turn round and have your back washed and you all had to stand up and turn round and sit down again and have your back washed. And it were queuing up for the toilets. Sometimes they were there for half an hour"

Sometimes they worked alongside Prisoners of War. I worked down at Sid Day's potato picking with the Italians. They were quite nice to work with really" "The Germans were good workers, but the Ities were a bit lazy". "Ah but they were a bit more gentlemanly. And they used to make things - these Italians - these wooden things. Like a bif-bat, they had chickens on them and they had strings down and a weight, and when they moved the thing, the chickens used to pick the corn off"

Occasionally the girls helped in the heavy work of digging bog oaks out of the fen ground,; the ancient trees exposed as new deep ditches were dug in the attempt to bring previously undrained fen land under cultivation,, "We used to have to find where they were and then they'd get a tractor with a chain on to hoist them out. And then they used to lay them on the side of the road"

Land Army girls from Manchester were engaged in such work in Burwell Fen in 1942 when news spread that the King and Queen were to visit to see the work which was so essential to keep the nation fed. Photographs record the moment when Manchester farm workers met the Queen of England - the present Queen Mother

These and the few recorded memories are too little testimony to the work of the Land Army girls. If you can add to our knowledge, and assist Michael Bentinck in his history, please write to Mike Petty at the News and I will pass them on

In last week's "Memories" I mentioned some suggestion that there had been a Royal visit to the R.A.F. hospital at Ely which coincided with a German raid. A local newspaper of 24th January 1941 has two items side by side., The first reads "Britain's latest and most beautifully equipped RAF Hospital, brought into service only a few months ago compete with the finest equipment that medical science can devise, received a surprise visit on Saturday afternoon from Their Majesties the King and Queen. Their Majesties arrived at the Hospital about an hour and a half behind schedule"

The second "A quiet little East Anglian village was machine gunned one afternoon this week by a low-flying German plane. Stacks and houses were sprayed with tracer bullets. One of them went through the window of a farm house, smashed the back of a chair and ended up by setting alight the rug in front of the fire. Mr Jack Cranwell stamped on the flames started by the bullet and put them out". Records published after the war give the date as Saturday 18th January - the day of the Royal visit - and the village as Lt Thetford, just down the road from Ely (Ely Standard 24 January 1941 p5)

MEMORIES 28th May 1997, by Mike Petty

My memories of history lessons in Stretham village school are practically non existent - except for the man who came one day and asked for his dinosaur back. When it had been first, discovered in the local gravel pit the experts thought they knew what it was and only took bits pieces for their museum. Then they had another look and realised it was something new, and had to come around the children to ask if anybody had any bones or bits they'd give Cambridge University, Some did - some remain around the village

Our local dinosaur came back to life on Wednesday evening last week when the school staged a village history in music and drama which was simply magnificent. The children from youngest to oldest sang newly-written songs which told the history of England - as seen through local eyes. Poppies were laid in memory of the lads whose names are inscribed on the panels of the church screen in front of which the children paid their tribute. Each child lived the parts they played. They sang of fires and floods, of the church clock by whose tick the world has changed - and of our dinosaur, the oldest thing our village has to offer history.

They also stressed that if the village is to have a future then it is up to them to build on the foundations of the past and recreate the village spirit which saw us cope with all the other Invasions and disasters which have made our communities what they are. But to understand that past we all need the memories of those who helped shape that history - so keep those letters coming in.,

Mrs S. Doggett from Histon has memories of something which happened before she was born. Amongst her family photographs is a postcard showing her father-in-law, Frederick Doggett, in the ruins of a chaff-making factory at Littleport after a fire In June 1906. The Cambridge Independent Press reported the Incident in which several thousand pounds worth of property was destroyed at Fyfe's factory near the railway station. The blaze, which started late at night was blamed on a tramp seeking shelter there, for the fire occurred away from the machinery of the boiler house. Despite the prompt attention of the Littleport fire brigade, whose steam fire engine performed efficiently, there was nothing they could do to arrest the flames. The photograph shows the large cylinders which were used for cooking the hay straw by steam pressure, but what was the process all about, what did they do with the final product. It was obviously important for the factory rebuilt, only to burn down again ten years later. If you can help write to Mike Petty at the News

Cambridge college porters are reputed to know everything, but Richard Lloyd from Emmanuel College has sought the solution to something puzzling the best brains of the college. Recent renovation work at the shops in St Andrew's street has resulted in the removal of the sign for the fashion shop "Vogue". Now revealed is an older sign saying "A, Beckley, Milliner and Draper". So when were they there? Research through the files of Spalding's Directory shows the shop trading between 1911 and 1935.

An advertisement in the programme of the Royal Show when it to Cambridge in 1922 shows they specialised in millinery, hosiery, lingerie and summer frocks - something about which I little. Did you ever shop there - or do you remember any of the other ladies outfitters, like George Stace or "The Silk Shop" opened by Gordon Thoday in 1932.

Thoday recorded his memories of early days as a shop worker in 1921 and being handed a green folder entitled "Rules for employees" outlining various offences for which staff could be fined. They included "For not being in business at the appointed time, or leaving before all is straightened, fine 6d." "For losing the sale of any article without first calling the attention of buyer or shop walker, fine 6d" and "For gossiping or laughing together in business hours (customers are liable to suppose that laughing and gossiping concerns them), fine 1/-". Do you have memories of the draconian or amusing side of shop work - what time did you have to start, how long did you work in the evening? Write to Mike Petty at the News

Memories of school days at Romsey School during the war have come in from a number of readers, following the appeal by Ken Ward of Ontario in a recent "Memories". Patrick Mills of Cambridge particularly members Miss Gunn, a good teacher who used to tell stories to distract and calm the children whilst they sat in the underground air raid shelters on the other side of Coleridge Road. He had to listen attentively and be able to repeat the story afterwards. Colin Reed of Quy was a friend of our Canadian correspondent and recalls the large concrete pipes which were stood on end and filled with chalk to prevent enemy aircraft landing on Coldham's Common, the anti-aircraft guns near Marshall's airport and how children had to wear gum shields to protect their mouths when the guns opened up. The scrap dump on the Common is also recalled by R. Brownlie of Royston who remembers how scrap metal from crashed aircraft were brought on "Queen Mary" long loaders from the crash site and that it was eventually loaded on to goods wagons at Barnwell junction railway station. He hopes to visit Ontario shortly and may meet up and share memories face to face. Thank you for all the letters, they will be passed on

Memories 3rd June 1997, by Mike Petty

The announcement of the impending closure of the ABC Cinema in Regent Street, Cambridge, formerly known as the Regal, has brought memories of several readers,

Reg Wood of Saffron Walden was actually there on its opening morning in April 1937 when Cambridge's new purpose-built cinema rose from the ashes of the old Castle Hotel which had burned down three years earlier. The opening film he recalls was "Swingtime" with Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers and he queued with his girlfriend for two hours to get in.

They were impressed by the multi-floral carpets, the beige curtain splashed with autumn leaves and by the mighty Compton organ with its illuminated console, the swelling music played by Cecil Atkinson filling the building. They were also impressed with the silver coloured Souvenir Programme they were given which explained the latest technology they had installed and outlined the forthcoming programmes.

Perhaps Reg unknowingly found himself sitting alongside another "News" reader, Miss Daphne Foreman of Sturton Street who knew it in the post-war days when as a young office worker she went with friends for a satisfying weekly evening out. Like Reg she remembers having to queue down the passage beside the cinema and into Downing Place, shuffling forward each time the Commissionaire, resplendent in black and gold uniform called out the newly vacated places: "two seats at 1/6 and one at 2/3" -causing some heart-searching as to whether to go in then or wait, until a block of seats came up together. Often she finally got in half-way through the film and had to see it round to the point she'd come in at.

If you did get in at the start there would be the supporting film, then the Pearl and Dean advertisements before the lights came up for the interval - and with them the cinema organ. Then out would come the usherettes with chocolates or ice-cream - and later with air-fresheners spraying the aisles liberally. And when the film had finished everybody stood, the tip-up seats pressing against the backs of their legs, for the National Anthem.

Then it was out to the fresh air of a Cambridge evening for an Espresso coffee and fairy cake at Snaxs, the first of the coffee snack bars, a few doors away from the cinema.

Before the war the Regal staged Sunday night celebrity concerts which included top artistes including Paul Robson and Myra Hess the pianist, who Reg remembers seeing. Others will recall the great days of the early 1960s when touring groups of pop stars used it as their venue, and more crowds queued to see Adam Faith, The Rolling Stones, Cliff Richard or The Beatles - to see them, but not to hear for as one reviewer recorded in 1960 "screaming teenagers sparsely mixed with incredulous and slightly-dazed parents ... the show was deplorably uninteresting but the audience gave a magnificent performance".

Now soon, it seems, all this will be just memories.

READERS WRITE

When Keith Ward of Canada sought your assistance in reviving memories of his schooldays at Romsey School during the war he stirred many reminiscences. Patrick Mills of Chartfield Road thinks he actually remembers him. Both he and Colin Reed of Quy share the recollections of the aircraft crash dump near Coldham's Common which, unofficially, provided youngsters with sledges to ride down the butts in the winter snow - and where children used to upset the Home Guard training activities. Dad's Army might have been a match for any invading enemy but local boys knew the common's ditches and hedges far better!

R.B. Brownlie, now of Royston, was one of the crash crews of RAF 54 Maintenance Unit which brought the wrecked aircraft to the site in long low loaders and arranged for major salvageable sections to be transported back to the manufacturers or specified repair units. He was billeted with a Mr & Mrs Breadman of 463 Newmarket Road and was extremely well looked after - apart from being harried by schoolboys!

The letters are en route to Canada.

Aviation historian Michael Bowyer asks for your help. In Cambridge cemetery is a long row of graves commemorating some of 169 airmen whose planes crashed when returning from a raid over Berlin in December 1943 on one of the most disastrous nights of the war. One Lancaster came down in a field near Hardwick which had in 1911 become one of the world's earliest military airfields. During army manoeuvres of September 1912 it was used by some of the greatest early aviators including Geoffrey de Havilland. The story of that airfield is now becoming clear, what is lacking are any pictures of early flights from Hardwick. Other memories of the early days of aviation would also be welcome. If you can help Michael Bowyer in his research please write to me at the News and I will pass the information on to him

Mike Lawrence of Royston has sent me a copy of an excellent history of the Prisoner of War camp there, published by the Friends of Royston Museum in 1991. It is full of details of camp life, the barbed wire fences and look-out towers, the burial of one inmate in a coffin draped with a swastika which caused local women to throw stones at the cortege. There is an account of a break-out when the prisoner made his bid for freedom by hitching a lift in a passing lorry. Sadly for him it was an Army lorry and he was delivered straight to the police station. The author is anxious to add to his knowledge and would like to hear from anybody involved In Camp 29 Royston West, especially any Italian prisoners-of-war. Write to Mike Petty at the News and I will pass your letters on.

MEMORIES, by Mike Petty 10th June 1997

The mention of Miss Annie Beckley's ladies fashion shop in St Andrews Street, Cambridge, whose name-sign has just been revealed after fifty years, has prompted many memories,

Peggy Miller of Orwell used to accompany her mother on shopping trips in the 1920s and 1930s and Beckley's was one shop she did not mind visiting. She was not interested in the clothes but sat on the carpeted floor in front of a large blazing fire and played with the large fussy cat. She remembers Miss Beckley as a gentle, welcoming lady who would have been quite at home in a Jane Austen novel.

Mrs Dora Chown of Cambridge remembers buying good quality lingerie and silk stockings there – 2/11 a pair, and continued to patronise it after Miss Beckley retired in 1935 and the shop became "Vogue", run by Mark Harris and his wife. But it was from "Modiste", which was run by Joe and Les Harris, that she purchased her honeymoon outfit.

Reg Wood of Saffron Maiden has marvellous memories of other fashion shops like Separates in Petty Cury & Heyworth's who moved from Burleigh street to Sidney Street in the shop later occupied by Goads, But he recalls that the one shop that catered for domestic servants was Lavenders on the corner of Kings Parade, and Bene't Street. They stocked the print, morning frocks and black, brown, and blue afternoon frocks with white and coffee coloured cuffs and aprons - and the white starched aprons for morning wear.

One shop everybody remembers was George Stace in Petty Cury. Peggy bought ribbon and buttons there, and was served by Miss Kent, an upright, dignified, friendly lady. Dora bought gloves there (though for winter wear it had to be the fur-backed gloves from Coats at 19s.11d) and Reg, well he, being a gentleman, preferred Marks and Spencer where nothing cost more than 5s. - or at least it didn't in the 1930s.

There were bargains to be had at Stace's in July 1951 when the shop closed down, "It had come", said the "News" "to stand in the mind of the shopping public for good, solid, middle class trade. It was not necessarily a smart one, but it met the needs of a definite section of the community. It catered excellently for the matron and for the moderately well-to-do family of both town and county". Its closure was a serious blow to its customers, many of whom had shopped there confidently for many years. As one lady commented "My mother bought her wedding dress there, and I bought mine. My daughter's wedding dress came from there and I was hoping my granddaughter's would be bought there too, in due course,"

What shops do you remember - do you have any of their old billheads - write to Mike Petty at the News

PHOTO: THE HEIGHT OF EDWARDIAN FASHION: George Stace's ladies dress shop about 1910; credit Cambridgeshire Collection

PHOTO STORY NO.2: ARCADE

The announcement last week of the proposals to give Cambridge a "Grand Arcade", based around Robert Sayle's shop in St Andrew's Street prompts memories of that other "Arcade", the one just at the back of Sayle's shop. When the new (present) Corn Exchange was opened in 1875 Cambridge had to decide what to do with the old one, which stood on the junction of Corn Exchange Street, Downing Street and St Tibbs Row - the site of the present Holiday Inn.

For a while it was used as a shopping centre and then In 1884 Ernie Hayward converted it into a variety music hall which became famed for the excellent variety entertainments given there. It closed in 1895, its demise brought about by a very hard frost which prompted other entrepreneurs to flood an area of Lingay Fen and install electric lighting. The novelty of skating by floodlight emptied the Arcade, a Marie Lloyd concert had to be cancelled and the venture closed down. It was subsequently used as a garage and demolished in 1951.

This is not to be confused with the Marcade, an indoor market on East Road where they claimed you could shop in comfort, undercover in the warm at varied stalls. It opened in 1972 and was destroyed by fire in 1975, only to reopen and continue until 1981

Let us hope neither fate befalls this new manifestation of an old idea.

READERS WRITE

Can you help a Milton reader reinforce her husband's memories? The search is on for a photograph of the Jolly Brewers public house In Union Road, Cambridge. If you can assist please write to Mike Petty at, the News. Do you have memories of a favourite pub -write to Mike Petty at the News

Mike Lawrence of Royston has sent me a copy of an excellent history of the Prisoner of War camp there, published by the Friends of Royston Museum in 1991. It is full of details of camp life, the barbed wire fences and look-out towers, the burial of one inmate. In a coffin draped with a swastika which cause local women to throw stones at the cortege. There is an account of a break-out when the prisoner made his bid for freedom by hitching a lift in a passing lorry. Sadly for him it was an Army lorry and he was delivered straight to the police station. The author is anxious to add to his knowledge and would like to hear from anybody involved In Camp 29 Royston West, especially any Italian prisoners-of-war. Write to Mike Petty at the News and I will pass your letters on.

Mrs P. Zupan of Trumpington has also added to my knowledge of Prisoners-of -war with a true story of romance which blossomed between an English girl and a German prisoner at Whittlesford camp. It appears that love could overcome barbed wire and a bicycle span a separation of over 40 miles. It was true love too for the romance survived over 50 years of marriage.

MEMORIES, by Mike Petty 17 June 1997

The heavy rains may have done something to ease the water shortage but when reading through the files of the "News" of 75 years ago it is obvious that the problem is not new.

On 14th June 1922 the paper was reporting on the pros and cons of a joint water scheme for the Ely area being aired at a public inquiry. A principal feature was the stout opposition to the scheme put up by a number of local parishes, mainly on the grounds that they had an ample supply from their village pumps, though one conceded that perhaps they would welcome piped water but not the cost of providing it.

The Medical Officer for the area gave evidence on the need of the scheme. Over the previous four years there had been 17 cases of typhoid and 41 of diphtheria due to polluted water. He pointed out that of all the pumps he had examined only two were satisfactory, the rest were highly contaminated with organic matter. This was dismissed Mr Everitt of Wilburton as being "Tommy rot" for the people there, where they had wells, lived to far greater age than those in the towns where they had water supply.

The view of the people of Lt Downham had been made plain at the recent parish council, when the candidates who supported the scheme were "bowled clean out by three to one". Downham people did not want the scheme and would not have it if they could help it. At Littleport however the position was more supportive for the majority of the inhabitants drank water from the River Ouse - and Ely emptied its sewage into that river making it totally unfit for drinking purposes - absolutely stagnant and putrid.

Mr Darby of Sutton pointed out that the principal water supply came not from wells, but from rain-water tanks - but the Medical Officer replied none of these were sufficient to hold more than a week's supply, forcing people to wells and pumps when their own supply ran out. It would not be so bad if the pump were not so stiff, but it could go hard and people had their methods of pumping. Some found it was easier to push the handle down to its lowest point and then lean over it and force the water out by a short series of downward thrusts, whilst others would raise the handle to its highest point and then jerk it down to nose level, both hands clasped over the handle.

Sometimes the man of the house would collect the water on his way to work, carrying it home again with the heavy palls swinging from broad wooden yolks, or perhaps filling a two-wheeled water cart which he left for his wife or children to fetch a little later.

If you wanted a complete roll call of the village then Monday was the best day to watch the pump. From six o'clock in the morning onwards there would be an almost incessant squeaking and rattling as one after the other they came along to get the water for the weekly wash. One of the compensations in pumping was that it was a sociable business; in half an hour at the pump you could see almost everybody, hear all the news & more than all the scandal.

Village life would never be the same again if piped water were supplied!

.....

Following my appeal for old billheads last week Mr A, Bates of Cambridge has sent a copy of a bill from A. Wehrle & sons of 29 Sidney Street, Cambridge, dated September 1892 when John Sharp purchased a watch worth £4.10.0. He put £1.0.0 down and paid the balance off in nine instalments varying from four shillings to £1.2.0. All In all he ended up paying £5.0.0 for his £4.10.0 watch.

Mrs Janet Daniels of Pemberton Terrace had an interesting find under the floorboards of her house. It was a credit note from Robert Sayle made out to a previous owner, Mrs Gerald Currie In 1911. It was to a forgotten item of apparel, camisoles (about which I know very little!). Because the credit note is somewhat plain I have copied a more ornate bill from the Cambridgeshire Collection (date uncertain)

READERS WRITE

Can you help Bury St Edmunds Cathedral? The Director of their Friends organisation is trying to locate Mrs Joyce Pugh who left there to move to Cambridge in 1964. She was an artist of a number of fine pictures published as Christmas cards in the 1960's. They would like to reproduce one again. It is an evocation of the arrival at the Abbey of Edward I and Queen Eleanor about 1300. If you know the artist or the whereabouts of the painting they would love to hear from you. Write to Mike Petty at the News and I will pass your letter on

Charles Barnard of Foxton remembers the early days of the Regal cinema. He writes: "At the rear of the cinema was a cycle store where we could leave our bikes in safety for 2d or 3d. On the way home we used to stop at a fish and chip shop opposite the "Unicorn" in Trumpington which I believe was kept by a gentleman by the name of Burbridge. As he was almost ready for closing he often piled us extra chips on and we finished out supper off with a bottle of Wadsworth's minerals. The fish and chips cost 5d and the mineral 3d"

MEMORIES by Mike Petty, 24th June 1997

Just 100 years ago this week the country was celebrating a great Royal Occasion - the Diamond Jubilee of Queen Victoria. Inevitably the Cambridge Daily News looked back on the events of a long and glorious reign,

Over the previous 60 years the number of University students had doubled and despite great growth in college accommodation many were still lodged out in the town. New courses and departments including the museums on the Downing site and the Botanic Garden in Trumpington Street had been established. Students no longer needed to be adherents to the doctrines of the Church of England, Fellows no longer celibate and relations with the town had greatly improved.

The town of Cambridge itself had changed out of all recognition, with massive housing expansion, new churches - including the recently-completed Catholic Church. The railway had arrived in 1845, but due to University pressure the station had been built amidst open fields - now disappearing under houses.

There had been dramatic change in the town centre following the reconstruction of Market Hill after a fire in 1849 which had threatened the entire central area, the building of a new Corn Exchange and the new buildings of Gonville and Caius College amongst others.

Cambridge had gained supplies of gas, water and electric light, benefited by the arrival of telegraph, telephone and tram - and even sewage was being laid on to clean up the polluted River Cam.

Outside Cambridge lay the independent settlement of Chesterton, still obstinately separate despite the town's blandishments. Elsewhere in the rural county the open-field system - with strips in each field - had been swept away by Enclosure and for a while agriculture had prospered. But there had been hardships too and many farmers had faced ruin. Now land which had previously grown wheat was devoted to plum, apple and pear trees supplying the Metropolitan markets of the great towns.

One person who had lived through those changes was Daisy Chapman who had attended Victoria's coronation feast on Parkers Piece in 1838 and in 1897 she was presented with a certificate by the Mayor, Horace Darwin.

Horace (youngest son of Charles Darwin) & himself a graduate of the University had a flair for instrument design at a time when the University's newly opened scientific departments were pushing at the frontiers of knowledge. In 1881 he established the Cambridge Scientific Instrument Company which prospered and diversified into world-wide markets - the forerunner of the modern "Cambridge Phenomenon".

One of Darwin's early apprentices was W.G. Pye who went on to work at the Cavendish Laboratory and then establish the firm which carried his name. This too diversified and pioneered many advances and developments, including of course radio, a side of the business developed by Charles Orr Stanley. Now his grandson is endeavouring to record something of their achievements.

This attracted the attention of Mrs S. Proctor of Milton for her father was indirectly involved in one element of their pioneering work. She writes "I was particularly interested in the fact that Pye installed the first radio controls in Camtax taxis. This was because my father, Mr Percy Crisp, was featured in an article with a photograph about this and I am hoping that you may be able to trace this for me. It was around the spring of 1947"

In fact it was on the 9th August 1947 that the "News" could headline "Cambridge leads the way", reporting how Pye Telecommunications VHF radio telephone equipment had been installed in 12 Cambridge taxicabs. Each car carried a transmitter and receiver, a control unit, loudspeaker and rod antenna. "The sets are a marvel of compactness and the loud-speaker and control are housed in the glove pocket. The set - an 11-Inch cube - is mounted in the boot". Initial tests showed that satisfactory results could be obtained over a 10-mile range.

It was the first such experiment in Britain, and possibly, enthused the Company, in the world. Certainly the Americans had nothing like it. But "News" readers knew better. Within a week or two P.B. Harvey was writing to his parents in Cavendish Avenue, Cambridge from HMS Sheffield. He had just left Montreal Canada where this type of public service had been in regular use for some time.

Now any readers who have further information on this, or other memories, papers or material relating to early developments of Pye can help a new biography of the company's boss, C.O. Stanley. Please write to Mike Petty at the News and I will pass the Information on.

(PICTURES : card presented to Daisy Chapman to commemorate Jubilee and a choice of either the cutting CDN 9 Aug 1947, or one of two views of Camtax Taxis near the Round Church)

READERS WRITE

Mrs Peg Bullen of Cambridge writes, "In answer to your appeal in the C.D.N. I well remember the "Jolly Brewers" public house in Union Road, Cambridge. My father, Mr H. Porter, used to go there on Saturday evenings in the summer. My brother and I were sometimes taken for a lemonade - I think we had to sit on a wall. I remember in the week-day we used to go to Miss Sadler's shop with a half penny and take ages to buy some sweets. Then there was the bread shop and the Muffin Man. I used to get dad's Woodbine 3d from Wilsons. They were such happy days. Sorry to carry on by there are so many memories of those days before the war"

Mrs Christine Newman of Chesterton writes, "I lived near this unforgettable shop in Victoria Road, Cambridge, from 1926 until 1939 & then when I came to live in Old Chesterton I found an identical one. These shops were called "Boynton and Wright" and were owned by two sisters. They were wonderful haberdashery shops & they sold just about anything a woman could possibly need. Dusters, tea towels, yards of elastic, ribbons, tape and lace, handkerchiefs, corsets, needles, vests, aprons. You think of it & they had it. One of the interesting things about the shop was when you paid the price was often something three farthings. We never-got the farthing change, instead we were given a pack of pins. I think they closed in the 1950's.

MEMORIES 1st July 1997, by Mike Petty

On 27th June 1972 the Cambridge Evening News carried a picture reminiscent of the war. For it showed the rubble that, was Alexandra Street as the bulldozers moved in on Petty Cury and the streets behind to make a clearance as part, of the Lion Yard scheme - proudly proclaimed as the "biggest redevelopment scheme yet in England, if we omit the blitzed cities".

The old streets swept away in the 1970s had for the most part themselves been rebuilt about a hundred years earlier to make smart addresses for organisations such as the Bell Telephone Company, the Cambridge Street Tramways Company and the YMCA, which, I believe played a significant role in the entertainment scene - your Memories welcome please.

Today many of the Lion Yard units are empty and proposals are in hand for a second remodelling with new shops and an eating area on the little-known open space of the roof-top Heidelberg gardens - named after Cambridge's twin-town in Germany, although German action never caused such widespread destruction of the town centre as city planners.

Of course in 1939 nobody knew what impact the War would have. One thing was certain: civilians would be hurt. So school children were scrambled out of towns to the safety of the countryside. As a child from Bethnal Green School recorded; "In London the streets are very stuffy, and supposing a gas-bomb were dropped by a German plane the gas would hang about for a long time, but in Littleport it, would disappear into the open fenland", So his school learned to live with Littleport people, and Littleport people had to adapt to living with Londoners.

Many of the evacuees into the area around Ely were Jewish and great arrangements were put, in place so that they could continue to live their lives in as normal a way as possible. Their presence had a worrying effect on some local people. In February 1941 a Sutton girl claimed that she had heard Lord Haw Haw promise that "every village on the Isle of Ely would be smashed for taking Jewish refugees"

Now some of the Jewish Evacuees' stories have been published by Soham Village College in a booklet entitled "Furriners"

Norman Leff, a retired chartered accountant, records his memories. "On Friday morning, 1st September 1939, I kissed my mother goodbye before going off to school to be evacuated. My mother kissed me quite cheerfully when I left home, but when I returned because I had forgotten something, my mother was crying. I left again carrying a kit bag and gas mask over my shoulder. It was generally believed that London would be obliterated as soon as the war started, so it was not surprising my mother cried - and so many other mothers cried. Perhaps that Friday should be called Cryday.

"We trooped off to Liverpool Street Station and time later arrived at Isleham. We were taken to the village school and awaited "adoption" by our future foster parents. We soon became adept at "scrimping", stealing apples, pears and plums. It was easy. All we had to do was flick and twist and the fruit was on its way to our mouths'

Being Londoners they thought village people odd. "Islehamites spoke rather strangely and we used to mimic them. After all we were the sophisticated Londoners from those high class slums and cobbled streets of the capital city, I think the locals were a little bemused. A horde of Londoners had descended on them, Jewish Londoners no less. One impression was that, never having seen Jews, they thought we had horns growing out of our heads "To our surprise we found that anyone from outside Isleham was referred to as a "furriner".
Imagine what they thought of Londoners from more than five miles away - "B ----- furriners"

Not all the youngsters stayed. Many returned home preferring to be bombed out in London than to die of boredom in the fens. Some suffered just that fate.

Michael Rouse at Soham Village College is anxious to add to his record of Jewish evacuees in that area. Write to Mike Petty at the News and I will pass your letters on.

Mrs Wendy Maskell recalls memories of Romsey School, Cambridge. She writes "I was there from 1940 to 1944 and can remember taking my gas mask to school each day, together with my "Oxo" tin containing rations in case of prolonged air raids. As soon as the Air Raid Siren sounded we were marched in orderly lines across Coleridge Road and into the underground shelters opposite the school. I can still recall the dank smell of these shelters. Our teachers would keep up our spirits by leading us in singing old favourites such as "John Brown's Body" and "Ten Green Bottles". This used to drown out the sound of aircraft overhead. I vividly remember the afternoon the German bombs fell on Mill Road Railway Bridge and people living "under the bridge" lost their homes. This brought the war very close!"
But there were happy memories of playground games: marbles, jinks, three balls and skipping. Romsey girls had their own rhymes to accompany the skips.

One favourite was:

"Mary Ann at the pawnshop door.

Baby in her arms and a parcel on the floor.

She asked ten-and-six but they only gave her four
So she knocked the handle off the pawnshop door!"

What rhymes did you sing : write to Mike Petty at the News

Memories, by Mike Petty 8th July 1997

July 3rd 1922 was a day possibly unique in England. For that was the day on which the Duke of York unveiled a War Memorial that was not there at the end of Station Road in Cambridge.

The date was booked, the dignitaries arranged, the crowds assembled. All that was needed was good weather. But 3rd July 1922 brought heavy rain and fierce wind, flapping the canvas covering of the yet-to-be unveiled figure underneath.

Unbeknown to the crowds there was another factor threatening the success of the event. The bronze figure, destined to stand on the plinth was not in fact there.

It had been designed by a Canadian sculptor, Tait Mackenzie and modelled in his studio at the University of Pennsylvania. The inspiration for the head was an Undergraduate of Christ's College, Kenneth Hamilton, and although MacKenzie had over a year to complete it he found he could just not capture the right expression on the face of a private soldier in full kit on his triumphal return after the war.

As time slipped away he confined himself to his studio, living like a hermit until finally he achieved what he sought. But then disaster struck. For the ship that was to bring the mould over to England had to search around for additional cargo and arrived too late for the bronze to be cast.

Thus it was that a plaster copy, painted to look like bronze was erected, and covered with a tarpaulin. The wind threatened to chafe the covering against the figure and the rain threatened to dissolve the plaster before the eyes of the crowd.

In the event it all passed off with appropriate solemnity and dignity. Then at 4 o'clock on the morning of 11th July 1922 a lorry drew up at the corner of Station Road. It had come from the foundry in Thames Ditton. Mr Kett and ten of his men were waiting and by the time that people were alert to the fact the impostor had been removed and the real figure securely fixed in position. By ten o'clock the scaffolding had been removed and the "Homecoming" was finally in place

For a short while the two figures had stood side by side. They were not identical twins for, having seen the plaster figure in place, Tait McKenzie had made slight modifications to its successor. And as far as I know nobody took any pictures of the change-over taking place

READERS WRITE

Charles Barnard of Foxton writes.

"My wife and I have a wooden coat hanger which bears the following on both sides: 'F. Suttle, Ladies and Gents tailor, 133 Fitzroy Street & 50 Regent Street'. I am sure that some of your readers must remember these shops but I cannot, although I have known these two streets for almost 70 years since I was nine years old. Does anyone know too when this business closed down?

Also written on the hanger in ink with what looks like one of those old nib pens is the name H. Osbourn. It would be most interesting if anyone has a clue as to whom this person was. My wife and I have no Idea how we came by it, only we have had It a long time"

This seemed too interesting a query to resist so when I was in the Cambridgeshire Collection I did a little digging. According the Spalding's Street Directories Suttles were at 133 Fitzroy Street until about 1922. But then they moved further down the street where they continued until the Second World War. They advertised in the second edition of Conybeare's "Rides around Cambridge", published 1902 when they offered lounge suits from 35/- or the latest in ladles coats and skirts from £1.10.0. It might seem a little pricey but - as they emphasised in Westrope's Year Book for Cottenham and area in 1909: "It Is better to be out of pocket than to be out of fashion, nobody minds who you are, so long as, you mind what you wear. A badly cut coat will blight a man in mid career"

Obviously this applied to Harold Osbourn who lived at 57 Humberstone Road until 1920 or thereabouts. But who he was and what he did I rely on others to tell us

Peter Prime of Ely writes of his memories of Pye chief C.O.Stanley, or, as he was known on the shop floor "the old man".

"I started work at Pye in the early fifties as an apprentice. I was fortunate to have started in the research department at a time of many achievements. The under-water camera which found the Comet, the development of the zoom lens, and of course work on t.v. sets. I can remember being sent into Cambridge to buy wood grain wallpaper to stick on to cabinets to enable C.O. to decide which grains would be used on the new sets. I think they call it "market research" now.

I would like to tell you a little about C.O. An elderly Irish lady worked as a cleaner. One day she bought a bed - because it was a bargain - for her son in Ireland, but she did not know how she could get it to him. One of the draughtsmen said 'When you see C.O. ask him if he will send it in one of the articulated box vans that go to Larne'. Some days later C.O. came though with some of the managers. The lady went straight up to him and said 'I have a bed to go to Ireland, will you sent it for me?' He said 'I will see'. The draughtsman was hiding behind his board and we were all 'very busy". A van was sent to collect the bed. It was packed in the despatch department, and sent to Ireland - at no cost to the lady. This was the sort of man C.O. was.

When I was working on the head of a record player called "The Black Box" the tool was not working very well, and I was not happy. As I worked a voice behind me said 'How is it going'. I replied 'not too good' - or words to that effect. The voice then said 'I think I have come at the wrong time'. On turning round C.O. stood there. He patted me on the shoulder, and walked away with a big grin on his face.

I am sure you will receive many letters about this gentleman"

MEMORIES, by Mike Petty 15th July 1997

The appeal for memories of the early days of Pye Radio has encouraged various readers to put pen to paper

Peter Prime of Ely writes of his memories of Pye chief C.O.Stanley, or, as he was known on the shop floor "the old man".

"I started work at Pye in the early fifties as an apprentice. I was fortunate to have started in the research department at a time of many achievements. The under-water camera which found the Comet, the development of the zoom lens, and of course work on t.v. sets. I can remember being sent into Cambridge to buy wood grain wallpaper to stick on to cabinets to enable C.O. to decide which grains would be used on the new sets. I think they call it "market research" now.

I would like to tell you a little about C.O. An elderly Irish lady worked as a cleaner. One day she bought a bed - because it was a bargain - for her son in Ireland, but she did not know how she could get it to him. One of the draughtsmen said 'When you see C.O. ask him if he will send it in one of the articulated box vans that go to Larne'. Some days later C.O. came though with some of the managers. The lady went straight up to him and said 'I have a bed to go to Ireland, will you sent it for me?' He said 'I will see'. The draughtsman was hiding behind his board and we were all 'very busy'. A van was sent to collect the bed. It was packed in the despatch department, and sent to Ireland - at no cost to the lady. This was the sort of man C.O. was.

When I was working on the head of a record player called "The Black Box" the tool was not working very well, and I was not happy. As I worked a voice behind me said 'How is it going'. I replied 'not too good' - or words to that effect. The voice then said 'I think I have come at the wrong time'. On turning round C.O. stood there. He patted me on the shoulder, and walked away with a big grin on his face.

I am sure you will receive many letters about this gentleman"

Phyllis Cook of Montague Road, Cambridge recounts a sidelight on Pye's wartime work; she writes :

"There is a lane running at the back of the houses in Chesterton Road and Montague Road. Its original purpose was for ponies and traps used by residents of Chesterton Road. At this time the war was still on and according to reports German spies were everywhere. My father was taking his evening walk out into the lane, up Haig Road and Cam Road (which were turned into Elizabeth Way) with a stop at the Fleur de Lys pub for a drink and a chat with the boys to put the world right. This evening as he stepped into the lane there stood a man on a box with a curious telephone in his hand which he was speaking into. Do father retraced his steps to the front and made his way up the road to St Regis (headquarters of Civil Defence - more memories please) where a police constable was posted every night to report a German spy in the lane. Next day a policeman called to report that it was just Pye testing a new radio for cars. Father was quite disappointed"

READERS WRITE

"I lived in the village of Newton when a child and our first water supply was connected in November 1952. Previous to that we fetched out daily water two buckets a day from the pump which was shared with twelve other residents in the road. At the rear of our house we had a large rain water butt which caught rainwater from the rood by a downpipe which had a stocking over the end to catch any debris. When the mains was eventually connected we had one cold water tap per house" - A. Bates, Cambridge

Miss Marion Bavey of Cambridge has written an interesting letter about Romsey School in wartime and memories of her teachers. One (perhaps best not named) found the best way to deal with unruly boys was to roar at them: "You horrible little boy, I'll wipe the floor with you; you're not worth finding in a dustbin!" Wendy Maskell also remembers that this teacher had a habit of swinging her glasses round and round as she taught and the children would watch fascinated to see if she would drop them. On one memorable day they broke and flew across the classroom. Something else for the dustbin, perhaps!

One reader writes: "I remember the church in Trinity Street, Cambridge, built over the pavement, one had to walk under the tower. It stood on two gigantic pedestals, the tower since demolished". This proves the longevity of Cambridge folk - for the church and its tower was knocked down over 130 years ago!

Memories 22nd July 1997, by Mike Petty

Cambridgeshire's wayside railway stations seem unlikely places for tales of strife. Many stand deserted, forgotten remnants of a transportation system that once saw excitement only when the steam train would chuff to a halt whilst farm produce was loaded for transport to markets far away.

Not all stations have led a dull existence, One's mind obviously turns to the wartime excitement at Soham where an ammunition train-caught fire and only the heroism of the driver, guard and signalman combined to detach a burning waggon and drag it far enough from the village to prevent adjacent trucks exploding, There are pictures of that disaster and people remember it,

Yet just 50 years ago there was another and very similar incident which is seldom remembered just a few miles away, between Six Mile Bottom and Fulbourn. Once more it involved burning bombs and the heroism, of railwayman.

On 23rd July 1947 a special goods train pulled by two engines in tandem was en route from Barham in Norfolk to Barry Docks. There was an escort of R.A.F. personnel for it included 40 open wooden wagons packed with old mustard gas bombs due to be dumped in the sea. It was always a hazardous assignment, especially with steam locomotives where sparks from the engines could easily be wafted on to the open bombs. But it was just part of the job

As they passed Six Mile Bottom station Driver Frederick Smart noticed one waggon was on fire, He alerted Fireman Alfred Chandler on the second engine and the train was stopped, Chandler jumped down and uncoupled the burning waggon from the rear part of the train, The engines then continued for 50 to 60 yards, stopped and disconnected the blazing bomb-load, steaming off to safety with the rest.

Then they halted and Firemen Chandler and Dougland Westland dashed back attempting to extinguish the flames using buckets of water from the engine. Only later were they told that putting water on burning mustard gas bombs was not really advisable!

The RAF escort convinced them that discretion was the better part of valour and they all scarpered just in time. As an eye-witness reported there was a sudden "woosh" and a burst of flame which shot fifty feet into the air. Poisonous fumes spread over a range of fifty or sixty yards, contaminating the surrounding area.

Members of the Cambridge National Fire Service were soon on the scene and seven of them ended up at Addenbrooke's suffering from burns.

The heroism of the four Cambridge railwaymen, drivers Frederick Smart and William Thorburn and firemen Douglas Westland and Alfred Chandler, was recognised by the award of the London and North Eastern Railway Medal for their acts of gallantry which, according to the citation were "equivalent to those recognised by the award of the George Cross in cases connected with current enemy action"

Other stations themselves have been the scene of battles as communities fight either to establish or to keep that facility

Take Oakington - pictured here in 1923. The previous year it had been estimated that 60,000 tons of fruit were despatched by rail from Cambridgeshire, over half from stations on the line between Cambridge and St Ives.

No matter how many stations there were some still wanted more. Cottenham fruit growers were so convinced of the benefit of rail freight that in the 1890s they fought for their own light railway linking the village to the station at Oakington. The battle was unsuccessful. Chivers Factory, established alongside Histon station gave a great amount of trade to the railway and in 1907 nearly 15,000 tons of fruit and jam were dispatched. Their workers travelled to and from the factory by train in the early part of the century - though in uncushioned compartments, presumably in case their clothes might have been sticky with jam and jelly making and spoil more luxurious facilities.

As the century progressed, and road transport developed, the viability of the railway lines was called into question. The War gave a revival of prosperity with the airbase at Oakington but it was short-lived. Dr Beeching swung his axe and on 3rd October 1970 the final scheduled passenger train made its 30 minute journey from St Ives to Cambridge. Or did it?

Rail enthusiasts still plan for a reopened service but if their dreams for their future are uncertain, their enthusiasm for the past is undiminished. On 16th August there is to be a celebration of the 150th anniversary of the St Ives to Cambridge railway in the Free Church Centre, Market Hill, St Ives from 10 am to 4pm. Organiser Brian Smith of 53 Elm Close, Huntingdon or Nick Dibben of the Railway Development Society (Huntingdon 495101 evenings) would welcome additional memorabilia and all are welcome on the day, admission just 50p.

]**

One knows of the importance of Duxford airfield both before and during the Second World War and of the daring exploits of its pilots. Yet just 25 years ago there were plans for a Borstal on the site, and it was thought the old airfield would be derelict for many years to come. Now all that has changed and the Queen will shortly be opening the latest extension to the Duxford Museum.

But do you have Memories of Duxford airfield which can add to the history books. Did you see the first Spitfire to fly from there in July 1938, or curse the RAF as German bombers swooped once more to attack it, driving you to duck into your shelter, or under the table? Write to Mike Petty at the "News"

Did you help make tanks in your village hall?

I have been told something which seems unbelievable. Apparently during the war people used to gather in village halls throughout Cambridgeshire to assemble tank radios, Pye's van made regular deliveries of components and later collected the finished articles. Is this true? I am told there is even a snap of some of this activity - do you have any? Write to Mike Petty at the News

Memories 29th July 1997, by Mike Petty

The crowds who flock to Duxford to witness the opening of the new American hanger will be following a well-worn path. In July 1935 they were planning for another Royal Visit and were catering for motorists with car parks for 30,000 vehicles. Even then although admission for spectators was free there was a car park charge of 2/6. All roads were sign-posted by the R.A.C. and motorists were advised to arrive early.

Then it was King George V who was visiting as part of his Jubilee review of the Royal Air Force. It was to be his second airfield that day for the first part of the review took place at Mildenhall. This gave time for the visitors to arrive and to listen to the Mildenhall happenings relayed over loudspeakers.

As visitors enjoyed their packed lunches officials dined in one of the hangers where one of the country's latest aircraft - a Gloster G 37 single-seated fighter was displayed. Here naval officers in their blue and gold uniforms and with swords swinging at their sides mixed with top brass from the Army and Royal Air Force and the occasional big wig from overseas in colourful flowing robes

The Queen arrived from London by train to Harston station. She & King George V who joined guests for dinner in the Officers Mess where they were served the normal officers menu. The Mess itself was bedecked with flowers and decorated with paintings especially borrowed from the Tate Gallery for the occasion & even the furniture was decorated in the Jubilee colours of blue, silver & maroon.

Then it was outside to watch twenty squadrons flying past in procession the Heavy bombers at 96 miles an hour, the light bombers at 115 mph whilst the fighters roared past at a staggering 160 miles an hour

Included in the display were the Vickers G.P. Biplane, the Bristol type 130 troop carrier capable of transporting 24 fully-armed soldiers, the Hanley Page H.P.51 which could carry 10 stretchers when in ambulance mode, or 30 fighting troops and the Pterodactyl V, a two-seater fighter fitted with Rolls-Royce "Goshawk" engines but which lacked a tail - giving the rear-gunner unlimited range.

At the special Empire Air Days of the 1930s crowds flocked to the show - including Mr W.S. Nightingale who was driving one of his family's lorries delivering 12 tons of beer from the Star Brewery in Newmarket Road, Cambridge, to revive thirsty spectators. He recollects watching a Wellington bomber and a Spitfire take off together, and was amazed at how steeply the Spitfire ascended. He also recalls giving a lift back to Cambridge from some lads off the base - only to find they had lightened his load by four bottles of beer en route. William Ketteridge witnessed a Hurricane producing a wonderful display of its abilities before landing right in front of the crowds, but with its wheels up.

So many memories both happy and sad are generated by Duxford, making it a wonderful place to visit and explore, and pay tribute to those brave souls who actually take off and fly the things.

**

Parkside indoor swimming pool in Cambridge, described at its opening in 1963 as the finest in the country, is now closed. It will reopen in new and improved form. It had cost £250,000 and been a long time coining

In 1857 there had been an ambitious scheme to provide a concert hall, lecture room, ball room, hotel, restaurant and two swimming pools, (one first-class, the other second), in one building. This was planned for the corner of Jesus Lane and Bridge Street in Cambridge. It came to nothing. Then in 1863 the Roman Bath Company opened a swimming bath just around the corner in Jesus Lane. It was 56 feet by 22 feet and had special opening hours for ladies, but failed due to lack of support. The elaborate entrance still stands

In May 1888 there was an announcement of the formation of a Public Swimming Bath Company for the Town and University which would provide large bath, 70 by 30 ft, available at all seasons of the year, with well-fitting dressing rooms. A good site had been earmarked near the New Theatre in St Andrew's Street. It came to nothing.

Then in 1935 it was announced that plans for a palatial swimming stadium were approaching completion. A site on Parkside was earmarked. It would have a pool 100 ft by 42ft and would have a glass screen in the tea room to allow patrons to watch the bathers. It did not materialise. Two years later two privately owned syndicates announced plans for indoor baths - they suffered similar fate.

Then in April 1963 the Parkside Pool opened. Now it has closed and we await the new version of what has been a long ideal

READERS WRITE

Derrick Mallows of Lt Eversden writes: "In the early 1950s the villages of Great & Little Eversden had an annual visit by a man who was in the business of digging horseradish roots for trade purposes. I understand that he was called Bill, that he cycled everywhere and came from the fens. For years I have been hoping to find a photo of him to add to my collection of old village photos of the locality. I am staging an exhibition of old photographs in the village hall at Gt Eversden on October 25th and 26th and would love to include a picture of Bill in it." If you can add to Derrick's truly marvellous collection of over 3,000 items please contact him at 4 Wheelers Way, Lt Eversden, CB3 7HF - or write to Mike Petty at the News

Memories 5th August 1997, by Mike Petty

MAIN PICTURE STORY - THRESHING SCENE AT SOHAM

John Flack of Harston has kindly sent me his memories of rural life about 1925 when he was eight years old

"I often think of my childhood days on the farm and they bring a broad smile across my face in my reclining years. I loved to be on the farm with Mr Bob whose dad was the boss. We were waiting for the threshing tackle to arrive. I ran home to have my tea. I told my mum the thresher is coming, she said "What that horrible thing again humming all day, dusty old thing, I hope its not here long"

I thought I could hear the chuff-chuff of the engine so I ran down the lane and I could see the smoke, then the engine very slowly appearing round the bend. I ran to meet it. The tackle had just left another farm with the drum team to visit Mr Barnwell's. The train of tackle was so long Jim could not get it all round into the lane as it was so narrow, so he stopped on the side of the road and took the drum only and the rest of the tackle could be pulled with horses.

People came out of their garden gates to see what was going on. The drum had to be set to stand level because of the rotary sieves for grading the corn and that would take time

In the morning I was there like a shot. I could see Jim preparing to start up the engine. He was on a ladder taking a sort of lid off the engine chimney spout placed there as a damper during the night. He then replaced it with a spark catcher, a dome shaped cage, to stop sparks setting fire to the dry straw. He took off a tarpaulin sheet he had put over the working parts of the engine and stoked the fire to get up steam. The he had to oil the working parts of the engine while his mate was uncovering and oiling the drum

Bob was dressing Nelly ready for the cart, old Joe and Charlie were ready on the straw stack, Mr Hugh and his mate on the corn stack. When all was ready Jim warned everybody that he was about to start by pipping the engine's whistle, then a pause, and one more pip and away as Jim's mate put the first sheaf through the beaters

Bob's job was to check the corn as it flowed into the sacks, he kept putting his hand under the stream of corn to check the grade of each sack as some grains were damaged and some small - that went for chicken feed, the wholesome grain for milling into flour or seed. When the sack was full it weighed about eighteen stone. He put the sack on a lifter, turned a handle and with a sound of click-click-click it lifted the sack to cart height and the man on the cart put it in place.

After a while Jim began to nod off for a second or two. Jim's mate was watching, he could see Jim nodding and put an uncut sheave through the beaters, uncut means he did not cut the string, and that made the old engine jump and CHUFF-CHUFF-CHUFF violently. Jim just held up his hand, he knew, his mate had a giggle

Now I am older I often think of Bob and Mr Barnwell and what good men they were. They have long passed away, but the memories still remain, and I hope this is a tribute to them"

MORE SUCH MEMORIES WOULD BE WELCOME

SECOND PHOTO STORY - TRAVELLING TRADESMEN; PICTURE IS TRAVELLING TRADER IN SAXON STREET, OFF LENSFIELD ROAD, CAMBRIDGE IN 1950 's; acknowledge Cambs Collection

Mr A. Bates of Cambridge has written his memories of life in Newton in the 1950s when they hardly ever needed to leave the village for supplies.

Groceries were ordered on Thursday and delivered on Saturdays by Jackson's store at Fowlmere, who also delivered bread and cake twice a week. Robert Brown was an oilman, supplying all needs while H.J. Ellis from Harston and Shelford came with meat twice a week. Fish came either fried and with chips from Wrens or fresh from a Mr Cambridge of Foxton. Creamax supplied ice cream between May and September whilst Mr Rogers delivered milk in the evenings on his bicycle which had two cans on the front. Sometimes a muffin man would come through the village with a tray of muffins on his head

He adds "If we needed rabbits we would watch for the local gamekeeper going by with them on a bar of his bicycle and periodically a rag and bone man would call to buy the rabbit skins"

DO YOU REMEMBER THE MUFFIN MAN OR OTHER TRAVELLING TRADESMEN, WRITE TO MIKE PETTY AT THE NEWS

READERS WRITE:

Mrs V. Small of 41 Faldo Road, Bedford MK42 0EH is trying to track down her family. In particular she is seeking anything about William Moore who had the Greyhound Pub in London Road, Gt Shelford about 1851. Nobody will remember him but what about the pub? If you can help write to Mrs Small.

IF YOU NEED HELP WRITE TO MIKE PETTY AT THE NEWS - it is wonderful what our readers do know!

MEMORIES by Mike Petty 12th August 1997

PICTURE STORY NO.1: WICKEN POSTMAN

Something over 100 years ago an entomologist named J.W. Tutt undertook a journey to Wicken Fen and published his "Random recollections" in 1891. This little-known book was lent to me last week by a "News" reader.

But it is not the insects which attracted my eye, it was the postman. Tutt arrived at Wicken via Fordham station and an uncomfortable journey across country by-roads. On arrival he found comfortable lodgings in a village inn.

"How quiet it was after London, hardly a sound until I heard a whistle up the street. I later found that there was a Post Office in the street at a little shop from which the letters were collected every day at 5pm, but as the thirty houses were scattered over a street some half a mile long, the postman after emptying the letter box blew his whistle as he went along to inform those people who had letters to post that he was ready to convey their letters to Soham if they were not too lazy to bring them to him.

The postman, who lived at Soham, started from there about seven a.m. and reached Wicken at eight, his Wicken delivery occupying perhaps an hour owing to the scattered position of the houses. Then he went on to Upware, still deeper in the fens, where the delivery was finished shortly after mid-day. There was no time to go back to Soham, then, quite a two hours' walk, and return to collect the letters, so the postman must stay at Upware.

Now Upware consists essentially of one important house styled "Five miles from anywhere". As it is a pub, and the postman is a teetotaler, a little diplomacy must have been necessary in the first instance for that postman to be allowed to spend every afternoon of his life in that pub, but he has managed the business and waits until at four p.m. the whistle sounds, the people stand along the road with their letters, and the journey back to Soham via Wicken begins, the day's tedious and monotonous work ending at about seven in the evening"

But there was another side to Wicken life he had not appreciated. One Sunday morning his landlady came into his room with a pile of letters with the remark "Ninepence, sir". "Ninepence! What for?" "Eight letters and two post cards sir - there's no post on Sunday and the boy that goes into Soham charges a penny each for letters and a halfpenny for postcards". The lad, it transpired was a grandson of hers - but then virtually everybody in Wicken in those days was related to one another - or so he claimed!

PICTURE STORY NO.2: CAMBRIDGESHIRE REGIMENT MARCH-PAST

READERS WRITE

Various readers have memories of Mildenhall & Duxford airfields.

Mr H. Bye of Ely was present at the Silver Jubilee Air Review at Mildenhall in 1935. He saw the Royal party arrive and watched the flypast led by two Handley Page Heyfords. It was a grand sight to see them all take off and get into formation, he recalls.

H.J.R. Sheldrick of Swaffham Prior was stationed at Duxford from 1936-1938 with 19 squadron and then posted to 66 squadron. He recollected that there was only one aircraft in the hangar, a Bristol Bullfighter dual controlled trainer. Later the squadron was equipped with Gloster Gauntlets. 66 Squadron had a Cambridge blue flash tapering along the fuselage and its badge was a rampant rattlesnake with the insignia "You have been warned"

G.E. Davis of Cambridge was at Duxford in 1938 when the first Spitfire was issued to Squadron Leader Cozens of 19 Squadron. He worked in the parachute section and packed Douglas Bader's chute.

Len Baynes from Stapleford was part of the 1st Battalion of the Cambridgeshire Regiment who was posted to R.A.F Duxford to protect the station at the start of the war. The territorial regiment had, in theory, been trained in the use of the Bren gun, but there was only one gun for the entire company, and that could not be spared. So they arrived with 1914-vintage Lee-Enfield rifles and ammunition which had been manufactured in 1917.

The airmen were not keen to share their accommodation with common soldiers so the lads dossed down on the floor of the church hall, Next morning they were issued with half-a-dozen Lewis guns, a most complicated piece of equipment, and only one tattered manual. Although they managed to dismantle it - after four hours of concentrated cursing - it took far longer to put it back together again. By the time they'd learned which end the bullets were meant to come out of it was time to take up their positions on sand-bagged gun emplacements around the perimeter of the base, and hope the Luftwaffe would never find them.

He was soon transferred back to Cambridge where he was billeted with a policeman's family in City Road. The cookhouse was in Zion Baptist church. Here he realised that the air force cooks had been on a different level from the army. His first pudding was smothered with a bright orange semi-transparent custard, made from custard powder and water, no milk or sugar; it was bitter and uneatable. But they were to have much worse later on. Perhaps Len is amongst the members of the Cambridgeshire Regiment parading on Parker's Piece in a picture sent in by Michael Bentinck. If you can identify the occasion or recognise yourself please let me know.

Mr A.A. Brotchie of Cambridge writes:

"Your story about the mustard gas incident in July 1947 brought back memories. I was stationed at Newmarket Road Fire Station and saw the results of the mustard gas on the crew that attended. Company Officer Jim Hyden was by far the worst of the casualties that night. I saw him next day in Addenbrooke's and saw the large blisters on his back. My visit coincided with him being interviewed by several high ranking Army Officers seeing first hand the effects of the gas on human beings. Others from the National Fire Service local division who were at Six Mike Bottom that night were Divisional Officer Gibson, Column Officer Kidd, and Firemen Wolfe, Gatward, Watson & Gyles. The fire appliance took several hours to be stripped and decontaminated, supervised by R.A.F. personnel."

MEMORIES, 19th August 1997, by Mike Petty

My postbag this week has brought a very mixed bag of memories.

From Charles Sharp comes recollections of the Chesterton area of Cambridge, prompted by news of an impending redevelopment at the junction of High Street and Union Lane. For he was born in one of a group of almshouses on that site, woefully primitive with none of the architectural embellishments which characterised later Victorian almshouses. The one on the corner backed against an even older property in Union Lane, reckoned to be the oldest occupied dwelling in Chesterton.

There was an awful outside privy and a solitary standpipe but the Sharps were privileged - for they had use of the lavatories at the Premier Dance Hall, until recently Hallen's motor car showroom.

The Premier earned a reputation as the most popular social function venues of the pre-war days attracting undergraduates, including a certain Kim Philby and his crowd. But as a young lad Charles's bottom played an important part in its success, for he was plonked down on a woollen blanket and hauled at speed up and down the floor to produce the high gloss finish for which the ballroom was famous. His dad used to say then when he stoked the boiler during the war years he could sometimes hear ghostly laughter of revellers of the past.

By co-incidence that same area also features in a series of war-time cuttings from October 1942 when an exercise was held to test the efficiency of the Cambridge Air Raid Precautions. Over a three-hour period all civil defence personnel were engaged in a test of their readiness to cope with attack. The wardens in various areas lit smoke-bombs to indicate the dropping of incendiaries - but the fire-watchers failed to notice them, at least not until thunder-flashes were set off to add a realist touch to the events, when they turned out in good order complete with tin hats and stirrup pumps.

A Cambridge Daily News reporter went out in search of "incidents", and found one at the corner of Chesterton High Street and Union Lane. He heard the warden blowing his whistle to indicate the landing of incendiaries - but nobody took any notice. Later as he wandered along Haig Road and De Freville Avenue he found the streets lined with fire-guards and fire-fighters standing around with nothing to do.

Meanwhile on the Histon Road a party of schoolboys spent the whole evening suffering from "fractures" or "severe bleeding" without being spotted by anybody. In the end they got fed up and decided to go home and succumb to their "wounds"

As was to be expected the mock attack was busiest in the town centre where police had a busy time directing traffic away from roads "blocked" by high-explosives whilst ambulances screeched through the night and literally scores of pumps were called out to fight pretend fires.

But it was all too real for dancers taking part in a ballet performance at the Arts Theatre when the smoke from a mock incendiary lighted near the stage door swept through the wings and on to the stage/ nearly choking them - but the show still went on.

Tony Cater from Christchurch in Dorset has written with memories of real air raids whilst he worked for Pye. At one time he had the job of spraying a number of loud speaker fittings with a special yellow paint which would turn green in the event of a gas attack. It was through these speakers that the message would be broadcast "It is now blackout time, all windows must be closed and blinds drawn". On one occasion he was passing the office window of L.W. Jones, the works manager when he saw some of the protective sandbags were on fire. A voice called out "Boy, help me put this out". It was C.O. Stanley who had banged his pipe out and nearly burned his factory down in the process. In the event the catastrophe was averted and Pye's went on with their war effort

However strenuous war service was it was easy compared to what some people did before. A.C. Gillett from Ten Mile Bank, Littleport remembers the hardships of farmwork in that area of the fens pre-war. Much was "piece" work, a certain price per acre.

"I remember 1939 singling beet at 10s. an acre. A wet day was a lost day (no pay). On a small family farm at 15 I had 100 pigs & 9 bullocks in the yards to feed twice a day, prepare and carry potatoes (to steam), 10 stones sacks of meal, water to carry by a pair of yokes & pails, straw for litter and hay, mangolds to clean and grind by hand, chaff to fill and carry, cotton and linseed cake to break by a hand machine for the cattle."

But the worst work was helping to harvest sugar beet: "wet, snow, frost in the fields, no rubber gloves those days & every beet had to be picked up, knock off the dirt, laid neatly out in rows to chop off with a hand hook, thrown into heaps to be forked into carts and taken to the river to tip into barges to go to Ely beet factory"

He was pleased enough to join the RAF as aircrew and end up as a Warrant Officer flying in Wellington and Halifax aircraft, well above the mud of the fens .

What a small world! In "Memories" on 24th June I mentioned how Pye 's claim to have installed the world's first radio-telephones in taxis in 1947 was disproved by a Cambridge man who wrote home to his mum from Canada. Peter Harvey was that man and now lives in Ely. He writes to say he has searched for the cutting in vain -but a copy is in the post

SHARE YOUR MEMORIES, SHARE YOUR ENQUIRIES - write to Mike Petty at the News

MEMORIES, 26th August 1997, by Mike Petty

PICTURE STORY ONE: FEN DITTON FERRY

Carol Senior of Cambridge writes: "I have been collecting postcards for about three years now & I recently bought one that I would like your advice on. It is a view of "The Plough Tea Gardens", with either a bridge or a ferry collapsed in the river and lots of people gathered to lend a hand. It doesn't actually say any location on the front of the card but it is franked 5th July 1905. I believe it to be what is now the "Plough" pub at Fen Ditton, but can find no mention of a ferry there or an incident concerning one".

Indeed there was a ferry, known as the "Red Grind" because of its bright colour, which operating across the river from the Plough. It was the usual platform-type structure with handrails and operated along a chain which was winched from the Plough side.

Tragedy occurred on 10th June 1905, during the popular May Bumps which attracted hundreds of spectators to watch the rowers in action. After the last race people flocked to board the Ferry that would take them across the Cam to and from the Plough at Fen Ditton for a refreshing drink

On the third trip the craft was packed with its maximum of 22 passengers but as it was about three yards out two undergraduates ran down the Plough lawn and jumped on board. This caused the ferry to lurch and those on board moved to the other end to counter the movement. But the weight was too much and the ferry overturned, snapping its chain.

Immediately there was panic. Wooden chairs were thrown into the river for some to cling to, men jumped and dived to help. Frank Skinner, who operated the chain, pushed off in his boat to assist but so many drowning hands grabbed at it that this too was overturned and Skinner joined those struggling in the water. Other Fen Ditton men shoved off from the banks in their black fishing boats and rescued many, but some were trapped underneath the ferry and three young women died after their clothing became entangled in the chain. One was due to be married; she was buried in her wedding dress.

The ferry continued to be used in summer months and during licensing hours, especially on Sunday evenings when people would stroll down the tow path from Chesterton and cross the river for a drink. As a former landlord, Kerry Pipe, later recalled his life would be constantly disrupted by somebody calling for the ferry -reasonable when the pub was open, but annoying at other times, especially when he was having his breakfast!

Then in March 1961 tragedy struck again, this time during the University Lent Bumps. Leonard Butler was winch man at the time and recalled that the ferry was overloaded as undergraduates had pushed him aside and jumped on board. They were singing and rocking the craft from side to side until eventually it shipped water and gradually settled on the river bed.

At first everyone cheered at the fun but then hundred of people on the bank fell silent as they realised what was happening. As bodies drifted down the river dozens of people jumped in fully clothed to the rescue. People were dragged to the bank and taken to the pub to await medical assistance,

Mercifully nobody was drowned, though the man who was collecting fares on the ferry was pulled down to the river bed by the weight of coins in his pockets. He - and some of the cash, was saved, but he died shortly afterwards of pneumonia.

It was one accident too many and the ferry was withdrawn. For there had been an even earlier incident, largely forgotten. During the Cambridge Amateur Town Regatta in August 1883 the ferry had overturned trapping a man and boy under its rails. Although it had been quickly lifted by bystanders and both were released, the man became trapped again before he could be pulled from the water and had drowned,

READERS WRITE

E. Badcock of Cambridge confesses to an old crime, in the hope that it may assist the young historians of Morley Memorial School.

"It may have been in 1927 or 1928 that the following 'jape' was perpetrated. Time and memory have blurred the exact period. A friend and I conceived the brilliant idea of muffling the school bell, thereby causing confusion and consternation.

"The bell, housed in its lofty open-sided cage at the highest point of the school building was a very tempting target for catapults and sundry other missiles, even air-gun pellets. A piece of thick felt and a length of twine were all that was necessary for effectively silencing the clapper. The ascent to the bell cage was not very difficult even in the darkness. Stout drainage pipes, flat areas of roofing and slopes presented little difficulty. The task was performed quickly and efficiently, much to our glee. The resultant uproar next day may be imagined. "In a more than usually solemn general assembly the perpetrators were invited to step forward and confess to the outrage. Dire punishment was threatened, even expulsion. The whole school would be punished. Nobody owned up"

Now he has. What a wicked lot you older generation were - surely there was nothing so wicked perpetrated elsewhere? Or do the misdeeds of the youngsters of today pale into insignificance. Write to Mike Petty now and confess all

PHOTO PICTURE 2: CAMBRIDGE POLICE

Claud Archer of St Albans Road, Cambridge has sent in a photo of the police who were dedicated to suppress such delinquency back in the 1920s. Many are wearing medals, some seem to be in motorcycle uniform. Do you recognise anybody - did you ever receive a cuff around the ear from a bobby for doing something you didn't ought to. Own up now.

MEMORIES, 2nd September 1997, by Mike Petty

Nothing evokes more response than discussions about the old Petty Cury, Cambridge. People remember the small streets that ran off it in the days before the Lion Yard redevelopment devastated Falcon Yard and Alexandra Street.

And inevitably they remember the shop associated with it. MacFisheries, the Civic Restaurant, The Lion Hotel, George Stace milliners, Heffer's bookshop. The older residents might add Hallack and Bond, and Beales the chemist.

But somehow there is one name that often gets overlooked, that of Boots the Chemist. Yet Boots this week celebrates 100 years of trading from Petty Cury, making it probably the oldest business to have traded continuously in the street - though I am sure somebody will come up with another.

Nobody would have known about its centenary were it not for the fact that 100 years ago the Company decided to place an advertisement in the Cambridge Daily News and its sister title, the Cambridge Weekly News.

It read: "When the students return to Cambridge they will find a change in the well-known establishment of Boots, cash chemists. Hitherto we have supplied chiefly Pure Drugs, Perfumes, Toilet Articles etc - not having room for other business at Market Hill".

The solution was to construct "most commodious new premises" at 31 Petty Cury where they could "supply our patrons with a larger variety of articles, as in our great establishments at Nottingham, Lincoln and elsewhere.

This included those necessities for students who required stationery, text books and note books, "Fellows" who want "the expensive range of books that good fellows need (at Discount prices)", brushes for artists, travelling bags for travellers, sermon paper for clergymen and strengthening embrocations for athletes.

They ran the advertisement in the Cambridge Weekly News on the 27th August, which paper the week before had published a small advert relating to the old premises on Market Hill with no mention of the new shop then being fitted out. Quite when they set up there is less certain, but certainly they were trading in Market Hill in 1895, but are not shown in the 1891 directory.

The business seems to have flourished for in the 1930s their premises were rebuilt as part of the massive development of new shop, which brought in Woolworth, Marks and Spencer and The Dorothy. Boots expanded again in 1958 and the 1980s

But such an established part of the Cambridge shopping scene has featured little in the local histories - so what are your memories

Incidentally another of the old favourites mentioned above would have been 50 years old this year. Keep your eyes on my "Looking Back" column to see if you can guess which one it was?

PICTURE STORY NO.2: BRIDGE STREET

Twenty-five years ago the developer's axe was lifted from another area of central Cambridge. It was at the end of August 1972 that the announcement was made that the historic frontage of 10-16 Bridge Street, near the junction with Round Church Street, was to be restored. It was a triumph for preservationists for behind the facade was a crumbling pile of masonry, described by a city alderman as "virtually a rubbish heap". A "News" reporter called it "a group of tumbled-down buildings" which "could be dismantled by a couple of five year-olds using toy hammers".

Indecision had dated back to 1968 when the City Council had sought to knock down the buildings, but been frustrated when the County Planners stepped in to enforce a new planning law which prevented demolition without Government consent. The debate rumbled on. Thus the news in August 1972 of a scheme which would preserve the historic frontage whilst developing at the back was welcomed. But Cambridge being Cambridge it was another three years before work started and not until April 1977 that Cambridge Mayor, Coun Bob Wright opened the £1.3 million development. He praised the care and skill of the architects, said it was an outstanding example of how a new building could be fitted into its environment and was quoted as saying "If only the architects had been involved at Lion Yard then things might have turned out differently".

READERS WRITE

Mrs V. Rumbleow of Cherry Hinton writes: "I was very interested to see in "Memories" of 19th August the photograph of Union Lane, Chesterton. The child is myself, aged about two years. I am looking through the railings of The Premier Dance Hall with my grandmother. I myself lived with my family in one of the four houses behind me. On the same side of the road was a public house named The Wheatsheaf and the one on the High Street fronting Union Lane was The Haymakers"

Ron Weaver of St Ives recalls his days at RAF Duxford in 1938 with B Flight, 66 Fighter Squadron. They were equipped with Gloucester Gauntlets when he was posted as an AC1 Fitters Mate. He was there when the Squadron received their first Spitfire and detailed to the fuel bowser to record the amount of fuel issued

Don Challis of Foxton and R.P. Buckle of Cambridge both recall the muffin man, named as Mr Craske from George IV Street, Cambridge. He used to walk around with a tray on his head, ringing a bell and calling out "Muffins". He went to Foxton by train and Don recalls that he wore a special cap to accommodate the tray of muffins which were covered with green baize. He also knew the Foxton fish man, Mr Cambridge, who commonly known as "Cutty" and had a whelk stall at local fairs - perhaps you remember him.

Just to complete the picture Mr Buckle identifies the travelling trader in my photograph as Fred Blake who had a fruit and veg shop in East Road, but cannot recall the name of the man who used to sell rabbits from a pale for sixpence and on his next visit buy back the skin for a penny. And what was the real name of "Spiv" who used to sell chocolate from a basket on Parkers Piece?

If you can help or if you need help write to Mike Petty at the News.

MEMORIES 9th September 1997, by Mike Petty

The tragic news from Paris of the death of Diana, Princess of Wales, had people everywhere glued to their radios and televisions as the story developed, hour on hour. But it was to newspapers they turned for information they could digest at their own pace, and read again and again.

The process of news gathering in these days of satellite and fax is greatly different from that available when in 1936 the world became aware of the deteriorating health of King George V, then at Sandringham House, Norfolk

As news came through 50 journalists left their offices and made their way to deepest Norfolk. The Feathers Hotel at Dersingham became their headquarters, and the only means by which they could send their stories to an anxiously waiting world was by that inn's one telephone, which stood on a bracket in a candle-lit cupboard, and by the one kiosk outside the quaint stone cottage that was the Post Office.

It was essential to increase the telephone capacity and engineers from Cambridge were called into action. A hurried conference was arranged of engineering, telephone, telegraph and traffic officers and work began immediately on providing additional circuits.

An urgent request went out to the Stores Department in Birmingham, but at that time the roads were blocked with snow and impassable. Back went a message that impassable or not a lorry with the cable had to be got through and a driver departed into the snowdrifts en route to Kings Lynn. He arrived two hours before dawn on the Monday morning. Eager hands seized the cable and soon there were six telephones working from the Feathers Hotel.

Ninety journalists now crowded into the inn; there were telephones in the smoke-room and telephones in the corridor. At Dersingham Post Office teleprinters were installed. The only illumination was oil lamps and there was no power. But soon the postmistress' parlour had been cleared of its sofa, settee and ornaments, electricity was installed and the room was ablaze with light and throbbing and humming apparatus.

Tens of thousands of words were sent from the village by telephone and telegraph to newspapers throughout the country and around the world.

On Monday night another bulletin was issued. It was flashed to London and within a few minutes an uncountable multitude of listeners heard the hushed voice of Mr Stuart Hibberd broadcast the message: "The King's life moves peacefully to a close".

Meanwhile Post Office engineers were continuing to work frantically. Four and a half miles of additional aerial cable had arrived. It was laid on hedgerow tops, tied up to trees or electric light poles and looped over cottage roofs while residents gaped at the sweating workmen. By the light of motor-car headlamps and acetylene flares the work went on.

Then in the last minutes of a dying day came the news that King George V was dead. That news was flashed around the world, in one seventh of a second it had encircled the globe. Before the sentence announcing the King's death had been completed by the announcer it was already known in Africa and Australia, America and the Arctic.

For the Telephone Engineers work had just started. They realised that the peak demand would be on the Thursday when the funeral procession would leave Sandringham for the Royal Station at Wolferton. Still more telephones were provided. At King's Lynn four picture telegraph circuits were installed and press photographers built a darkroom in readiness for developing their pictures.

The volume of postal, telegraph and telephone traffic at Sandringham and Buckingham Palace surpassed all previous records and the cables that zig-zagged across the roof-tops worked perfectly.

Then on the Thursday morning King George V left Sandringham for the last time. The morning was bright with sunshine and the crisp grass glittered with hoar frost as without pomp or pageantry the simple cortege passed, the coffin on a gun carriage. It was the farewell of the country people to their beloved squire.

As the train carrying the coffin made its way south, through Cambridgeshire, people lined the track in reverence to bid their last good-byes.

Photographers dashed to Kings Lynn to send their images. Pictures were developed, printed and telegraphed to London, within three minutes of their arrival. Seconds later they had been received in London, minutes later they had been wirelessly to the ends of the earth.

At The Feathers in Dersingham reporters from every country in the world occupied the thirteen available telephones. In one corner a Japanese journalist dictated his story, in the corridor a reporter covering 1,500 newspapers in the United States waited his turn for a vacant phone.

Now the attention of the world turned to London for the funeral. The journalists departed, and the telephone engineers started the long job of disconnecting cables, rewinding wire on to drums, returning items to stores in preparation for the next emergency.

Then it was their turn to rest, content that they had played their part in a nation's grief - and aware that their contribution would probably never be appreciated.

DO YOU HAVE MEMORIES OF ROYAL MEETINGS, DID YOU SPOT QUEEN MARY AS SHE VISITED CAMBRIDGE ANTIQUE SHOPS - OR GIVE HER A LIFT WHEN HER CAR BROKE DOWN - one man did; write to Mike Petty at the News

MEMORIES, 16th September 1997, by Mike Petty

PICTURE STORY NO.1:

In January 1934 Queen Mary came shopping in Cambridge. There was nothing particularly newsworthy about that for such was the fame of the local antique shops that she had made the similar journey from Sandringham just three weeks earlier.

This time she was to visit Messrs Collins and Clark of Regent Street. Sidney Clark was an old friend who had personally negotiated sales on behalf of his firm with both Queen Mary and the King. Here she purchased several pieces of Chelsea china, two 200-year-old pin-pricked English pictures and a box containing four Waterford glass decanters.

She then moved down to Roger Roe's business premises in St Andrew's Street where she obtained several pieces of Worcester porcelain, a bezique cabinet and a combined work and musical box. Mr Roe commented that; "We have been patronised by Royalty before, but this is the greatest honour done to the firm during its long experience". He had been in business in Cambridge for 55 years and his father and grandfather had traded here, and at Ipswich for 50 years before that.

Such shopping was obviously thirsty work and Her Majesty popped in to the "Copper Kettle" cafe on King's Parade where she chatted to the manageress, Mrs Marsh, widow of Richard Marsh of Shelford, for years the King's trainer. Having partaken of light refreshments Queen Mary made her way to the car, waving to undergraduates who were standing on the little wall outside King's college, before departing.

An interesting day for Cambridge folk, certainly, but surely not one to make International headlines.

But there had been something which made it special. For as Queen Mary had been making her way in the Royal limousine from Sandringham the vehicle had broken down, not once but twice. On the second occasion she was parked by the road side near the Slap Up public house at Waterbeach.

Percy Titmous, district manager for Messrs Worthing, was driving his wife to Ely when he saw a car with two chauffeurs bending over the bonnet. Gallantly he turned his car around and asked whether he could be of service.

Thus it was, as an American paper reported; "Queen Mary Thumbs Ride as Auto Quits", beginning "Percy Titmous, who works for a brewery, drove into town Monday morning with her majesty, Queen Mary, riding in his little automobile. The townspeople stared in amazement from the side-walks"

Having deposited his Royal passenger from his Morris Ten, Percy tried to make good his escape, fighting shy of publicity. But news spread rapidly and soon pressmen, news agencies and even film-companies were hot on his trail.

The stricken limousine was towed to King and Harper's garage where an overheating radiator was diagnosed. Another car was quickly dispatched to take the Queen to Exning, where she lunched with Mrs Featherstonhaugh and where she was met by one of her own cars sent from Sandringham to convey her, and her new treasures, back home

As for Percy, he was quoted as saying "Every citizen ought to share with me a feeling of intense pride that Her Majesty was willing to entrust her safety in the hands of an unknown commoner, That is, I think, a remarkable thing".

PICTURE STORY 2: TRAFFIC LIGHTS

A recent correspondent in the "News" has suggested that in order to test the impact of proposed new traffic lights on the corner of Fen Causeway; two policemen should be placed there on point duty, letting vehicles through at regular intervals

Police on point duty used to be regular sight in Cambridge. There are various pictures showing them on duty at the end of Market Street and Petty Cury in the days when traffic went both ways down that narrow thoroughfare

It was in September 1929 that the first traffic lights appeared in Cambridge. The Co~Ordiplex Traffic Control system, more commonly known as the robot policeman, came into operation at the busy Northampton Street and Chesterton Lane junction. This was a radical new invention and motorists had to be instructed in the meaning of the red, amber and green lights. It was hoped that the new system would save police time, but -according to some accounts - it had the reverse effect. It was said that instead of having one policeman on point duty they then needed two. One to sort out the accidents, the other to control the crowds of onlookers flocking to watch the new illuminations I

CAN YOU HELP

Travelling Light, Channel 4's history travel programme is planning its new series. Last time their intrepid duo "Tim and Him" travelled from the Scillies to Shetlands, visiting places of historic interest and riding on fun forms of transport - including a steam car. So if you can suggest interesting spots or drive a 1920s fire engine ~ or something similar - they would like to hear from you. Contact Tim Grundy, Hamilton tv., PO box 16, Buxton, Derbyshire

If your name is Jacobs you might be related to Frederick Jacobs, born in Stetchworth in 1808 and later an innkeeper and carrier at Ely - making regular journeys to Newmarket, St Ives and Sutton. If so P. Jacobs of 14 Minchinton Close, Norton sub Hamdon, Somerset, TA14 6SX would love to hear from you

READERS WRITE

F.M. Coker writes from Chesterton to sing the praises of Haverhill - which he says is a charming place which hasn't changed its image over all these years. He particularly remembers the heavy tweed jackets made by Gurteens for whom he used to work many years ago

MEMORIES, 23rd September 1997, by Mike Petty

Police sergeant Anthony Rae of Lancashire Constabulary H.Q., Button, Preston, has written to the News in connection with a new memorial planned to honour every police officer killed on duty.

On 4th June 1930 the Cambridge headlines were full of tragedy; three Cambridge men were dead. An undergraduate, his tutor and Detective-Sergeant Francis Willis

The undergraduate was always eccentric, he had a reputation for being clever and was reading history at King's college. He also played the drums in a jazz band and had hired a grand piano which he kept in his room. Unlike most of his college he wasn't rich or famous, he hadn't been to Eton, and he didn't have the finance to maintain the lifestyle he adopted. He wore garish sweaters and plus-fours, claimed to be a Russian prince and ran up debts.

He also stole a pistol, teamed up with a friend from Fitzwilliam, changed his name and spent the merry month of May touring Cambridgeshire pubs in a second-hand car. When the money ran out they traded the car for a motorbike and set off for London where they found excitement, glamour and company in the flat of a girl named Madge. She worked in a nightclub, had a heart of gold and seemed used to strange young men popping in for a while. By the end of the weekend she knew these two were different. They obviously had money problems and had written to Cambridge for clothes they could pawn. They also had guns. When they went to collect the parcel of clothes they found two men waiting who invited the runaways to return to Cambridge. Their escort were fellow undergrads - after all there was nothing that a little chat could not sort out.

When they arrived in Cambridge the Kingsman met his tutor in Trumpington Street. The two strolled off to sort things out over a glass of sherry in rooms in the Gibbs building beside the Chapel. A third figure followed. During their friendly chat a knock came at the door. The plain-clothed policeman had just started to read out his warrant when the first of five shots rang out, hitting him in the shoulder.

When the gunfire ceased Prof A.F. Wollaston, a distinguished explorer, lay dead and Detective-Sergeant Francis Wallis had been fatally wounded. The final shot had ended the life of the undergraduate who committed suicide.

It was a very bleak day in Cambridge's history and one which needs to be commemorated on the memorial now being planned.

PHOTO PICTURE NO.2: BOOTS

In 1942 Ramey & Muspratt, the Cambridge photographers, took pictures of the interior of a branch of Boots the chemist, which I think may have been the one in Petty Cury. As both Reg Wood of Saffron Walden and John Howes of Stapleford have told me this shop had two entrances, the other one being in Market Hill. Reg particularly remembers that when you went in there you could look up at the ceiling which was all mirrors in dark wooden frames, whilst John recalls that it was a fun place to shop - because it had a revolving door. In the centre where the two sections met was a large circular area which housed the Boots Booklovers library and was topped by a circular glass dome.

Several people have chided me about forgetting to mention Lyons Tea Shop in Petty Cury - though some even remember the Maypole and the Home and Colonial Stores - whatever happened to them.

READERS WRITE

Charles Barnard of Foxton writes with regard to Queen Mary. He met her, but not in Cambridge. It was early in 1940 when he was working in a Bomb Disposal Section stationed in Bristol. One night a German plane dropped 6 bombs in the park at Badminton, none of which exploded. Queen Mary had apparently been evacuated there where she was staying with the Duke and Duchess of Beaufort. Charles and seven others went out to deal with the bombs, which had gone down into the ground some five or six feet. It took almost a week to dig them out and make them safe. When the job was complete Queen Mary came, with the Duke and Duchess, to see what the excitement had been about. Charles remembers that it had been very hard and very hot work and they were all anticipating how much they would get for a "drink" from the Duke - but sadly it appears the Duke had very deep pockets! They did however have their picture taken with the Queen - which would surely have been reward enough, only he never saw the result!

Whilst on bombs I have heard tell how two naughty local schoolboys found the fin of an old bomb which had dropped from a lorry. They managed to bury it in the garden of a nearby house, and then pretend it must have fallen during a raid - causing considerable concern to resident and bomb disposal experts alike. I will mention no names - unless the prankster likes to identify himself.

And while we are on memories of long ago and far away Jessie Hicks has written from St Austell in Cornwall with memories of her Land Army days there. She had enlisted in Sheffield, in 1943, was put on a train and arrived in a foreign country where she could not understand the Cornish dialect, and they couldn't understand her. She recalls having to take one of the cart horses to the blacksmiths to be shod, a distance of 3 or 4 miles through a maze of Cornish country lanes - a nightmare journey with no sign posts anywhere. Surely it couldn't have been so difficult in Cambridgeshire

Patrick Mills of Cambridge wrote some weeks ago following my memories of the Arcade; the old Corn Exchange which stood on the site of the Holiday Inn in Downing Street, Cambridge. He believes that there had been a riot at a theatrical performance as a result of which a number of undergraduates had been arrested. They were tried at a special court to avoid the possibility of any student being detained overnight, which would have made it impossible for him to have a career in such institutions as the Indian Civil Service. I believe I have some recollection of something similar having taken place at the New Theatre – can you help us both

MEMORIES, 30th September 1997, by Mike Petty

PICTURE STORY NO.1 : BRIDGE STREET READERS WRITE

Mr G. Murfett of Cliveden Close, Cambridge writes: "Your picture of P.A. Allin's shop and works, on the corner of Bridge Street, Cambridge, brought back some very pleasant memories for me.

I started my apprenticeship there in 1935. There were three bothers, Bert who was our boss, Edgar who ran the garage and cycle side, and Sid who ran the electrical departments. Bert Allin was the best boss I ever had. Allin's were at that time the largest plumbing, heating, electrical and garage etc firm in Cambridge.

"They also had a tin smith, Jack Lark, who made cooking utensils and repaired them for the colleges. We used to clean the old ones out to prepare them and the new ones we used to polish the tin lining with silver sand, when we were slack.

"They also had a cycle mechanic named Joe. He would build cycle frames as well as repair them. When I first started there they had an electroplating works on the top floor. We used to cut the solder of old sheet lead we had taken off college roofs and lead pipes, melt it down, add pure tin and make our own solder. I learned many things there, I was bronze welding brass tail pieces to short lengths of copper tube before I was 15 years old.

"I had a five year bound apprenticeship which was a legal document, signed by your father and the boss, binding both parties for five years. The wages were also set out in it. They should have been 6s. for the first year, then 7s/6d. 10s., 15s., 19s.6d, but mine was altered by agreement to 10s. a week for so many years, then increased"

I hope to feature further extracts from Mr Murfett's letter in other weeks.

The picture of Bridge Street in the 1930s also shows petrol pumps standing by the side of the street - an innovation being urged by the Mayor of Cambridge in October 1922 and resisted because of the fears of what undergraduates would do to them on rag days. The idea of such pumps beside busy central streets seems most strange nowadays. Do you remember filling up at other road-side pumps. Surely there must have been some sticky moments - write to Mike Petty at the News

PICTURE STORY NO.2: COMPUTERS

The news that Microsoft billionaire Bill Gates has offered Cambridge University another £12 million for computer research ("News" 25th Sept) comes almost 50 years to the day after the Cambridge Daily News broke the store of the development of a "brain" capable of answering 1,000 questions in a minute which was in course of construction in the University Mathematical Laboratory. Work had been going on for a year under the leadership of Dr H.V. Wilkes, director of the laboratory and a wartime radar research expert.

The "brain", officially known as "Edsac" - electronic delay storage automatic calculator - would when finally completed consist of 16 metal tubes full of mercury and some eight racks containing between 1,000 and 1,500 valves,

Questions would be fed in on a punched tape and the answer delivered by teleprinter. It was hoped to complete it within a year. Ramsey and Muspratt photographed the apparatus in 1949.

Such is Cambridge that when I showed a cutting from the "News" of 3rd October 1947 to a group of computer experts in the University Combination Room, one of their number could claim to have been involved in its early development

ANOTHER INSIGHT INTO THE KING'S COLLEGE MURDER, 1930

Barton Holister, Fellow of Clare College, Cambridge has written adding a new insight into the incident at King's college in June 1930 which led to the death of police detective sergeant Willis.

He recounts a story told him in 1966 by Superintendent Bill Ainsworth, then a senior officer in Cambridge police.

In 1930 Ainsworth had been a young constable at the Cambridge police station when he was instructed to accompany Segt Willis to witness the interview of an undergraduate who was under suspicion of theft.

The two offices strolled along Petty Cury and St Mary's Passage en route to King's college. As they passed the door way of Gt St Mary's church a rather distraught man emerged and called out to PC Ainsworth. A wedding was about to take place in the church and one of the bellringers had failed to arrive.

Naturally Mr Ainsworth pointed out that although he was an experienced bellringer he was on duty and not able to help. However Segt Willis felt sympathy for the young couple about to wed and encouraged him to help out with the peal, commenting that he would be able to interview the King's undergraduate on his own, together with the man's Tutor.

So Ainsworth did take part in ringing the peal and the Sergeant proceeded on his own to the Tutor's set in the Gibbs building, where he and the Tutor were both murdered and the student committed suicide

Bill Ainsworth always felt fortunate that due to the coincidence of the bell ringer emerging from the church and meeting himself and the Sergeant, his own life was obviously saved

Patrick Mills of Cambridge wrote some weeks ago following my memories of the Arcade, the old Corn Exchange which stood on the site of the Holiday Inn in Downing Street, Cambridge. He believes that there had been a riot at a theatrical performance as a result of which a number of undergraduates had been arrested. They were tried at a special court to avoid the possibility of any student being detained overnight, which would have made it impossible for him to have a career in such institutions as the Indian Civil Service. I believe I have some recollection of something similar having taken place at the New Theatre - can you help us both

MEMORIES, by Mike Petty 7th October 1997

PICTURE STORY NO.1: MARKET HILL

Now that the lecture season is well underway I have been wearing out my maps trying to locate such diverse places at Kimbolton Castle, Hemingford Grey Reading Room, Girton W.I. Hall and - most puzzlingly, Sturton Street chapel.

Surely, though, it is not possible to lose your way in central Cambridge, which (of course) has not changed in hundreds of years.

However the picture, taken about 65 years ago may prove a puzzle to many. If I add the clue that it shows the old Shire Hall then it will only add to the confusion.

But this is the heart of Cambridge, Market Hill, looking across to P.O. Sennitt's shop beside the lane which led to the Cabman's shelter and the old Guildhall with its arches and clock. That building had been erected in 1747 as the Shire Hall, centre for county government, with the town Guildhall behind it, connected by a bridge. When in 1842 the County administration was moved to a new building on Castle Hill the Town Council moved into the front offices, blocking in the open archways where traders had previously erected their stalls.

Just 100 years ago Cambridge Councillors were hatching grand ideas for new offices, with a grandiose plan being drawn up for a new and larger Guildhall. These proposals could be said to have caused a stink, but not so bad a stink as the sewerage system which was then being installed. Ratepayers revolted and told the elected members that they would not sanction grand new offices until the drains were fixed first.

In the event the rebuilding scheme was shelved until 1932 when plans by C. Cowles-Voysey for the present Guildhall met with more protest. But this time councillors were adamant and they were helped by the dangerous condition of the canopy which extended from the front of the building. The canopy was removed in 1933 - its old site marked by the white line just below the centre windows seen in this photograph

It was taken by the late Clement Williamson who worked as a photographer for the University School of Agriculture and is one of a number of glass slides sent in by his son, Jack Williamson of Argyle Street, Cambridge, which record unusual viewpoints of an area in the heart of Cambridge which has now changed dramatically

DO YOU HAVE FAMILY SNAPS THAT FILL GAPS IN OUR HISTORY - send them to Mike Petty at the News

ANOTHER INSIGHT INTO THE KING'S COLLEGE MURDER, 1930

Darton Holister, Fellow of Clare College, Cambridge has written adding a new insight into the incident at King's college in June 1930 which led to the death of police detective sergeant Willis ("Memories 23rd Sept).

He recounts a story told him in 1966 by Superintendent Bill Ainsworth, then a senior officer in Cambridge police. In 1930 Ainsworth had been a young constable at the Cambridge police station when he was instructed to accompany Segt Willis to witness the interview of an undergraduate who was under suspicion of theft.

The two officers strolled along Petty Cury, past the Guildhall and down St Mary's Passage en route to King's college. As they approached the doorway of Gt St Mary's church a rather distraught man emerged and called out to PC Ainsworth for assistance. A wedding was about to take place in the church and one of the bellringers had failed to arrive.

Naturally Mr Ainsworth pointed out that although he was an experienced bellringer he was on duty and not able to help. However Segt Willis felt sympathy for the young couple about to wed and encouraged him to help out with the peal, commenting that he would be able to interview the King's undergraduate on his own, together with the man's Tutor.

So Ainsworth stopped to take part in ringing the peal and the Sergeant proceeded on his own to the Tutor's set in the Gibbs building, where he and the Tutor were both murdered and the student committed suicide

Ainsworth always felt fortunate that his own life may have been saved by the chance meeting, his own bellringing skills, and the kind-heartedness of Police Detective Sergeant Francis Willis

PICTURE STORY NO.2: banjo player

When I spoke to a meeting of Cambridge Business and professional Club the other week one of the members was reminiscing about an old Cambridge character who played the banjo, lived in the St Andrew's Street area and sold newspapers. He was known as -"Dave".

The Cambridgeshire Collection has a photograph taken by Matthew Mason of one such musician - can anybody tell me if this is the same chap, or if not who he might be.

DO YOU REMEMBER "CHARACTERS" in your town or village - write to Mike Petty at the News

READERS WRITE

Mrs P. Rolph from Quy writes:

"I would be four years of age when my sister Amy married Walter Bull who worked for a Mr Winship at Milton. They brought the house no.31 Cam Road, next door to a Mrs Keens sweet shop. I was eight when I was allowed to go on the late afternoon buses to Cambridge. I'd go via New Square, James Street, over to Auckland Road. P. Hawkings had the bakery at the Common end. I'd go over the river for a penny and along the Ferry Path. My sister's was just four houses up on the left. On the corner of Montague Road was Mr Cousins' butcher. I used to walk through a kind of alley way to old Chesterton for fish and potato scallops. The potatoes were dipped in the batter & fried, delicious. I'm now coming up for 80 years.

MEMORIES, by Mike Petty, 16th October 1997

Ely Horticultural Society is celebrating what they believe to be their 80th birthday and so the other evening, after dinner, we looked back to the events of 1917 and the incidents which would have been influencing the minds of those who founded that society.

Chief amongst all would have been the casualties of war - so many local men paying the supreme price; one Soham family had send five sons to the front, by October 1917 four of them were dead, the other a Prisoner of War,

Ely was playing its part in restoring the shattered bodies of those wounded on the battlefields. A VAD hospital had been established in the Theological College and in 1917 40 wounded soldiers had enjoyed a peaceful Christmas there.

But as more and more men were needed for the front and Volunteers grew fewer, compulsion had been imposed with Military Tribunals appointed to decide who could stay and who must go. Farmers denuded of male workers turned instead to women, and to German Prisoners of War, based in Ely Infectious Diseases Hospital.

But other Germans were not far away, in fact just above the roof of the Cathedral, as Zeppelins raided, bringing destruction to the fenland countryside. Ely councillors considered placing a gun on Cherry Hill and agreed to give the warning by sounding the jam factory hooter.

Amazingly one of the gathering had actually seen Zeppelins and remembers one being attacked as it raided the area, Local newspaper accounts are patchy, but there is no doubt that bombs were dropped at Soham fen in August 1916, and pieces of a wrecked Zeppelin were being sold off there in October that year.

Ely was playing its part in the aerial war with a Royal Flying Corps stores depot in the city and aircraft regularly flew in to collect parts. Sometimes they were forced into emergency landings and one which came down between the Bedford Rivers had to be collected and brought back by barge.

Other wartime memories have come via Allan Motts whose Grandfather was in October 1917 experiencing the destruction that could be wrought by planes. He was in the unlimited mud of Passchendale. His diary records "Our first night here was to put it mildly trying! Four times between sunset and sunrise we were visited by Jerry bombing planes and each time they wreaked havoc, killing and wounding men by the dozen, as they could not fail to do in so thickly a populated area.

"On October 26th the first detachment went into the line, halting first at Irish Farm before starting on the dreaded Duck Walk. A more damnable place one could not picture, the whole way along the earth was pitted with shell holes, some half full of muddy water, and others smoking from recent explosions, for as we scrambled along the duck boards the ground belched flame and smoke to the accompaniment of ear splitting shell burst. Many of our party never reached the line, they were either carried back on stretcher or lay there to have their bodies, from which the souls had fled, further torn by the incessant bombardment".

Allan, of 192 Miller Way, Brampton, has recently discovered his grandad's most graphic handwritten journal and is hoping that it can be published

Harry Bye, of Ely, has written of more pleasant memories of aircraft for in October 1934 he was at Mildenhall RAF aerodrome watching Jim Mollison and Amy Johnson fly their new Comet aircraft direct from the De Havilland works at Hatfield so as to be ready for the International Air Race to Australia. He did not sleep too well on the evening of 20th October as traffic was thundering ceaselessly past his farmhouse near Shippea Hill, so he and two friends set off at 5am to bike to Mildenhall to see the first of the planes take off. 56 years later he was in Melbourne when he met a man who had witnessed the winning Comet arrive there, three days after leaving Suffolk. Another chap had been in India and seen the planes stop over for refuelling - and just to make the world seem even smaller he remarked that he had a niece who ran a grocery and flower shop in the Cambridgeshire fens, at Whittlesey,

PICTURE STORY NO.2: SWAFFHAM CHAPEL READERS WRITE

Alan Wyatt from Landbeach writes following my recent "Memories" of postal deliveries around Wicken and Upware. Further along the road in Swaffham Fen is a small chapel, used just once a year for Harvest Thanksgiving services. Beside it used to stand a tin hut. This hut had been built by Tommy Hood, a postman, who used to pass his days at Upware before returning to collect the letters and take them back to Soham. In it he would repair boots and shoes and later undertake basic radio repairs. The hut was removed about 18 months ago, a little piece of local now disappeared

Incidentally just down the road on the way towards Swaffham there stands an ordinary-looking white post on the edge of a field. In August 1940 when the concrete road was laid through the fen this post was driven into the underlying clay until its top was flush with the surface of the soil. It now stands five feet above the surface of the field - an indication of just how the fen has eroded in 40 years.

Do you know similar examples of little-known aspects of local history - write to Mike Petty at the, News

Mr D. Traylen of Cottenham writes: "I have in my possession a bottle of beer with the name J. & J.E. Phillips Ltd of Royston which was unearthed at the rear of my property on Newmarket Road. Can you give me any idea of when and where this Company existed?"

Answers please to Mike Petty at the News

MEMORIES, 23rd October 1997, by Mike Petty

This morning I took my usual walk to fetch the papers - the long way round. Along Mill Drove and down the edge of the field as the sun was starting to break through the early morning mist. Then across the stile into the meadow with its undulations marking the old ridge-and-furrow cultivation. The field was a complete sea of silver, shimmering in the sunlight - each blade of grass covered with cobwebs. On the hedges the last of the blackberries were wrapped in their silver strands.

Then, standing white amongst the silver grass was a mushroom. As I turned towards it I found myself walking up a rainbow as the sun's rays reflected the water on the cobwebbed grass, forming a path which led back up the field. When I stepped off the path, the rainbow followed me. It was a truly magical experience.

75 years ago others were experiencing miracles - the sound of voices and music coming through the air as the beginning of broadcasting transformed peoples' lives.

Pye, the Cambridge instrument company, began marketing a series of receivers and the Cambridge Daily News published a regular column giving instructions in this form of wireless communication. Wireless amateurs who were not owner-occupiers soon discovered that their landlords objected to them putting up aerials - the fixing of masts or poles to private houses could damage brickwork and an efficient lightning arrester would need to be fitted.

But the technology was expanding so rapidly that the paper urged people to wait for a while to see how matters would develop and so avoid disappointment and save money. By all accounts - they claimed in September 1922 - It may not be necessary to have aerials at all - any ordinary electric light installation or gas pipe could be used, or failing that a wire garden fence, or even a pair of knitting needles. "All this remains to be proved, and just as it took a long while to perfect the Invention of the gramophone, so we must expect it to be with wireless developments"

On 20th October 1922 the Cambridge and District Wireless Society members gathered at the Liberal Club, Downing Street, to hear a wireless concert broadcast from the transmitting station of Mr H.W. Taylor of Camden House. Sadly the receiving set would not function; two further sets of reputable make were acquired, but again neither worked. At about 9pm however Mr Taylor's voice was heard on the loud speaker and for about half-an-hour gramophone selections were received, but the reception was by no means the success it should have been and several people left early. Urgent steps were being taken to locate the mysterious fault which had blanked out the signals and prevented people enjoying to the full their first taste of the magic of music through the air.

WHAT ARE YOUR MEMORIES OF WIRELESS, did you own a crystal set -and what about the accumulators - write to Mike Petty at the News

READERS WRITE

Alan Wyatt from Landbeach writes following my recent "Memories" of postal deliveries around Wicken and Upware. Just off the road in Swaffham Fen is a small chapel, used just once a year for Harvest Thanksgiving services. Beside it used to stand a tin hut. This hut had been built by Tommy Hood, a postman, who used to pass his days at Upware before returning to collect the letters and take them back to Soham. In it he would repair boots and shoes and later undertake basic radio repairs. The hut was removed about 18 months ago, a little piece of local history now disappeared

Incidentally just down the road on the way towards Swaffham there stands an ordinary-looking white post on the edge of a field. In August 1940 when the concrete road was laid through the fen this post was driven into the underlying clay until its top was flush with the surface of the soil. It now stands five feet above the surface of the field - an indication of just how the fen has eroded in 40 years.

Do you know similar examples of little-known aspects of local history - write to Mike Petty at the News

Mr Sid Martin of Langdon House, Cambridge recollects another form of entertainment; he writes: "When the Regal Cinema was built in 1937 there was a lot of unemployed men about and jobs were scarce. The firm who built the cinema wanted to test its upper storey for weight and the best way to do this was to get 2-300 men to go up and sit on the seats. Now if you were unemployed you got about 5s. a day and these men were to get 2s.6d as it only took 1-2 hours. But on a week day this meant they would have to lose a day's unemployment pay, so to overcome the problem the men were allowed to do it on a Sunday - no loss of pay as it was not a working day, but they got the extra 2s.6d. Now I lived in the country and was not able to go. I would like to know if anyone is still around who can remember or did this job?"

MEMORIES, by Mike Petty, 30th October 1997

FAREWELL TO THE FAIR?

The centuries-old fair at Ely is facing the future with some trepidation, having moved from its traditional home on the Market Place and finding that its fortune has declined.

Such institutions have played an important part in the life of our county and Ely can trace its fair back to before 1135 when King Henry I granted a charter permitting a fair to be held for seven days at the Feast of St Etheldreda in June. So important was it that it was suppressed for a time in the C13 as it was interfering with the profit of the Westminster Fair and later the date was switched from June to October.

It was then a trading fair and at one time necklaces, known as St Audrey's lace, were sold which by the 17th century had become symbolic of the cheap and gaudy finery found at such fairs, giving to the language the word "tawdry"

Ely was not alone in its fairs. Cambridge held one of the greatest trading fairs in all Europe on its Stourbridge Common, and retains its Midsummer Fair, with its crockery stalls a continuing reminder of its trading heritage.

Another was held at St Ives and 100 years ago the Cambridge Daily News visited its Michaelmas Fair it commented on the great crowds of people who flocked into the town. "They came by the railway station, in many a slap-up conveyance and every shade of vehicle".

In those days Monday was looked upon as the principal business day and the streets around the Market were full of horses for sale, with side streets being used as exercise yards, allowing sellers to demonstrate the speed of their animals. Sheep and cattle were shown in the Market and the Pavement was crowded with shows and stalls.

Here you could shoot rifles at glass balls kept moving by water, see an armless lady do all sorts of things with her feet, get your portrait for 2d or invest your money in sweets, toys, nuts, cakes or hot peas. There were swings and steam roundabouts of galloping horses in the Broadway, vendors of cheap jewellery and needed even a dentist who would attend to your teeth.

But at St Ives in October 1897 there was a special attraction. Mr G. Dawston, pork and sausage maker, was exhibiting his new sausage-making machine, driven by one of Crossley's splendid gas engines.

People in those days tramped for miles to visit fairs or village feasts and if they arrived foot-sore might patronise a stall such as that operated by W. White Robinson on Market Hill, Cambridge. There one might purchase Pallister's shoes or Waterproof K boots. Rosemary Leach of Hemingford Grey has lent a photograph of his stall, taken by Valentine Blanchard, which shows something of his expense range - and makes one wonder how he managed to transport it all! Do you remember local fairs - write to Mike Petty at the News

Various people will have memories of another local institution - the St Ives Sand and Gravel Company which Harold Shelton has been tracing back to two brothers, Alfred and Chilli Everdell who in 1918 bought two ex-service buses which they converted to lorries to convey sand and gravel from Johnny Emmerson's pits - provided they extracted the material. The company flourished and were joined by Ted Greenwood and by Stan Darby with whom they merged in the early 1960s. In trying to piece together the development of the company and the people who worked for them Harold has gathered many reminiscences but would welcome more memories. He can be contacted at 38 Jubilee Avenue, Warboys, PE17 2RT

READERS WRITE

W.J. Hudson is a native of the Potteries and is intrigued by the names of houses in the Sturton Street area of Cambridge, which remind him of his home area. For example Hanley House, which he believes was built by a potter who travelled up to sell his goods in Cambridge market. Hanley was one of the Pottery towns & now the commercial centre of Stoke on Trent and nearby Etunia and Cobridge Villas carry the names of districts of Stoke. He believes there used to be a row of cottages opposite Hanley House which also carried a Potteries name - do you remember what? If you can help write to Mike Petty at the News

Next week sees Guy Fawkes Night when all sorts of excitement used to perpetrated by undergraduates in Cambridge streets. If you have memories to share write to Mike Petty at the News

MEMORIES, by Mike Petty, 6th November 1997

Bonfire night was celebrated, said the Cambridge Chronicle newspaper of 1786, in the usual manner, with squibs, crackers, rioting and mischief to the personal injury of many and the great danger of the inhabitants in general. The paper warned that any person let off fireworks in any public street would forfeit 20s, or be committed to the House of Correction to hard labour for one month.

But despite the official disapproval of the authorities people have continued to celebrate. In 1856 both St Neots and St Ives demonstrated their usual fireworks and noise, though the latter had no bonfires leading to the comment that "St Iveans seem to be tired of the mummeries of that usual demonstration".

Not so Cambridge for though there had been some evidence that "the regular manifestations of detestations of popery and popish plots - by punching each other's heads and blacking each other's eyes - was dying", being in 1850 only exercised by a few shop boys and Barnwell brats following in the wake of a half-dozen gownsmen or kicking a policeman or two, by 1859 the event was back to its full furore.

The paper reported how a party of undergraduates walked arm-in-arm along the principal streets with defiant expressions on their countenances and their sleeve turned up as if ready for battle. Being a Saturday night there were a large number of country lads in town and the Boys of Barnwell and other "scum" who generally visited the centre on that night made as dirty a mob as one would chose to set eyes on.

At first feelings were expressed in groaning or shouting, but soon some Barnwellians of larger growth, joined the mob. Skirmishes occurred, sticks were used by both parties, stones thrown by younger boys hit heads of both sides as well as neighbouring window panes. The most serious affray was in St John's Street where an undergraduate had his arm broken and an innocent passer-by - a Sunday school teacher - was attacked and taken to hospital.

By 10 o'clock the University proctors had intervened to send the undergraduates back to their colleges but roughs continued to prowl the streets, attacking any students they came across. It was all part of the normal celebration of Guy Fawkes Night.

But what of the Guy himself.

The reporter in 1860 recalled the Guy of former years - a figure dressed in modern but seedy clothes, supported on the back of a donkey, his arms outstretched to denote the intensity of the torture he had undergone, the gloved hands bearing brimstone matches spread out fanwise to show his diabolical intent; his face red and apoplectic with eyes fixed and expressionless and his complexion heightened by a large white frill and gigantic paper collar

Bonfires were not confined to Bonfire night nor were bonfires the only thing set alight. Cambridge students took great delight in setting fire to anything they could find - the fittings from the underground toilets on Market Hill, shutters from shops or fences round gardens being favourite targets. Indeed so much damage was done at one rag in 1905 that the University ended up paying some £200 compensation

But the most notorious bonfire night was that of 1948 when the headlines of the student newspaper "Varsity" proclaimed "Bonfire damage worse than enemy action during war". The interior of the Senate House was severely damaged by an explosive charge and 70 panes of glass broken. The priceless medieval windows of Kings' College chapel narrowly escaped destruction. Rockets were aimed at the Guildhall clock, scores of fireworks thrown and smoke bombs tossed down the underground toilets. In Sidney Street a van was seized and with a cry of "Up with his back wheels" was lifted into the air, rolled backwards and forwards and then pushed, over on to its side, causing considerable damage which was not fully covered by the driver's insurance whose business was badly lit with the van laid up. Students subscribed to a fund to pay for the damage. Two other vehicles were also attacked.

Some 2,000 people had been out on the streets, including a number of women undergraduates but military authorities had banned RAF personnel and American servicemen from entering Cambridge.

After a number of more peaceful 5ths violence again erupted in 1959 when youths poured oil on the water of Market Hill fountain and set it on fire. Meanwhile a continuous barrage of squibs and bangers interspersed with heavier explosions from larger, home-made fireworks, kept the crowds constantly on the move, though nearly everybody was caught by a squib and many people's clothes were scorched and burnt.

The terror of bonfire night continued into the 1960s with students banned from the town centre and the police warning townspeople to stay away but sanity was restored in the 1970s with the Cambridge Round Table organising a firework spectacular on Cambridge United's ground in 1973 and the City Council following this initiative with the now traditional celebrations on Midsummer Common, uniting Town and Gown on what was previously a night of conflict and battle

DO YOU HAVE MEMORIES OF 5TH - write to Mike Petty at the News

READERS WRITE

Edward Hall from Lt Eversden writes: "You asked for memories of wireless. My mother had a Cossor radio during the war. She would take out the valves and clean them. The wireless used a large dry battery and an accumulator which was charged up once a week for 6d.

Miss Daphne Foreman of Cambridge recalls how her father made their first wireless set in about 1937. The cabinet was made from wood left over from their poultry house and covered with green silk material taken from an old article of underwear belonging to her mother something she took great delight in telling visitors, to her mother's embarrassment. It had two knobs, one of which selected the three stations, National, Regional and Midland. The aerial wire was stretched the length of the garden

During the war she remembers every Sunday evening listening to the National Anthems of the countries which had fallen to the Nazis and their number grew every week. Her father used to accompany the Palm Court Orchestra on his violin

MEMORIES, 13th November 1997, by Mike Petty

The Last Post plays, the Standards dip, the wreaths are laid and the country honours those who did not grow not old.

For many however the names of those "we shall remember" read out at Armistice services in villages throughout Cambridgeshire are merely names, people we never knew. To a dwindling band of elderly men and women however they were comrades in arms - but who remembers those who fought and survived.

One who does is Dennis Poulter of Sawston who as a fit young Royal Marine served on landing craft guns on D-Day and was seriously wounded on the Dutch Island of Walcheren. He has a photograph of himself, gravely ill, being shipped back home on a stretcher.

Now he has produced a most remarkable record of the other men and women from Sawston who played their part in conflicts from 1919 to 1945. Page after page after page of photographs depict those who saw action both at home and abroad.

They include the exploits of women warriors - Kezia Keeler who, like Patsy Hancock and Gracie King joined the WRAP in 1918 and whose four sons fought in the Second War, Land Army girl Gwen Murray, WRNS Betty Whiting or Dorothy Wright who worked in the Entertainments National Service Association in Italy in India

There is graphic detail of those Sawstonians who were killed, including Sidney Matthews who spent Christmas 1944 near the small village of Kreuzrath inside Germany. On Christmas Eve they heard German soldiers start to sing carols to the accompaniment of a harmonium. Memories were awakened of the Christmas fraternisation of the First World War when opposing troops met in No Mans Land. Not so in 1944 - compass bearings were taken on the singers and an artillery barrage reminded them that Christmas Eve was no time for Peace and Goodwill.

Then a few days later Matthews was helping to lay an anti-tank mine field when there came an explosion. Out of 2,400 anti-tank grenades, 2,350 had detonated. The natural reaction was to send for stretcher-bearers but a quick walk around the area established that there were no survivors. 47 men had perished. There was nothing to do but collect up the bodies, write letters of condolence and lay more mines.

There is a letter sent by the Air Ministry (Casualty Branch) confirming the death of an airman, his fate revealed by a captured German document. Peter Mitchell had been navigator on a Mosquito aircraft over Belgium when it was shot down. The crew of two had been killed, their burial place was at that time unknown. Dennis Poulter has tracked it down to a plot in Heverlee War Cemetery. The aircraft had been shot down on 24th February 1944, the news of his fate was contained in a letter dated 16th March 1945 - over a year later

With details of the Home Guard and newspaper stories recalling happier incidents between 1919 and 1945 Dennis Poulter has produced a record worthy of the sacrifice made by those who did not return and those who came back to restart their lives. "The story of a village : Sawston 1919-1945" is only available from Sawston Book Shop, Morley's Place, Sawston for £8.50 plus L2.50

FEW VILLAGES HAVE SUCH A RECORD, share your memories with Mike Petty at the News

More memories of the county in wartime will be stirred by another publication, "Cambridgeshire's airfields in the second world war" by Graham Smith (Countryside books, 11.95). From Alconbury to Wyton there are details of raids and characters, both RAF and USAAF and of the civilians who lived and farmed beneath their shadows

READERS WRITE

Mike Richardson writes to recall his part in bonfire night 1961. Then a lad of 15 he was determined to celebrate in central Cambridge - though the area was out of bounds to undergraduates and servicemen. He found it was blocked off to civilians too. The surveillance camera at Drummer Street watched that area, police with their Black Marias cordoned off all other approaches. Finally some 100 15-year olds were escorted by Special Constables down Silver Street and along Queen's Road. One of their number - dubbed "The professor", a wizard at chemistry, had brought his own contribution to the celebrations in the form of a home-made firework which illuminated the whole area. In the sudden blackness which followed the lads scattered, and the night seemed full of the sound of fire engines

PICTURE: CAMBRIDGE'S LAST THATCHED COTTAGE

The quaint thatched cottage seems to nestle under the shadow of a country church tower - a symbol of old-England at risk both from war and from fireworks. But this one stood just off Park Street, Cambridge and the tower is that of St John's college chapel. Mr G Murfett of Cambridge remembers when it was nearly destroyed by fire. A plumber who was soldering a pipe with a blowtorch accidentally set the thatch alight and only prompt action by the fire brigade saved the day. It was finally demolished in 1972

MEMORIES, 20 November 1997, by Mike Petty

READERS WRITE

PICTURE: TRUMPINGTON HIGH STREET when Marjorie Swann was a girl

Mrs Marjorie Swann, now aged 97 and living at Boscombe near Bournemouth writes:

"My friends in Cambridge recently sent me cuttings from the Cambridge Evening News regarding the Coach and Horses at Trumpington, and I thought the following memories might interest you

My mother and father moved from Kent to manage this pub - a tied house owned by the Pemberton family - in 1900, when I was about three months old. My father died in 1909 and my mother stayed on as landlady until 1929. Her name was Alice Maude Howard.

I have wonderful memories of living in the old building. It was originally a coaching inn where coaches stopped for refreshment and fresh horses en route to London. In the garden remained a stepping stone to help ladies in long dresses mount the coach. Inside the lovely old doors were thick and solid. American visitors to the Pembertons were always brought to be shown around.

We were always in competition with other pubs in the village - the Red Lion, Unicorn, Tally Ho, Green Man and Volunteer. We were open all day but had to close at 10pm. Anyone wanting to drink for a further hour crossed the road to the Volunteer which was open till 11pm. Monday was especially busy as farmers drove down and from Cambridge market. They would go into the Tap Room and put a poker into the big open fire to warm it before putting it into their ale. Spittoons were much in evidence.

As there were so many pubs in the village there was great competition for trade. It was the one with the best billiard table or best games that attracted most customers. In our yard we had a big bowling alley. Balls were sent rolling down an incline to knock other smaller balls over. "Devil amongst the Tailors" it was called. Our lawn was a miniature golf course. The Tap Room had the usual darts and I used to play records on a big machine with a trumpet on it with a customer winding it up.

George, a regular customer, always wore hob nailed boots and used them for his special trick. He spread a box of live matches on the brick floor and danced on them in the boots! Blind Jo came once a week with his barrel organ and sometimes a German would bring his dancing bear

The gardens were a delight. The kitchen garden, adjoining Trumpington Hall Park, was huge with big solid high walls all around. There were ash trees and walnut trees and walnuts were sold in the bar for about 20 a penny. There were hens galore. I had the task of collecting the eggs from all over the place and they too were sold. We always lost one egg. One of the hens would go into the men's toilet to sit on the seat and lay her egg. At night the hens roosted on perches in a large hen house. The yard was full of pig sties. Sally and her lovely piglets were my favourites. Mother used to mix their food with 'old ale' to keep them happy.

Children from the village used to come to play with my brother and I as we had such a lovely big home. Candles were needed to light our way to the very primitive outside toilets. We used to hear the horse and cart come to empty them very early in the morning when we were still in bed.

Twelve soldiers were billeted with us during the 1914-18 war, by which time I was a pupil at the Higher Grade School, now Parkside Community College. Buses were few. I walked or begged a lift on a cart.

I loved my days at the 'Coach and Horses'. My memories of it are as vivid as ever. How different the world was then!

Rita Williams from Cambridge writes:

"I was very interested in your recent article about W. White Robinson and his shoe stall on Cambridge market. He was my great-grandfather. My grandfather kept a fruit & veg shop on the corner of Leeke Street on Newmarket Road.

On Sundays he sold winkles which came from Brightlingsea by rail - alive in a sack. They were then washed and boiled in a large coal saucepan on a gas ring in the back yard. The gas lead was a long rubber hose that pushed onto a small tap on the gas stove – today's safety experts would have a fit.

PICTURE STORY NO.2: banjo player

When I spoke to a meeting of Cambridge Business and professional Club the other week one of the members was reminiscing about an old Cambridge character who played the banjo, lived in the St Andrew's Street area and sold newspapers. He was known as "Dave". The Cambridgeshire Collection has a photograph taken by Matthew Mason of one such musician - can anybody tell me if this is the same chap, or if not who he might be.

DO YOU REMEMBER "CHARACTERS" in your town or village - write to Mike Petty at the News

MEMORIES, 27 November 1997 by Mike Petty

For most of us this will just be another Thursday. For thousands of Americans in Cambridgeshire however it is "Thanksgiving", commemorating the Pilgrim Fathers' first harvest in their New World in 1621.

The links between Cambridgeshire and America are very tangible and the University can claim to have educated probably 70 of the pioneers. John Harvard a student of Emmanuel College joined the early settlers and left his estate and library to a new place of superior education being established at Newtown. The college was called after him, and Newtown renamed Cambridge in 1638.

200 years later more local people were joining the trail to America. In 1832 six families from Willingham left for Liverpool and the ship to their new life; they were joined by six other people from Over. Each family received a sum of money from the parish to cover their expenses. Another 11 people were Westward bound from Haddenham.

Once gold was discovered in California the pressure to desert the harsh life of 1850's Cambridgeshire was almost irresistible. The Cambridge Chronicle of 1851 commented that "several families have emigrated to America, forced from their homes by the depressed state of the times and the low price given for agricultural produce".

Soham held a public meeting to consider raising money to aid the emigrants in 1851 - but there was another inducement in the form of Mormon Missionaries who had converted various of the good folk of Soham to their beliefs. In April 1853 anti-Mormon preacher A. Hepburn launched a crusade against their teachings before moving on to continue his fight in Cambridge and Sawston.

The Second World War saw Cambridgeshire's towns and villages welcoming American servicemen, both coloured and white, into their public houses and dance halls, and whilst their military story has been well told there is less on record about the impact they made on rural communities before they went home.

In July 1949 in the middle of the Berlin air lift crisis that the US Air Force announced that two American Medium Bomber groups were flying to bases in England "for a short period of temporary duty". By 1952 the base at Mildenhall was described as an "untidy and rambling oases of the American Way of Life. A huge and vulgar military anachronism set in the wild and monotonous Suffolk countryside. They have their own library (whose facilities can today show ours a thing or two!), grocery stores and barbers shops, their canteen or P.X. complete with flashy murals and a juke box"

But the G.I.'s longed to get away. "Educational Transport", known as the 'passion wagon' brought them to Cambridge. They flocked to pubs such as the Baron of Beef or Pickerel where - in 1952 - American style cocktail bars, recorded music and attractive barmaids were provided.

One American told a reporter "Sure I like Cambridge. You can always get a woman here if you want one, and give her a meal. When I see a pretty girl I take her round the waist and say 'Hi, baby, how's your life?' and by that time she likes me too much to go away". Another was feeling low "Because of one of your undergraduates I met in a pub invited me up to his room and I lost £15 playing him poker! And after that do you know, he pinched my girl. She didn't want me after she found I hadn't got any money"

All that was 45 years ago, perhaps things have changed - but do you have MEMORIES OF THE AMERICANS, at war or peace - write to Mike Petty at the News

READERS WRITE

Robert Thurley of Cambridge writes:

"The other day I was looking at an old copy of the C.E.N. when I spotted a paragraph about the local character "Spiv". Many of us oldies well remember him, especially the older sporting fraternity. He used to traverse Parker's Piece with his oval wicker basket dispensing chocolate and sweets, always with a great deal of humour"

Rita Williams from Cambridge writes:

"I was very interested in your recent article about W. White Robinson and his shoe stall on Cambridge market. He was my great-grandfather. My grandfather kept a fruit & veg shop on the corner of Leeke Street on Newmarket Road. On Sundays he sold winkles which came from Brightlingsea by rail - alive in a sack. They were then washed and boiled in a large coal saucepan on a gas ring in the back yard. The gas lead was a long rubber hose that pushed onto a small tap on the gas stove - today's safety experts would have a fit."

Memories of the county in wartime will be stirred by a new publication, "Cambridgeshire's airfields in the second world war" by Graham Smith (Countryside books, 11.95). From Alconbury to Wyton there are details of raids and characters, both RAF and USAAF and of the civilians who lived and farmed beneath the shadows of their wings

MEMORIES, by Mike Petty, 4th December 1997

SAME OLD NEWS

The announcement that the old Festival Theatre in Newmarket Road, Cambridge may be converted for use by the Cambridge Buddhists indicates a change of use for the building first constructed as the Theatre Royal.

But it has had similar use in the past. Build in 1814 it was used for 63 years as a theatre, seeing visits by most of the leading actors of the day. In May 1875 the Theatre was hired for a month to stage the mission of American evangelist D.E. Moody. This led to the establishment of a Ragged School in New Street which functioned for some years. By 1878 the Theatre was disused and sold by auction. It was bought by Mr Robert Sayle for £1875, but when he learned that a number of University students had hoped to obtain it for a Mission Hall and had collected £1650 for that purpose he sold them the building at that price requesting that the £225 extra he had paid should be considered his subscription towards their welfare work.

Posters were set up all over town announcing that the Theatre Royal, Barnwell, would reopen under entirely new management. When the audience arrived they found that instead of a play they were offered a prayer meeting. Various speakers expressed satisfaction that the building had been converted from a house of the Devil to a house of God.

The stage had been cleared of scenery and scriptural texts had been placed in from of the boxes and about the building.

The Mission flourished, attracting many young people who might otherwise have been walking the streets with nothing to do. It closed in 1920 and six years later the building was converted back to a theatre and renamed the Festival. This had a successful period, a period of decline and, most recently a period of disuse. Now it appears it may have a new role, catering for yet another audience

One person who knew the area at that time was Ida Redhouse, then Ida Everett, who has written to me from Maxey near Peterborough, with her memories and a photograph of her sister.

Ida was born in Walnut Tree Avenue, Cambridge 95 years ago. The Avenue used to run from the River to Newmarket Road & was demolished when Elizabeth Bridge was developed. She attended the Occupation Road Infants' School from 1907 to 1911 but encloses a battered old school group picture of an ever earlier period. Taken in 1888 it shows her sister Blanche in the front row. Ida herself remembers teachers Kate, Florrie and Nellie, besides Miss Beamiss who was very formidable. Florrie was the daughter of Wards the bakers of Newmarket Road

Yet more memories have come from Archie Rickwood, now of 29 Alton Gardens, Southend who recalls the back streets of Cambridge and seeing women wearing men's caps coming from the "Jug and Bottle" department of pubs with giant jugs of beer. But he himself grew up in Ely, where his grandfather started a shop called the "Old Curiosity Shop" selling curios and antiques to visitors.

Archie's father was lessee of the Ely markets and fairs and the lad got to know some of the characters who traded from them. One sold cough medicine and would start by talking in a cracked, croaky voice "My name is Percy Gasines. I have attended this and other markets for thirty two years bringing the benefit of my wide experience to you, the people. This mixture - a physic but a veritable elixir and aphrodisiac. I can only show you in the short time available for me the wonderful effect it has upon throat and voice". He would then take a dessert spoonful of the labelled bottle and having swallowed it would speak in a resounding bass baritone to further extol the virtues of the liquid which he would sell by knocking it down from £1 a bottle to not 15 shillings, not 10 shillings, nor five shilling but half a crown a bottle. Having quickly sold out he would be found in the bar of the Woolpack to prepare for a similar performance when the speech was just that little bit slurred

Archie attended Ely Cathedral Choir School where discipline was strict with "lock up" times which meant they had to be indoors by seven in winter. In cold months naughty choristers used to urinate on the mammoth "Turtle" coke heating stoves in the cathedral, which produced a diabolical aroma (a good trick too for the exhaust pipe of the engine which operated the generator at the cinema). The headmaster in those days had been a Chaplain in the Guards and was dead nuts on high standards from the "snivelling little guttersnipes" under his charge.

Perhaps that had an impact on Archie for he later served in the Grenadier Guards before joining Southend Police - and becoming part of their Police Singers. Now he has produced his "Memories of an ordinary man" which he sells for £10.00

READERS WRITE:

Mr E. Gray from Littleport writes: "I am 85 years old. We farmed near the Hundred Foot Bank at Welney and had to take the cattle and horses over the Suspension Bridge and across the Washes. If we had hay season on the Washes we bailed the hay and carted it to where some ropes which were strung across the river; using pulleys we hauled the bails across the river and down to the farm on the other side of the bank at Mr Wilken's Pymoor Hill Farm. Believe me it was some job!"

Dennis Poulter asks if you can help him with some research into wartime Pie clubs. These were arranged to supplement the rations of agricultural workers gathering in the harvest and were organised by the Women's Voluntary Service. Delivering food direct to the field meant that time was saved and workers fed with minimum disruption and loss of working hours. Do you recall the scheme?

Roger Cowern of Oadby, Leicestershire is researching wartime German espionage penetration of Britain. He is seeking further details of the Dutchman, Jan Willen Ter Braak who was found dead in an air raid shelter near Christ's Pieces, Cambridge. In his rooms was found a radio transmitter - but was it tuned to Germany, or Russia?

IF YOU REMEMBER THIS OR OTHER SPY STORIES WRITE TO MIKE PETTY AT THE NEWS

MEMORIES, 11th December 1997 by Mike Petty

Mention of Mormon missionaries in the fens in the 1850s ("Memories" 27 NGV) have been amplified by Margaret Oldfield of Whittlesey, near Peterborough

During her family researches she has discovered a journal kept by Elizabeth Lidia Fovargue who was baptised at Doddington church in September 1828. When she was 18 years old Lidia visited the bar-room of a local public house to hear a new form of preacher, Elder Cope, one of the Latterday Saints.

Although the young girl was quickly converted she found her parents ardently opposed but, defying them, attended the meetings regularly. When in June 1850 she was baptized by John Wayman in Mr Blenches pond her parents were furious and turned her out of the house so she found work at March, then moved to London. The agonies of her family can only be imagined, though Lidia records that when she finally let them know of her whereabouts they fell into a rage, begging her to return.

Instead she married another Mormon, James Smith, quietly - inviting none of her friends and only confessing to her family after the event. Picking up her courage she took new husband to meet the fenfolk before returning to Lewisham, giving away their furniture and setting off for Liverpool and the long overland trek to Salt Lake City. It was a life of hardship and children and when her husband died in 1874 she was left with five kiddies, poor health and not a dollar to her name. The promised land was not overflowing with milk and honey.

Mrs Peggy Cowell of Milton has more recent memories of Americans.

She writes: "In 1943 I started school at Chesterton Secondary Modern (as it was then called). In my first year a party was arranged for 50 1st year girls to entertain 50 G.I.s from Duxford - each girl was accompanied by her mother!

The girls and the Americans each picked a name out of a hat. I picked 'her daughter Kitty', so I had to find 'Old Mother Riley'. I found my other half, he hadn't a clue who he was looking for (How many of us would today?). My American's name was Donald M. Shane who was 19 years old and came from Lancaster, Pennsylvania.

Don was shy and quiet and said how much he missed home. It was a really good evening and my mother invited Don to come home to tea. He jumped at it and this became more and more regular until we were his home from home and received lovely letters from his mum, dad and sister. She sent me my first pair of nylon stockings (something I had only read about). They were marvellous and lasted for ages and ages. Don really became like a second brother to me.

One of Don's friends invited him to Sheffield on a blind date where he met and fell in love with Gwen, who he brought to meet his second family. They were eventually married and spent their honeymoon at our home in Cambridge.

Don decided to stay on in the Army/Airforce and did tours of duty in Bedfordshire, Germany and Spain. His last posting was in Virginia, USA

I didn't see him any more after he left Europe, but we kept in contact by letter. After 15 years Gwen came back to see her family in Sheffield – and us. I suddenly stood in Cambridge station in fear and trepidation, would we recognise each other, would we get on together. All of a sudden the train pulled in, there she was hanging out of the window calling me – and the 15 years just flew away. She came back every other year and each trip would spend a week with us, one year bringing her daughter Christine.

A year last September I had a phone call from Gwen. I was expecting her to say she would be with us any day - but she was at Heathrow, waiting for her flight home. Don had been taken very ill. He never recovered and died in the October.

Gwen always said to me you never think of Don as he was then - you always see that 19 year-old G.I. and I suppose I did. We shared all their happy times - seen their children and grand children grow up, and them ours. We also shared their sadness when their youngest son was killed in a terrible car crash on the Freeway.

I hope my memories will be of some help to you. I have never put them down on paper"

READERS WRITE

Reg Wood of Saffron Walden remembers the Cambridge Festival Theatre and its Restaurant with facilities for dining on the roof whose very popular head waiter was called Toni.

The Theatre was, he recalls, mostly in green with a series of steps leading up to the stage. The gallery was very dingy with wooden forms covered with leatherette, its entrance down a narrow passage from Wellington Street with wooden stairs. In the latter end of the 1930s it was redecorated and painted red and yellow, but it still retained the dark green curtains. Winston Churchill's daughter Sarah played at the Festival for a short season. She married Vic Oliver the comedian just afterwards.

The last time Reg went to the Festival Theatre was just after the war started to see George Bernard Shaw's "You never can tell". "My girl friends (later my wife) had never seen a Shaw play so we went. Of course buses stopped running after dark in the early part of the war and we couldn't afford a taxi, so we walked back to Chaucer Road where she was living at the time and then I had to walk over Coe Fen to Newnham, where I lived. I doubt if anyone would do it these days. Let's hope the Festival can reopen as a Theatre. It's so much part of the real Cambridge".

MEMORIES 18th December 1997, by Mike Petty

The announcement in the News on 10th December that Cambridge University have agreed to allow Raleigh bicycle company to produce a "University of Cambridge" bicycle range prompted some memories of other local bikes.

Delving back into the material in the Cambridgeshire Collection I have unearthed one or two examples - perhaps you can add more.

John Howes of Regent Street were building boneshakers in 1868 after seeing one in an exhibition in Paris. He started his own "Granta" cycle company in 1890 and by in 1909 was using fittings manufactured by the Birmingham Small Arms Company, thereby enabling them to guarantee absolute reliability for machines ranging in price from 10 guineas to £20. Certainly they were able to quote endorsements from numerous local dignitaries, including the Vice Chancellor of the University, A.W. Streane of Grantchester Vicarage and F.J. Foakes-Jackson of Jesus College who testified that he had bought one of their Granta bicycles in May of 1899 and covered 1,500 trouble free miles by that October.

For those who wanted an easier form of transport Howes offered a Granta Motor Bicycle with a 3 1/2 h.p. motor for 50 guineas.

One of their competitors was G.H. Whitehead of Cottenham with his "Senior Wrangler" cycles offering ladies machines from nine guineas and custom-built trailers to tow behind them. They too could build motor bikes to order. Another were Townsends who made their "Cycleries" bikes in Norfolk Street about 1895.

Robert Taylor of Soham who is said to have been one of the pioneers of the machine. When about 18 years old he had built a tricycle that could be propelled by the rider. Later he came upon a woodcut published in the "Illustrated London News" which depicted a man riding on two wheels. Local folk laughed at the idea but the young man persisted. He made two very light wheels of wood with wooden spokes and an iron rim. Pieces of old iron were fashioned into the main frame - the front fork alone weighing ten pounds. It was completed in 1868 and two years later he rode it to London where it created a sensation.

All that is a long time ago. But it is not so very far back that you could get a bicycle for free in Cambridge. The author Jack Trevor Story recorded in one of his novels how, as a lad in the 1930s, he had left his bike outside a shop, only to find on his return that it had disappeared. But no it hadn't. It had merely crossed the street and changed colour. Jack jumped on and biked off

But it was in October 1993 that Cambridge City Council launched its "Green Bikes" scheme stationing dozens of restored cycles at racks strategically placed around the city.-The idea was that they could be borrowed, ridden and returned. It was a brilliant scheme that half worked. The bikes were borrowed. The mystery is what happened to them. Did you ever see one - do you even have one?

WRITE TO MIKE PETTY at the News with your cycling memories

SPY STORIES

Further details have come to light following the request from Roger Cown of Oadby, Leicestershire for information on wartime German espionage penetration of Britain. Thomas Potts, a junior reporter at the Cambridge Daily News for some of the war years recorded his memories in an article some 20 years ago.

He recalled that there were two German spies based in the Cambridge area between 1940 and 1941. One was a Finn, Caroli, who landed by parachute north of Oxford in September 1940 and was arrested by the British within a few hours. He escaped in January 1941 and set out for Germany on a motor bike. He got as far as Ely when the bike let him down and he was recaptured. The Germans were allowed to know that Caroli's radio transmitter was at Cambridge railway station left-luggage office. They send another spy to collect it (unfortunately for them he was actually working for the British)

But, apparently unknown to the British, there was another spy working in Cambridge. His name was Jan Ter Braak and he too was thought to have parachuted in. He got himself an office in Rose Crescent where he could be heard tapping away at night. His radio was equipped with a Morse key but the neighbours thought he was using a typewriter - which would have accorded with his cover as a Free Dutch journalist.

There is even a claim that he arranged for an air raid to be launched on Cambridge on 25th February 1941. By now people were suspicious and his lodgings in St Barnabas Road were raided by police. Knowing the game was up he shot himself in an air raid shelter on Christ's Pieces. Or did he?

There must be more to be learned about wartime spies in Cambridgeshire, of people who dropped in by parachute and were rounded up before they could do mischief. Can you add to the story?

READERS WRITE

Flight Sergeant Frank Raeman from Belgium seeks your help in tracing the friends or family of the late Flying Officer Michael Donaldson who was shot down by Luftwaffe fighters whilst escorting Mitchell bombers to the power station in Langerbrugge in Belgium on 10th June 1943.

If you can help write to Mike Petty and I will forward your letter

MEMORIES, 24th December 1997 by Mike Petty

Christmas day in the workhouse - the traditional images of Victorian times are conjured up at this time of year.

f

So how was it celebrated in the area just 100 years ago?

1897 was a white Christmas. Frost which had set in Christmas Eve ensured that and on the great day itself there was skating to be enjoyed on the specially flooded meadows at Grantchester. But on Boxing Day the thaw set in and proposed skating matches at Littleport had to be abandoned.

For those in Cambridge workhouse, Mill Road, festivities started early on Christmas morning with the receipt of a Christmas letter and, following service in the chapel, the noon-day dinner was served in the dining hall with an abundant supply of roast pork, beef, mutton and plum pudding. In the afternoon inmates received gifts of tobacco, snuff, tea, cake, oranges, sweets and beer and when tea time came they were regaled with half a pound of plum cake. In 1897 there was a Christmas tree for the children, strewn with gifts, admirably decorated by Miss Hosegood. Other decorations adorned the chapel, dining hall and sick wards. When it was all combined with a visit from the Mayor all agreed it had been the brightest day of the year.

Just along the road at Chesterton the poor were allowed the treat of leaving the Workhouse to attend Christmas service in church or chapel before returning to a meal of equal splendour to their Cambridge neighbours. Following a bread-and-butter tea inmates adjourned to the Girls' school which had been set up as a concert room and where an amusing farce "Petticoat Perfidy" was performed by the Misses Cullum and Mrs M. Marshall.

Out at Newmarket the regulation workhouse meals were replaced for the day by an abundance of seasonable fare. During the morning there was a distribution of gifts including tobacco and snuff and packets of tea with 3d bits in them. In the afternoon the Master's organette was brought into action and the day concluded with songs and recitations by the children, "musical chairs" and other games and dancing.

There were gifts for inmates - scarves and cuffs for the boys and girls donated by Mrs John Hammond, motto-cards to hang by the beds of those in hospital wards from Miss Seaber, woollen wraps for the old women from Mrs Payne, hoops and skipping ropes from Mrs Westley and of course an abundance of oranges, tea, snuff and tobacco

Twenty-five years later, 1922, saw things had changed somewhat. The weather then was windy and showery, discouraging people from venturing from in front of their fire - though for those who had the inclination there was football to be watched at Cambridge Town Football Club on Christmas day, with even an excursion train to take dedicated fans down to London to watch Tottenham Hotspurs. And there was the traditional Christmas day swim for those hardy souls willing to brave the water.

Mill Road workhouse had been transformed with paper flowers, Chinese lanterns and fairy lights decorating the main parts of the building. On Christmas Eve the children hung up their stockings and found next morning that Santa had not forgotten to call. There were sausages for breakfast, cakes for tea and a dinner-time menu which echoed that of 25 years before. In the Children's home, Ross Street, Cambridge, the 21 children indulged themselves in making a noise. The wail of trumpets, the squeak of whistles and the grunt of mouth-organs came from everywhere at once. It was somewhat quieter in the Cambridge Church Army Home, Willow Walk, where the men passed their time singing, playing round games, chess, dominoes and draughts - after the traditional Christmas dinner of roast pork and plum pudding.

As for the children at Addenbrooke's Hospital they found their wards decorated with balloons, fairy lights, holly and mistletoe. Excitement knew no bounds when Father Christmas himself arrived - though not by chimney, not by door, but by window. Then there were the other wards, whose names will evoke memories for many.

Griffith Ward had horse-shoes as symbols of good luck. In Hatton Ward a large stethoscope hung in the centre of the room along with rows of Chinese lanterns and even a miniature artificial lake. Then there were Victoria and Albert Wards, Hope and Coliglon - where Dr Searle, dressed as Father Christmas carved the turkey and Dr Scales and his daughters provided the music.

One is missing. The one that was a long way to go, where black cats and red lights were the distinctive decorative features that Christmas. Beside the fireside sat a full-size figure of a witch and on the piano was a wonderful pussy which lit up at night. Many will not need to be reminded that this ward was Tipperary.

Do you have memories of Christmas in hospital or infirmary? What presents did you find under your Christmas tree, or in the toes of your stockings? Why not sit down after the turkey and write to Mike Petty at the News

Memories 1998 in one sequence

Memories, 1st January 1998, by Mike Petty

Seventy-five years ago as the Old Year 1922 made way to the New Year 1923 some seven hundred people made their way to Parker's Piece in Cambridge to witness the revival of a hundred-old tradition many had feared dead.

The custom dated back to 1820 when Isaiah Deck, a chemist on King's Parade, having supped with some friends, crossed the street to the space in front of King's college gate just before midnight and, on the stroke of twelve, let off a rocket, after which the party drank each other's health in punch.

It became a regular event which was continued by his son Arthur who added to the spectacle in 1853 by using two rockets, one for the Old and one for the New Year.

By 1900 as the new millenium dawned throughout Cambridge all forms of entertainment both public and private stopped. Hundreds of people headed for Kings Parade and as the Nineteenth-century got into its last quarter of an hour the crowd in front of Deck's the chemist grew even larger. Finally the door opened and the hero of the hour emerged.

Alderman Arthur Deck was one of the grand old men of Cambridge. He had been a town councillor for nearly 50 years, he was and an enthusiastic balloonist - but most importantly he was the Rocket Man.

As King's clock struck the first chime of midnight a rocket whizzed up into the night sky and everybody waited for the distant explosion and the pretty coloured lights that would follow. Then before the clock had finished striking up went the second. The Twentieth Century had now officially arrived in Cambridge. It was welcomed with much shaking of hands and exchanging of good wishes, with the singing of Auld Lang Syne and rousing cheers.

Then all adjourned to Deck's back parlour where steaming punch was ladled out with unsparing hand and the Alderman's health was drunk time and time again.

Arthur Deck saw the start of 1908, but not its conclusion; his rockets continued until 1913, then Dora - the Defence of the Realm Act - forbade them for the duration of the First World War.

In December 1919 those Cambridge people looking forward to a general return to pre-war conditions at the festive season were disappointed to learn that there would be no rockets to signal the New Year. Mr Deck junior explained that sometimes the rocket sticks had caused damage when they fell and - perhaps more significantly - the crowd had been rowdy - things not to be tolerated in those days. So he had decided that his father's custom must not be his. It seems a pity said the paper - "There are many loses we could submit to with less regret than the loss of the rockets and the abandonment of a celebration which was based on good fellowship". It was the end of a chapter, but not the end of the story.

In 1922 the custom was revived in response to continued pressure. But it was thought no longer safe to use Kings Parade for the launch and the ceremony transferred to Parkers Piece. Midnight found a thousand people assembled to watch the rockets which were set up opposite Regent Terrace

A minute before twelve there was a whiz and 1922 was borne away in a shower of sparks and coloured light. For a space there was silence, then on the stroke of twelve from the Catholic Church - whiz and 1923 had come.

As the smoke cleared away somebody started playing "Auld Lang Syne" on a cornet, spectators took up the words and the rousing strains of the song echoed into the night. It was followed by the National Anthem and everybody went home, or back to their parties, confident that the New Year had been properly launched.

But it was not quite the same, numbers dropped off and people found other attractions in the town on New Years Eve. So it was that 1929 arrived underrated by any rockets and one of the most celebrated of Cambridge customs fizzled out.

Perhaps it could be resurrected in time for the next New Century

READERS WRITE:

Helen Seeley of Cambridge writes : "I was looking through an old Jarrold's Pictorial Series book on Cambridge and was interested to see that there were iron railings round King's College, presumably taken down for the war effort in the Second World War"

In fact the heavy railings in front of King's - identical to those which still stand around the Senate House - were removed in 1927 as part of a plan to improve the appearance of the area. They were replaced with lighter railings until a low wall in memory of the Rev Septimus Philpotts was erected in 1932. During the Second war various Cambridge railings were removed and melted down though an exemption was granted to more historic ones

Memories 8th January 1998 by Mike Petty

LOOKING back on the stories of January 1973, I find that one of the items in the news was beef.

In those days it was not BSE, nor the safety of beef on the bone, but the price being demanded by butchers and others.

Cambridge housewives had been warned in May 1972 of steep prices in meat prices because of increasing prices in wholesale markets. Mr A.C. Finbow, area manager of J.H. Dewhurst, who had 10 city branches, said rump steak would probably have to go up from the present 75p per pound to 78p.

By January 6, 1973 the rising price of beef was again hitting the headlines, though one supermarket was keeping the price down to 94p a lb for home-produced rump steak. Argentine rump steaks were around 65p a lb, with topside at 45p against English topside at 60p a lb.

Roger Purvey, the Tesco manager, thought that prices had to ease off. "People are buying more lamb instead of beef."

Housewives were indeed resisting the increases which it was claimed were due to a reduced supply of home-killed beef, declining supplies from Ireland and the increased pull of the continental market.

But nobody was quite sure, so Ted Heath's Government had set up an inquiry to discover just what was pushing the prices so high.

Now the restrictions on the sale of beef on the bone have added to the problems and people say that meat does not taste like it used to.

Old photographs show vast amounts of meat hanging up outside butchers' shops during the Christmas period.

In 1904 one correspondent to the Cambridge newspapers recalled how Cambridge used to have a show night when almost everyone went out into the streets to see how the shopkeepers had striven to make the best possible display of their wares.

Above all the butchers and poulterers' exhibited huge quantities of the carcasses of prime beef and poultry. But in their endeavours to outdo one another the butchers killed more meat than they could sell and losses eventually caused Show Night to be abandoned.

There was another consideration - some people regarded the exhibition of so many carcasses as barbarous and "unworthy of 19-century civilisation".

But other photographs, such as those of Burwell taken by Dorothy Grainger, showed the custom continued. Ken Isaacson of Soham has recorded in his A life in the Meat Trade", how, in the 1920s, his father would go to the Smithfield Fat Stock Show to buy fat cattle for his Christmas trade - cattle weighing 17 to 18 cwt with backs as wide as old-fashioned kitchen tables.

A day or two later the cattle would arrive at Soham station to be led through the village to the butcher's shop. Here they would be brushed, combed, sprayed with water, bedecked with ribbons and rosettes before they were displayed in front of the shop. Everybody used to turn out to see their Christmas joint on the hoof saying "cut my joint off this one Ernie - about eighteen to twenty pounds of rib and a stone of fat".

It would be slaughtered at the shop and delivered on Christmas Eve either by pony cart or carrier bicycle overloaded with the heads of turkey and geese hanging almost down to the level of the road.

And if grateful customers plied the butcher's boy with mince pies or home made wines then it all made for a merry time - provided the pony at least stayed sober enough to see the road home.

Do you remember Christmas meat displays? Write to Mike Petty at the News

READERS WRITE

AN anonymous correspondent has sent a cutting of the obituary of Eddie Chapman, war-time spy.

Eddie was a successful criminal — until he was caught and found himself imprisoned in Jersey when the Germans invaded the Channel Islands. They suggested he carry out sabotage in Britain and on December 20, 1942, Chapman, codenamed "Fritzchen", was parachuted down near Ely with the mission to blow up the De Havilland factory where the Mosquito fighter-bomber was being built.

Instead he phoned Wisbech police station. Once he had convinced them he was a genuine spy he became a British double agent with many wartime adventures before returning, post-war to his original trade as safe-breaker.

He published The Eddie Chapman Story, which was made into a film, appeared on BBC TV's Underworld series in 1994 and died in December last year. Any more spy stories welcome.

Memories 15th January 1998

THE headline news of the tornadoes which struck Selsey last week will have brought back memories of the storms which swept across the country in October, 1987.

But there have, of course, been others. Perhaps the greatest storm ever to have hit Cambridge occurred on November 26, 1703, when, according to contemporary chronicles, "Part of King's College Chapel fell down, part of Katharine's Hall's (St Catharine's college) New Chapel was damnified; Fifteen Stacks of chimnies fell down into St John's colledge, without hurting any Body, but Two or Three miraculously escaped. "St Peter's Colledge was much damnify'd, and a Stack of Chimnies fell into the Vice-Chancellor's Chamber, but was so far from hurting that he was not awaken'd by it".

1925 was another year of wild weather, when in February a terrific gale swept the country with Cambridge bearing the brunt of hurricane-force winds, trees were uprooted, shop windows broken, cyclists blown off their bikes and the canvas roof torn off a car driving along Huntingdon Road.

In an incident similar to that echoing that of last week near Barway, a goods shed at Sawston railway station was blown on to the railway track and hit by the London train, which had to stop at Shelford station to remove portions of corrugated iron from the engine. Then it ran into a hut at Trumpington which had been blown across the line.

Just in case history is going to repeat itself further, if 1925 is any guide we can expect exceptionally hot weather in May, with thunderstorms sending giant hailstones which cause great damage, to be followed two days later with a three-hour thunderstorm, with lightning killing cattle and striking the church spire at Buckworth. June had seen temperatures of 82 degrees Fahrenheit in the shade, soaring to 86 degrees in July but combined with 13 days of rain - and more to come in August. The year will then end with exceptional frost and snow in November, though with a thaw by Christmas. You have been warned.

Mention of the various German spies around during the Second World War has prompted Dr Neville Silverston of Cambridge to send me a photograph of the Bottisham and District Home Guard, which was taken in front of Anglesey Abbey.

One of their tasks was to keep watch out for suspicious characters. Their colleagues from Babraham were responsible in June, 1940, for rounding up the crew of a crashed German plane, thought to be among the very first prisoners to have been taken by the Home Guard. By July, 1941, Home Guard activity was hotting up, especially following the arrest of a one-legged man from Chichester who was found with a German wireless transmitting set in his rooms in Victoria Road, Cambridge.

He claimed it had been "liberated" from a crashed German plane which had come down in Sussex. While his trial was awaited (though not, apparently reported due to wartime censorship) there were headlines of the execution at the Tower of London of a German secret service agent who had been dropped by parachute in the Home Counties area. He carried with him a transmitter, a large sum of English money and rations - including a German sausage. His spying activities had been terminated by a Home Guard unit.

Then, one night at the end of July, 1941, a car failed to stop at a Home Guard checkpoint just outside Cambridge.

The sentry on duty cried "Halt, who goes there", then, when that had no effect "Halt or I fire". As the car continued to roar away he took aim.

The bullet passed through the bodywork of the car, through the seat and into the body of the driver, a 23-year old lieutenant in the Army Intelligence Corps. In the passenger seat was a 16-year-old Perse schoolgirl. They had been for a quiet drive in the countryside after a visit to the cinema.

The driver died from a bullet wound in the chest. Now a television company making a documentary about Home Guard activity is seeking to make contact with anybody who can give them further details.

If you can help, please write to Jeremy Williams at Laurel Productions, 116-118 Grafton Road, London, NWS 4BA (0171267 9399).

And, of course, if you have memories of Home Guard activities around here, please share them with Mike Petty at the News.

Memories 22nd January 1988

MARJORIE LOUKES of Cherry Hinton seeks help in identifying the location of a painting by her late husband, Donald, some 35 years ago.

The turret in the background looks something like the bandstand on the top of what used to be Laurie and McConnal's in Fitzroy Street.

One who certainly knows the area is 80-year-old Mr H A Palmer, of Cambridge, who has written sharing his memories of the streets around Newmarket Road, Cambridge, where his grandfather, Thomas Thickpenny Cash, had a cobbler's shop, making and repairing boots and shoes for Thressels in Bradwell Court. Behind their business premises, which were between Abbey Church and a newsagents shop, there was an old wooden building which housed two deep wells. There was also a passage running level with the shop between Abbey Street and Coldham's Lane called "Back o' Barnwell". He also remembers a tradition of this time of year - the costermongers' barrow race run on Boxing Day until, I believe, 1912. His Grandfather was the official timekeeper.

Jim Richardson, of Cherry Hinton, has occasion to recall the Christmas of 1944, for he was in Eindhoven, Holland, enduring more than two feet of snow. The next year, however, it was a complete change of location and temperature, for he was on duty with the RAF in India, sweating in heat of 140 degrees in the shade. While there, he was admitted to hospital and awoke one morning to find his locker containing something that had not been there the night before: a little slipper bag containing razor blades, soap, a shaving stick and writing paper. With them was a note: "Don't forget to write home." It was only when one of his mates found a diary they realised it was Christmas Day, and the Ward Sister had prepared little gifts for her patients. Jim always looks back on that present as the best ever. It was not the price or the size that counted, but the thought. That sister was, to him, an angel on earth.

Brian Humphreys, of Mawson Road, Cambridge, is tracking down his family tree. He is seeking a photograph of the Newmarket Volunteer Fire Brigade which included its captain and founder, Robert Simpkin Jacob, who died in April, 1894. Can you help?

Eagle-eyed News reader Richard Cox, of Quy, has sent in names of all the members of the Bottisham Home Guard - and also spotted that technological gremlins caused last week's picture to be printed back to front - causing all of Bottisham's defenders to appear improperly dressed, with their caps tilted the wrong way. The names, together with the original picture, by Stearns of Cambridge, will be deposited in the Cambridgeshire Collection.

In July, 1940, the main worries of the Home Guard, then known as the LDV (Local Defence Volunteers or, according to your inclination, Lousy Dirty and Verminous or Look Duck and Vanish) were spies and lights at night. At Dullingham, reports came in that red, green, yellow and other types of light were being shown and so they set out to investigate.

They identified the source of the lights as being from Devil's Ditch between Wood Ditton and Stetchworth and, in conjunction with members of the Regular Army, staked out the area. All remained in ambush, perfectly silent until 4am, when they noticed one of their number was missing. He was eventually found at the bottom of the ditch, having lost his footing and rolled over and over down the slope. Despite his discomfort, he had obeyed orders and maintained perfectly still. His heroism was unrewarded, no spies showed, no lights seen. There is a picture in the Cambridge Antiquarian Society's collection, housed in the Cambridgeshire Collection, of a military installation dug into the Devil's Ditch at Reach. I have heard various accounts of its actual purpose. Can you put the record straight?

Memories 29th January 1998

ON SATURDAY night I joined members of the Thriplow Society for an evening of mystery, music and memories.

The mystery part of the proceedings involved solving two of the cases that confronted Sherlock Holmes in Cambridge. One, The Missing Three Quarter, was straightforward enough for Dr Watson does state quite clearly that it took place in and around Cambridge, and the only mystery was if there could be any way to bring Holmes into Thriplow itself.

The second, The Three Students, was more problematic as the scandal is so great that Watson declines even to indicate which of the University cities is the venue for the action, although he does assign it a date, and it is possible to place Holmes in Cambridge at that particular time

The musical part of the proceedings was far more entertaining, at least to me, as I'd given the lecture several times before. Village resident David Gibson, dressed in appropriate period garb, delivered a fine rendition of a number of contemporary songs, with the audience joining in the choruses.

Add a fine buffet supper and it made it an evening to add to the memory. Yet such entertainment was once part of normal village life, as Sheila Andrews has recalled in a recent booklet.

In the 1930s very few people had a wireless or wind-up gramophone. But there was the Band of Hope on Monday evenings where young and old joined in, usually with a magic lantern show given by "Uncle David and Aunt Flossie". Then, every other Tuesday, there was the Girls' Guild, where they were taught craft and sewing. On alternate Thursday afternoons the Women's Meeting would hear readings from such works as Anne of Green Gables.

Meanwhile, in the Reading Room, the young men of the village would gather for cards and billiards. When you added whist drives and dances, garden fetes and Sunday school treats, it becomes apparent that there were plenty of things to do even in quiet villages in the days before television.

Steps Back in Time, by Sheila Andrews, is available from Shirley Wittering of 24a Middle Street, Thriplow, SG8 7RD for £3 plus 50p postage

- Lorna Delanoy and other enthusiasts at the Farmland Museum, formerly based in her back garden at Haddenham and now ensconced in the more palatial setting of Denny Abbey, have been searching for more than 20 years for a "horse works" This device, working through a series of gears, was adapted to operate such machines as elevators, cake breakers and the like down on the farm, using "horse power" rather than manpower.

A few months ago one was discovered under an elder tree in a farmyard at Sutton, less than two mile away from the old site of the museum. What's more it had been supplied by another nearby firm, Whiting Camps of Wilburton, in the 1920s and not used for more than half a century. With the assistance of museum helpers and a capable tractor driver, the monster machine was lifted and transported to Denny, where it will be restored for when the museum reopens in March.

Now the appeal is on for anybody who has experience of operating a horse works - as well as a very docile horse. If you can help, please phone the Curator of the Farmland Museum on (01223) 860988

- Horsepower of another type is always in the new. As discussions continue to rumble on about Cambridge traffic problems, it is interesting to glance back to a cartoon in the Cambridge Daily News c just 50 years ago. Some things, apparently, never change!
- The role of the Willingham Home Guard in apprehending a German spy has been told by Nigel West in the Telegraph Sunday Magazine in January 1980.

When Wulf Schmidt jumped from a Heinkel in September 1940, he had a wireless set an instructions to make his way to London. His arrival in the Fens went unnoticed, he buried his parachute spent the night in a hedge and, nursing a bruise ankle, headed towards the sound of a church clock. He stopped on the village green to bathe his ankle in the village pump and continued down the street to find breakfast. At the Connie Mills grocery shop h bought something to eat, before moving on to the newsagent to do what every Fenman does - buy copy of The Times. He then found himself escorted by a very obliging local to The Three Tuns where he was introduced to the licensee, who just happened to be commander of the Home Guard unit!

Memories 5th February 1998 by Mike Petty

Recent newspaper stories of the problems over the high speed rail link to the Channel tunnel come just 25 years after Aerospace Minister Michael Heseltine announced the cancellation of the Hover-train project

The project had been launched with great excitement in 1970 and engineers began erecting a number of huge concrete beams on pylons on the only site in the country that was suitable between the two Bedford Rivers at Earith.

Only here could they find the 20-mile straight length they needed to develop the technology that would whisk people at 300mph and put Edinburgh a mere hour away from London. It would be the ideal way to provide a high-speed rail service for the 47-mile link between London and the projected new airport at Maplin.

Conservationists however were appalled. "A monster of steel and concrete will now drive an ugly path along the haunt of snipe and redshank," complained naturalist John Humphreys.

Others thought back to the problems which had faced the early railway pioneers as they laid their metal tracks across the unstable fenland. Their doubts were reinforced in August 1970 when one of the large concrete beams destined to carry the train above the boggy fen collapsed.

Slowly, however, the track grew and the Hovertrain set in place on it. It was to run on a cushion of air produced by powerful fans and propelled by powerful linear motors.

By 1971, the experimental hover-train was in motion, and before Christmas it had reached the staggering speed of 12mph. By the following August they were up to 72 mph and permission was sought to extend the track. By January 1973 speeds were up to 106 mph.

"Faster than a sportscar," commented the News, even though this represented only about one third of its proposed full power. The Japanese were expressing interest in this British "Concorde of terra firma". The Government, however, were withholding the funds needed to extend the track beyond its one-mile length

By the end of 1972 local MPs and councils were urging the Government to make a quick decision on the project's future. It came in mid-February 1973 - it was to be scrapped and parts sold off to other companies. An arrangement had been made with Hawker Siddeley to develop the linear motor and British Rail had agreed to continue development of the magnetic suspension system.

The decision brought uproar in Parliament with complaints of short-sightedness, lack of initiative and incompetence.

Workers of Tracked Hovercraft, the company which had been set up in 1967 to develop this innovative new technology, were bundled out of their Ditton Walk offices in Cambridge within 36 hours of the announcement of the cancellation.

But not everyone was upset, for the Earith site was dismantled and the fens went back to their isolated peace.

With the approach of the Millennium, many communities are planning ways in which they can commemorate the event and leave some lasting record of their area.

Now the Open University has produced some suggestions for those considering the options. Some of them require detailed research in county record offices in an attempt to reconstruct the life and times of 1851, others encourage the more elderly members of the community to record their memories of childhood in the 1930s. However, there is another suggestion which will, in fact, fill a much larger gap in the story of the county.

Many homes will include a beaker, mug, newspaper supplement or other souvenir of the Coronation of 1953. Various places even produced their own guides to the celebrations they organised at that time, so that the great day itself could be commemorated.

But there is far less record of life in the community in 1953. The Cambridgeshire county guide gives a glimpse of some villages - how at Thriplow, the Winter Egg Farm had large brooder houses well-filled with chicks and at Litlington pigs from A C Playle's herds of pedigree large black pigs lived out in the open most of the year.

But what was life like for you? Do you have memories of life in the forgotten 1950s? And would you like a copy of the Open University's guide to Millennium projects? Write to Mike Petty at the News, Winship Road, Milton, Cambridge, CB4 6PP.

Memories 12th February 1998

Cambridge University students found themselves under the spotlight this week in 1973 with the publication of a report by the University's High Steward, Lord Devlin.

He had been called in after student disturbances in February 1972 when 600 undergraduates had occupied the Old Schools - the University administrative offices - in protest at plans to reform examinations.

This prolonged occupation was followed by the convening of the University's Court of Discipline, held in Cambridge Guildhall, which had to be protected by large numbers of police called in to support the University's Proctors.

It degenerated into a shouting match with obscenities both shouted and spelled out on cards held up in front of the judicial panel. Ten students who were protesting outside the Court were themselves arrested and ended up being fined more than those convicted for the original sittings.

Lord Devlin's report gave advice on how any future demonstrations should be handled and also advocated greater student participation in university government. This report, too, proved controversial and led to further protests and occupation of the Lady Mitchell Hall in Sidgwick Avenue. Smoke canisters and thunder-flashes were let off as counter-demonstrators arrived.

One thousand marched to the Old Schools when the sit-in ended, but when the proposals for a greater student say in University affairs were instituted, they were met with student apathy. The most famous student protest of modern times was in 1970 when 1,000 undergraduates, opposed to a promotion for holidays in Greece being held at the Garden House Hotel, clashed with police who made a truncheon charge against the mob before invoking the Riot Act. At the trial that followed, Judge Melford Stevenson passed deterrent sentences of between five and 18 months in prison on six students.

In Victorian times things could be different - as a story from February 21, 1898, illustrates. The ending of the Lent bumping races was an excuse for a celebration at Emmanuel College. Students bombarded the college facade with fireworks, then they set out to start a bonfire. Raiding the college rooms, they broke down doors which were flung on the blaze. The remainder of the woodwork soon followed, to be supplemented by anything else which would burn.

Around the bonfire, the wild spirits performed a war dance while a number of men clad in evening dress leapt through the flames and smoke. The excesses continued until midnight. But this was not a riot, merely the young gentlemen having a fling - boys will be boys, you know.

FREQUENT victims of student excess were the drivers of hansom cabs. Indeed the original "Chariot of Fire" was one of these horse-drawn cabs which was commandeered by students who then set it on fire, leaving the terrified horse to gallop round Market Hill pulling the blazing vehicle behind it.

Although the cabmen were always compensated for their loss, their lives could often be hard. In various towns there were cabmen's shelters so they could keep warm while waiting for their fares. One of these has been discovered and renovated at Hitchin but I believe there may have been one behind the old Guildhall in Cambridge. Does anybody remember it? Were there others in the area? If you know please write to me, Mike Petty, at the News.

A television programme this week will be examining the life and times of Oswald Mosley and his black shirts during the 1930s. Mosley visited Cambridge on various occasions. Do you remember the Fascist rallies and the counter-demonstrations? If so please write to me with your memories.

Reg Wood from Saffron Walden, however, recalls more peaceful pursuits. He lived in Bourn from 1916 to 1932. In that village they had a Reading Room and the Victoria Rooms. Then, in 1922, villagers got together and bought an ex-Army hospital hut which they erected in Caxton End. It provided a home for the Men's Club with billiards, cards and newspapers. The most popular events were social evenings organised by the local Labour Party, which engaged a band and visiting artistes from Cambridge including Brian Stubbings and George Papworth and then* marionettes.

The big event of the year was the village feast when C. Manning's Fair visited Bourn with roundabouts, swings, coconut shies and a rock stall. During the Second World War part of the hut was used as a factory with a weekly cinema show in the other half. Like Sheila Andrews from Thriplow (Memories, January 29) Reg, also recalls the visits from Uncle David and Aunt Flossie with their magic lantern shows.

They obviously made a big impact on village life.

Memories 19th February 1998, by Mike Petty

ENOCH POWELL, who died recently, and Oswald Mosley, the subject of revived interest because of a television drama, both shared the same platform at Cambridge - albeit at different times. For, like thousands of others they addressed various meetings at the Cambridge Union Society.

Enoch Powell spoke there in 1979 in a debate which also featured Edward Heath and David Steel. Mosley was there in April, 1960, speaking to the University's Conservative Association - and had a jelly slapped in his face by a demonstrating undergraduate.

More serious opposition had occurred at a meeting of the University Labour Club at the Cambridge Guildhall in May, 1927, when, as Labour MP for Smethwick, Mosley had been howled down by some 300 undergraduates.

Even the chairman, Dr Alex Wood, found some difficulty making himself heard in a meeting billed as debating the Trades Union Bill. The room was packed with supporters of the Conservative Party, dismissed by Mosley as "a lot of congenital worms". When challenged to "go to Moscow", Mosley replied: "I am not taking my orders either from Moscow or Rome, but from the British working-class". The meeting broke up in uproar and the whiff of stink bombs as Mosley succeeded in making his escape from a group determined to "rag" him and the contingent of police at the back of the hall had difficulty in containing a noisy, but not vicious gathering. It was all reported fully in the Cambridge Daily News.

However, when Mosley returned to Cambridge in March, 1935, to dine at the University Arms he was met by demonstrators from the University Socialist Society and Labour Club. An anti-Fascist demonstration was held on Parker's Piece with speeches by John Cornford and Maurice Dobb among others. They had the support of the representatives of the Cambridge Labour, Communist and Anti-war parties.

The rally was followed by a torchlight parade of some 200 demonstrators who round the gates across the entrance to the hotel closed and several police lined up before them.

In October, 1936, Mosley was expected back for the dinner of the Cambridge University branch of the British Union of Fascists and National Socialists at the Dorothy Cafe. Concern about disruption prompted the university proctors to issue a strong warning to undergraduates to stay away and police mounted an elaborate operation with officers positioned in adjoining shop doorways and plain-clothes officers patrolling the streets.

The evening passed off without incident. Mosley himself was not able to be present. He sent instead the director of propaganda of the British Union of Fascists, a certain William Joyce, later to become known in Cambridge and elsewhere as Hitler's "Lord Haw Haw", whose radio broadcasts, Germany Calling, were intended to spread alarm among the Allies during the Second World War.

Throughout the war, people who tuned in to Haw Haw's broadcasts were horrified to hear local places and activities reported, wondering: "How did he know that?" Newspapers were restricted in what they could report in an effort to prevent information reaching the enemy. Thus it seems perhaps odd that at the end of May, 1944, the Cambridge Daily News was reporting in considerable detail the dedication of a new Military Cemetery at Madingley. It told how high-ranking officers of the American and British armies were present along with representatives of the town and university, British Legion and WVS.

The cemetery, set on the brow of a hill with typical English rural background, was profusely decorated with flowers for the ceremony.

Between the rows of simple white crosses were planted scores of little flags - Union flags and Stars and Stripes. Centrepiece of the service was a small grass mound from which flew the American flag, for this was a homage to the American heroes of the war - those who had fought and died.

General Eisenhower, Allied Com-mander-in-Chief, issued an Order of the Day stressing how "We of the United Nations must live and work together to win back a better world, secure and free for all men everywhere".

A flight of three Flying Fortresses flew over, on their way back to local bases, the roar of their engines drowning the words of the chaplain and even during the Silence which followed the dedication the drone of planes could be heard.

Yet while all this was happening the main news story was not the dedication of a cemetery but the impending invasion of Europe.

The main activity was not in East Anglia, but on the south coast of England, where men waited in invasion barges for D-Day. Was it, I wonder, a deliberate ploy to get people looking the wrong way and give the invaders the best possible chance of secrecy, diverting the prying eyes of Haw Haw and his sympathisers?

In early March, 1948, Madingley cemetery was again in the news. Then it was being closed while hundreds of bodies were exhumed to be returned to the United States and hundreds more transferred in from other American cemeteries, then being closed.

Later it reopened and was rededicated, one of the most beautiful parts of England, a foreign field forever America.

Memories 26th February 1998

Recently I joined members of Addenbrooke's Trust "Empress pub group" for one of their regular lunches where Ted Cash reminisced about the Newmarket Road area of Cambridge, which has known for over 80 years.

He was able to recite the names of the 14 pubs which once served the needs of the local residents with landlords like Charlie Swan who would ensure that none of his customers went without a Christmas dinner, and Tom Griffiths on the corner of Abbey Street, who sported a big silver winkie in his bar, into which the blasphemer needed to place a coin.

Ted's father, More Thickpenny Cash was a shoemaker and his grandfather, Isaac, made bricks by hand at the brick company in Coldham's Lane. Together they had an important claim to a place in Cambridge's history as organisers of the Boxing Day costerrnongers barrow race from East Road corner to the Bottisham Swan and back. This flourished at the turn of the century and continued until 1913.

While the public house provided companionship and good cheer, other people found the same qualities at meetings organised by the Band of Hope Union. Details continue to come in of "Uncle David and Aunt Flossie" who toured village and town chapels with their lantern slides and electric moving pictures during the 1930s.

Ted Austin of Over remembers seeing them at the Ebenezer Strict Baptist Church in Cottenham, where his father was minister, and Peggy Day from Quy recalls how she herself featured on one of Uncle David's films. Apparently he used also to intersperse his lectures with pictures he had taken of people then in the audience. If you remember seeing them I would like to hear from you.

Another side of Cambridge life, which has been raised by one or two correspondents, including Mr G Murfett of Cliveden Close, was the Castle Soap Company just off New Street, between East Road and Coldham's Lane. It was established in the 1870's to make tallow candles and the manufacture of household bar soaps was a natural extension. By 1907 the yellow, primrose and mottled bars of soap were being despatched to all parts of the country. The Cambridge Express in January that year described how animal fats were chopped up, boiled in large coppers, cooled and shaped. The company produced various varieties of its product perfuming it with mimosa, sweet violets and Otto of roses while their "Ovaltine and Vaseline" brand was a favourite speciality

The Factory was a self-contained industry, providing work for the local residents and employed carpenters to make the packing cases and boxes. It installed its own water supply from an artesian well and had invented ways to recycle the glycerine which would otherwise be washed down the drains. Such was the purity of their product that, in 1902, the Queen broke the usual rules to accept a gift of the Castle Soap Company's product.

All this was precisely the sort of thing the late Enid Porter would have known all about and now her contribution to the appreciation of the folk lore of Cambridgeshire is being researched for a new book.

Enid was appointed to the Cambridge Folk Museum in 1947 and in many minds the two became synonymous. Enid was the museum, the museum was Enid. She provided a human face to what otherwise might have been an obscure institution, and people need a face they can relate to. For it is often the family's treasured possession they are giving away, they need to feel it is appreciated and cared for. Enid journeyed into the fens to collect memories which she ensured were published in books such as Tales from the Fens, and wrote over 70 articles - on barges, witchcraft and woad - as well as her books with their cures for lumbago, rhymes and rags. She shared her knowledge through lectures in village or backstreet halls and people flocked to the Guildhall for the annual meeting of the museum, mainly to listen to Enid afterwards.

Enid Porter had an honours degree in modern languages, had post-graduate teacher training, was awarded honorary degrees from the Open University and the University of Cambridge. She was an expert. Yet she was also prepared to clean the museum windows, to run the museum single-handed on a pittance of a budget.

She would sit in her small office with its electric fire and chat to visitors, learning things that would otherwise have been lost. The most valuable members of society, she said in 1968, are people in their 70s and 80s, we have so much to learn from them.

Having just returned from speaking to Trumpington Over-Sixties this is a sentiment I can endorse completely. Now we need your memories of Enid Porter.

Write to me at the News and I will pass them on.

- Thanks are forthcoming from Lorna Delanoy on behalf of the Farmland Museum at Denny Abbey. Following her appeal for anybody recalling horse works (Memories, January 29) she has been contacted by various people able to help.
- If you need help with a project, contact Mike Petty at the News.

Memories 5th March 1998

KATHLEEN Skin has written to me of her memories of schooldays 65 years ago at Haslingfield Endowed School:

One morning I passed a threshing machine in a field, surrounded by groups of men with their dogs, holding cudgels of various kinds to kill rats, mice or rabbits which were fleeing from the stacks being threshed.

One man came up to me, his terrier on a rope in one hand, and the other was a closed fist. 'Put your hand up. Gal,' he said, so I held out my left hand and into it he put a fistful of baby mice, pink, blind, and squirming, I think he thought I was going to drop them or yell, but in that he was disappointed.

"Ooh," I said, "aren't they dear little things," and I put them carefully into the deep pockets of my dress.

Then I hastened off to school where all the pupils were already in the hall for assembly, being introduced to a gorgeous looking, smartly dressed student on teaching practice from Homerton College.

We were soon seated in our desks and we eyed her up and down as we were introduced to her individually. We did not exactly touch our forelocks but, as we smiled, bowed or gave little curtsies, we each vowed in our hearts to do our best to please this vision from the big town who had deigned to descend to the depths in order to teach us clodhoppers.

All went well during the first lesson, arithmetic, and as we began written work she stood behind us, wafting delicious waves of perfume.

The headmaster, Eric Cole, who lived just across the playground, decided to have his tea early, leaving the student in charge. She then sat at his desk, trying to match up the names in the register with the children.

Just then I felt a movement in my pocket and remembered my forlorn little babies. Tenderly, I took them out, one by one. I lay them in the palm of my left hand. Ugly they were really, but pathetic and wriggly.

A voice broke into my reverie, it was a strong, fierce voice. "Girl in the green dress." I looked up. "Yes, you. Come here with whatever you are playing with."

I closed my hand over the squirming babies. The class stopped working in expectation of something interesting developing.

"Come along, quickly. At once." I slowly stood up, then waited meekly in front of her desk. She stood up holding out a hand.

"Now give me what you are holding," she ordered. I hesitated. Her hand was clean, and manicured.

"Please Miss, I don't think you will like it," I faltered.

"Don't be impudent. Give it to me at once," she said. All eyes were on me as I opened my hand, depositing my precious cargo on to her open palm.

I was not prepared for the reaction. She let out a scream like a demented steam train whistle, over and over again as she flung my blind babies to all corners of the room. She jumped up and down, crying and laughing together, screaming and gasping.

We were thunderstruck. Never had we seen such a performance of hysterics. The next door teacher entered the room; she took in the situation at a glance. A child was sent to fetch the headmaster.

In the meantime I had collected my dead and dying infants in my handkerchief, helped by my classmates crawling under the desks to retrieve those they could see. The headmaster raced into the classroom. He took the sobbing student back to his house and returned. He had not been able to get any sense from her, so he asked for an explanation.

All the class pointed to me. I stood before him, telling him everything.

"I told her she wouldn't like it and she said I was impudent," I said. "Is that so?" he asked the class. "Yes Sir," they answered in unison.

"Show me" he said to me, which I did, but the babies were still and dead. Then he kindly took off the lid of the chalk box, lined it with a piece of pastel paper, and told me to place the little corpses inside, I could bury them in my own little garden plot across the playground in the lunch hour, he suggested

"However, I must punish you" he concluded, looking for his cane, "for misbehaving directly my back was turned and for upsetting a visiting lady."

Caning girls was a rare occurrence, so I felt I had been extremely wicked to deserve this punishment. The headmaster went next door to ask the teacher there to witness the punishment and set to work.

"Put your hand straight out," commanded. I looked into his face, my hand outstretched, palm uppermost. To my surprise he winked, his mouth was twitching, his eye watering. I was not slow on the uptake, so I understood each other — play-acting.

He jumped as if to give a resounding thwack the class and the next door teacher gasped audibly. The cane came down, but the sound was worse than the pain.

"Now the other hand," he said. I oblige Again the leap in the air. As he was six feet tall it must have been horrendous to the watcher. The next door teacher covered her face. But I trusted him. Once more the cane came down with a convincing sound.

His face was quite contorted with trying to look angry, but his eyes were twinkling. I put my hands under the opposite armpits as if in agony.

He made me stand with my back to the class facing the wall. Then he took the other teacher into the girls' cloakroom on the other side of the wall.

"Oh Kath, aren't you brave," said my be: friend. "Show us your marks," but I wouldn't doubting there were any. Then I heard gales of laughter from the other side of the wall, uncontrolled hoots of 'Ha, Ha, Ha!'

Meanwhile, both classes were becoming out of control. When the bell was rung for playtime everyone rushed for the door.

The girls' cloakroom was inundated by children, and the headmaster and the next door teacher emerged looking as if they had been crying. They went into the headmaster's house

We did not see the student teacher again. Homerton sent no more students on teaching practice to Haslingfield. Perhaps teaching in the rural areas held too many pitfalls!

Memories 12th March 1998 by Mike Petty

DOREEN PHILCOX of Thorpe St Andrew, Norwich, writes: "Your name was suggested as the person most likely to assist me in my quest for interesting things about Cambridge in 1948, the year the National Health Service was introduced.

"What is less widely known is that my friend and I, at the tender age of 17-and-three-quarter-years, left our respective homes in Cromer at Yarmouth to help launch the NHS at Addenbrooke's Hospital - with one or two other student nurses, you understand!

"I have been trying to recollect aspects of life as we knew it then. Rationing was still on, the New Look was in vogue and shoes had platform soles and ankle straps.

"Although we did not realise it at the time, some of the undergraduate and postgraduate students were older than average, having returned from wartime experiences to either commerce or resume their studies.

"So, do you think you can help me to discover some articles or pictures which might illustrate the time and be of interest to a younger acquaintances, who would find it all historical, and possibly hysterical, as well?

"My maiden name was Mills (nicknamed Freddie) my friend is Pamela Corbett (nee Vincent). We started our nurse-training in September 1948 and resided at Owlstone Croft during the preliminary training period."

I have written to Doreen with various suggestions, but if anyone can add to their memories of student nursing 50 years ago I should be happy to pass it on.

• Recollections of a more recent period have come from Martin Booth of Cambridge :

"I was very interested to read your account of the student protests of February 1973 (Memories, February 12), since I was an active participant in both the occupation of part of the Sidgwick Avenue site and of the thousand-strong demonstration to the Old Schools which was the culmination of the campaign for a greater say by students in university affairs.

"However, I must take issue with your contention that the protests resulted only in student apathy.

"In fact, despite the rather airy-fairy nature of some of the demands of the sit-in - calls for alternative universities and the like - the march at the end concentrated on one major demand. This was that the university authorities be made to recognise Cambridge Students Union as a representative body for all Cambridge University students.

"This was regarded by students as very important, as up to then, we had only been represented by college based Junior Common Room committees, which obviously made it easier for the authorities to divide and rule if they so chose.

"It was almost also important for CSU to be recognised, as it was a branch of the National Union of Students, and would therefore bring Cambridge students into a common front with those at other universities all around the country.

"In the event, this demand was realised and CSU became the recognised body representing Cambridge students.

"This marked an important step away from Cambridge being seen as an elitist establishment run along authoritarian lines, and towards it becoming a more modern, mainstream university where young people from ordinary backgrounds could feel at home, with their interests represented by a proper student union.

"In the meantime, I look forward to seeing more memories of those heady days."

Memories 19th March, 1998, by Mike Petty

THE Memories postbag has this week spanned most of the century.

Two people have recalled incidents as far back as the First World War.

Mr F C Mansfield, of Cambridge, recalls how, as a four-year-old in 1916, he sat in a window of a shop in King Street and watched mauve-faced German soldiers being taken to their billets in King Street Infant School. The colouring was caused by treatment for a skin disease.

From them he looked back to where his father was framing photographs of Cambridgeshire men called up to fight. Many of those portraits would have been taken by Palmer Clarke and the negatives are now in the Cambridgeshire Collection in the Lion Yard Library, from where it is possible to order copies.

More dramatic Great War memories come from Dorothy Diver of Ely, looking back to her childhood days at Lea Farm, equidistant from Isleham, Freckenham and West Row.

She writes: "At the age of 11 I stood with my parents and sister at the door of the farmhouse and watched the cigar-shaped Zeppelin as it droned its way over the fen. It was clearly visible and heard.

"Suddenly there was a big bang. My baby sister cried. I said: 'Don't cry, it's only someone shooting wild ducks'. The bomb fell in Isleham fen. The date, I think, was 31st January, 1916. A second bomb on 6 February did not explode.

"Incidentally, I think I saw the first airplane land in our area. The aviator had lost his way. My father approached him with gun and gun dogs! An old lady's reminiscences!"

And very accurate, too, for the weekly paper of February 4, 1916, carries a note that its report on Zeppelin raids had been censored. Reginald Arbon of Foxton remembers that during the Second World War he had the job of Sunday newspaper boy and was en route to collect them. Suddenly he heard a tremendous noise and saw the outline of an American Flying Fortress, moments before it crashed in the woods.

Shortly afterwards an airman came towards them, trembling violently, and asked directions to a telephone. Reg remembers that the American's lips were shaking so much that his cigarette fell out of his mouth and he was unable to hold his hand steady enough to shake another from the packet.

As the lad continued on his round he was able to spread news that would appear in no newspaper. Later he joined other children to try to outwit guards to acquire pieces of Perspex that could be fashioned into rings or at the very least, sticks of chewing gum.

Ronald and Gwynneth Rule of Willingham have looked back to the 1930s: "Your reference to Uncle David and Auntie Flossie (Moore) has revived memories of them for me and my wife. My mother Bessie Rule ran a Band of Hope in Linton in the 1920s which David and Flossie visited several times.

"I remember them arriving on motorbike and sidecar. The meetings were held in the Congregational Sunday school. Two things I remember were being taught the Siamese national anthem, which should be sung by all drunkards to the same tune as God Save the King. The other thing was a song about Joe Perkins, who was a reformed drunkard.

"David was secretary to the Cambridge Beekeepers Association and helped me re-queen a savage hive of bees about 1950."

Mention of a fashion show staged by Mitcham's shop in 1948, when models were male staff, resulted in this item from Irene Bloy taken by the Cambridge Daily News. Recognise anyone?

Memories 26th March 1998, by Mike Petty

WHEN Mr Philip Pumfrey saw the picture of the threshing tackle in Memories on March 5, he immediately recognised the scene and saw his late father, Sidney Pumfrey, driving the engine.

Having ordered a copy of the picture from the Cambridgeshire Collection, he has now written in with an account of the firm.

C R Pumfrey and sons, agricultural machinists and contractors, was formed in 1908 by Charles Robert Pumfrey, the eldest of four sons of Robert Pumfrey, who farmed in Cherry Hinton and Teversham. Charles started work for John Crampton of Sawston as an engine driver and engineer, though his ambition was to operate his own business.

Into 1908 he cycled from his home in Sawston to Six Mile Bottom railway station, caught a train to Stowmarket and went to George Thurlow and Sons, the threshing machine agents. He ordered a Ruston 7hp traction engine, threshing drum and straw elevator — total cost £650 — paying a deposit with 100 sovereigns. All were delivered by rail to Whittlesford station on August 10, 1908. The name on the engine was Progress.

So began his business.

The business expanded quickly as working arrangements were made with many local fanners and the family moved from Sawston to Duxford. Charles invested in additional engines and machinery, buying engines Dreadnought, Lord Roberts and Success, complete with drums, elevators, bailers and chaff cutters. In 1914 two of them were commandeered by the army, bailing hay and straw for horses in the French war zones.

The other also played a part, hauling loads of bales to various railway stations. Following the First War, the engines were seldom idle. When demand for threshing was low they hauled heavy loads of brick, coal or timber and once delivered a large boiler from Whittlesford Station to Spicers Paper Mill in Sawston.

By the mid-1920s the firm had several sets of threshing machines together with other agricultural equipment and also acquired a pair of steam ploughing engines complete with plough, cultivator and harrows. The engines had winding drums which housed a steel cable. This was used to pull the plough and cultivator across a field, with the engines placed at opposite ends of the field.

During the farming recession, being the entrepreneur he was, he rented and bought farm land, some of which had been poorly cultivated. He deeply ploughed this with the steam plough engines, bringing the land back into condition.

He continued to buy more farms in the 1930s, under the title of Pumfrey Brothers, and when he died in June 1935 he had not only achieved his ambition as an agricultural machinist, but had also, with his sons, become the owner of four farms.

Of all the Pumfrey engines, only the Success remains in working order and is still owned by a farming member of the family. I have given the letter in some length since there is an immense interest in things mechanical. There are numerous other photographs in the Cambridgeshire Collection for enthusiasts to ponder over and identify Mechanically-powered ice cream carts have also come into the spotlight, following the receipt of an old glass lantern slide showing the Linton and District Pure Ice Cream Company. The proprietor's name is shown as H Nunn. The photo was taken by David Moore. Does this ring a bell with anybody?

Do you remember seeing prisoners wearing clothes with broad arrows on them, and Glengarry caps, scything the grass on Cambridge Castle Hill before the First World War. Mrs Gwen Peacock of Storey's House does. She also recalls how the mound was opened once a year so that people could go to the top to admire the view or, in her case, the white violets.

Another thing that stuck in her mind was that there used to be a brass cross on the mound marking, we think, the site of the original gallows. This was different from the gallows which were in the old County gaol yard until 1930, where there was a black stone in the wall marking the spot when the bodies of hanged prisoners were buried.

Her memories of the area go back 90 years because she spent her early years at the Isaac Newton pub, one of several which served the people in that most deprived area of Cambridge, where houses were crammed into the area off Gloucester Street with only primitive facilities. She recalls a headmaster becoming so exasperated at the condition of one of the children attending the school that he washed half the lad's face, half of his hair and brushed half of his clothes, sending him off to finish the job

Posher youngsters wore blazers, but why are they so-called. Joan Last's son thought it was something to be worn when it was blazing hot! But then she investigated further and discovered that the first blazers were made by Ruben Buttress, of Cambridge. They were scarlet boat jackets for the men of Lady Margaret Boat Club, St John's College. He nicknamed the jackets blazers because of the blazing scarlet colour - and the name stuck.

Memories, 2nd April 1998, by Mike Petty

Saturday's University boat race was favoured by perfect weather, an unusually strong tide and fairly smooth surface conditions. Oxford took an early lead, there was an incident with an oar which upset the rhythm of the boat but the Cambridge crew won in a record time.

A report in the "News" – yes. But the News of 50 years ago - 29th March 1948. There were of course some differences. It was the Cambridge rower Bircher who caught a crab, which practically stopped the boat and many believed that the race was over. But with great coolness the team stopped rowing while he sorted himself out and they set off in hot pursuit of their rivals. They were soon ahead and the race became a procession enlivened by the prospect of a record time, eventually finishing up five lengths in front in a time of 17 minutes 50 seconds, no less than a quarter of a minute up on the previous record. By comparison the 1998 time was 16 minutes 19seconds, 26 seconds faster than Oxford's previous best.

There were one or two other incidents that caught the eye of the journalist in 1948. The BBC commentator's plane had to make a forced landing and the Press launch was rammed by a small passenger steamer. Then to cap it all the Cambridge cox emulated Blondin by standing up at the finish and doing a step dance in the sternsheets of his flimsy racing eight.

Other stories also have a habit of coming round. Last week the "News" carried a report of the erection of a new bridge at Houghton, which the army has constructed as a temporary measure while work takes place at the Watermill. When I was there on Tuesday the small central square taken over by the military whilst engineers were manhandling large sections of a pre-fabricated bridge. It all evoked memories of the picture I have of other army engineers erecting another temporary bridge, this time over the Old West River whilst a new road was being rushed through to connect Stretham and Wicken in 1914. The issue then was not the need to maintain a footpath but the need to move men and munitions speedily from the Midlands to the East Coast to repel an anticipated attack by the Germans in the very early days of the First World War. The road was duly constructed, the folk at Wicken anticipating the prosperity that the new Military Road would bring – for would not the cavalry be sure to pass that way, and where better than Wicken, with all its commons, for them to pause en route to the battlefield. There was one snag. Nobody could decide who was to pay for the bridges across the rivers Old West and the Cam. So they were not built – at least not until the war was won .

Since then Cambridgeshire has seen various examples of the bridgemaker's art. When Cambridge's Magdalene Bridge was being strngthened in 1981 a temporary bridge was constructed alongside (incidentally in the same position as one had been when the existing iron bridge was built in 1823!). Magdalene Bridge had previously been closed to heavy vehicles for a number of years. The new one was designed to cater for the anticipated weight of traffic that would thunder over it for years to come. Only now, of course, the road itself has been closed to most vehicles

But Don Mackay has reminded me of another piece of bridge engineering. This was the railway bridge across the river at Chesterton. Trains had crossed the Cam at this point since 1845 but locomotives had become heavier and the old bridge could no longer cope. A replacement was urgently needed and work started. Then in April 1930 crowds of onlookers flocked to watch as the old bridge, weighing 70 tons, was moved over and a new 300 ton monster, which had been constructed alongside was first lifted on hydraulic jacks and then winched into place at a rate of eight inches per minute. Don's father was in charge of the operation and the trains were running again the same day

Mona Rumsey of Saffron Walden has written following the picture in last week's "Memories" of the Linton Pure Ice Cream man, Mr Nunn. She recalls that he lived in the last house on the Hadstock Road where he kept his motor bikes and sidecars. He made his ice cream from pure cream which was delivered in churns that were unloaded at Linton station. She remembers watching him making it and the only additive was vanilla flavouring. "He would say 'get a dish and you can have some'. A small dish was refused and a larger vegetable dish was filled, which we all enjoyed. Happy days!"

C.T. Shaw of Gt Shelford has an unusual request. Does anybody remember what happened to the ashes of Henry Morris, the well-known Cambridge educationalist and pioneer of the village college concept? Morris was cremated at the Golders Green crematorium and it is said that the ashes were sent to George Edwards, the Chief Education Officer at that time, at Shire Hall. No one seems to know what happened after that. Can you help? If so write to Mike Petty at the News and I will pass the letters on

Do you know the whereabouts of any Cambridge button factories? Button expert Kathleen Skin thinks it may have been in the Castle Hill area sometime between 1850 and 1920. Any clues?

George Dunn of Stapleford writes: "I have been trying to find out if the Vicar's Brook is named after a particular Vicar without any success to date. Since the brook has its headwaters in Shelford parish it could be a former vicar of Shelford. Any light you might have on the problem would be appreciated"

Memories, 9th April 1998, by Mike Petty

Ted Cash revived memories of his youth last week when he slotted two pence – more than twice the old fine – into the famous Silver Winkle. 70 years ago the money would have been demanded from him had entered the bar of the Hearts of Oak public house in Cambridge's Newmarket Road without carrying his own miniature winkle or been heard to blaspheme

The Silver Winkle club had been instituted by the pub's landlord, Charlie Swann in 1921 when times were particularly hard in this hard-working part of the town. Many men were employed in the gasworks, Watts's wood yard or at the Cambridge Brick Company. Ted's family was shoemakers with a shop next to the Abbey church. Here they made fine quality boots and shoes from scratch, drawing on the stocks of leather stacked in their stores. Work was collected from Cambridge shops or brought in from the village by horse and cart, prepared and returned the following week. There were unusual repairs: Ted recalls how his grandfather had a problem of how to spot a small slit in the thigh-high Wellington boots worn by men who worked in water. The solution was to set fire of a piece of material which was placed it inside the boot. Then they watched to see where the smoke came out – and thus find the hole where the water came in.

People those days worked all hours, but still found time to tend their allotments at the bottom of Leeke Street, off Coldham's Lane, where Silverwood Close now stands. They were proud of their produce, which was displayed in fortnightly flower shows at the Hearts of Oak, taking over the billiard tables for the occasion. The first prize was 15 Woodbine cigarettes, the second 10, and the third 5. One memorable exhibit was submitted by Sammy Lloyd, carefully covered to avoid the prying eyes of his competitors. When unveiled in all its glory, there it stood, two feet high – a fine wild thistle. It won!

In pride of place on the bar stood the eponymous Silver Winkle, presented to the club in 1924 in memory of Con Griffiths. Con owned a boxing ring which was delivered by the Bruce brothers to the Cambridge Corn Exchange whenever needed for the fights. At the Varsity matches Ted was a water boy, fetching the water that was used to spray and splash the boxers who changed at the side of the hall and went back to their colleges after the bouts were over.

As well as the fines for transgressing Winkle Club rules members paid sixpence a week into club funds which went to finance an excursion to the seaside. They travelled on big solid-tired, open motor coaches supplied by the Brown Brothers of Oakington and – being a pub outing – they stopped for drinks en route. However on one memorable occasion their destination was not the seaside but a stately home. For the back street lads were invited to Croxton Park, home of Sir Douglas and Lady Newton. The occasion was the wedding of their daughter – the club was not exactly invited to the wedding, but to see the wedding presents

All that is now in the past but lives on in Ted Cash's memories, some of which I featured a few weeks ago. This article was spotted by a News reader who knew that the silver-plated Winkle was still with Charlie Swann's granddaughter, just a few streets away from Ted's present home. Thus it was that Ted and the Winkle were reunited after more than 60 years.

If you have memories to share or revive, write to me, Mike Petty, at the News

Mr E. Badcock of Cambridge has sent me a cutting from The Times of 18th June 1952 which he found tucked away in the back of a book. It reads : "A LIVE WIRE. A junior postman at the Ely post office who recently took out for delivery a telegram addressed to a workman employed on the renovation of Ely Cathedral found that the workman was at the top of the scaffolding in the Lantern Tower. After all efforts to attract the man's attention from the ground had failed the postman delivered the telegram by mounting the ladders and climbing 170 ft of scaffolding"

On the question of height can you help former Brain of Britain, Henry Button? He is trying to establish the height of the spire of All Saints' church in Jesus Lane, Cambridge. It does not appear to be recorded in any of the usual books. Over to you.

If you have questions or queries and think News readers can help, drop me a line

Memories, by Mike Petty, 16th April 1998

Tonight is the night of the Band of Hope filmshow at Castle Street Methodist chapel, Cambridge, showing once more the films and lanternslides taken by "Uncle David and Auntie Flossie" Moore to an audience, many of whom have memories of seeing the films some 60 years ago. Others have already shared their recollections, including Mrs Beatrice Stevens of Stretham.

She writes: "Nearly all the social events of the village took place at the Mission Hall or the Wesleyan Chapel. If there was a Sacred Concert at the Hall one week there might be a Magic Lantern at the Chapel the following week, and two of the most popular visitors were Uncle David and Aunt Flossie.

We children loved them. They came to our house to tea, big Uncle David Moore, with his sandy hair and rosy cheeks, and smiling Aunt Flossy, whose eyes had a permanent twinkle. They were engaged by the Band of Hope Union to visit Churches and Chapels, and their magic lantern shows were as popular with the grown-ups as with the children.

In the early days their lantern depended on oil, paraffin oil, and with the smell of that and coke fumes from the tortoise stove the Chapel often became distinctly fuggy. Once the lantern got on fire, with thick, black smoke pouring out. No one minded, though; nearly every child from the village was there except a very few strictly-Church people, who pretended not to mind when we talked about it at school next day.

Aunt Flossie played the organ, jazzing it up somewhat. Even I noticed the difference between the way she played it and Mrs. Bradshaw's more stately and dignified manner of playing on Sunday but I thought both perfect, right for each occasion

"A song, a song of water bright" we sang lustily, with Aunt Flossie singing too, while Uncle David urged us, "Louder, you can sing louder". It was enough to make Father cover his ears; although he loved singing he didn't like noise, and there was little of tunefulness as our singing became almost a yell. But then we became quiet, really quiet, as Uncle David said, "Now we will talk to God," and he did just that, as if God was standing right next to him.

When we said the Lord's Prayer, "Our Father 'chart in Heaven" we raced along in verbal contest, quite oblivious of the beauty and meaning of the words. We wanted to get to the picture-part of the programme, and were impatient that we had to sing another song, albeit a favourite, "Hold the fort for I am coming" with the boys in warlike attitudes, ready to pounce on Satan if he should suddenly appear! How we loved to dramatise, and Uncle David and Aunt Flossie encouraged us to "do the actions", something not permitted in Sunday School. Needless to say, the stories told by Uncle David as he fitted the slides into the magic lantern, one by one, all had a moral, and we heard how little George and Sally went barefoot because their father spent too much money on strong drink, while Johnnie and Daisy were always warmly clothed. They even had a holiday at the seaside, only two days to be sure, but it was all because THEIR father was a teetotaler. And, of course, the story ended happily when the father of little George and Sally signed the pledge.

The collection was "for expenses", and this included a small fee for the services of Uncle David and Aunt Flossie and a contribution to the Band of Hope Union.

David Moore had been appointed agent to the Cambridgeshire Band of Hope in 1908, he died in 1968. The film show thus marks a double anniversary – and might not have happened except for "News" readers whose memories have prompted the resurrection of pictures which might otherwise have faded into oblivion

Lucy Nicholls of Thirsk in North Yorkshire seeks your assistance in a probably impossible search. She writes: "I am trying to find a book published in the last 1940's by a Sqn Ldr Palmer. Unfortunately I do not know the title or publisher. Some of your older readers from the Waterbeach area may recall Sqn Ldr Palmer who was an officer at RAF Waterbeach during the late 1940's. I should be very grateful if you could help in any way". If you can help write to me and I will pass it on Cambridge Scouts are embarking on a project to ensure their history is well recorded by the time of their centenary. They are seeking memories or mementoes to add to their files. If you can help please contact Ted Easy, 113 Station Road, Impington – or send them to me and I will pass them on.

PICTURES : David – Uncle David and Auntie Flossie and their camera – please use this one if you can Visit – Uncle David and auntie Flossie visiting a village with an exhibition of Band of Hope material

Programme – a typical programme of one of their shows

Memories, by Mike Petty, 23rd April 1998

So often it seems that history has a habit of repeating itself – of perhaps that the news is just recirculated

Compare the report from 13th April 1998: "Workers at the recycling centre in Butt Lane, Milton alerted police after they found six live shotgun cartridges in a bag" with that of 7th April 1948: "I am asked to point out to the public the danger of getting rid of their war relics by placing them among the refuse. No less than eight live cartridges were found in one load recently"

Then the main headlines of recent days have echoed those of March 1947, especially in regard to the sufferings of the folk at St Ives who have found their property flooded. 50 years ago the "News" reported : "At St Ives some of the back streets are flooded fairly extensively, the water on the road to a depth of about 10 inches entering many houses in the town, forcing people to move their belongings upstairs. Traffic had to be diverted last night because of the movement washing water into the houses."

Now there has been speculation that in certain cases the problem has been exacerbated by new roads which have increased the speed at which water rushes into the rivers, or by building on flood plains. A report from August 1947 makes the same point: "Further steps are to be taken by Huntingdon, St Ives, Godmanchester and St Neots, the four towns so badly affected by the March floods, to press home to the Government the urgency of some action being taken to mitigate further floods of these places. Mr W.E. Doran (Ouse Catchment Board Engineer) said that in his view the inhabitants of those towns were suffering from the sins of their ancestors in building houses in a flood area. At the height of the recent flood water was passing St Ives at the rate of 11,000 cubic feet per second. It was impossible to dig a channel capable of taking such an enormous volume of water."

Like many others on Sunday I journeyed to Earith to view the height of the river and was concerned, not at the water across the road leading in to Earith – for this is over an area designed to be flooded to fill the washlands between the Bedford Rivers – but at the water across the road to Sutton – water that could only have come over, or through the giant barrier banks.

Then on Monday evening I was speaking at Whittlesey when a Manager with the Environment Agency mentioned that they had been particularly concerned about the possibility of a breach in the Great Ouse bank adjacent to Over fen, and had sent up a plane to view the area. It was along this bank in 1947 that the major breach occurred, a scene witnessed by Marshall Ingle of Over, who recounted the incident on television and radio last year, and whose death was reported just a few weeks ago

Despite all their efforts in 1947 the bank was breached sending thousands of gallons of water into Over fen and intimately crossing the Old West River and surging across towards Haddenham and Sutton

Farmers along the Hill Row Causeway, linking Earith with Haddenham, were warned by police to prepare for evacuation and began moving equipment to higher land – in both 1947 and 1998

The difference however is that – at least to the time of writing – the banks have held. The recent investment in infrastructure, new sluices, monitoring equipment and dredging has paid off. But it might have been a different picture had we seen a repeat of the severe storm of 16th March 1947 which whipped up the water and sent it crashing over the banks on to the fen beneath, leading to the catastrophe which saw houses flooded, not to a depth of 18 inches but to 18 feet.

A comparison of that storm with the hurricane force gusts of 2nd January 1976 has recently been published in the Journal of Meteorology for February 1997. This article is freely available in the Cambridgeshire Collection room on the third floor of Cambridge's Lion Yard Library, where hundreds of people, young and old, expert and novice discover their heritage.

On the shelves alongside contemporary accounts of the 1947 floods are the current planning reports which consider the problems of where to build the new houses and roads now deemed necessary to cope with increasing population – factors which might have a dramatic impact the next time the floods come - and the pictorial records which show what can happen if we do not learn from the lessons of the past

Jim Laughton of Cherry Hinton writes : I was most interested in the article relating to the Silver Winkle Club run at the Hearts of Oak pub in Newmarket Road, Cambridge. I was a lad living in Gold Street so was very much aware of this type of life those days. You may have heard about a similar pub club run at the Ancient Druids in Fitzroy Street by Bert and Anne Kirlup, known as the Brush Club. They had a silver metal brush on the bar.

ILLUSTRATIONS : views of properties along road from Earith to Haddenham, 1947

MEMORIES, by Mike Petty 30th April 1998

When the history of entertainment in Cambridge during the inter-war years comes to be written one building that will achieve major headlines is the Festival Theatre in Newmarket Road, one of the few surviving wooden Georgian theatres in the country.

It started life as the Theatre Royal but fell on hard times, especially as the University limited the period when plays could be performed. In autumn 1878 the building was put up for sale and knocked down to a builder who had plans for its demolition. When however it became known that the under-bidders had intended to use the building as a Mission Hall the new owner, Mr Sayle, agreed to let them have it for the price they had scraped together. It then enjoyed a considerable period of packed congregations, before reverting to a Theatre in 1926 for a decade or so. Since then it has survived as a store, largely unknown and unused for all but a few plays which have probably attracted larger audiences because of the venue than for the quality of the performance.

Now the genteelly derelict building, its theatrical decoration peeling to reveal the religious texts beneath, has once more come into the spotlight with a meeting called last week to discuss its future use. Some of those attending had their memories of the performances produced by Terence Gray, 60 years ago, including a production of Julius Caesar in modern dress. Once more plans for the radical revamping of a building described as “possibly the most remarkable of Sleeping Beauty theatres” have been defeated and once more it may revert to spiritual use, now that it has been bought by the Western Buddhist Order, and into dramatic use for their own exploration of the arts

Other Cambridge buildings attracted far greater crowds, and yet are now largely forgotten. Tucked away in Magrath Avenue, behind Shire Hall, used to stand a multi-entertainment centre. Originally a roller skating rink, it incorporated a cinema in 1911, was requisitioned during the First War and then reopened as the Rendezvous cinema, dance hall and skating rink. It was devastated by fire in 1931 and rebuilt the following year. Later it became the Rex cinema and ballroom where in 1957 the new and outrageous “Rock’n’roll” dances were allowed after the Guildhall banned jiving

A rare photograph of the interior of the Rendezvous dance hall, decorated for one of the May Balls, which were a regular feature of the 1920’s, has been lent by Ted Mudd of Victoria Road. The ornate decoration features trellis work produced by his father from workshops at the bottom of their garden. Nor was this his only contribution to Cambridge, for the firm undertook maintenance of the First Eastern General Hospital across the Backs in the First World War and Brooklands Avenue during the second. In peacetime he made shields for Crisps on Kings Parade and designed display stands for the Cambridge Scientific Instrument Company to promote their wares at exhibitions at Olympia and elsewhere.

Ted himself became an engineer, working for a while at the Unicam works on Arbury Road during the Second World War when the factory was a regular target for German bombers. He recalls how the raids disrupted production to such an extent that the company decided to ignore the sirens and station their own lookout on the roof who would sound a klaxon if he saw a plane actually coming their way. On one occasion several female workers needed First Aid treatment after diving under their workbenches on a hot afternoon, the mixture of heat and excitement causing them to faint. In the event the factory was never hit, though cows in the adjacent fields were injured.

Do you have memories of the Festival, Rendezvous, the Rex or other dance halls – write to Mike Petty at the News

PICTURES : interior of the Theatre Royal Barnwell Mission, afterwards the Festival Theatre, on Newmarket Road about 1900

Rendezvous ballroom decorated for a May Ball c1920 - THIS PICTURE HAS NOT BEEN USED BEFORE, please include it if you can

Memories, by Mike Petty, 7th May 1998

Jim Laughton of Cherry Hinton had to dash to get to his 80th birthday party for he was held up at Addenbrooke's Hospital where he was being scanned on a electrocardiograph – the very instrument had helped to develop when he worked at the Cambridge Instrument Company, where he had started in 1936.

Jim was born in Gold Street in 1916, a friendly part of Cambridge full of people with their troubles - now submerged by the Grafton Centre. His mother worked at home as a trouser maker and alteration hand for G.H. Jacobs of St Andrew's street. Jim attended the old British School in Auckland Road, which could be a frightening place for Tudor's Circus kept their animals stabled in the nearby warehouse. He moved to Christchurch Institute and then to the new Brunswick School in Walnut Tree Avenue when it opened in 1929, ("had to wash behind my ears that day!", he recalls).

Like many children he earned the odd coppers by running errands and could make 6d whenever he carried a can of paraffin from Laurie and McConnal's shop for the owner of the Rabbit Pub. The money went on trips to the cinema or the New Theatre where his uncle was stalls manager. Jim has some of the publicity cards they used to send out to advertise the latest attraction. Later in the 1930s he organised Variety nights at the Mansfield Hall in River Lane with local artistes such as Gwen Scott, soprano, Herbert Green, comedian, James Ison "The merry pianist" and Harry Day, the whistle player whose favourite tune was "Washington Post".

Jim treasures many mementoes of his interesting life but pride of place goes to a snippet from the Cambridge Daily News for the day he was born – which records his arrival in the world. Years ago the "News" deposited its back files in the Cambridgeshire Collection, on the third floor of the Central Library in Lion Yard, Cambridge. Here they are freely available on microfilm and specialist staff are on hand to show you how to take copies. It is not practical to copy the entire paper but you can certainly do what Jim has done & build up a scrapbook of events for the day you – or a friend – was born.

Another of Cambridge's great institutions was the Dorothy Restaurant. Gladys Hayhoe of Cherry Hinton remembers that in her youth it was the place to have tea and meet friends or dance to Percy Cowell's band (although she was not allowed to go until she was 18!). Highlight of the year was the New Year's Eve ball: "at 12 o'clock we all went crazy, and the Ballroom, having a spring floor, we felt anytime it would collapse". She has lent two pictures, one showing a typical formal dinner at the Dot and another a group of staff, including Mr Emerson, head waiter and Miss Dorothy Smith who became manageress. If you can recognise yourself – or anybody else please let me know. The pictures will be added to the Cambridgeshire Collection in a week or so.

Peter Oates of Godmanchester has written asking for details of the evacuation process in the Southery area following the 1947 floods and particularly of the Stocks family of Wood Hall. Certainly they took evacuees during the Second World War for when I was speaking at Hilgay Good Companions Club this week one lady recalled how the Squire turned up one Sunday in his pew accompanied by a bevy of young London boys. When she went round with the collection plate one of the lads said: "The chap at the end's paying for us!" Peter would also like background details of any of the riverside pubs in the area, such as the "Ferry Inn" at Southery, "True Blue" and "Jolly Anglers" at Ten Mile Bank or the "Dog & Duck" on the Hundred Foot.

If you can help, or if you would like help, write to me, Mike Petty, at the News
Note: recording of interview – MPC51

MEMORIES, by Mike Petty, 14th May 1998

Memories of the Rex Ballroom have come in from Mrs Barbara Rooney of Cambridge.

She writes: My first recollection of going to the Rex was in the early 1950s with my friend Maureen, and seeing the Rex sign all it up, we couldn't wait to go in. The first thing that greeted us was the smell, a heady mixture of perfume, face powder, cigarettes and beer. It had a wonderful dance floor, and a silver glitter ball hung from the ceiling. There was a very small cloak room where we put on make-up we didn't really need! It had a small balcony but we didn't go up there as we all thought it was for the "oldies".

The resident band at that time was Austin Payne. I only have to hear "Tenderly" or "How High the Moon" and I'm back there.

We used to go on Wednesday evenings, "Early Bird night". If we got in just before eight o'clock we were given a free ticket for Carnival Night on Saturday. I think it cost us 1/6 (7 1/2p).

We jived and danced all evening in high heels, full skirts, tight sweaters, black seamed nylons, "Betty Lou" lipstick, California poppy scent & bright red nails. Wonderful happy exciting days for two 16 year olds.

Later on when my husband was a Cambridge City Councillor he tried to halt the closure of the Rex by taking up petitions organised by patrons and attended meetings with them, but sadly the lovely old Rex closed in the late Seventies.

I met my husband at the Embassy Ballroom in Mill Road on September 26 1953, we have just celebrated our 44th wedding anniversary, we are still jiving and dancing and American line dancing and having a wonderful time.

Anna Bidder's memories go back somewhat further (well she is nearly 95!):

"I remember happy years of visiting the Festival Theatre. I was then working for my PhD. It was Terence Grey who bought drama back into it in a rather original way and produced black programmes with translucent white lettering on non-rustling paper - a boon to latecomers or to anyone who needed some point from the programme during the performance. Moreover the price of the seat was related solely to the kind of view they possessed. The very front rows were cheap, as far too near the stage, and any seat whose view was partially blocked by a pillar was cheap accordingly. I remember seeing Flora Robson making her first appearance after a bitter break following nervous trouble in her throat. We loved her - and, when many years later she came and gave us "Mary Tudor" at the Arts - we were proud - it was "our Flora" come back to show us the great skills.

The last years were a co-operative bunch of young things who did their own chores and sold programmes if they were not in the current play from their repertory - one young lady might sell programmes in slightly grubby white satin, another in flannel trousers and a shirt. There was free beer on Monday to try and pull in an audience for a night always unpopular.

One company put on a play with a satirical - political flavour. It had of course been censored, and at intervals the action would suddenly stop and a flat, impersonal voice would sound from the wings saying "speech removed by order of the Lord Chancellor" - and then action would proceed. One act was played with the stage set up as a sort of giant dolls' house and curtains which to back to reveal the actors in the appropriate box for the scene. When the curtain went back for the central box the voice said "scene removed by order of the Lord Chancellor". It showed up with great clarity that you could suggest what you liked but must not use plain words.

A very able actor was acting Captain Absolute in "The Rivals". He and Lydia Languish were quarrelling in a spirited way - she crying indignantly "There's no beating his insolence" and flung herself on the sofa on the stage - and the leg broke. Actors and actresses alike dissolved in mirth - she crouched at the sofa head, her face hidden - having fully turned her back on the audience - both with shaking shoulders. Enter Mrs Malaprop and Sir Anthony (it was in fact their cue) "What's this, what's that?" She: "Ask him Madame". He "Ask the lady, Sir" - then we in the audience realised that we must stop laughing - or they could not. So we did and they finished the scene with spirit."

Henry Button - who wrote seeking the height of All Saints church spire in Cambridge has now found his answer. It stands 198 feet high making it the third highest structure after Addenbrooke's Hospital chimney (232 feet) and the Catholic church spire (216 feet). Thank you for your help.

Sid Martin of Cambridge has recorded a postscript to the story of "Uncle David and Auntie Flossie". He knew David in his latter years in connection with his beekeeping activities. Being an expert judge David was in great demand at beekeeping shows but was handicapped in one respect. Being a lifetime abstainer he was unable to swallow the excellent mead he was called to adjudicate on! After Flossie died David Moore moved from Histon Road to Langdon House, Chesterton, where he died in 1968

Memories, by Mike Petty, 21st May 1998

This afternoon I attended the funeral of our old neighbour, Harley Crow, one-time village carpenter, decorator and coffin-maker. After the church service we gave a lift to the crematorium to a fellow mourner who had journeyed from Sussex to join the congregation. He known Harley during the second world war, not as carpenter, but as almost a foster-parent – being billeted with him throughout the war years. He had tales to tell of evacuee experiences, of schooling and misbehaving in the days when he was but a very young Jewish lad from the East End of London, one of about 100 to be based in Stretham.

Then during the reception held in the village pub he met another resident – one who remembered him from all those years ago, who indeed had lived in those days almost next door, and continues to live in that same house. It was obviously a most poignant experience, having lost one treasured memory of happy days during the trauma of war, he had gained another. He will hopefully return again to his one-time village to be reacquainted with others he knew at that time, just as others will return on Feast Sunday as they have for years on that most traditional of homecoming days.

As villages change and “characters” are lost so such reunions will become increasingly rare – but if you have such a story please let me know

The photograph of the staff of the Dorothy Restaurant (Memories 7th May) has prompted a wealth of memories. Former Mayor of Cambridge, Albert Johnson, immediately recognised the main chef, in the centre of the picture, as Harry Curtis. He had particular reason to know them for Mr Johnson was in a similar line, being at one-time the catering manager of Peterhouse where he started as an apprentice in 1924 and worked for 51 years. He has especial memories of the difficulties of catering during wartime when various groups were billeted on the college, including Army Field Security, the London School of Economics and Chichester Theological College. The colleges had a catering allowance but undergraduates had to surrender their ration books, thus restricting their opportunities to dine elsewhere.

Another face he recognised was that of Bert Cook, third on the left of the back row. Somebody else who knew him immediately was Bert’s daughter, Mrs Phyllis Alderton of Cambridge. She recalls how; “My dad worked there before the war and went back there after serving five years in the Army Catering Corps before retiring in the late 1950s due to ill health. My sister and I used to go up to see dad on a Saturday, the kitchens were always hot and steamy but I loved it. He worked all hours imaginable, sometimes when they had big dinners on he’d go in at 8 am and work till midnight. He died in 1981, having been married to mum for 50 years and 8 months”. Talking of weddings she also had good reason to remember Bill Brignell (in the middle of the back row) for he iced her wedding cake in March 1959 – and its Jack Elmer on the left in the middle row. She adds: “It seems funny to see dad’s photo in the paper. I have got some pictures of him with pancakes etc, but I haven’t got this one. Is it possible to get a copy?” The answer is yes, from the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library, where the picture will be deposited shortly.

Ted Mudd of Victoria Road, who shared his memories on 30th April, has now discovered a most interesting snap of George Bolton’s removal vans which was probably taken in the 1920’s. Cambridge has had a variety of removal firms over the years – do you have memories? . I recall that the Library used a Finbow’s furniture van to make a journey to Sutton Coldfield, near Birmingham, about 20 years ago. That was the day that about 50,000 dead folk returned home to Cambridge – or more specifically when 1,000 boxes of glass plate negatives taken by Palmer Clarke of Post Office Terrace, Cambridge, were brought into the Collection. The load weighed something like seven tons and it is just as well that the floor of the Cambridgeshire Collection stack room, on the third floor, was designed to take heavy weights. Since their arrival the negatives have been indexed. They cover the period from about 1900 to about 1935 and if you are looking for a picture of a long-lost relation you may find it amongst them. Just turn up and check the card index. And if you’re looking for a more recent picture – perhaps of your own wedding – then remember that the Ramsey and Muspratt negatives are there as well from the 1930s to the 70’s. As they’re talking of closing the Cambridgeshire Collection room within the year it may be as well to get in quick while the material is still easy to get at.

More memories of the Festival Theatre have come in, this time from Mrs F. Coker of Chesterton. She enjoyed most pleasant evenings there, thanks to complimentary tickets from a friend's father who was a porter at one of the colleges, and remembers seeing Robert Donat, Flora Robson and Philip Cunningham, all unknowns in the 1930s. She also recalls the Rex Ballroom where you could dance all afternoon for about 2/6. "What wonderful days they were. I'll never forget, life was so different then"

If you have memories, please share them with me, Mike Petty, at the News

Memories, by Mike Petty, 28th May 1998

Fifty years ago today, 26th May 1948, the "Cambridge Daily News" – as it was then – was celebrating its Jubilee and invited its readers to send in their memories of the paper.

J. Johnson was then their oldest newspaper seller. He recalled the headlines he's called over the years: "I sold the paper when a girl was burned to death at a fire at Matthew's in Trinity Street; also at the time of the Moat Farm murder, the King Street murder, and the East Road murder; when Lord Kitchener came to Cambridge and lots of other exciting events".

G. Tarrant had been a newspaper lad, about 50 years before, "I remember how popular the paper was made by the editions that were printed giving the latest news about 'Jack the Ripper' who was terrorising the women of London at that time".

Someone who went back further was W.L. Robinson who wrote: "Being a small paper delivery boy of sixty years ago I remember the first issue of the C.D.N. a few weeks ago I had occasion to call at your front office and thought: what a contrast to years ago. Then an office staff of one, with a dim gas jet in a dark passage. One sees the great progress so steadfastly made in every department at St Andrew's street, where efficiency is the keynote in all the delicate work that is undertaken there"

Percy J. Looker recalled: "I used to stand at the top of our street patiently waiting for the red van with newspapers for a shop, where I and a crowd of people who afterwards obtain our copies of the evening paper". Competitions and prizes were an important part of the paper in those days too. H. Cross recalled how he and his wife ("Min and Bill") won a 'Holiday Memories' competition and went on to become a regular contributor. He ended with a poem that might be echoed today:

"The C.D.N.
Was welcome then
The queue shows how
We need it now"

A reference in my "Looking Back" column (15th May 1948) relating to the demolition of the old Boat Inn at Brown's Hill Staunch, Over, has brought in memories from another long-standing "News" correspondent, Ernie Papworth. "The old building was taken down, brick by brick, mainly by two or three German P.O.W.'s. The only way to move it was over a rather frail small wooden trestle bridge, with one shaky arm-guard, over the ditch into the riverside washes. They first tried with a two-wheeled Trusty Tractor and small trailer, but even this was extremely dangerous, so every bit of the old pub was taken across on a wheelbarrow. It was rebuilt into a Cold Store and the door from the old pub is now the entrance to the store.

"Inside the pub was an old blackboard with the words "Mind your P's and Q's", at the top. This was to remind the bargees how much they owed for their Pints and Quarts, which they would have to pay for their return journey. Then well lubricated they would sing the following:

“Can ye walk along a lighter, Can ye eat fat pork, Can ye ‘oller out ‘Watchee Dozee’, Can ye drink a quart?”

Dozee Doggett was foreman of the lighters, the railway across the fens to Earith was called the Pork and Lard Railway, part of the platelayers wages. The new house, as it was then, was built on the other side of the Great Barrier Bank. It is no longer occupied but on dark cold winter nights it is still possible to see the faint glow from the old pub window and hear the merry voice of Bill Johnson tell Bill the landlord to chalk another one up for Dozee!”

Letters still pour in following the photograph of the Dorothy Restaurant staff (Memories May 7th). Mrs D. Brignell recognised her husband, William (Fred), Freda Dawson from Sawston spotted her uncle Bill Emerson. From Comberton Mrs Margaret Wakefield recalls many of the faces from when she started training as a waitress there in 1926. The most comprehensive list however comes from as far away as Yatton, near Bristol, where Marion Tankard has been sent cuttings from Cambridge friends. For she is the daughter of Harry Curtis, the chef, who died in 1980 at the age of 90, having outlived several of the people in the photograph. She asks for copies of the pictures to sent to her sister in America – where of course they can read the modern “News” every night, through the wonder of the Internet. No more waiting on street corners for the newspaper van when it can come on your computer screen – though sadly you miss the photographs which are worth so many words.

Memories, by Mike Petty 4th June 1998

“Memories” this week has a 1940’s flavour, responding to your letters and telephone calls.

We start in the garden of St Matthew’s Vicarage, Cambridge in 1941, where a class of St Matthew’s Infants school smile for the camera. It was lent to me by Sheila Wall (nee Hughes), who organises facilities for the old and bold at Cherrytrees centre, near the church. She is on it, along with Thelma Maltby, the twins Mary and June Knights, Barbara and Lorna Hills, Hazel Few, June Birch and Molly Mitchell (nee Arnold). Molly started school at 3½ with a dummy in her mouth, which headmistress Mrs Swann immediately threw over the wall – if she was big enough to go to school she did not need a dummy! Most stayed in and around Cambridge. So if you recognise yourself, or anybody else let me know.

Other children were uprooted from their homes and sent elsewhere for fear of wartime bombing raids. Many found themselves billeted in or near Ely. On a hot afternoon, 29th August 1944, one girl and her friends went to play near the river at The Cutter, Ely. The next thing anybody knew she had disappeared and was being submerged in the murky waters of the Ouse. It would have been the end of her story but for the actions of Fred Buckle.

On embarkation leave before going off to Burma as a signaller in the Royal Navy he had already seen service off North Africa, carrying supplies along the coast from Alexandria to Benghazi to support the army. Following the battle of Alamein his boat was hit by terrific storms, the engine was disabled, the compass gave out and it sank. Fred found himself swimming for his life and was fortunate to be picked up after dark by a minesweeper.

That afternoon he was staying with friends in Ely and had decided to hire a canoe, paddling towards Prickwillow, before returning to Appleyard’s boatyard. When he heard cries of alarm from the youngsters on the bank he knew something was amiss. Then he glimpsed a girl’s body floating six feet below him. He immediately ditched the canoe, dived down, grabbed the child and carried her to the bank, turning her upside down to drain the water from her lungs. Help was soon on hand, a lady came out and took the child away, and a chap from the Cutter gave him a pair of dry trousers to replace his own sodden clothing.

Next day Fred was off to India, Burma, Rangoon and Malaya, on a trip that would keep him away until demob in 1946. About a year later he was presented with a certificate on parchment from the Royal Humane Society for the rescue of a child in imminent danger of drowning, and whose life he had saved.

The certificate ended up in a cupboard, almost forgotten. Now however Fred has rediscovered it, and has been trying to find anybody who knows more about that incident in August 1944. The local newspapers did not report it at the time, appeals on the radio have come up with nothing. Can "Memories" readers help? Write to me and I will pass information on to Fred in Suffolk

Further information on wartime Cambridge has come from letters discovered by Margaret Brierley from Cottenham written by her brother, a Cambridge undergraduate. There are the problems of everyday life – "At the moment I am eating margarine instead of butter. When I opened my last week's ration it just stank. Mrs B. Took it back to the Co-op to change it but the next lot wasn't much better". In some ways, though, Cambridge was fortunate: "If you are getting short of eggs tell me and I will send you some in a parcel. There is a stall on the market with hundreds every day from the Norfolk farms. The man says that carting them to London costs so much it isn't worth taking them so far".

War caused other disruptions, May 1941: "Well our exams have started. Owing to the Examination Hall having been taken over for wounded soldiers our exams are being held in the Corn Exchange. It is a terrible place, very draughty, and as it was raining on Monday the rain began to come in through the roof in various places"

Studies had been hampered: "On Monday I had a narrow squeak. I was brushing my teeth about 10.30 p.m. and there was an aeroplane flying very low and coming nearer. I heard a whistle beginning and then a terrific bang as the bomb exploded. I found next morning that it had hit a house about 120 yards away, completely demolishing it, the next door house and killing two ladies. There is no damage at my digs at all, due I think to it being a slightly delayed action type. It must have thoroughly buried in the house before it exploded. There are blankets etc still flying from the trees across the road. Several other High Explosive bombs were dropped the same night. Nine people were killed altogether"

Earlier in June 1940 a bomb had dropped on Vicarage Terrace, just off East Road with children amongst the casualties. This was just feet away from the Vicarage Garden where Sheila and her friends posed so happily.

Memories, by Mike Petty 11th June 1998

Something of the arrangements put in place in event of invasion during the First World War has become clear with the loan of a handbook prepared by the Local Emergency Committee for the Cambridge area, issued in 1915.

The area was divided into seven sections under the chairmanship of such people as Mr J. Chivers for the Histon-Girton area, W.C. Bull for Cottenham and Rampton and F.C. Doggett for the Grantchester group. Each would be responsible for law and order in his patch. Their role was to supplement the existing police organisation, make arrangements for instructing the civil population. They had also to collect information on the number of horses, vehicles, telephones, male employees etc and make arrangements to collect them when the time became necessary.

Each area appointed Head special constables – E. Parish for Swavesey, A.W. Frohock for Dry Drayton, J. Mead for Hauxton - and people to organise communications, horses, stock and working gangs.

Three warnings were to be issued: “Stand By” when all arrangements were to be placed in working order – but the population was not to be alarmed. “Partial Emergency” when picks and shovels should be collected and loaded on to carts, stock had to be branded, preparations put into hand to receive refugees from adjoining counties and vehicle owners warned so that everything was ready for the movement of inhabitants and stock.

Should “Total Emergency” be declared the Head Special Constable would assume control of the parish. He would have made an inventory of all stock and horses which would be removed by the military or taken to a concentration place, in Cottenham, Lingay or Swavesey fens, Childerley Hall or at Burnt Mill, Hauxton. The remainder would be slaughtered and stocks of beans, oats and hay destroyed. Any vehicles left in the parish would be rendered useless.

Cyclists, scouts, horsemen and motor cyclists would be available to deliver orders, a band of youths would act as despatch riders, and guides posted at cross roads and entrances to villages. The Master of Horses – people like Tom Hayes of Harston - would ensure that the requisitioned horses and carts from various parishes would be kept separate in the Concentration Place He would make arrangements for feeding and lodging both horse and groom and ensure available fodder was brought in. They needed people who would know all the roads and field-ways and ensure designated Military Roads were kept free. These included the roads from Sandy to St Ives, Royston to Godmanchester, Harlton to Linton and Haverhill, and the New Road that had been constructed from Stretham to Wicken and Freckenham. This latter presented some small difficulty for although the road was built, the bridges across the two rivers were not

Meanwhile the Master of Working Gangs (A.P. Abraham in the case of Landbeach, Thomas Johnson at Fen Drayton)) would ensure that a number of workmen were ready to be moved away from their homes and used for field defences, possibly outside the county He had also to ensure that every person who was capable of working in their neighbourhood of their homes was available. They would be organised into gangs of about 25 people each of whom should come with a day’s food, his great-coat, pick and shovel. The gang would also need crowbars, sledgehammers, hurricane lamps – and a pail. The men, aged between 18 and 60, would be under military discipline.

Under DORA – the Defence of the Realm Act – everybody was obliged to comply with any order, to give help to members of the Emergency Committees – on whom might devolve “many duties at present unthought of” – and to be vigilant, challenging any suspicious alien who might present himself in the locality. Fortunately the invader never came, but – if this “confidential” document issued by Lieut-Col. Louis Tebbutt is any guide – it appears Cambridgeshire would have been prepared.

No fear of unknown faces on the St Matthews school photograph in “Memories” last week. Jean Patman of Chesterton had friends ringing up to tell her she was in the paper along with Eileen January (whose father was the chimney sweep), Pauline Goode, Rita Stepney, Jean Rouse, Diana Eusdon, Betty Brogan and Evelyn Cucut. Jean (Patten in those days) also remembers going to school with a dummy – and having it quickly despatched by the headmistress.

A couple of people this week have mentioned the hardships of being a “Tweenie” – an lowly individual responsible to cook and housemaid in the days when houses had a full complement of “below-stairs” staff. Do you have memories of life in “Service” or any snaps of the time? Please write in to Mike Petty at the News

PICTURES : sheep washing at Overcote 1917; during the Great War plans were made to move livestock to “concentration places”

Or : Electric : Cambridge Electric Light Company annual outing about 50 years ago – a photo lent by Mrs Kathleen Sargeant who recognises Roger Peck in the front row – the rest is up to you

Memories, by Mike Petty, 18th June 1998

Two recent television programmes featuring military heroes – or incompetents depending on your interpretation – have prompted readers to write.

When Charles Barnard of Foxton saw the programme on Lord Kitchener he remembered his own father’s involvement in the South African war where he was ordered to burn the homesteads containing women and children – but there was another connection. For in the 1930’s there lived at Foxton Hall nursing home an old lady, who attended church in her bathchair. Charles used to see her regularly and can point out her grave in the churchyard – for she was Lord Kitchener’s cousin, and the family crest adorns the grave.

But Kitchener also came to Cambridge, and received less than respectful reception. It was in November 1898 that Kitchener – then feted as the person who had avenged the death of General Gordon at the hands of the Mahdi – arrived at Cambridge station for a craaiage drive into town, through streets largely deserted because of bad weather. . A contingent of members of the 3rd (Cambridgeshire) Volunteer Battalion of the Suffolk Regiment formed up on Market Hill. The front of the Guildhall was barricaded, the Great Hall floor covered in crimson cloth and on the stage was a table bearing a beautiful casket designed especially by G. Munsey, the jeweller containing a scroll conferring upon him the Freedom of the Borough of Cambridge.

Once the speeches were over and the presentation made Kitchener was off to receive another accolade – this time from the University. Already Kings Parade was packed and undergraduates who had taken their places high in the Senate House used a hosepipe to spray water on the distinguished visitors gathering below them. Cheers from outside announced Kitchener’s arrival, drowning the cries of pain and distress of undergraduates who were crushed when the great railings surrounding the Senate House were pushed over by the sheer weight of numbers straining to get a glimpse of the hero.

Inside the Senate House an effigy of the Mahdi was suspended from the ceiling as more speeches of praise – this time in Latin - were delivered. Then he was off again in a carriage pulled by undergraduates as far as Christ’s college where not even a contingent of police could prevent the crowds surging through the gates.

Later the undergraduate population continued their celebrations. Hand carts, goal posts, fences from the Backs and much of Christ’s Pieces bandstand were ransacked to feed the flames of a Bonfire on Market Hill. Next morning the town centre had all the appearance of having been in the hands of a mob and many cartloads of debris had to be removed.

Later, of course, Kitchener became famous as the face on the Recruiting Poster for the First World War. One who responded to his country’s call was Herbert Hatton of Milton. He served with the Durham Light Infantry and was killed in action on 15th July 1918, leaving a widow, Kate, living in Gentles Yard, Northampton Street, Cambridge.

“News” reader Raymond Fella of Cambridge came across Herbert’s grave recently whilst travelling in the Dolomites. It lies in the British Military Cemetery on the Asiago Plateau. He has taken a picture of the headstone, and of the entry in cemetery register which he would be delighted to pass on to any members of the family. Contact me and I will put you in touch.

The second programme was the one on the Home Guard. Ruth Holliday from Stretham seeks help. Whilst clearing old possessions she had unearthed a photograph of a group of Dad’s Army. It was taken by Starr and Rignall of Ely and probably shows the defenders of the Witchford area. Can you recognise the background or do you know any of the people.

Meanwhile yet more names have come forward for faces in the view of St Matthew’s street school. Thelma Northrop (nee Maltby) saw herself in the front row. She remembers carrying her gas mask to the school in a square cardboard box and being given a spoonful of malt: “We used to line up with our teaspoons with a piece of coloured cotton tied around the handle so that we knew which was ours. June Prime (formerly Burch) of Staffordshire Street writes “I remembers vividly the night the bomb fell on Vicarage Terrace, it was the most frightening night of her life. Thank you very much for bringing back old memories”.

Thank you very much for sharing them with me – and keep writing!

PHOTOS :

Home Guard group, possibly Witchford area

Charles Barnard with the grave of Kitchener’s cousin at Foxton – taken by photographic on Friday

Memories, by Mike Petty, 25th June 1998

Readers of my daily “Looking Back” column will have been following the story of Walter Horsford of St Neots who, just 100 years ago, was facing trial for the murder of his cousin, with whom he had been having an affair. Following due deliberation he was found guilty and sentenced to be executed.

The whole incident attracted wide press coverage. The Cambridge Daily News of 28th June 1898 devoted an entire page to the proceedings, putting it in the context of previous capital crimes – as would be expected today. But in 1990s we might not expect to be taken inside the execution room to witness the final minutes of the condemned man. Yet that is what readers of a century ago were treated to.

The report was headed “The execution, (by an eye witness)”, and still makes compelling reading.

“It was difficult to realise, as one walked up Castle Hill, to H.M. prison, Cambridge, that one was about to witness the execution of a man in the pride of strength and vigorous young manhood, found guilty of a most horrible crime. Outside the prison a glorious June morning, typical of life and joyousness; inside, already "the shadow of death" pervaded the place and the gloom of the grave overhung the precincts”.

Inside the two pressmen were escorted to a newly elected building of wood, painted a stone colour, with folding doors that open outwards. The place resembled nothing so much as a coach house, yet this seemingly innocent looking building was in reality the gallows.

“Shortly before eight o'clock, the hour fixed for the execution, the bell of the prison chapel began to give forth minute notes. Presently the voice of the Chaplain could be heard reciting in tones tremendous with emotion the opening sentences of the Service of the Dead. And now the funeral procession emerged from a door in the rear of the place of execution. The warders in charge had opened the door of the dread building, and the rope could be seen dangling from the beam overhead. On the trap doors beneath lay a new strap with which to fasten the ill-fated prisoners legs.

All eyes were fixed on the procession. There was but a few yards to traverse, but the scene was sufficiently awful to cause strong men to pale and suspicious lumps to rise in the throats of officials not given to the display of emotion. The Chaplain led the way, with a face of deathly pallor that threatened a collapse, but the Reverend gentlemen carried out his trying task to the bitter end.

The least concerned apparently of the whole group was the prisoner. With head when thrown back and unwavering step he marched to his doom with the aspect of a brave soldier about to be shot - certainly with no inclination of a criminal going to the gallows. With face unblanched and a steady eye, without a muscle moving to indicate fear or remorse, Walter Horsford walked to the place of execution. As he swung round and faced the entrance to the place of death he threw up his head still higher and threw one last glance at the blue sky overhead. He walked into the building and place himself under the noose. The executioner quickly passed the straps around his legs, adjusted the rope around the doomed man's neck, drew the white cap over his eyes, and then stepping to one side pulled the lever. There was a sickening thud as the drop fell, a slight quavering of the rope as the victim to justice disappeared from sight, and the spirit of Walter Horsford had fled to his maker”

Then the reporter added further details of the position of the knot and how death had been instantaneous. He commented: “all the arrangements work smoothly, and the execution was carried out as decently and it expeditiously as was possible under the circumstances”.

Outside the jail a small crowd had gathered who waited for a dark ball to be run up the flagpole; when a moment later it unfurled into a black flag it confirmed the sentence had been carried out. “All appeared calmly to witness the passing of the criminal, and to be thankful that once more retribution had followed on the heels of the wrong-doer”.

The prison was finally closed in 1916 – though many older Cambridge folk can remember queuing for a look in the condemned cell before its demolition in 1931. Now Shire Hall stands on its site, headquarters of Cambridgeshire County Council.

.....

The picture of a chain ferry being used to help wash sheep at Holywell (“Memories” June 11th) recalled for 93-year old Oliver Peters of Needingworth how he used to operate the ferry at the nearby Pike and Eel, when he was a boy. The charge was 3d each way to cross and he remembers the bank lined with people waiting - though if they bought a drink at the pub they didn't have to pay the ferryman

Mrs Lydia Hockaday of Papworth Everard, 90 years young and with a marvellous memory, recalls visiting the sheep market in St Ives as a girl. “It was a special treat to be able to touch the sheep through the pens. This may be an old wives' tale, but I remember children being taken there if they had a bad cough – it was supposed to have healing powers”. Have you heard of similar cures and remedies?

Memories 2nd July 1998, by Mike Petty

DURING the writing of this column I have the great privilege of meeting people with wonderful memories. I had only to mention the words "in service" to prompt a most interesting letter describing one person's experiences of life "below stairs" — but this one is different from most as it comes from a gentleman, Reg Wood, of Saffron Walden.

He writes: "I was rather a delicate boy, and when I left school in August 1930 I went to work on the farm. That winter I developed bronchitis, so a lady in the village suggested to my parents that I should go into domestic service as a houseboy

"So the next spring, having put an advert in the Cambridge Independent Press, I got a job in a house in Bury Road, Newmarket.

"The master was the racing correspondent of a well-known evening paper (not the Cambridge Daily News). There was a cook, house parlour maid, and chauffeur/gardener.

"The cooking was done on a large cooking range, which I had to be up at six o'clock to light and clean, I also had to attend to the water boiler, clean the fireplace and light the fires in the drawing and dining rooms, clean the boots and shoes, lay up the table for the staff breakfast, clean the front porch and whiten the doorstep.

"After breakfast I had to get in the coals for the fires, wash up, then go and sweep the landings and down the stairs and hall with a brush and dustpan, then clean up in the kitchen, prepare the vegetables and any jobs the cook wanted done, also help the maid to empty the slops, clean the bathroom and toilets and then it would be silver and brass cleaning, and, of course, there was always the kitchen table and floors to scrub.

"After lunch it was washing up pots and pans again. Then come sunshine, wind, rain or snow I had to take the two dogs out, and, if they were wet, dry them.

"Then it was teatime and afterwards time to peel the vegetables etc for dinner, feed the dogs, attend to the fires. After washing up the dishes and pots and pans, I had to get the sticks ready for the fires in the morning.

"I was glad to get to bed at 9 o'clock. I had one day off a month, an evening out on Saturday, and Sunday evening to go to church.

"I was provided with striped coats and aprons and was paid five shillings a week. I stayed there 15 months."

Afterwards Reg went on to another job at Carlton, near Newmarket, which he says was worse than ever — but, he point out, in those days there was no unemployment benefit for domestic work or farm labourer. So you had to put up with all sorts of conditions, knowing full well if you didn't like the job, there was always somebody ready to take your place.

- I have an awful memory for names and faces — but many people can look at a photograph and reel off lists of people they knew, or worked with, many years ago.

Kathleen Sargeant has sent in a picture of a staff outing from Macintosh's ironmonger's shop in Market Street. Cambridge. She worked there for six to eight months in about 1928, one of only two female staff. She manned the cash desk which was just inside the door. Customers got their goods at the counter where a bill was made out, and paid at the cash desk. Several people have mentioned Macintosh's shop where they took their shears to be sharpened, or bought screws or nails. It seems to have played a large part in Cambridge life — did you shop there?

And what of the old Ortona single-decker bus with its retractable canvas roof — it must have been delightful to ride in on balmy summer days, but what were they like to drive? Did other companies treat their employees to outings — and where did you go? Any memories to me please.

Many people find they can remember days past, but have great difficulties with days present. How often do we have a name "on the tip of the tongue", but then find it will not come out? It doesn't usually matter too much — unless it is the name of your husband, or wife. Sadly, many people suffer from just such dementia.

Next week is Alzheimer's Awareness Week — aptly called "Thanks for the Memory" — giving prominence to the difficulties of both the sufferers and their carers.

Often the long-term memory seems to grow clearer as the mass of modern cares is forgotten — so share those memories with me. Write yourself a note to write me a letter.

- For information on dementia contact Ms Susan Elliott, Alzheimer's Disease Society, Ida Darwin Site, Fulbourn Old Drift, Fulbourn, Cambridge CB1 3EE — phone (01223) 884031 (during the morning).

Memories, 9th July 1998, by Mike Petty

On Saturday Cambridge was awash with memories of schooldays and after. All afternoon Coleridge Community College was packed with old pupils — some of them much younger than others — as they celebrated its Diamond Jubilee. Wearing coloured stickers to indicate their particular vintage people paraded corridors, greeted old friends, commented on the foibles of former classmates (only to find that person standing behind them), remembered the teacher who used to keep a chair stave in his belt ready to administer retribution for misbehaviour — and the activities of Tilly, the school goat. They pored over hundreds of snapshots of school classes and old Cambridge Daily News pictures of outings — and recorded their memories for a special Jubilee Reunion edition of the School Magazine.

Earlier in the day School Buses had drawn up in King's Parade, Cambridge, and hundreds of old-girls had disembarked — some of them really quite venerable. They queued up patiently in line, each immaculate in her gown, as to spontaneous applause, they made their way to another celebration. Some needed help getting up the steps but all were determined, and some had risen very early indeed to be sure they were there. Later the Senate House lawn was full of the usual mixture of proud youngsters, their parents and grandparents. But uniquely this time they were acknowledging the achievements of the oldest member of their family. For this was Cambridge University's celebration of those women from Girton and Newnham colleges who had been students before 1948, when women were first granted degrees.

One who was watching the proceedings was Sally Hatton from Sawston. She had earlier shared with me memories of her own grandmother who had not attended University, though she had lived virtually in the grounds of St John's college for 50 years. Her cottage was in Gentles Yard, Northampton Street. It was one in a cobbled passageway with a toilet across the yard and an outside tap from which she drew buckets of water to carry into her kitchen. Inside there was a single room housing her old gas cooker, a table with a bowl and bar of soap, the black kitchen range and the cupboard under the stairs where she kept the coal — the coalman carrying the sacks in through the one door.

Every Saturday when Sally went visiting her proud grandmother would have waiting for her new bread and jelly in a basin, a new pot of Raspberry Jam, a flaky pastry turnover with jam and cream inside, and a jam doughnut. The pattern would never vary. Gran would not eat anything herself, though she would stir the sugar into her tea for ages as she reminisced – but never of her own pecunious state or how she would sit and shell sacks of Chivers peas for a few coppers a time, or of her husband.

For gran was a widow. Herbert had been killed in the Great War when the Austrians and Germans had made a big advance in Asiago, Italy, in July 1918. His parents had lived in Milton, his father working as a cowman at Denny Abbey. Herbert had been home recovering from a wound in his hand a short while earlier and they had posed for a family photo with their two sons, George the elder and Walter Leslie, (Bib) in petticoats - Sally's late father.

She has lent me the photograph, a treasured memento of a wonderful gran and a grandfather she never knew. She now has another. For "News" reader Raymond Fella had spotted Herbert's grave when on holiday and snapped it. We mentioned it in "Memories" in the hope that somebody would be interested. Indeed they were! It has now been passed on to form part of the family's treasures. But, to make the file complete, does anybody have a picture of the cottages in Gentle's Yard, demolished in the 1960s?

Whilst on the subject of old army photographs the "Dad's Army" picture featured in "Memories", 18th June has definitely been identified as Witchford. Work is still going on to put names to faces

From Witchford Yvonne Barlow of 29 Clover End, (CB6 2XD) writes: "Historical research shows that childbirth could be a fearful, lonely and even disabling experience before modern medicine weighed in with antibiotics and pre-natal classes. I am a freelance reporter and would like to talk to older women about their experiences". Her number is 01353 663687

It was hard bringing up children when there was no money for doctors' bills and people devised their own cures. Edward Hall of Lt Eversden writes: "When I was a youngster I remember mother bringing children to inhale tar fumes to cure whooping cough when roads were being resurfaced". Whilst Mrs J. Clements of Campkin Rd, Cambridge recalls: "When my brother and I had whooping cough in about 1932 we were taken along to the Gasworks on Newmarket Road. For a very small fee we were held over the sulphur pit, after taking in the fumes we were very sick, taken home and put to bed. According to my mother we were left with a very mild cough. The pit was located under a manhole cover in the ground. I wonder if any of your older readers remember this"

She also asks if anyone has pictures of the Cambridge Albion Fishing Club children's fishing matches – over to you

PICTURES : Hatton – Herbert and Kate Hatton (nee Clayton) with their children, c1916
North : Northampton Street, Cambridge ; Gentle's Yard was on the left where the shaft of light is shining through identified as Witchford. Work is still going on to put names to faces

Memories 16th July 1998, by Mike Petty

Mr Reginald Dye of Cambridge has contacted me about his grandfather Walter Pauley who ran the Fort St George ferry which used to ply across the river from Midsummer Common to Chesterton.

In the earlier years of the century the residents of the new houses at Chesterton enjoyed the best of both worlds. They were near enough to Cambridge to be able stroll into town across the lush green commons which were separated from their homes only by the river Cam.

Several ferries plied across the river, the ferrymen making a useful living from the tolls they charged and the residents not being too inconvenienced by the delay in crossing. Sometimes people took themselves across after hours, turning the handle that engaged the chain that ran across the bed of the river although when the ferry was on the other side it had to be pulled over by tugging on the chain itself, which was slimy - and worse - from the depths of the river.

Cambridge councillors however looked with dismay at the residents of the independent Urban district of Chesterton who were using their facilities but not contributing to Cambridge rates. They tried to encourage them to become part of a greater Cambridge. One inducement proffered was a new road bridge to replace William Bates' ferry. In 1888 Chestertonians voted for the bridge – Victoria Bridge – but then declined the amalgamation.

Whilst the residents of Ferry Path were content to cross the river in the traditional way occupants of the new houses on the De Freville Estate were soon campaigning for something better - a footbridge. The tragic loss of life when a ferry sank at Fen Ditton in 1905 would have added fuel to their cause but no bridges were to be forthcoming whilst Chesterton was independent.

In 1913 the Cambridge Borough council, having won its battle to absorb Chesterton, decided that a bridge was indeed necessary at Ferry Path, though it was another 14 years before it actually opened. Those waiting to make a last nostalgic crossing were disappointed when the ferry sank just before the new bridge opened in 1927. By then William Pauley had operated the ferry 40 years and carried an estimated one and a quarter million passengers. Further downstream the Cutter ferry, worked for years by the Dant family, was also superseded by a footbridge, though it was brought back into use five years later when the bridge needed repairs.

Old Chesterton however still had to rely on the two ferries opposite the Green Dragon in Water Street. One was a heavily built craft that could carry horses and cattle across to Stourbridge Common, alongside it a light passenger ferry. It was May 1936 before the bridge was actually open. The smaller ferry was repositioned near Banham's boatyard and was used by the engineers constructing the latest link between Chesterton and Cambridge - Elizabeth bridge

Reg recalls that Grandfather Pauley usually charged 1d a crossing but used to double it whenever Midsummer fair was in operation – and demand was greater. The late A.F. Leach used to tell another of Pauley's tricks – how the ferryman would wait in his cottage until there were five or six people waiting – and thus he received more for his efforts.

Reg seeks help on another point for although the fair was a temporary attraction a circus was ever present. My researchers show that Keith and Tudor's circus enjoyed success on Midsummer Common – too long according to Cambridge authorities who fined them for overstaying their welcome in 1888. So they moved to a new building in nearby Auckland Road in 1896 where they showed the first films seen in Cambridge. I find regular reviews of their variety performances as I compile my "Looking Back" notes for 1898 – for example on 26th July there were glee singers, lady acrobats, lady gymnasts, a riding goat - that is to say a goat that rides, "the irresistibly idiotic and curiously contrasted clowns Frisky Freddy and Jolly Jim, the sad and silent and the gay and garrulous". It was renamed the "Hippodrome" about 1904 presenting a mixture of entertainment aimed at the lower class of working men and women. It was probably not the grandest building in Cambridge and was later reopened as the "Gaiety" in 1913. Reg believes that during the 1914-18 war soldiers were billeted in the building and it was later used as a school health clinic.

He would like further information to add to the family's story, for his father James Dye was also involved in the entertainment industry, being stagemanager at the New Theatre in the 1930s. Can you help? Do you have memories of crossing the Cam by ferry – and why was "Cuckoo Dant" so nicknamed – write to Mike Petty at the News

PICTURE : William Pauley (with the white hat) on his ferry at the Fort St George, in c1926

Memories, 23rd July 1998, by Mike Petty

When Alan Phillips of Thurston, near Bury St Edmunds, went to a car boot sale recently he spotted a couple of small wooden boxes which looked interesting. Inside were old blackened pieces of glass. As he studied them he realised they were photographic negatives and some of them were of Cambridge scenes. He took them to an antique shop in Lavenham who put him in touch with me. Now, thanks to the News photographic department, he has prints of some of the views.

It is hard to date them accurately, since Cambridge does not change radically, but I estimate they were taken over 90 years ago, though who took them is a mystery that may never be solved.

One person who seldom has problems identifying old photographs is Ernie Gray of Littleport, who looks forward to the "Memory Way" feature in the Ely Weekly News. He spent his childhood at Pymoor where they moved in 1912 after the family were flooded out from Feltwell Fen. They lived in a cottage with a parafin lamp and outside toilet & fetched water from the 100-foot river, ¼ mile away – a long trudge with two heavy buckets. He got his first camera while still attending Pymoor school which was a mile away. He always walked there even after he got a bike – bought from a shop at Lt Downham which was featured in "Memory Way" recently. He'd saved hard to get the 10/- purchase money only to find he'd lost it on the walk there. His father lent him the missing money, which he had to repay from the 2/- a day he earned from working on the farm on Saturdays.

After he left school at 14 he soon found himself employed as horseman, taking over from his father. He had to rise at 5 am so that everything was ready for a 7 o'clock start to the working day. They broke for docky at 10.30 and had their hot meal after the day's work was done, at 3.30. Then it was time to work on his garden, or – during the war - don his uniform and turn out for Home Guard duty where he was a despatch rider. Ernie's memories are as clear as the photographs he still takes – though sadly his oldest snaps were cleared when he moved into his new accommodation.

Photographs too are the subject of an appeal from Nicholas Stanley, who is writing the story of Pye of Cambridge. "News" readers have already filled in many of the gaps but there's still one remaining.

During 1940 the Ministry became so alarmed that Pye's critical defence electronics work was located in Cambridge, so vulnerable to attack. They tried to persuade them to relocate to premises in Swansea. C.O. Stanley refused such a move, but decided instead to diversify some of the production elsewhere. He recruited housewives, retired people and older children to work in village and church halls, or garages, assembling plugs for tank radio sets. It became a way of life for many local people for 4 or 5 years

Do you have any photographs of such groups working in a local venue that you would lend for the new book, and so fill a gap in Cambridge's war-time story? If so let me know and I will pass them on. As a reward Nicholas Stanley offers dinner for two at the Midsummer Restaurant to anybody who produces a photograph that is good enough to use!

Mention of the Hatton family of Gentles Yard, Northampton Street, Cambridge ("Memories" 9th July) has prompted reminiscences from Pear Loveday and Mrs J. Horton. Pear (nee Chapman) knew the next-door neighbour, Mrs Annie Twinn who minded bicycles for people from the surrounding villages who used to bike in to the market. She had previously been landlady of the Spotted Cow, on the opposite side of Northampton Street.

Mrs Horton knew the Hatton family well, as she used to live in the area in 1928 after her father got a job at Northfields the builders at the bottom of Castle Hill. Leslie Hatton, then known as Bib, became one of the first friends her brother made in Cambridge. She points out that I had wrongly located the entrance to Gentle's Yard – it was further along the street, opposite Honey Hill. The entrance I identified was into Tan Yard – so what can you tell me about that?

PICTURES : unchanging Cambridge – Alan Phillip's snap of St John's street, c1905

Changing Cambridge – the corner of Honey Hill, Northampton Street, with the Spotted Cow, c 1926

Memories, 30th July 1998, by Mike Petty

Browsing through the files of the Cambridge Daily News for August 1923 I chanced upon an article recording the memories of one of the old village's most important men. Ted Lowe of Stretham was shortly to celebrate his 65th year as a carrier. Aged 78 he was still making the regular journey to Ely. In all that time he had had but three conveyances and the existing cart was – like himself – going strong after 50 years, with only the wheels having been replaced.

On one occasion, he recalled, he was driving a party of 13 people home from Ely market when the back band of the harness broke and everybody was pitched into the road. With the exception of a few minor scratches nobody was hurt – though one man would insist he was dead. "I'm dead, I'm dead," he groaned and no one could alter his opinion. "Are you certain you're dead?" asked his wife. "Yes, certain," was the reply. "Then lie quiet", was the wife's comforting response

There is little written about such important characters, though Kathleen Skin of Cambridge has recorded the song of the Kingston carrier that she heard over 60 years ago. This gives, in verse, an account of his weekly itinerary. Monday saw him journey to Arrington and Wimpole, Tuesday it was Barton and Cambridge with farmstuff. Wednesday saw him en route to Orwell, Barrington, Harlton and Haslingfield, Thursday to Comberton and Gamlingay – "But we doon't dew such business, As we other days dew". Friday by contrast was busy : "To Royston we goo, With shoppers and traders, And livestock a few. The market's roight boisterous, All shouting and bawl, In the inns they are roisterous, Like any market stall".

On Saturday he was available for private hire, which he found a tiring day: “Oi goo tew their Grannies, Or tek foolks tow wed, But on Sundays Oi am resting, And Oi’m in me bed”

One group of equally-unrecorded, hardworking folk, are the College butlers. Last week I had the privilege of meeting one such : Thomas Moffett, until recently butler at Peterhouse. His is a remarkable story for he had a background of Dickensian poverty. Shipped off from South Shields, an area of deprivation and drunkenness, to a Surrey building whose very name described its purpose: The Royal Albert Orphan Asylum for Thoroughly Destitute Children. He came to Cambridge to join his uncle in 1939 first working at G.P. Hawkings bakery as errand boy delivering bread at 12/6 week; then got job in kitchens at Temperance Hotel, Newmarket road run by two sisters, Ward & Cox, for nearly twice the pay. Following a spell in the navy he got a job at the University Arms hotel in 1946 where he stayed for 26 ½ years. Overcoming the tragic loss of his first wife he then sought a second career with his second. Together they applied for jobs at Peterhouse – the college were impressed by her and took him too (he says). She became housekeeper in a college hostel whilst he rose to become college butler, and when forced by statute to retire was appointed to a new post – that of butler to the Master.

A Cambridge college is a world of its own and he has been lucky enough to serve and enjoy the fellowship of a number of brilliant and distinguished people. He has been privy to their conversations and their private thoughts and had to mediate in the inevitable difficulties that arise when a small group dine and live together for years. It has not all been sweetness and light, not every change has been welcomed. But although he has a marvellous memory for many things he has also a well-developed professional amnesia – what the Butler saw is safe with Thomas Moffett

He has however shared his remarkable early life in his autobiography “A canny lad”, just published by Erskin press of Banham, Norfolk. He had to be bullied and cajoled to set it down and I hope he can be encouraged to produce a second volume on his Cambridge career – though he has enjoyed it so much it could sadly not be entitled “Peterhouse blues”

Do you remember the carrier – or tales of college life – write to Mike Petty at the News

Memories, by Mike Petty 6 August 1998

This week’s Memories seeks your help on things musical. Jim Moore has contacted me for help with a radio programme he is putting together on the Cambridge dance halls – and this seems a topic that has not properly been researched. Trawling through my memory I can think of such places as the Dorothy, Corn Exchange, Guildhall and Victoria where dances were held. Then there was the Rendezvous/Rex dance hall in Magrath Avenue, the Premier in Union Lane, Chesterton. There was another on Mill Road – was it the Embassy?

Just remembering the name is one thing, but Jim wants to talk to people who actually used to go there and who have their own memories – people like Dorothy Kidman of Cambridge who used to sneak out to go to the Premier and met her late husband, Jack, at the Rendezvous. And is there anybody who actually used to play in the dance bands? Did any of them actually make recordings? Time is of the essence here so if you can help please ring Jim Moore on Cambridge 327634 – as well as writing to me at the News.

Whilst thinking music I am most grateful to Mr & Mrs Shelley of Trumpington who have lent me a couple of most interesting photographs which I will feature. The first is this one of the Cambridge Town Band taken, we think, somewhere between 1928 and 1932. Some of the names are Mott, Hawkes, & Bullman whilst the conductor was Mr Robert E. Austin. Cecil Fordham was a singer. I believe the Band started in 1900 at which time there were five other local bands – the Albion, Salvation Army, The Territorial and Police bands and the one reckoned to be best of the lot – the Cambridge Railway Band.

But the Cambridge Band had considerable success playing at everything from local sports and fairs to promenade concerts and garden parties. The highlight of the year was the visit to the Crystal Palace for the national brass band championships. At the end of the 1920s they recruited a new member, Leonard Lamb, an out-of-work pattern maker from Oldham. In his time they went on to win the fourth section of the national championships and the East Anglian brass band championship three years running. All this I learn from an article in the News in January 1973 when Stanley Brown of Landbeach was interviewed – one of five brothers who were mainstays of the Band. Do you recognise anybody hiding under their remarkable headgear or know when it was taken?

More memories of Gentles Yard, Northampton Street, have been received. Iris Ward of Cambridge used to live in one of the cottages and has snaps of her two children in the yard. When they moved down to Tan Yard Sam and Angela Ward took their cottage. She also remembers that there was an artist from Shelford who had his studios in the yard, but can't recall his name. Can you help?

Earlier in July I mentioned the Cambridge Albion Children Fishing Club matches. From a cutting from the Cambridge Chronicle in August 1929 I see that three hundred children complete with fishing rods assembled on Parker's Piece. Led by the band of the Boys Brigade they marched off to the railway station and were transported free of charge to Ely in the first post-war revival of the competition. On arrival at the riverbank the sight of so many youngsters struggling with their fishing equipment must have been memorable. Tangled lines, missing bait, misplaced maggots and broken rods were commonplace, whilst so many hooks were lost that at the end the organisers ran out. Amazingly many of them even caught fish with G. Cockerton getting the biggest catch, and S. Moule winning the girl's prize for the biggest fish. Then they had to be fed and got home again. It must have been a tremendous undertaking repeated year on year at different venues – does anybody remember it?

Memories, 13th August 1998, by Mike Petty

My appeal last week for memories of the dance-band days struck a chord with several readers, bringing in a wealth of information.

Ted Cash recalls dancing at the Beaconsfield Hall, whilst Percy Seeby from Trumpington has particular memories of the Embassy ballroom in Mill Road. He writes: "I played tenor sax in Freddy Webbs' band at this venue from 1952 to 1957. The manager of the Embassy was Arthur "Fiddler" Goodwill, a Newmarket race horse trainer. Business however began to decline as T.V. became more popular and the hall eventually closed and became a concert warehouse. Before this I was a member of the revolutionary "Down Beats" band which was the first to feature the then new "Be Bop" music in the area"

Megan Williams from Mill Road, Cambridge, also "read with interest your article on dance bands in Cambridge. My late husband, Eric Williams played at the Dorothy Café for many years with Percy Cowell. Later he formed his own band – the "Lyricals" performing at the Guildhall and also at private functions. I have enclosed a photograph, (which I feature) but unfortunately cannot find a recording. My husband is the one playing the accordion, he was also a competent pianist and organist." Eric died very suddenly last Christmas

From Chesterton Road, Cambridge, comes a most interesting letter from Timothy Moore, who obviously played a full part in the music scene. He writes: "From various programmes, press cutting and posters and the “Life History Album” started by my father (Prof. G.E. Moore) at my birth and later continued by me I’ve dredged the following information. In 1943 I played piano frequently with Wally Scott’s dance band. From October ’43 I played with the Ambassadors Swing Band (reformed in Nov 1944 as the New Ambassadors Band”).

His album includes a souvenir programme of the Melody Maker Cambridgeshire Dance Band Championship in the Guildhall in August 1945. Competitors had to play first a foxtrot, then a waltz and finally a quickstep. At that time he was in the “Cambridge Rhythm Club Quintet” which came third. The winning band was the Downbeats which he then joined, playing with them in “Re-Vaudeville” at the A.D.C in January 1946. Of that band at least three people are still playing in Cambridge he believes. By the next year’s competition he was in another band, the Calinesen Quintet and judged the best pianist in the contest.

Some indication of the wealth of music at the time is contained in another of his cuttings. On 17th May 1946 at the Dorothy Café, Cambridge University Rhythm Club presented a May Ball from 8 to 1am. Playing were the Augmented C.U.R.C. Dance Orchestra, Percy Cowell’s Band and guest bands “The Downbeats” (featuring Percy Seeby), The Cambridge University Swing Cubs and Tim Moore’s Jazz men.

All this has been passed on to Jim Moore (no relation to Tim) whose programme on the Cambridge Dance Band Days is scheduled for BBC Radio Cambridgeshire on August Bank Holiday.

Mention of Ted Lowe, the Stretham carrier (“Memories” 30 July) has prompted a letter from Edna Milne of Gt Shelford, who tells me Ted was her grandfather. She still has in her possession the whip that he was holding in the photograph. Others recall that Ted was a great one for his tales, some of which seem somewhat remarkable. For example he once witnessed the remarkable spectacle of three trees being almost blown down at Stretham by a terrific gale – but then the wind veered and blew them upright again! The story might seem a little exaggerated but three other inhabitants claimed they actually witnessed the spectacle and the trees were known for many years as “The Three Wonders”

Whilst on things botanical Keith Jordan has written following my “Looking Back” article for 21st July 1923 about the Vinery Road allotments in Cambridge. “It appeared just as we were researching into the history of the allotments. Records show that 121 people had applied for land, 9 of them asking for 15 poles each”. This is testimony to the hard-working gardeners of those times, for nowadays our village has plenty of unlet allotments, with people finding even half a single plot far too big for their needs – or energy.

By coincidence that evening the 1948 extracts featured the removal of wartime defences on the eastern side of Cambridge – which Keith believes relates to Burnside allotments. He writes, “The middle part of the current allotments was apparently used for tank traps during the war. This accounts for the poor condition of the soil in this area (a lot of chalky clay sub-soil), caused by the excavations. I am not sure when they were filled in. It would be interesting to know if any maps exists of the defences, unless it’s still secret information!” Can you help fill in this gap in their history?

8

Tony Chapman of Stanesfield Road responds to my request for information on Tan Yard, Northampton Street, an area he knew well until 1932. Beyond a row of cottages was the slaughterhouse of Warrington’s the butchers, where it was not unusual to see flocks of sheep, small herds of cows and pigs being led or driven to their fate. Mrs J. Horton of Wulfstan Way remembers this took place on Mondays – wash day.

Memories, August 20th, 1998 by Mike Petty

More dance band memories have been arriving. Mrs Elizabeth Chapman of Harston used to dance so regularly at the Rex in Magrath Avenue, Cambridge, in the mid-forties and early fifties that if she missed a session her father used to say, “I shall have the manager round here wanting to know where you are!” There was no staying out late for dances finished at 11pm and everybody left at the interval for a drink at the Carpenter’s Arms or Blackamoors Head nearby. She recalls that the old Masonic Hall in Corn Exchange Street (remember that?) used to have well-known jazz bands such as Humphrey Littleton and Duncan Whyte.

Elizabeth may have danced with Dave Dilley of Cambridge for he too was a regular dancer at the Rex, Embassy and Guildhall at that time. He remembers many of the “name bands” who visited the Rex including Harry Gold, Sid Phillips, Vic Lewis and, one evening, the exciting Tommy Sampson band. “It was a very loud band. There were 49 people at the Rex that night. After the interval only 12 remained”

Sid High of Waterbeach recalls Josephine’s Band, formed by Jo Clarke and consisting of seven people with Jo’s husband Nobby on saxophone. He was thought to be the first person in Cambridge to own and play a soprano sax. Their son, Frankie Clarke, followed in their footsteps playing double bass and became well-known in the London area playing with the big bands and often going on tour with American visiting artists

Graham Taylor of Trumpington recalls the Ted Heath Band who came to Cambridge in the early 1950s with vocalists such as Lita Rosa and Dickie Valentine – whose autograph he got by waiting at the stage door of the New Theatre. He can also add some details about the Cambridge Town Band whose photographs – wearing Bear Skins – I featured on 6th August; he writes, “My father was a cornet player with them during the war when they were part of the Home Guard 5th Battalion. The conductor then was Wally Cantt and when he died Ron Mathews took over for a short spell. Their main task then consisted of morale boosting parades to lead visiting troops – Canadians, Australians and New Zealanders from the railway station to their billets in Cambridge”. (This incidentally is another unrecorded aspect of war-time – did you have soldiers billeted on you, how did it work, did it cause problems – or lead to romance?) They also played to the Americans at Wimpole Park when it was a Hospital (– any memories of this?)

On the subject of uniform Graham remembers Cambridge Band tunics were army style but as musicians they wore a Lyre emblem on the sleeve. When the war was over the band were issued with red tunics and berets and eventually they had flat caps

The mystery headgear is solved however by Mrs G. Murfett of Cambridge. “I can tell you that the photo was taken at the New Theatre where the Cambridge Band was playing a Guards Band on stage for a week. I know this because Stan Brown is my dad’s brother. He is the only one left and will be 90 this year”. The picture shows her father Cyril, together with Harold, Frank and Stan Brown. Keeping it in the family she adds “My sister and I also played in the Band for a while; at that time it was known as the British Legion Band, as they were the sponsors for a while”.

.....

Mrs Gladys Davenport of Sawston has staked her bid to the free dinner on offer for any picture of war-time outworkers for Pye’s chosen for the book now being written. She has a snap of a group who used to assemble equipment in outbuildings at The Grove, Sawston, which belonged to the Stanley’s. There’s some doubt as to whether it was taken during the war or around 1948-49. Do you recognise anybody – or yourself. There's still time for other pictures of this vital war-time activity so turn out the family photographs.

And whilst on Sawston Julia Falkner-Tompkins has sent me a chapter from her biography of Keith Falkner, one of England's finest 20th-century singers. He was born in the village in 1900, the son of the schoolmaster of what is today the John Charles Falkner Primary School – a post he held for thirty-five years. Perhaps you remember father or son. If so the book, published by Thames Publishing at £14.95 might be of interest.

Finally another school-day snap to puzzle over from Mrs Shelley of Trumpington. This group of young musicians was photographed outside St Barnabas school, Cambridge in the 1940s when Miss Foster was head. The conductor is Christopher Hodges and the band includes evacuees. Can you identify anybody?

PICTURES : A group of outworkers for Pye's, taken at Sawston about 1948
School band at St Barnabas School in the 1940s

Memories 27th August 1998, by Mike Petty

Do you remember seeing elephants in St Andrew's Street? Not so long ago they heralded the arrival of the circus as they paraded from the station to Midsummer Common in the days when animals were an essential part of the show.

Just 100 years ago Cambridge was preparing for "The Greatest Show on Earth", "the worlds largest, grandest, best amusement institution" – Barnum and Bailey's Circus. Advertisements in the Cambridge Daily News extolled the wonders to be witnessed. There would be wild beasts, the funniest clowns on earth, stupendous mid-air feats, 400 blue-ribboned horses and Joanna, the only giantess gorilla in captivity.

They would be matched by a world's fair of modern marvels – giants, midgets, dwarfs, tattooed people, armless and legless men and seven open dens of trained wild beasts.

Cambridge's own, permanent neat little Tudor's circus in Auckland Road prepared to compete although "Last night was not the occasion on which the average cold-fearing rheumatic-dreading Britisher would elect to plough through muddy Cambridge streets to spend a few short-lived hours at a place of amusement", commented the News on 30th August 1898. But still they turned out to see the jolly clowns Rabbit and Frisky Freddy, to admire the skills of the acrobatic performers and listen to the sweet-toned voice of Cissie Warner, a dusky little maiden, apparently about eleven years old, who "sings coon songs with a delicate grace seldom to be found in dancing ladies of a maturer age"

But when Barnum's great circus finally hit town 15,000 packed round the vast area, perspiring, laughing, cheering and perspiring again. The reporter enjoyed the bearded lady, the dog-faced man, the double-wonder (combined brother and sister). He marvelled at the footballing dog, the pig races, educated elephants and the four or five other shows all going on at once; "the camera of our memory holds only imperfect slides of a myriad sights taken with a lightning shutter".

But he was concerned about the welfare of the animals, for Summer had broken out and while the elastic skinned man and the skeleton dude were favoured with "their lives and experiences (printed) wherewith to fan themselves", "some of the animals clearly had the hump over it" and, "the hyenas swore at the Cambridge folk in the severe language of some distant Billingsgate"

Then it was all over, the American circus packed its bags and headed off on the next leg of its tour and Tudor's had the town to itself.

Fifty years go, August 1948, the Americans were once more in the news, for more than 700 airmen had landed at Lakenheath, "where 31 giant silver Super-Fortress bombers now lined the runways of this big new R.A.F. station". The airfield had opened in June 1941 as a satellite for Mildenhall and remained operational as an RAF station until May 1944. Now it was in use again, this time by the Americans. They found the accommodation less than ideal – having to use RAF huts and eat RAF food, but already semi-prefabricated buildings were shooting up and the runways were being lengthened.

Many of the airmen knew Cambridge well, having been based at Bassingbourn during the war. They shared their memories of the Baron of Beef, the Rex ballroom, the Dorothy – and the Cambridge girls. They wondered what Market Hill and Petty Cury would be like, now the lights were back on, having only known it in the blackout. The reporter looked around "to see if we could find two airmen dressed alike, but without success. Yes it sure did seem as though the Yanks hadn't changed"

Nobody could say how long they'd stay, though "it looks like we are here for a spell". Fifty years later they still are.

Other bases proved less permanent. The American presence at Alconbury is now only a memory, but one enhanced by a photograph of Wally Scott and his band playing away in front of a most futuristic backdrop. For this engagement the band had to hire transport, but, as Marjorie Scott told me, for those bookings nearer Wally's Girton home he would bike, his music slung one side of the cross-bar, the trumpet the other. Then it was back home in the early hours only to be up at crack of dawn to bike to Chiver's dairy on Pound Hill. There he would collect his horse and cart and deliver milk to the Milton Road area of Cambridge – probably humming the latest waltz as he trotted along.

Note: tape-recorded interview with Mrs Scott filed TC62

Memories 3rd September 1998, by Mike Petty

Terry Holloway from Marshalls writes to seek further details about the flying exploits of a 24-year-old Cambridge housewife, Mrs Richarda Morrow-Tait who set off from the airfield on 18th August 1948 in an attempt to be the first woman to fly round a light aircraft round the world. She was accompanied by her navigator and co-pilot Mr Michael Townsend of Cranmer Road, Cambridge who had served during the war with RAF transport command and made several trans-Atlantic flights. They carried only a minimum amount of baggage but included in it was a .303 rifle and ammunition, as part of the flight would be over uninhabited territory. Maps and baggage stowed away, including some sandwiches cut for Mrs Morrow-Tait by her husband the two climbed into the aircraft, an ex-RAF Proctor aircraft which had been thoroughly overhauled and fitted with a reconditioned engine. Her husband said, "She is a wonderful person, full of courage and determination"

The dream of completing the trip in six weeks soon went sour for the very next day her plane was damaged when landing at Marseilles. She told Reuter's correspondent, "I hit a small ditch owing to bad visibility. The propeller was twisted, a wing damaged and the undercarriage also suffered. Our plan for a round-the-world flight in 200 hours is no longer realisable. I think I will probably go back to London and start again". When a C.D.N. reporter told her husband of her accident he said, "I don't care twopence about her abandoning the flight. I expect she will have another go"

Start again she did, and the columns of the “News” began to carry regular snippets charting the progress of her journey. A year and a day after she left Marshall’s she was finally home, landing at Croydon airfield – though not in the same plane, and without her navigator, having made the final 1,200 mile hop on her own”

They had got three-quarters of the way when the Proctor was wrecked when she had to make a forced landing on the Alaskan highway. “I was nearly home and just could not quit” she said. She sang in nightclubs, modelled and gave talks to raise money for a new plane. Well-wishers in Seattle and Vancouver subscribed 500 dollars to buy a Vultee Valiant replacement aircraft which she again named “Thursday’s Child” for it – like the first one “had far to go”. But, she told the reporter, “I cannot afford to keep it, there is about £24 customs duty to pay on it and it would be necessary to get an import licence”. Does anybody know what happened to it?

When interviewed at her home at St Regis, Chesterton Road, Cambridge she said she’d made the trip because “I wanted to be the first woman to fly round the world and was “narked” because Britain did not seem to be doing too well in international sport and seemed to be getting effete”. Now she was happily reunited with her husband and baby daughter but had not given up all flying ambitions: “I hope to continue flying by joining the W.R.A.F.V.R., but my main job is going to be looking after our home” What became of the gallant flyer?

Other flying women have been recalled by Harry Bye of Ely. Pauline Gower and Dorothy Spicer were friends of Amy Johnson – indeed they had plans to go into business together, but when Amy continued her record flying the other girls set up a company to give joy-rides to the public, Pauline as the pilot and Dorothy keeping the plane in good trim. They joined the flying circuses which visited the Cambridge area in the early 1930s. The programme always began with a formation flight on which passengers were carried, so that everybody around would know there was an air circus in town. There would be balloon bursting, paper cutting, bottle shooting from the air – an endless supply of beer bottles lined up in front of a screen at which the pilot fired as she flew past. The bottle always smashed (but, say Harry, the gun fired blanks and the bottle was hit from behind the screen with a sledgehammer). Later in the ‘30’s the girls based themselves at Hunstanton, living in a gipsy caravan on Searle’s donkey field and giving flights to holidaymakers.

Harry used to bike miles from his home at Shippea Hill to watch the lucky passengers make their flights, but never had the money to take a trip himself. On one occasion Dorothy Spicer – now well-used to the sight of the lad – offered him a cut-price trip, but that would have meant a long bike back home without any money at all and he had to decline. Harry was left with a love of flying and decided that he would join the RAF when the time came. He changed his mind after witnessing horrific crashes during the war, which brought home to him the bravery of those magnificent women in their flying machines

Jack Back has other memories of flying from Marshalls. “During the early part of the war the pilots used to get bored. When they were flying they would go over the fens and annoy the farmers there. They would see a tractor and then fly across the field at “0” feet and hop over the tractor. One day we had a Tiger Moth come back from buzzing a farmer and his undercarriage was peppered with 12 bore shots. The old farmer had let fly with his gun! So what we did was get some yellow “dope” and paint over the plane quickly ... before the police arrived, because they came round looking at all the kites to see if there were any gun pellets in them!”

Elizabeth Chapman of Harston was sorting through some old photographs she came across one which caught her eye. It shows the Cambridge Water Polo Team – but can you recognise any of the faces, or supply further details?

Mrs Caroline Henman of Gamlingay, now 83, writes: "I used to dance with Josephine's Gipsy Band. It was a great band. A Miss Dorothy Parcell from Orwell played in the band. She was my school mate. I also danced to the Ted Heath band. They were two great bands in those days of so long ago". June Carter recalls another band, The Stirlingaires. "I think the leader was the drummer, Len Stevenson & they played the Guildhall on Saturday nights. As a member of staff at Rose's Fashion Centre (remember that?) we went to all the dances you have written about. They also had dances at the YMCA, Alexandra St, but only records, not a band. Jean Pope of Comberton writes: "I remember being taken by my mother to tea and coffee dances at the Beaconsfield Hall in Milford Street, off Sturton Street in Cambridge. The band was called Sons Accordion Band, I wonder if any other readers remember them"

PICTURES :

Pauline Gower and Dorothy Spicer & their Spartan aircraft, 1934

Harry Bye's snap of Pauline Gower and Dorothy Spicer's plane – note the loudspeaker to give running commentaries

Cambridge Water Polo Team – a fine body of men

Memories, 10 September 1998, by Mike Petty

Many people remember the Civic Restaurant which started life as a British Restaurant in the Pitt Club, Jesus Lane, before moving to the old Post office building at the corner of Petty Cury, Cambridge. Its closure in 1972 – during the mayoralty of Jean Barker – now Baroness Trumpington, left a gap in the facilities enjoyed especially by the older Cambridge resident needing a place for an inexpensive snack in a city centre more used to catering for more affluent visitors.

This role was continued for a while by the Blackbird Club at the Unitarian Church before a Centre for the Elderly was opened in Parsons Court, beside the Corn Exchange. Here in the somewhat intimidating city centre is a friendly place where the over-sixties can be assured of a cup of tea, piece of toast or snack and – most importantly - good company, while they gather up their energy before taking the bus back home.

It was there that memories turned to a sport which it seems has united generations of youngsters – roller skating. Whilst the story of ice skating in the area has been often told the story of the wheeled version needs to be pieced together.

It seems that the modern roller skate was the invention of one James L. Plympton who opened the first rink at Newport, Rhode Island in 1866. Here in Cambridge the University and Town Roller Skating Rink opened in December 1909 in Magrath Avenue – it later became the Rink Cinema, then the Rendezvous and Rex. As a cartoon postcard in the Cambridgeshire Collection shows the sport became very popular, whole families taking part together. Several other rinks were set up, including one at the Victoria Assembly Rooms, Market Hill. There was a Cambridge Roller Skaters society and fancy dress carnivals were held in 1911 and 1912.

Then the story seems to be forgotten – or just unrecorded, until in April 1951 when roller skating restarted at the Rex Ballroom to be followed at the Corn Exchange in July 1956. It was about this time that I remember being the first person to roller-skate on Stretham school playground, though I never picked up the courage to try the roller-rink at the end of Hunstanton pier – and anyway the wheels kept coming off.

By 1970 the sport was back in fashion. The News for May that year reported how as many as 200 young people regularly crowded into the Cambridge Corn Exchange to take advantage of evening skating sessions. At 2s. (10p) skating was cheaper than the cinema and besides there was "nowhere to go on Monday" said young teenager Yvonne Stewart, while her friend Carol Casey of Newmarket Road added: "It gets packed here, but you meet lots of people". They included Karen Lewis of Akeman street and Kersti Robinson of Herschel Road who was sure that it was good for the figure and reducing weight.

Some insight into the earlier story of skating appeared in October 1970. "In the days when Elvis was king, quiffs were in fashion and the permissive society had not been discovered a roller-skating craze swept the country, like hula-hoops a few years later. Night after night, young people would do to the converted dance halls or purposely-built skating rinks and sweep gracefully around in ever-decreasing circles as Gene Vincent or Presley belted out their latest numbers". But, it went on : "A former Teddy Boy happening upon the Corn Exchange in Cambridge could be forgiven for thinking that he had returned to the scene of former glories. One more Elvis rules the roost, skaters zip across the parquet floor and chewing gum and Coke are sold in quantity"

For the most part it was youngsters showing the way, with the music loud to drown the rumble of the rollers on the wooden floor, and miniskirts and flared trousers flying in the breeze. But on Monday nights there would be a fair sprinkling of older people who acquired their skating skill in the hey-day of the sport in the 1950s. A helper said: "You get all sorts of people here. A group of fellows came in the other evening looking as though they should be in their club bar rather than a skating rink. But they got the skates and pottered round quite happily for a time. Even occasional "parades" of Rockers seem to annoy nobody and add colour to the proceedings"

Roller skating stopped at the Corn exchange in April 1982 and continued at the Kelsey Kerridge sports hall. But by then the youngsters were into skateboarding, with a skateboard park opening at Cheddars Lane in 1978, and closing the next year. Now it is roller-blades – continuing the old fascination for wheels on the heels.

So what can you add to the story of roller-skating in the area. And what was a Teddy Boy anyway? Perhaps I should ask them at the Parson's Lane centre, before that too disappears into the memory – or can you tell me?"

.....

Mrs Win Griggs of Longstanton writes with her memories: "In 1945 I started work for the Rural Food Office based in rooms at Christ's college, later a large house at the Parker Street traffic lights and later still at Dr Salisbury's vacated house opposite Robert Sayles. Then the Rural and City food offices joined up and we were then in the old post office on the corner of Petty Cury, opposite Lloyd's Bank. I remember helping to issue ration books in the Corn Exchange"

.....

Another Marshall's memory from Jack Back of Cambridge, recorded by H.Wallace Badcock. "In the real old days we had a boy called "Goss" – he was gormless. One day they had to change a wheel on a Gipsy Moth, or renew a tyre, but when they put it back Goss fitted it, but it had a castellated nut on the end and he couldn't 'split pin' it. The kite took off, and unfortunately this nut was on the side of the craft so that as the wheel went round the nut would undo. The plane got a fair way off the deck when the wheel dropped off! We had an old fire tender there, then, a real old one. One of the old boys got hold of the wheel which had dropped off and stood on the fire tender and held the wheel up to try and tell the pilot that his wheel was off ... there was no radio in those days. The pilot made a good landing though ... just as if he was making a three-point landing ... but on one wheel and tail skid. Of course when he stopped over she went. I don't know what happened to Goss over that!"

PICTURES : roller skating in the Corn Exchange, May 1970
Mayor Jean Barker at the closure of the Civic restaurant, 1972

Memories 17th September 1998, by Mike Petty

Two stories carried in the News recently have prompted memories of not-so-long ago in Cambridge.

Whenever people reminisce about the present Lion Yard area before redevelopment they remember the Lion Hotel - and the flower seller who used to sit in the doorway (I have never seen a photograph of him in action - can you help?), MacFisheries - though people remember the name but forget the smell of Billingsgate which used to hang around the alleyways off Petty Cury - and of course Heffers even though it has now been closed for 26 years.

In September 1970 over 400 people queued for the opportunity to buy bargain stock left over from their long stay in that shop and which was not considered appropriate for their new premises opposite Trinity College, opened by Lord Butler.

Now comes the announcement that the Heffer empire is up for sale. Their name has been synonymous with Cambridge bookselling for 100 years and must hold memories for many generations of Cambridge residents and students alike. Do you have stories to share – or did you pick up your bargains every week at David's bookstall on the corner of the market?

The second item was the interview with Hank Marvin of The Shadows fame who is due to return to Cambridge once more to give a concert at the Corn Exchange. In it mention was made of the earlier visits of the Shads as part of the combined pop group visits of the 1960's. Then the venue was the Regal cinema and youngsters queued to hear their favourites of the day. But how many groups do you remember seeing at the Regal. Some of course are easy - the Beatles, the Rolling Stones but you can come up with a more complete list, and what sticks in your memory of those days when reporters condemned the sounds made by the musicians but praised the audience whose screams drowned out the music they had come to hear. And is it you in his queue at the Regal?

Memories continue to arrive of another type of music – the dance bands

Pam Pettit of Cambridge remembers going to dances at the Beaconsfield Hall with her mother and grandmother. Emily Pink, their near neighbour in Abbey Road, played in Son's Accordion Band which gave an extra interest.

Mrs M. Stevenson of Cherry Hinton writes to say that her late husband, Len Stevenson, played with the "Railway Silver Prize Band" and as a semi-professional drummer with the "Melody Makers", "Cambrians" and "Stirlingaires" throughout Cambridge and at several of the American camp bases. She has photographs of several of the bandleaders, F. Lofts, B. Gordon and L. Tibbs.

Jim Laughton records his memories of an old school chum in the late 1930s named Gordon Hunt who together with "Yorky" Robinson formed the Kestrels Dance Band, who dressed resplendently in light blue satin tunics. After the war they reformed and played for many years as one of the popular "Old Time" bands.

Eddie Ramonde of St Neots writes: "Prior to joining the RAF in 1943 I shared the Hammond Organ spot with Don Lorusso at the Rex Ballroom. The band was made up of local musicians who were either waiting for their call-up paper to arrive or exempt from the forces. It was a popular band and the tea dances were the highlight – always packed to capacity. You would never have known we were halfway through Word War II. I wonder how many members of that band are still around?" I wonder if they are still playing – Eddie not plays a Yamaha Election Organ, still giving pleasure to those who remember the days when, he says, music was music.

Harry Bye of Ely can substantiate Jack Back's account of British pilots' high jinks. He writes: "I remember a Tiger Moth with a crew of two dive bombed some estate workers near Shippea Hill station on Chivers estate who were cutting cabbages. Some threw cabbages at the plane, one reached a height above the plane, fortunately the pilot was not hit. "Popeye" Lucas, the New Zealand Wellington bomber squadron leader often flew over "hedge hopping", waving to some of the workers he had met in the Plough Inn at Lakenheath the night before." He also has memories of the problems of parachutes. "In 1932 at Littleport annual show I flew in a De Havilland Gipsy Moth for 5/- just before a parachutist was killed. His harness became tangled on the rudder of the plane which caused it to crash and the pilot was severely injured." Not put off he went to one of Alan Cobham's air shows at Ely when he witnessed a parachute descent from the air during a trip in a Fox Moth which cost him 7/-. Later he flew in an Avro 504, expending another 4/- of his hard-earned cash. If you have recollections of air flights in early days of aviation I should be delighted to hear from you

Memories, 24th September 1998, by Mike Petty

Roy Coxon, one-time goalkeeper for Cambridge Town Football Club, has called to say he recognised himself in the picture of the queue of young fans for the Regal cinema pop concert in last week's "Memories". Whilst others are dressed in ankle-socks and scarves, Roy is the one in the middle with his scooter helmet and gauntlets. These were essential equipment when you were a Vespa rider in the 1960's – and especially when you were a member of the 12-strong police scooter patrol.

He had joined the police in 1950 and recognises his colleague, Jock Urquart on the right. He thinks it likely that the sergeant on the left was Tim Gedge.. The normal-looking police helmets were reinforced to give extra safety in event of accidents

Like others he used to patrol the town centre in the days before personal police radios. He was supposed to be at certain places at certain times so the Sergeant could be there to meet him. But if he were needed urgently he had to watch out for the blue flashing lights on the top of the police telephone boxes. These were sited outside Heffers in Sidney Street, near Mitcham's corner, at the Cattle Market and in Trumpington – but were there others, and did you ever have occasion to open the door and use the phone to contact the police?

Rosemary Preston of Cherry Hinton was one of those who used to queue for the pop concerts at the Regal, though, we writes: "One memory I have is of skipping technical college one afternoon with my friends and going to see a show. We got a lad to climb up a drain pipe in the passageway at the side and he came down and opened a fire exit to let us in. We ran up the circle and saw a band on stage rehearsing. We then went through to the restaurant where some of the performers were eating before getting thrown out."

Another memory she has is of a Beatles concert. "We heard nothing because of the screaming, but had a really good time just seeing them. They had the Shelford rugby club at the front of the stage to stop people trying to get onto it. The next morning my mother came to my room with a copy of the Daily Express in her hand with a photograph of me and a couple of my friends at the concert screaming. The caption was "City of learning and culture bends to the sound". The date November 27th, 1963. I still have this cutting"

She also has autographs of some of the acts, including Chris Montez, Tommy Roe. Billy Fury, Eden Kane, Dave Clarke and various others. She had Billy J. Kramer's autograph on the back of a dinner menu for the University Arms Hotel on Sunday 11th August 1963. Dinner was 15/-

Just to test the memory I print a picture of one of the stars Rosemary mentions, with a couple of fans. Can you identify anyone?

Whilst researching my "Looking Back" column I found a most interesting account in the CDN for 21st September 1948 of a radio broadcast from the Barley Mow, Histon of which I could only give a snippet in my daily column.

Various people took part in "Country Magazine" including Reg Robinson of Church Farm, Babraham "rather an old fashioned farmer" who told how he disliked the combine harvest – "I do believe in horses and stock" he said. "What grows what my farm I like to back into the land by feeding straw to cattle and treading straw into muck". Jake Smith of Willingham who had charge of the pumping station recalled how his engine pumped for 336 hours during the 1947 floods, "everything went through the pumps, including a tremendous lot of fish"

Fred Toates of Histon was the village rat and rabbit man, with wasps and hornets as a summer-time addition. "Funny things how the hornets get into all the posh houses", he ruminated. "Doctors and Parsons and such cases". Then Mrs Young Nightingale of Girton spoke of her gleaning activities, "A job you've got to like because it's very tiring. If you don't keep your back down you won't get much".

Ron Butler, a Swaffham Prior agricultural worker told how a bog oak 96 yards long was found buried where he was working and the programme was wound up by "Admiral" Ben Lee of the Royal Sovereign barge belonging to the Ely beet sugar factory. At 62 he was the oldest waterman around these parts, born on a barge and has spent his life on one. Now he was in charge of the six tugs and 84 barges of the sugar beet factory.

The broadcast disappeared into the ether & was later repeated in the General Overseas Service of the BBC. I wonder if anybody now remembers their parents taking part or whether the programme exists in some form apart from the report in the C.D.N.

Did you ever dig up a bog oak or drive a sugar-beet barge and what was "gleaning". And what about other countrywork before everything was mechanised – memories please.

Mrs Carol Reeve from 66 Brookfield Avenue, Poynton, Cheshire, has written following a "Looking Back" article in July 1923 which refers to Burwell Village College players giving a performance of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" in a clunch pit belonging to Dr Ennion. She would like to know just where this pit was and how it came to belong to Dr Octavius Ennion, who was her grandfather. Their daughter, Ruth, was her mother who married Dr Dick Gilbert and lived in Bottisham until the 1950s. Now Carol is writing up the family story. She has already discovered that Bottisham was "invaded" in turn by Austrian refugees, cockney evacuees, Army tanks, the RAF, the USAAF, the Belgians and finally Polish school boys but would welcome any assistance any readers can offer in the form of reminiscences, old photographs or cuttings.

Memories 1st October 1998, by Mike Petty

RECENT pictures featured in Memories have had readers identifying faces - some of them their own.

Diane Barnes (nee Emmines) of Elizabeth Way, Cambridge, writes : "I was most surprised when reading the News to see myself over 30 years ago! Yes, I'm the girl in the front of the queue by the Regal cinema holding the gondola basket."

These baskets were high fashion at the time recalls Jenny Brading of Brampton, for she had one too. And could have had one since as she saw one in an antiques fair a few weeks ago. The blonde girl in the front row was Bridget - but Diane forgets the surname - while to her right was Judy Gordon whose dad, Bill, played in several Cambridge bands, including the Pye Dance band. They played functions in the pavilion at the back of St Andrew's Road on the Pye playing fields.

So why were the girls there? Diane again: "If my memory is correct it was in the autumn of 1963 and were queuing not to hear the Beatles but to buy tickets for the concert. In fact I wasn't the first in the queue as my mum wouldn't let me camp overnight as many did - I was only about 12!" It was all worth while, "the concert was great - Paul was my favourite - though of course we didn't hear much 'cos we were all screaming so loudly."

Deborah Smith of Cambridge was another 60's pop picker and has posters to prove it. "My friend and I queued out all night to get tickets for the Rolling Stones, she having told her father that my father had agreed and vice versa. The police were there all night to watch over us!

Diane, however, remembers that being small was an advantage where the police were concerned for she managed to duck under their guard to get the autographs of The Small Faces.

Max Rees of Birdwood Road was there too. He writes: "Thanks for evoking memories of the concerts held at the Regal. I was very happy to see the Hollies, although we were more interested in the support act, The Small Faces, who were just superb.

"Most memorable however was the great Stevie Wonder. Other gigs I enjoyed were Amen Corner at the Dorothy Ballroom, and the Yardbirds and Spencer Davis Group. Ones I missed, but would love to have attended were Jimi Hendrix (Dorothy), The Who (Corn Exchange), Queen (Tech) & Oasis (Boat House). Also many people who went on to become Blues legends played at the Alley Club and the Red Cow in the Lion Yard area."

Earlier Max had been with his father to see Billy Fury, whose picture I featured last week along with two young fans. They have been identified as Janice Bilton (now Watkinson) of Swards End, Saffron Walden, and Peta Truscott.

Just to keep the memories flowing a little more I reproduce another group with their fans and one of Deborah's flyers for a concert in November 1964. She finishes her letter. "I love the nostalgia items about Cambridge. I wish there was a photo book covering the 40's, 50's, 60's. There is - my Images of Cambridge published by Breedon Books with the Cambridge Evening News, which covers the period 1900-2000 and has pictures of the Stones, Beatles and cheering teenagers selected from the News photographic files.

Memories 8th October 1998 by Mike Petty

MY APPEAL for memories of gleaning has brought memories from Joan Wick, of Comberton.

She remembers how she would be allowed in the cornfield once the farmer had finished harvesting and how she would hunt around in the stubble to gather heads of corn into her apron to feed to her chickens, the sharp straw stalks scratching her legs as she did so.

Ernie Papworth, of Over, explains the system in greater detail. He writes : "In Over, we had three types of gleaning -common gleaning, leaf gleaning and bean-bunning.

"Provided a shock had not been left in the field, anyone was permitted to go gleaning, but had to wait at the entrance gate until the church gleaners' bell rang at exactly 8am and again at 3.30pm, when everyone had to leave.

"The gleaning was done mostly by women, often pregnant and with young children helping them, and a baby in a pram with a bottle of cold tea with a few drops of laudanum to keep it quiet. My own grandmother was reputed to be very good at gleaning, she had to be with 11 children.

"No woman would enter the field until the bell had rung, to give everyone a fair chance. There are numerous entries in the church school records of children absent from school 'gone gleaning', and tales of arguments as the women scrambled for places.

"Leaf gleaning was done when the shocks were in the field, but only with permission of the owner, who usually gave it to near relatives and friends he could trust, for fear of tampering with the standing shocks

"Bean-bunning was done at the end of the harvest and not subject to the rules of the other gleaning, the stubble from hos (horse) beans were hand or reaper cut. These were pulled up by hand, the dirt knocked off and taken home to store in the barn for kindling, and a quick boil of a tin kettle on the old kitchen stoves.

"Over the years, the bell was eased and rules not strictly observed. After gleaning, the stubble was lifted with a horse drawn skimmer, or broad shear, then harrowed and burnt.

"Now those days of long straw, mowing round, dockey time, the old pork and large railway have long since gone and all I have left are the tales told by my father and his old mates as we sat in the low-roofed Gilbert's cottage on those winter evenings so many years ago."

Harry Bye, of Ely, writes: "When I was six, my family moved to Plantation Farm, near Newmarket. We used to go gleaning for corn for the chickens, a job we did not like. But we liked to see the horse binders, as my father worked one. In the hope of cheap dinner, scores of people with sticks would wait for rabbits to run out of the fields, away from the binders." Later, he moved to the fens and started work when he was 14.

"Working with a threshing machine was a dirty job and the young lads mostly took the job of looking after the chaff with the rats and mice running around you as the sacks of sheaves were put on to the drum. When you got to the bottom of the stack, there were always several dead rats."

He also sends me a marvellous old poem about spinning potatoes, written by a horsekeeper in the Littleport area many years ago. Farmwork apparently was not without its problems.

*At half-past five from bed I get Sometimes before I'm hardly fit
Then with my basket on my back
Up to the farmyard I do track
Get food for horses which are three
As they want food as well as me.
As I pass the pickers on their retch,
"Good morning" out of them I fetch.
Someone says their piece is long,
The argument then does get strong.
The ganger then will shout and say*

"Well step it out yourself today."

Is that really what happened? Surely there were never disagreements in the potato patch
- and what was a retch? Other poems are welcomed.
-

Meanwhile, Eric Roberts of Barnstaple, Devon, has been browsing through a box of family photographs and discovered a group taken during the 1920s in the grounds of a Cambridge college. Two of them are in fancy dress, while the ladies are holding coconuts. The only clue he has is that the lady seated on the right was his late aunt, Miss Ivy Dollman, who lived in Duxford, and was employed by Eaden Lilley. Any ideas?

Memories 15th October 1998, by Mike Petty

IN LAST week's Memories I shared recollections of gleaning. But newspapers have long been the source for ordinary people to reminisce.

John Denson remembered when, "the wife and children of the labourer gleaned immediately after the sickle; now a field must be cleared of its corn before the gleaners are allowed to enter, and even then it is a favour to glean.

"Then, besides the gleaning of wheat, they had the privilege of gleaning barley, beans and peas; now that privilege is given to the hogs of the farmer, and the poor are entirely excluded."

Things were hard in those days, but he looked back to when "there was no difficulty in getting situations in service and as young people could, by sober habits, accumulate a few pounds, they seldom married till they could begin the world with comfort.

"Now it is difficult to procure a place in service and both young men and women go to work for the farmers for from three or four shillings per week during the winter. And their earnings during the summer will very little more than maintain them.

"Thus knowing their situation cannot possibly be worse, and seeing no hope of it being made better, they marry; and I believe it will generally be found that those who have the least prospect of being able to support a family are the most eager to rush into one."

Denson was writing 170 years ago. His letters were printed in the columns of the Cambridge Chronicle newspaper and later published as A Peasant's Voice to Landowners in 1830.

Given such hardship in his village of Waterbeach, no wonder people were deserting the countryside to find work elsewhere, and just down the road there was the prospect of employment for hardworking young men and women.

For Cambridge was experiencing great prosperity. More and more people were flocking to the university and colleges were expanding their accommodation to keep pace with demand. There was also a building boom enveloping the green fields that had always surrounded the historic core.

The enclosure movement that was sweeping away the old system, with labourers having a strip in this field and a strip in that field, brought great change to the village, but in Cambridge it brought great opportunity for the builder.

Many plots of land were allocated to colleges who took time over their development, but others went to speculative builders who threw up long lines of terraced housing, intent on cashing in on the opportunities offered for a quick profit.

The Barnwell area along Newmarket Road expanded rapidly, houses growing along rural East Road, separated from the university town by the delights of the Garden of Eden, soon to be developed as Paradise Street and Adam and Eve Street.

In 1830 an Earith man, Richard Grey Baker, produced a remarkable map of Cambridge just before the Victorian age. Unlike previous maps — and many since — he did not confine himself to the town centre but surveyed the much wider area around, from Chesterton to Grantchester with a remarkable amount of detail: roads, milestones, footpaths, public houses, schools and fields are shown on one of the largest maps produced of Cambridge. Baker advertised his map in the Cambridge Chronicle, but it was expensive then, at £1.8s. plain, £1.10s. coloured, and has been virtually unobtainable ever since.

Now it has been reissued by Cambridgeshire Records Society, which has agreed to offer a special discount to News readers. By using the form on the left you can obtain your own copy of this unique map for just £6.50, a saving of £1. Copies of John Denson's A Peasant's Voice to Landowners are also available for £10.

Memories 22nd October 1998, by Mike Petty

LIKE a cinema-full of other folk last week, I watched films of the 1940s selected from the files of the East Anglian Film Archive.

The cheers which greeted every mention of the Women's Land Army was proof that memories of that institution are alive and flourishing - even if not in letters to this column. Instead, I am grateful for two regular contributors, A C Gillett from Ten Mile Bank and Harry Bye from Ely, for details of the "retch", which I mentioned in connection with a marvellous poem on potato harvesting.

Every morning in potato harvesting time the length of a field would be "stepped-up" by the ganger who would stride down the field and divide it into equal distances - called a "retch". He would mark them with a stick cut from a tree which still had the leaves on it so that it could be clearly seen.

Then, however many women who had turned up for work would have her allotted length for the day to pick the potatoes into 'cob' baskets.

A young or less able worker could have three-quarters or even half length with proportionate pay. Arguments broke out when some complained that their 'retch' was longer than her neighbours.

Those on day rate were relied upon to keep the piece rate workers going. The horseman had to keep the pickers working and faster workers would complain if a slow picker happened to hold up the "spinner" machine turning out the potatoes.

It was a thankless task. Harry did it one season and didn't like it.

An empty cart had to be available at the start of every round. This was the responsibility of the clamper - who would construct by hand the five-foot high mounds heaped about five feet high, which were strawed and covered with earth.

In a full gang, there were two at clamping, one or two drivers to take the potatoes, the horseman with spinner and two throwers-in -picking up the cobs and throwing them into the carts. It was hard, backbreaking work.

Gatekeeper's lonely job

SEVENTY years ago, Ted Austin of Over, then a lad of 11, used to cycle from Cottenham to Histon where there was a level crossing on the St Ives to Cambridge line.

Inside the small brick-built crossing keeper's hut was a Tom Payne stove, usually with a tin tea kettle singing and a solitary oil lamp for lighting. Ted remembers; "Charlie the gatekeeper was a quiet-spoken friendly man who cycled to work from his home in Milton. His was a lonely job and he always worked 12-hour shifts.

"His crossing was not protected by signals, neither had it a telephone, just one warning bell to open the gates operated from the Histon signal box. Against all regulations, Charlie allowed me to open the heavy crossing gates when the bell rang.

"This was not as easy as it looked since you had to slide the large bolt across into the socket at the exact moment the gate reached the post - otherwise the gate bounced back and you had a hard job to prevent being knocked over!

"Charlie had a vivid white scar running across his scalp. One day, he had been outside his hut waiting for the bell to open the gates for 'The Express'.

"To his horror, he heard the engine whistling as it sped through Histon station, less than half a mile away. For some reason the warning bell had not rung. Charlie rushed to open the gates but had to jump clear as the engine crashed through it

"The heavy metal bolt securing the gate flew through the air cutting a gash across his scalp - half an inch lower and I should never have had the pleasure of meeting him!"

Ted never knew Charlie's surname -do you?

Memories 29th October 1988 to find

Memories 5th November 1998, by Mike Petty

After a short interval, while cuttings from the News find their way around the country and fingers less agile than they once were pick up pens to write, memories of the Dance Band Days burst forth once more.

Jenny Bradine of Brampton writes : "I have been in touch with my mother who has moved from Cambridge in her 83rd year to live near me. Her name is Bertha Hawkes (late of Greville Road) and she has a mine of information on the dance bands of the 30s and 40s and also of the Cambridge City Brass Band.

"She recalls first starting to dance at the age of about ten with her twin sister Jessie at the Gas Works' parties on Newmarket Road. From this she graduated to dancing at Pye Radio in St Andrew's Road, where she used to work on the production line. She recalls that her real 'Big Dance' was when she visited the Dorothy. In fact she married a musician, Harold Hawkes, who used to play for the Cambridge City Brass Band at concerts at the Crystal Palace. The band made a 78 rpm record entitled Cambridge Bells in the early 1930s."

Bill Graham from Nacton, near Ipswich, used to be known as Gordon Revell and had his own dance band. Later he ventured into the pop scene, becoming the Foster Trio and then Foster Sound. He gives credit to the impresarios of the period.

Les Baker, of University Recording Studios, promoted many successful functions, including the Cambridge Dance Band championships, Cavalcades and Jazz Jamborees.

Harry Bradford was instrumental in bringing to Cambridge the very best of British dance entertainment. In due course he opened a new venture, the Embassy Ballroom, and Harry Webb became his resident band. He had, years before, played drums for Son's Accordion Band.

"I could go on and on bringing in names of bands about the 40s and 50s and 60s, such as Vin Wright's Stirlingaires with Jean Circuit, Fred Cross, Josephine's Gypsy Band, Len Tibbs and not forgetting the Riverside Jazz.

"I could also mention the Trojan work carried out by the Concert Parties, Alice Reynold's in particular, and the dancing troupes of Joan Metcalf, the King Slocombe School and the Joan Slipper School of Dancing whose troupes of babes were essential to the existence of any concert party.

"The ladies deserve more than a brief mention. They were Aileen Ross, Julie (Butler) Townsend and Audrey Payne. I could expand quite a bit more on most of the subjects but I hope this will bring back a few more memories."

One name omitted from the list was The Organ Grinders harmonica band, the most popular band around Sawston, formed in 1937 by Don Clare. Sid Robinson from Cambridge has cause to remember it well, for he is the little fellow in the front in the photo.

The band consisted of thirteen players, drums, banjo and accordion. The vocalist had a microphone for his numbers powered by an old three-valve radio set - the valves, as Bertha will remember, used to be the size of electric light bulbs.

Such apparatus needed electricity so they had to carry long lengths of wire for the sometimes very distant power supplies. Even this was no use in one hall where the only illumination was by oil lamps hanging from the ceilings.

It is not so many years that I used to have to carry one of those plugs that would adapt to round or square pins whenever I gave my slide shows. And I remember one where the only source of power was the minute three-pin socket in the church pulpit and the only way was to push the bare wires into the holes and secure them with matchsticks!

Other readers continue to spot articles in my daily Looking Back column. Sir Arthur Marshall writes from Horseheath: "I attended an 80th birthday party on Sunday - a very happy occasion - and somebody read out a cutting from your Looking Back column about the opening of Hemingford Grey Reading Room at which 'Sir Arthur Marshall spoke of the cheapness of books and newspapers'. It is an occasion I have no memory of.

Sir Arthur's memory is magnificent so I looked up the article again - to find it dated from August 1898! As he says "presumably there must have been another Sir Arthur Marshall in those days". Presumably?

Harry Bye from Ely has another titbit of information. Did you know over 100 years ago a Burnt Fen farmer named Seaber built a chapel and a pub on a piece of land near Shippea Hill station?

"At one end was the Wesleyan chapel which he called 'Heaven'. At the other end was the 'Pig and Whistle' which had more customers than the chapel and was called 'Hell'. The chapel was demolished many years ago and the pub closed, like the others in Burnt Fen. But it remained an eyesore for many years before it was mysteriously burned out about four years ago. So the story of Heaven and Hell ended."

Memories 12th November 1998, by Mike Petty

Taking advantage of a half-term break from my various lectures, we ventured to Bath, joining dozens of others on a guided tour of the Roman baths, each of us listening intently to our own personal sound guide which explained various aspects of what we were seeing.

Rut Cambridge too was a Roman town, and also had Roman baths, albeit not until July 1861. It was then that a group of university and townsmen, several of them doctors, got together to inaugurate a scheme proposed by a company which had already established baths at Oxford and Aldershot.

The Roman Baths were built the following year in Jesus Lane with an 18th-century style facade and a small Ionic portico. Inside was a swimming pool 17m (56ft) long by 6.7m (22ft) wide, which took seven hours to fill. Its 172,748 litres (38,000 gallons) of water were heated to 17 C (62F).

It was open from early morning till nine at night, with discounted prices for early and late bathing, but these were still too expensive for townsmen who could, of course, bathe in the river for nothing.

The company arranged special openings for ladies only on Tuesdays, allowed invalids in for half-price and gave free baths to members of the police. Then they targeted working men with early baths on Sunday mornings, 5am-9am, provided they supplied their own towels.

It was to no avail, and the business closed down. The building had been taken over by the University's Pitt Club by 1867.

They were apparently too expensive for townspeople and not needed by students, who, after all were only up for a few weeks at a time. Even today anybody strolling through some of the older colleges early in the morning may still spot hardy undergraduates in dressing gowns, carrying their flannels as they cross some chilly courtyard to a distant bathroom.

But Cambridge councillors were concerned that the townsfolk had a cleanliness problem. Very few people had access to a bath, certainly they were not to be found in their own houses. Baths could be taken at two hairdressers in Mill Road but these could not cope with all the demand.

Public baths had been suggested as an appropriate way to commemorate Queen Victoria's Jubilee in 1897, but nothing had come of it. Then in 1902 a meeting was called at the Guildhall, but the debate diversified into swimming baths and Turkish baths and ordinary baths became submerged.

In 1910, there were complaints that the average Cambridge builder was omitting to build bathrooms in otherwise tolerable houses, whole streets of new houses did not have a bathroom between them.

Then, in 1927, public baths were provided in a purpose-built building at the corner of Gwydir Street, off Mill Road.

They proved a most useful facility -in 1970-71 5,335 adults and 2,000 children and pensioners made use of them, the adults being charged 10p each and the others 5p. Towels and soap were provided if required.

Additional facilities such sauna baths were added but by 1975 the baths were losing £7,000 a year and the boilers, which had been second-hand when they were originally installed, were wearing out. They were closed and demolition was planned, but locals voiced opposition to the loss of the building and it was converted into a neighbourhood centre.

Did you ever make use of the Gwydir Street baths, or was it a case of using a tin bath in front of the fire - and how did you feel when you finally got a proper bath of your own in your own home?

On the trail of a brochure

VARIOUS readers have asked for assistance, some questions I can answer, others need your help.

Ted Cash has been racking his brains for the name of the sweet shop that used to be next to the Rose and Crown in Newmarket Road during the war. I believe this may have been Miss M White, just around the corner in East Road.

Does anybody remember Charles Macintosh's factory, making raincoats - I've checked street directories without results. There was the ironmongers in Market Street and a scale maker, but no factory.

Do you have a copy of Peter Turner's history of the Cambridge-Mildenhall railway line that you no longer require - if so Pam Dowhill on Cambridge 241235 would like to hear from you.

In 1947 Pye Radio launched its new radio-telephone system. The company produced a three-colour brochure, its cover headed "Urgent", pictured below, left, showing how communication between ambulances, fishing boats and railway trains was now possible. Gordon Bussey, who is writing the company history, has got one copy, but needs another in better condition. Do you have a copy to lend?

Lilian Barker from West Glamorgan is trying to find the owner of a Certificate of Merit which she found backing an old photograph of her father, Arthur George Bowd, when she reframed it. The certificate was awarded to Minnie Florence Archer for a scripture examination at Hills Road Wesleyan Chapel in 1913. Lilian writes: "The certificate is such a lovely one, I'm sure a relative would love to have it to frame. I would appreciate if you could find the owner."

• If you are interested or can help please write to me, and if you have a historical query that News readers can help with, drop me a line, too.

Memories 19th November 1998 by Mike Petty

THE Armistice commemoration last weekend has prompted various readers to share their wartime memories.

Joan Wick of Comberton lived in Shepreth during the Second World War. She writes: "I was in Shepreth Church when the Rev Sharp announced we were at war. I think that was the same day that the five chimneys of the Rhee Valley cement works were blown up. We had to go to Shepreth Village Hall to get our gas masks which we had to take everywhere with us. We had to blow into them before we put them on, otherwise the glass steamed up.

"Shepreth is a village that you can walk around the middle part. More than half of this was taken up by an army camp, and near the watercress beds was a search light battery. All the children at school had to go to nearby houses if the air raid siren sounded. Mine was Allan's Nursery next to the Congregational Chapel.

"We had a school from London evacuated in Shepreth, so they had half the school and we had the other half, with partitions in between.

"We all had to wear berets or pixie hoods to school, which were hung up with our coats. We all caught head lice, and guess who got the blame for giving them to the village children.

"We had to comb our hair over brown paper, and kill the live ones with our thumbnail. Nitty Nora, the school nurse, must have had a busy time. We never had any evacuees at home because we had some army wives billeted with us - very nice ladies they were.

"During the Battle of Britain one of my grandfather's brothers decided to come for a holiday to get away from the bombs in London. They lived in Leightonstone and used to go down the underground at night to get some sleep. Their son, Joe, cycled from London, getting to Shepreth very early on Saturday. That day we had six air raids, so early on Sunday morning he cycled back as he thought he was safer in London.

"We had quite a few bombs drop in the village. At Bassingbourn airfield there were bombers, and at Duxford and later Fowlmere, there were fighters. I was told the German bombers lightened their load to get away from the fighters."

Percy Seely from Trumpington tells me he played with the Freddy Webb Band at the Embassy Ballroom, the Gordon Revel Band and the Ken Stevens Big Band.

Ken him self is now living and working in Los Angeles and has won two Oscars for his film music scores - a fine example of a local boy made good.

In 1942, Percy formed the Ambassadors Dance Band from which evolved the 'Down Beats' which included Tim Moore and later Ken Stevens on piano. This five-piece band was basically a jazz group and played the American bases.

He adds: "I would like to play tribute to the contingent of black American servicemen musicians who were stationed at G.23 Camp on Milton Road, Cambridge, during 1943/44

"They were excellent players and often used to 'sit in' with us when we played at the Cambridge Rhythm Club above Millers Music Shop in Sidney Street They also had a very stylish big band; I wonder if any readers remember them playing at the Beacons field Hall or on Jesus Green?"

Derek Stubbings is seeking information to add to his researches into the men's Bible classes at New Street and Old Chesterton. The latter was started in 1900. Its first meeting attracted just one person but by 1914 more than 130 men and boys regularly spent their Sunday afternoons discussing the Bible - numbers that declined as they left for the carnage of the Great War.

Derek knows that the Bible class held its Jubilee Service in 1948 but would like to know more. Can you help?

Contact Derek on (01223) 525009 or write to me at the News.

Memories 26th November 1998 by Mike Petty

Among the treasured possessions of Cecil Cundle, of Cambridge, is a framed scroll.

It reads : "He whom this scroll commemorates was numbered among those who, at the call of King and Country, left all that was dear to them, endured hardness, faced danger and finally passed out of the sight of men ... giving up their own lives that others might live in freedom." It concludes: "Let those who come after see to it that his name be not forgotten."

The name lives on underneath: Pte Reginald Victor Nightingale, Suffolk Regiment. What has been forgotten is what happened to him. The family remember he volunteered from Girton and had been in France only a week when news came of his death.

While the Cambridgeshire Collection holds details of the Cambridgeshire Regiment dead, the Suffolk Regiment roll is not there. So I turned to the Internet, using one of the free machines in the collection.

I typed in "Suffolk Regiment" and chanced upon a record of the men from Swavesey who had served, together with a record of a plane crash in the village - which sent me off on one of those many diversions which is the fascination of local history. I did not find what I was looking for but had perhaps found a different Memories story.

I contacted Phil Curme from Swavesey whose website I had blundered across to ask him more details of his research. This had apparently had been encouraged by a visit to the Cambridgeshire Collection when I had shown him a marvellous file of newspaper cuttings compiled by CR Vincent, village correspondent for the Swavesey area - hundreds of pages, with indexes identifying events both happy and sad.

Phil is a member of the Western Front Association whose members ensure the memory of those who fought and lived through those war years is remembered. He consulted the Suffolk Regiment war list - available on CD-Rom -and the story became clearer.

Reginald Nightingale had been killed on May 23,1916, when his battalion had gone for a first six-day stint in the front line near Becourt Wood to accustom themselves before the Battle of the Somme, which was to take place a few weeks later. On their second night, A-Company under HW Stace had suffered severely, one section of a platoon being all but exterminated by a night-time bombardment of canisters which exploded and scattered metal balls, causing horrendous casualties. It would all, Phil said, have been kept very secret.

Now I had a date I turned to the files of the Cambridge Chronicle.

The issue of May 31, 1916 reports casualties - "the heaviest we have had to publish for some time". Although Pte Nightingale is not listed, there are details of many of his pals. They include Pte JC Hunt, licensee of the Cow and Calf public house, Pound Hill, Cambridge, hit by a large piece of shell.

Two who joined the regiment together, and died within a few hours of each other, hit by shells, were Ptes George Casey, killed outright, and Alfred Reynolds, who died of his wounds. The sister in charge of the casualty clearing station wrote to his parents in River Lane: "I am sending you a lock of his hair, which I thought you would greatly care for." Similar news was being received that Pte Alfred Potter of York Street had died of wounds while Fred Wright of Cross Street, Co vent Garden, had been wounded in both legs. Gangrene had set in and his left leg was amputated.

Next week the Chronicle had yet more sad news of that bombardment. Pte BO Woodcock of Catharine Street had been "badly hit by a shell and I am thankful to say passed away quietly and in no pain".

The parents of Cpl Bolton of Grantchester had the consolation of additional news of their son when Cpl Billings, a stretcher-bearer, called on them. He had helped to bury their son and took back with him a small token of the parents' love to be placed on the dead soldier's grave. Had Reginald Nightingale survived the bombardment he might well have perished days later in the Battle of the Somme. • You can access Phil Curme's website at <http://ourworld.compuserve.com/homepages/phil-curme>.

STAYING on things military, A Maltpress of Soham has lent a photo of the Ely contingent of the Cambridgeshire Regiment of the Territorial Army taken about 1934 which shows Walter Maltpress on the left of the back row. Who are the others, where was it taken and what was the occasion that led to the impressive array of silverware in front of them?

DON Challis would have been a lad in Foxton in the Thirties, earning extra pocket money by fetching water from the village pump for the schoolmaster and escorting Captain Martin's daughter to and from school each day.

The Captain owned and ran a very high-class cafe on the site of the present Q8 filling station in Cambridge Road, Foxton. His cafe was a model of an upper class English tea room with highly polished floors and immaculate tables with crisp linen.

He had no compunction in turning away customers who did not come up to his high standards. At exactly five to six each evening his two daughters would remove the large potted shrubs which stood guard at the entrance and shut the large gate.

At six o'clock precisely the Captain and his wife would appear at the back door, he would lock it up, kiss his wife on the cheek and they would walk arm in arm to their bungalow. The cafe closed in 1935 in advance of a bypass that has never appeared. It is now only a memory - but one brought to life by Don in a little booklet entitled Schooldays in Foxton being sold to raise money for the village church at £3 plus 40p postage, from him at 4 Caxton Lane, Foxton CB2 6SR..

Memories 3rd December 1998 by Mike Petty

Ted Austin from Over has sent in some childhood memories well worth sharing.

He writes: "Seventy years ago I was a whippersnapper aged 10. We lived in a small Cambridgeshire village where my father was the local Baptist Minister.

"Monday was universally kept as wash day -whatever the weather. Although my father was very poorly paid we had to keep up appearances so employed the services of a Mrs Few as our washerwoman.

"She was a very large lady indeed with thick powerful arms and enormous bosoms! She always dressed from head to foot in black while her apron was made from a well washed corn sack.

"On Mondays when father got up to make the early morning tea he also set light to the copper fire in the kitchen which heated approximately 10 to 15 gallons of soft rain water.

"Promptly at 8am Mrs Few arrived to start the week's washing. For this service she received half-a-crown (12.5p!) plus a very generous hot dinner.

"The washing was done mainly with scrubbing brushes in a wooden tub and with much application of Sunlight soap. This soap came in foot-long yellow rectangular bars. These bars were kept for many weeks on the scullery shelves before being used. This made the soap hard so it lasted longer.

"In those days wildlife was much more plentiful than, sadly, it is today. We boys frequently caught grass snakes.

"One weekend I caught a particularly large and beautiful specimen which I put in father's garden frame. On Monday morning I thought I would exhibit my prize capture, and took it into the scullery with its head just poking out of my fist. "Look what I've caught, Mrs Few," I said.

"Being slightly short sighted she came over and bent down close to the snake - which just at that moment decided to stick out its forked tongue several times.

"With a piercing shriek Mrs Few collapsed on the cement floor in a dead faint, and in doing so tipped the wash tub over, spilling a flood of soapy water across the scullery.

"Father came rushing in, but mother was much more concerned, that in lying prostrate, Mrs Few was exposing the full range of her underwear to father and me! Fortunately she rapidly regained consciousness and was helped into a chair.

"Upstairs in a secret drawer father always kept a bottle of brandy (strictly for medicinal purposes!) This was fetched and after two or three large glasses of the fiery liquid the good lady pronounced herself much better - though after such an experience she couldn't possibly contemplate doing any more work that day - but thought that she might, just might, be able to eat her dinner! In fact she did more than ample justice to her meal.

"She always came on foot, and eventually departed rather unsteadily - but doubtless fortified not only by the brandy but also by the extra money father had given her.

"I was despatched to the allotments at the end of our garden to release the snake - strictly forbidden to bring one on the premises again, then banished to my bedroom to reflect on the lack of understanding in adults!"

- The recent reports of the removal of an ancient avenue of trees across Christ's Pieces in Cambridge prompts memories of other tunes when trees have hit the headlines.

Dutch elm disease in the 1970s saw the loss of elms throughout the area, but there was an earlier outbreak in 1950, which particularly hit Brooklands Avenue and Trinity and St John's colleges.

At that time several giant 500-year-old trees along the Backs were removed, and although much replanting has since taken place this is one area of Cambridge that has changed dramatically over the century.

FOLLOWING a recent exploration of Samuel Pickwick's Cambridge Scrapbook at Ickleton I was approached for details of a Cambridge gunsmith who produced a pocket pistol owned by a village collector.

All that was known was the inscription "Evans, Cambridge" and the possible date about 1810. This is too early for any of the Cambridge town or county directories but does fall within the dates for which the Cambridge Chronicle newspaper has been indexed in some detail.

The News Index in the Cambridgeshire Collection records various entries for gunsmiths between 1770 and 1820, mainly referring to advertisements they placed in the paper. Thus on February 23, 1810 came the following. "To sportsmen. Evans, Gun maker, Trinity Street, Cambridge (from Mr Galley's, London,) humbly solicits the attention of the sportsmen... to his new gun manufactory, where he undertakes to make and repair all sorts of guns and pistols... for ready money".

Five years later, on August 4, 1815, Samuel Evans is now advertising a large stock of double and single-barrel guns and a quantity of patent powder flasks which prevented the flask exploding should the gun accidentally go off while being loaded.

- Do you know what became of HMS Loyal, the warship which the people of Cambridge adopted during the Second World War?

It features on the front of a November 1941 Warship Week leaflet headed "Imagine this in Cambridge", depicting German troops marching down King's Parade, the West window of King's College Chapel obscured by a swastika. Cambridgeshire communities raised huge sums of money during the war - were you involved?

At about this time T Miller, now of Orwell, was apparently in dire trouble, being "progged" outside Queens' College for not wearing his gown after dark.

In fact it was a put-up job, a propaganda photograph to be sent to Russia to encourage them to continue their struggle in the war to ensure that both they and Cambridge university students could live undisturbed in the way they chose - unless of course they transgressed the rules. The proctor was traditionally accompanied by two fleet-footed college porters known as "Bulldogs". Were you ever one, or stopped by one?

- My apologies to Percy Seeby for mistakenly transferring Ken Stevens to Los Angeles and crediting him with two Oscars for his film music scores in Memories on November 19. These achievements belong to another musical Ken - Ken Thome, pianist in the Sammy Ash band at the Rex ballroom during the war years.

- Betty Newman of Bassingbourn is the first to identify faces in the picture of Tony Blackburn at the Cambridge Co-op stores which we featured in Memories on November 20, when she spotted her father who was store manager at that time. But who were the fans?

- Meanwhile, Jean Chase of Ely has spotted her father, Herbert Armsby, as the middle soldier in the back row of last week's picture of Ely soldiers.

- It is never too late to start researching the past. Edwin Nicole of Wilburton was aged 73 when, in 1957, he set down his family history, recording what his father, onetime county court bailiff of the Isle of Ely, had told him. Edwin himself was apprenticed to a jeweller's firm in Derby but later sought the quiet life in Wilburton, where he was licensee at the Bell Inn for 30 years, also carrying on the business as timber merchant and druit grower. Perhaps you remember him.

In 1959, shortly before he died, he gathered together whatever he could find on the history of his native village in a notebook which is now the treasured possession of his granddaughter, Tracey Dalton from Toft

Memories 10th December 1998 by Mike Petty

CHRISTMAS is not always a time of happiness. For many families there is an empty space by the fireside that was not there before and stories which may have been heard so often - sometimes too often - are now sadly missed.

How often do we regret that we never captured those tales on tape or got them written down, so they could be remembered?

I have been privileged to read one such unpublished collection of memories of Winnie Maltpress of Soham - of school days, tea-party day, Sundays; of working days and sweetheart days. Winnie died last spring.

Winnie recalled wartime days in Soham: "During the war we had two cinemas. The real old one that was owned by Nick Nack Taylor was something you would never forget.

"We used to have some lovely Saturday afternoon matinees there but the cinema often had breakdowns. Then the boys would call out, Tut another shilling in the meter, Les'. The other cinema was across the road: it was called the Regent. Once I remember the air-raid went and we were not allowed out till the all-clear sounded.

"I was working in the cake shop. During the war soldiers were billeted in Soham until it was time for them to go abroad. Once we had some Polish officers billeted. They were so polite. Every time they came in the shop they used to click their heels together and salute us. It used to be embarrassing if we had a shop full of people but that was their way and it brought a smile to people's faces.

"One evening my mother and I were going to the cinema when we met one of these Polish officers. He recognised me and yes, we got the heel clicking and salute. My mother was so embarrassed. I am sure she thought all sorts of bad things about me.

"When I saw him in the shop next morning he said, 'You have a charming lady for a mother', which she thought was very nice. A day or two later, they all disappeared and that was the end of our salutes

"In June 1944 a terrible thing happened. An ammunition train blew up just outside Soham railway station. It was in the early hours of the morning and lots of homes were damaged. At the time my niece was staying, sleeping in the same room, when came an almighty bang and the bedroom ceiling came down on us. We thought we had been bombed. Not only that but most of the end of the house had been blown out. My niece and I were badly bruised, covered in lathe and plaster. We looked at each other and said, 'You've got a black face'.

"There was a funny side to it though. Dad had had a pig killed that spring and had the bacon and hams cured. They were sewn up in muslin. The sides of our stairs consisted of boards of wood and to keep the bacon and ham from prying eyes, Dad had knocked hooks in this wood and hung the joints on them. When the end of the house was blown out there hung the meat for everyone to see. I never had seen my Dad move so fast. He hid the meat somewhere but it must have been all right as we still had bacon to eat."

More action is recalled in Ely Memories, just published by the Ely Society. The reminiscences come from many periods and people: some scholars, some not - like Obed Cross who set down his memories at the turn of the century: "I kood not rite nor read till I was about twenty years of age, and then 'ad to learn my sult as I had no schoolen."

But Beryl Buckwell, now over 90, remembers more recent events At the Ely Cathedral celebrations in 1973 she found herself next to the husband of a grand Lady Mayoress in the row in front. Came the last hymn and the organ crashed out for the last verse, "Now before Him with our praises we fall", when a pigeon, obviously asleep, was shaken off its lofty perch in the roof and plopped into the Mayoress's hat. It bounced to the floor and was neatly fielded by the husband, who thrust it at Mrs Buckwell. She passed it on till it reached the end of the row. A man arrived with the collecting bag into which he pushed the pigeon and hurried to the south door to let it fly away!

Schoolday photographs are usually posed playground pictures but not so one lent by Alan Tompkins of Sawston. It shows the back of his head in the front row of a class at Newnham Croft Junior School, Grantchester Street, Cambridge, about 1946.

But who is the girl reading to the teacher - or any other children shown? His grandfather, Charlie Wallman, built up a taxi empire, including the Newnham Hire Service. They advertised in a brochure produced by the Bull Hotel in Trumping Street, where double rooms with hot and cold running water cost from 14s to 16s 6d

There was no charge for baths although you could expect to pay an extra 2s 6d if you required the fire in your bedroom to be lit of an evening. The brochure is undated but Thrussell and Sons Ltd of Sidney Street were "foot fitters". Biggs and Sons Fruiterers were at 47 Bridge street and the Electric Wiring and Repair Company would give free estimates for complete electrical installations of lighting, phones, bells, heating and power from their base at 5 Corn Exchange Street, Cambridge.

If any of this rings a bell, let me know.

Memories 17th December 1998 by Mike Petty

On Saturday the crowds packed Cambridge streets, and Ely shopkeepers reported healthy trade. Yet experts elsewhere predict that people will be spending less, worried about what the New Year might bring.

Just 25 years ago there was much more to be concerned about. In December 1973 the country was in the middle of a crisis - the gravest by far since the end of the war. Edward Heath's government was finding itself in a true winter of discontent over trades unions' reaction to its prices and incomes policy.

Power workers, miners and railwaymen had banned overtime, coal getting through to power stations was down by 40 per cent at a time when the Arab-Israeli war had cut oil production - and oil provided half the country's energy. In an effort to contain the crisis, electricity cuts were introduced and a three-day working week brought in. The New Year would see an election on the theme of 'Who governs Britain?' -which Harold Wilson's Labour Party was to win. But that was to come.

Local people coped as best they could. Stores were making valiant efforts to give the public every opportunity to do their Christmas shopping, depending heavily on emergency lighting and special security measures to beat the shoplifters on days when there was no electricity. Eaden Lilley planned to use old gas lamps which were still fitted in their shop.

Shoppers in Cambridge defied the gloom and were out in force to do their last-minute Christmas shopping. At Woolworth's in Sidney Street the manager said: "People are determined to enjoy Christmas despite the gloom and doom."

The general manager of Joshua Taylor reported that trade was about 20 per cent up compared with the previous year and Tesco, in Regent Street, was fairly busy.

Traders in Ely, Newmarket and other small towns also found business booming as the petrol shortage encouraged shoppers to stay at home - or perhaps it was the fear of shortages in the future which was encouraging shoppers to stock up more than ever.

To add to it all, the January sales were brought forward at Robert Sayle to take advantage of remaining days with electricity before the more stringent regulations came into force in the New Year

Everywhere shop workers put in extra hours during their five-day period of electricity supply, and looked forward to a rest - albeit in blackout - after Christmas.

Thousands of women planning to have a holiday hairdo were to be disappointed. Leading Cambridge hairdressers announced they had been forced to cut their bookings by almost half because of Government measures that said only five out of the last 10 days before Christmas could be worked. A spokesman for Joshua Taylor's hairdressing salon, Raymond, said, "We can do simple appointments which won't involve the use of electricity but I estimate we will have to turn about 1,000 people away."

How ironic that precisely at this time came a prediction that total disaster faced the world in about two generations since so much energy was now being burned that the temperature of the earth's atmosphere would rise by half a degree.

"This will melt the polar caps and start a runaway reaction which will raise the ocean levels to a height which will bring about disastrous flooding," said Prof Mike Pentz of the Open University, speaking in Cambridge.

A rise of 100 feet in this country would have put Cambridge well beneath the waves - all the more reason for a very good Christmas now!

HOW about a Coat-of-Arms for Christmas? Mr W J McClure from Cumbria has written:

"Some years ago, while helping to clear a house of a very good friend of mine, I found what at first appeared to be a roll of wallpaper wrapped in newspaper and was about to put it the bin, when I thought by the feel of it it was more than that

"On taking it home I discovered what I had found was a parchment, hand-written, and with the seals and stamps and signature of the gentleman mentioned, granting the bearing of arms to one Fred Crisp. I contacted the College of Arms who said it was authentic.

"However, they could not tell me who was the present user of the coat-of-arms, and since then I have been trying to find if Fred Crisp had any descendants, but with no success."

According to the grant, dated February 24, 1898, this Fred Crisp was of White House, New Southgate in the County of Middlesex, Scotland Farm, Dry Drayton, Moor Barns in Madingley and of the Manor Fliston (probably Histon), all in the county of Cambridge.

I have done some digging in the University Library and discovered that Fred Crisp was High Sheriff for Cambridgeshire and Huntingdonshire that year and had some sons, whom he named Albert Hemington (born 1878), Frederick (1884) and Stanley Searle Crisp (1887). There is also reference to a General Firth Crisp, born in 1898. Of these Albert had a son, Dudley Charles Hemington Crisp. But what then?

Mr McClure wrote that he wished to return the document to the family.

Steve Foreman of Girton can identify himself and some of the scholars at Newnham Croft School, featured last week, which he attended between 1945-1950. He writes: "Teachers Mrs Marriot, Miss Wilson; pupils John Goddard, Gill Thurston and the girl reading is, I believe, Marina Chapman (my first love aged seven), whose parents kept the Red Bull public house on Barton Road,"

Memories 24th December 1998 to find

Memories 31st December 1998 to find

Memories 1999 in one sequence

Memories 7 January 1999, by Mike Petty

"Petty Cury, may be a short, narrow street in which traffic congestion and overcrowded pavements cause considerable anxiety to the City police, the local traders and townspeople, but it epitomises the character of Cambridge". Thus wrote Erica J. Dimock when she surveyed the area as part of a series of "Down Your Street articles" in the Cambridge News of 1964

I thought it might be interesting to look back on them to see what jogs your Memories of Cambridge and its shops 35 years ago, at a time when change was then very much in the air.

The Lion Hotel, once a well-known coaching inn had been owned for the previous 25 years by members of the Barr family but by 1964 its hotel facilities had come to an end and only the bars were being kept open to attract some local custom. Nobody was sure what the future might hold as the site had just been acquired by Jack Cotton and Charles Clore in the largest single property transaction to be made in Cambridge. Various plans were being touted for redevelopment and change but Erica found "Most of the traders are very happy with the street as it is and feel the ban on cars would lead to a loss of custom. If buses were not allowed through Petty Cury they would have to make a very long detour and if neither they, nor cars, came near then people would not come either, they contend"

Erica surveyed some of the shops. Starting on the corner of Guildhall street were Dolamore, wine and spirit merchants, next door was the hairdressing, tobacconist and confectionery business of Finlay & Co, then Heffer's Bookshop which had moved to Petty Cury in 1896. Beside Heffer's was a passageway leading to a house occupied by Ellison and Co, then came the Lion Hotel, its doorway the home of a much-remembered flower-seller. Beyond came Falcon Yard and Mac Fisheries one of the few shops in the Eastern Counties which sold bulk ice for hospitals, champagne parties and other purposes.

Hunt's Dress shop on the corner of Alexandra Street dealt in the full range of women's clothing and on the opposite the alleyway was Dewhurst butchers and canned food retailers. Two men's shops, those of John Collier and Alexandre Ltd had replaced George Stace's fashion store after the second world war. Dipple and Conway was an old established firm of opticians whilst Separates catered exclusively for skirts and blouses, woollen goods and slacks as opposed to full length coats and dresses. This was run by Mr Monty Harris who complained that there were only three locally owned businesses left in Petty Cury, all the others being branches of national firms. "I think it is local firms which attract people and which have something different to offer them. Otherwise you might just as well go to Bedford or Welwyn to do your shopping. The goods will be the same anywhere in these multiple stores", he said

Further towards Sidney Street was the Civic restaurant occupying rooms which had earlier been used as the headquarters of the Air Raid Precautions and Special Constabulary. In 1964 over 1,000 good-value meals were prepared each day for eating either in the restaurant or transported to people's homes by the W.V.S. meals on wheels service. Completing the south side of the Cury was the old Post Office building which then housed the offices of the Ministry of Pensions and National Insurance and upstairs the Overseas Services Club for employees of overseas government attending courses organised specially for them in Cambridge

All of these have now gone, swept away by Lion Yard redevelopment. But what of the shops on the other side? I will return to the survey in another next week's "Memories"

Readers write :

D.J. Beynon from Haslingfield and H.G.Mansfield from Cambridge have shared their knowledge of the story of Cambridge's adopted warship, HMS Loyal. The ship was completed in October 1942, one of the first to be fitted with three power operated turrets. Immediately after work up she and her sister ship H.M.S. Lightning were in action in the Mediterranean, sinking two Italian boats. Two months later she had to rescue 181 survivors from the Lightning when an E-boat sank her. Loyal took part in the Salerno landings, firing 1714 rounds of 4.7 inch shells despite being hit in the boiler room and remained in action for a further three weeks after the damage. On 12th October 1944 she hit a mine off the west coast of Italy which caused major structural damage. Loyal saw out the war as a base ship at Malta until 1948 when it was towed to Milford Haven to be broken up. Mr Mansfield writes: "I remember that we sea cadets were involved in collecting money at various cinemas in Cambridge"

After a successful Warship Week National Savings campaign in March 1942 the people of Ely had adopted the destroyer HMS Walpole, which had been built in 1918. Already it had experienced an eventful war being damaged by a mine in October 1940 and spent several months under repair before returning to escort duty, only to hit another mine – which did not explode – in December 1941. In February 1942 the ship was sent to make torpedo attacks on the German warships Scharnhorst, Gneisenau and Prinz Eugen but developed a machinery defect and was withdrawn. On her way back to Harwich for repair it was attacked by a Wellington but survived when the "friendly" aircraft was driven off by German fighters!

After her adoption Walpole fought on being involved on Russian convoy, anti-submarine and anti-E-boat work as well as assisting in the Normandy landings. On January 6th 1945 two of her crew were killed and five seriously injured when she hit a floating mine. Disabled and listing the ship was towed into harbour, only to be declared a total loss and broken up. Ely museum records her heroic story.

Readers ask :

Dr Tony Merrifield from 2 Barton Square, Ely seeks your help in tracking down material relating to the early history of the Royal Air Force Hospital, Ely for a talk to the Ely Society. He is particularly interested in the site, farm owners and so on and would welcome any personal memories.

One of the most important buildings in Cambridge is the old University Library, beside the Senate House, which now houses the library and archives of Gonville and Caius college.

Above its entrance doorway is inscribed the word “Bibliotheca” and above that there are a number of “V” sign graffiti. Do you know how they got there? The oral tradition is that they were part of the celebrations at the end of the Second World War and certainly the VE celebrations were extensive and resulted in damage to the top of the fountain on Market Hill. But do you know for sure. If you can help please contact Miss Ellie Clewlow, archivist of Gonville and Caius college or write to me at the News

Memories, by Mike Petty 14th January 1999

Just before Christmas I featured a letter from Mr W. McClure of Barrow-in-Furness, Cumbria who had discovered a century-old parchment conferring a coat of arms on one Fred Crisp. Mr McClure was trying to discover something about this gentleman with a view to returning this most important document to the family. The citation had indicated there may have been a connection with the Dry Drayton, Madingley area.

Within a few days I received a reply from Dennis Jeeps of Willingham telling me that Fred Crisp had been born in that village. His father had been a butcher and publican and they’d lived in Church Street. Disaster had struck when the shop together with numerous other dwelling were burnt down in April 1866. Fred had left home by this time to make his fortune in London.

Following other clues supplied by Dennis I have been able to track down something of Fred Crisp's progress. His obituary in the Cambridge Independent Press of 17th November 1905 records how he left the village when aged 12 to become an apprentice in one of the large business houses in St Paul’s churchyard, London.

He began business for himself in a small way, aided initially by his uncle, Mr Thoday of Cambridge. He acquired shop after shop until he had no fewer than 26, covering more than an acre of ground and a window frontage of 650 feet. It became one of the largest emporiums in London & he became known as “the man who made the Seven Sisters Road”, gaining the reputation of being the very model of what a business man and employer should be.

But this, alas, was not the whole story, for according to issues of The Times the business hit difficulties. When Thursday early closing was introduced the shop saw a drastic fall-off of trade, yet he was criticised for not also closing early on Saturdays. In 1899 profits had fallen from £12,000 down to £3,000 and Crisp was personally offering to make up the dividend to disgruntled shareholders from his own pocket. In 1902 owing to the great strain and worry of the business he resigned as chairman and gave up his seat on the board. A new management was put in who started a wholesale restructuring of the company.

The founding father left to concentrated on his beautiful house in Southgate, Middlesex and his other pursuits. Chief amongst these was the breeding of Shire horses. He bought himself another residence, Whitehouse at Girton, acquired 4,000 acres of land in Cambridgeshire, paid 1,400 guineas for one of the best stallions of the day and won numerous awards. He diversified into Aberdeen-Angus cattle and built up one of the largest herds in the country.

With all his wealth he never forgot his home village and in 1896 gave the money for the construction of Willingham town hall with a reading room, committee rooms and accommodation for a caretaker. It was, he said be beneficial to the youth of the village who “instead of being on the street, would go to the Hall and read their papers and books”. It was soon filled with over 50 people busy at various games, chess, drafts, dominoes, ludo, bagatelle and other games and has continued to serve the village to the present day. Perhaps the grant of arms might find a home there?

But there is still a mystery – what happened to the great man himself. We know he died at his residence in 1905, aged 56 years, but Dennis believes he took his own life and that this might explain why the grant of arms was put away, as suicide was a cause of great shame at that time.

Does anybody know the area today or have a snap of Crisp's emporium in its prime

.....

Returning to the "Down your street" article on Cambridge's Petty Cury published in 1964. Starting on the north side corner with Sidney street Erica Dimock found True Form which had opened before the war, then Dunn and co which had taken over the Maypole grocery site two years earlier. J. Hepworth mens tailors had the Eros café above it which like the Waffle further along was "one of the few restaurants which remain open late at night". Familiar names like H. Samuel, Boots & Dixons "which deals in photographic equipment" are followed by Barnett Hutton women's fashions, Lyons restaurant which had arrived in 1931 and Dolcis shoe shop. Then came Eastman's butchers on the former Empire Meat Company's site, while the adjacent shop previously occupied by Kendall's the umbrella makers was then James Smith dyers and cleaners. Next door was Ken Stevens music shop where you could have your money refunded if you were not satisfied with a second-hand record you'd bought there. Peter Lord's shoe shop at no.36 had been opened by Katie Boyle the television personality three years earlier and was alongside Paige's dress shop.

She concluded, "This then is Petty Cury. A street which in character must have remained very much the same over the years and the future of which is inextricably bound up with the future re-development of the central area of Cambridge as a whole"

Your memories and snaps of the shops and area would be most welcome

READERS WRITE

Elizabeth Byers of 6707 Ellen Place, Nanaimo, British Columbia V9V 1A2, Canada is on the ancestor hunt. She is trying to track down the children of George Alfred Widdas and his wife Annie Tadcaster who married in 1900. So if you know the whereabouts of Margaret Butler, Ellen Sutton, Violet Peacock, Doris Harris or Kathleen Smith – who was living in Gwydir street, Cambridge in 1953, Elizabeth would be delighted to hear from you

Another Canadian reader is Jane Wilson from Ottawa who writes; "I enjoy reading the Cambridge Evening News and the "Memories" column, on the Internet. It certainly allows you to keep abreast of things. The other day I had a letter from a friend who used to work at the MRC on Chaucer Road, telling me about all the changes that have taken place, but as I had visited their web site a few days prior to the letter, I actually had more up-to-date information. What a topsy-turvy world!"

MEMORIES, 21st January 1999, by Mike Petty

Cambridge's Green Street, between Sidney street and Trinity street. is currently undergoing a facelift to make it more enticing to shoppers and visitors. I thought it might be interesting to look back at what Erica Dimock discovered when she surveyed the street in the Cambridge News in August 1963.

Right at the start she identified the problem planners are now trying to solve. "As the public hurries along this narrow by-way not one person can be oblivious of the congestion which mars its charm and causes one to hop on and off its insufficient pavement to skirt a hurriedly parked lorry or avoid being brushed by a passing car. For the street has been invaded by frustrated shoppers trying to find a parking place, by lorries unloading their wares and by harassed residents endeavouring to keep a clear space so that they can see out of their own front windows.”

Although Mrs F. Dench still took eight students in her five storey house most of the lodging houses which had formerly occupied the street had closed. In their place had come Trinity college hostel under resident housekeeper Mrs G. Badcock , while another opposite belonging to Caius college was run by Miss I.L. Cottrill as a private business venture, accommodating holiday makers and overseas visitors outside term time

Mr Leonard Whitehead had been cutting men’s hair in the street for more than 40 years. He remembered that when he first started, porters and waiters from nearby colleges would trundle their wicker trays along the street, delivering breakfast to their students or waiting upon them at private cocktail parties. One man who became a kind of institution in the street was Mr Freddy Fulcher, who used to stand with his coster barrow selling fruit to undergraduates. Other hairdressers were E.W. Matthews and T.E. Twinn.

One building which had changed very little was the Volunteer public house, then a popular meeting place for undergraduates with a variety of pursuits such as chess, skittles, billiards and draughts. It also had the attraction of an inter-college competition of drinking a yard of ale – the record time of 11.4 seconds being held by Sidney Sussex college

Amongst the current traders were the Eastern Gas Board occupying premises which had earlier been Stockbridge’s furniture store rooms & Ellams Duplicator company which sold officer machinery operating a comprehensive duplicating service in the days before photocopiers.

Eaden Lilley’s bedding department and wholesale grocery store occupied premises that had once been Herbert Robinson’s cycle shop. Auctioneers G.W. Haslop and the surgery of well-known doctor Rex Salisbury Woods were nearby. A.G. Almond and Bodgers, the mens clothing shops with their main frontages in Sidney street were complemented by another tailors, Strickland Sons and George who had traded from Green street for 45 years.

Probably the most famous of all establishments were the bookbinders John P. Gray and co, in their Dickensian premises, the oldest in the street. In 1919 the firm had taken over the business of another long-established binders, G.F. Stoakley to be joined later by that of Cox and Allen of St Andrew’s Hill. Erica noted: “Specialising in the restoration and repair of valuable books and manuscripts and in fine binding, it is perhaps surprising to learn in these days of ever increasing mechanisation, that everything at Gray’s is done by hand. Presentation volumes have been bound for every member of the Royal Family”

More people however would have patronised two of the other establishments. The Coffee Pot, run by Mr & Mrs A.H. Moffatt specialised in home made food and enjoyed its reputation for supplying “the best cup of coffee in Cambridge”. For those who fancied something stronger there was the recently constructed Stable Bar, “decorated to give the impression of a stable with timber and rough-cast walls, a wattle ceiling and an array of cartwheels, bridles and collars providing added authenticity”. It was as part of the Berni Inn’s “Turks Head”, which had converted the old Matthews’s restaurant into “a miscellany of chicken, ham and steak restaurants and bars”

.....
Mrs Joan Summers of Newnham writes: “I loved your piece about Petty Cury. Just as a matter of interest my father E.S. Summers had a studio over the Maypole (now Boots) and when alterations were made by Boots he moved to Alexandra Street, opposite the Y.M.C.A.. He was a heraldic artist and had a shop and studio. The buildings were pulled down in March 1971 to make way for Lion Yard”

Hazel Evans found something of interest in my “Looking Back” column article for 8th January 1899 when I mentioned her grandfather Joseph Redfarn. “His daughter, my mother, lives with me. She is 98 and intrigued about where I get your information from, do you keep all the newspapers from years back”. The back files of the “News” and its predecessor papers from the 1760s, are filed in the Cambridgeshire Collection on the third floor of the Lion Yard Library. I go through these looking for my snippets, which I copy from the microfilm of the papers. The story of Joseph extended over half a column and I have sent Hazel a fuller extract. If you see anything of interest let me know.

Mrs Judy Robinson of Lt Abington writes: “In “Looking Back” you mention by husband’s father Reg Robinson, Babraham farmer, when he was on the radio “Country Magazine”. I wondered if you could find out if in 1949 there was any mention of Arthur Askey’s programme ‘How do you do’. He went to Church Farm, Babraham and recorded the programme.” Well, writing on 12th February 1949 the “News” commented: “I thought the programme from Babraham was the best of the lot, so far. Farmer “Reg” Robinson, his family and his friends, seemed to be thoroughly enjoying themselves”. The Cambridge Independent Press added: “That cheerful little comedian, Arthur Askey, had what must be for him the unusual experience of meeting someone his own size when in farmer “Reg” Robinson’s spacious parlour in Church Farm, Babraham he met Herbert Jones, famous 68-years-old former jockey to the King, who lives at Girton. The hospitable farmer Robinson had invited a merry crowd of guests. He is himself no stranger to the microphone, having broadcast in “Country Magazine” from Histon and from London too. His lively party was relayed by landline to London, there to be recorded for transmission in the Light Programme”. Hazel would love to get a recording of the programme – can anybody help?

PICTURE :

CELLAR : The Turks head cellar bar, 1963

Nursery children : IF SPACE, OTHERWISE RETURN AND I’LL USE ANOTHER WEEK :
John Durrant has lent this picture of mothers and children at Ditton Fields Nursery school, Waddelows Road, Cambridge in 1949 : do you recognise anybody

Memories, 28 January 1999, by Mike Petty

Do you remember that severe winter of 1963 with its deep snow and severe frost, of blocked water mains and seven foot drifts – Lady Rowena Ryle does. She has sent me some papers she discovered tucked away in the study of her late husband, Novel prize-winner Prof. Sir Martin Ryle. They do not relate to any astronomical discoveries of his, but to one of her own adventures.

It was the 21st January 1963 that she and two friends, having already seen the Backs on skates, and undertaken an excursion on the ice to Grantchester, decided to make a longer expedition – from Denver Sluice to Cambridge. So they took a train to Downham Market, brought chocolate and apples, and asked their way to the lock gate

Denver sluice was clearly marked on their map, but it not some of the new channels that had been recently cut. Which was the river to Ely? Workmen pointed it out to them, doubtless wondering why two women and a man wearing climbing boots and a rope would be contemplating such a journey.

The ice looked very safe and solid. It was obviously strong enough to bear birds and animals, as their footprints testified, but would it stand the weight of people? There was only one way to find out. They tried the ice nearest the bank, for the most part it held, though some sections broke and sent them flying time after time. Some of the ice was just too slippery – “as my skates were the same ones I’d had as a child, with the edges worn away and the cross-wise surface almost rounded, it was impossible to skate just because of the marvellous surface – they simply slid horizontally with each forward stroke”.

Nothing daunted the trio continued, the ice breaking in long lines ahead of them with loud bangs like gunshot. They saw eels and fish, frozen just below the surface, slid past houses and bridges. On one a woman called a warning; “I shouldn’t go on that part of the river – it’s only been frozen two or three days”. Too late – that was the section they’d just skated.

Now however it was safe to venture into the middle where the ice was clear and the miles fell behind them. But they were still very far from Ely when they stopped for sandwiches, coffee and a chat to a workman, seeking assurance that they were indeed going the right way! On they skated, counting down the miles to Littleport, with three swans leading the way, flying overhead, then alighting and waiting for them to catch up.

By this time the effort was getting to them, her ankles aching from the strain of keeping up. “But coming into Ely was an experience I’ll never forget – the sky reddening behind, and the great cathedral high up on the rise so that it looked as if it was floating out of the flat fen land. As we came to the first bridge into Ely there were old collapsing warehouses at the foot of the cathedral that looked as ancient and medieval as any Breughel picture”.

Time was getting on, it was four o’clock. The railway station was nearby with its prospect of a comfortable end to a day’s adventure. “I knew I was tired and it would be hard, but it was too much of an experience and a challenge to stop at that point. We went on with more of urgency in our skating”. The setting sun sent great shafts of reflected-light dazzling the way ahead. Physical fatigue was more noticeable, but this seemed negligible, and the end was only a few miles away.

“The sun finally went down and there was no moon, but brilliant stars reflected in the ice. In the dark the noise of cracking ice was more ominous and we knew we had to be careful because of the increasing narrowness and speed of the river.

“By now Anne had taken the rope and gone ahead. In star-light we could see the marks of skates ahead. These were deceptively reassuring. I suddenly saw her disappear into the river. Before I could stop I had followed in behind her. I was wearing Martin’s ex-American Army sheep-skin coat, and this helped keep me up as we struggled to climb out. The ice was breaking round us, but with John lying flat and hauling we managed it. It was the coldest night of that remarkable winter and the ice was forming in plates all over us. We pulled off our skates and ran along the bank towards the lights of a house ahead of us”.

The lady who answered their knock was shocked at the sight before her – so much so that she hurried them through a cosy kitchen, where her dog basked by the hearth, to the front room and a tiny electric fire.

“We were able to phone Martin, who had the task of locating us ‘somewhere along the river bank near Waterbeach’. It was wonderful to get back home to hot soup and drinks and a bath. Only later in the middle of the night, did I wake up shaking”.

She had recounted her adventures on the way home, forgetting just one detail. Only later did her husband remember: “You never told me, when you phoned, that you’d fallen in too!”

READERS WRITE

Various readers have written in following “Memories” articles or photographs. Ted Austin of Willingham writes: “Your article triggered off a surprising number of contacts, including a Perse School fellow pupil of 72 years ago, and also my old school caretaker” Colin Hayton of Oakington spotted himself amongst the shoppers in Petty Cury, 1963.

Peter Andrews of Histon writes:

“Your weekly “Memories” are always of interest to me and they were particularly so on 14th January because I am confident that the woman in the photograph of Willingham Public Hall is my mother, Violet Andrews who died in 1968. She appears to be looking towards our house immediately opposite. The Hall is now a day Nursery called the “Buttery” and outside stands the old butter churn in which my father Bill Andrews made many tons of butter during the pre-war years. He also made many thousand Cambridge cheese which are remembered fondly by the older residents who invariably say how much they would like to have one of them now. I learnt to dance in the Hall to the strains of the “Arcadians” who were smartly attired in red shirts and black trousers. Many of the RAF members at Oakington attended and some weddings ensued

Memories, 4th February 1999, by Mike Petty

Twenty-five years ago Cambridgeshire was, like the rest of the country, suffering the impact of the winter of discontent. Yet thinking back on it I cannot remember much about it. My little cupboard at the back of the Reference Library in Wheeler Street was never particularly well-lit – and had been, I discovered, condemned in 1904 – but even there disruption must have been apparent. Perhaps we were concentrating too hard on preparing for the new Lion Yard Library, then nearing completion, or the impending local government reorganisation that would see library powers transferred from the city to the county.

Meanwhile the Cambridge city council was preparing to be wound up and a new District council waiting to take over – though before it took office the Queen had allowed it to retain the style and status of “City”.

Yet looking back through the News files the story becomes a little clearer. Council offices were adjusting their opening hours to maximise the periods when they were granted electricity, closing when darkness fell on non-power days - though St Neots were continuing almost as normal thanks to oil lamps.

Businesses were struggling to cope, bringing in generators to supplement power supplies, but the Pye group, who employed a large percentage of women, did not want to ask them to work on those Saturdays when they were allowed power, because of the inconvenience this would cause to their family commitments. Such a contrast to the present days of late and Sunday opening

One major casualty had been Christmas – or at least the Christmas lights which the Cambridge Chamber of Commerce had strung across the streets. They looked marvellous, but there was one snag – they were not allowed to turn them on. It was too much to bear so in the middle of January – and hoping no one was looking – they lit them up for just two minutes so see what they had missed

Housewives feared shortages of more than electricity. Shops were besieged in the search for toilet rolls, which were rumoured to be soon to disappear. Bread was another casualty with a Haddenham baker being forced to cut his van deliveries in half, leaving 600 people in Cottenham, Haddenham and Willingham to make alternative arrangements for their daily loaf.

Bread was one thing but local Scots had already had to endure the misery of a Hogmanay deprived of haggis. Now Burns night seemed equally at risk. Because of rail and post problems the supplies to Mr Derek Traylen's butchers shop on Newmarket road, Cambridge had been axed. His Glasgow suppliers could however send a delivery direct to Euston station. So Mr Traylen drove to London and picked up about 2 cwt of the stuff to avoid a culinary disaster.

But what did you do after tea when the television programmes closed down early to save power. Hundreds flocked to Huntingdon library where Reg Keyworth and his staff endeavoured to cope with the rush of people bored into rediscovering the joy of reading. Old people took to reading in bed, one way of keeping warm in a cold and cheerless winter

The question facing the Government was "Who governs Britain". Having been challenged by the miners Edward Heath called an election. The three Cambridge parliamentary candidates competed for the ears of shoppers in a battle of decibels in the Market Place. The Liberal, Dr Michael O'Loughlin, was coming to the end of his soap-box session when his Conservative opponent, Mr David Lane, arrived armed with a megaphone. Minutes later the Labour contingent arrived with their candidate, Mr Jim Curran. Their loudspeaker van made a tour of the Market Square booming out the socialist message and drowning everyone else. Meanwhile a late contender for the seat, a Girton undergraduate standing for the "Diggers" seemed somewhat unsure as to her policies and Clement Freud, Liberal candidate for the Isle of Ely, moved into a new house at Mepal in the middle of campaigning.

Regulations were relaxed to allow the street lights to be turned on in time for polling day. Freud, Renton, Pym and Lane were returned, the Heath government was not. Harold Wilson formed his administration and on 8th March a five-day week was resumed.

This was reported by the News – but they could not cover everything, indeed with the petrol shortage they were forced to bring back bicycles to get their reporters to the scene of the action. So what do you remember of the dismal days of the winter of discontent?

.....

Local historian Alan Brigham has been researching more of the story of Fred Crisp, the Willingham lad who made his fortune in London and established the village's Town Hall – now used by the playgroup. Despite my best endeavours there was still a mystery about his final years. You may recollect that in 1875 when just 25 years old, Fred bought a shop on the Seven Sisters Road, Islington, which he opened as a fancy drapery business. Success followed success, shop after shop was added and by 1894 he was employing 300 assistants in the busy season. Problems arose and next year the business became a limited liability company under a new management team. Costly extensions were undertaken, new departments and a marketing hall opened, but the business failed to thrive. It closed in July 1910.

Fred himself had died in 1905. According to the "Holloway Press" he left a fortune amounting on paper to nearly £96,000, but in reality he was a ruined man. He had sold his house at New Southgate which had been dismantled and the furniture removed. Crisp went there one Saturday afternoon and was seized by an apoplectic stroke. A mattress was borrowed from an adjacent pub and he was laid upon it. He died in his old bare, dismantled, drawing room.

.....

A recent story in the News about a proposed leisure park scheme for the Cambridge cattle market site on Cherry Hinton road gives me an excuse to feature a picture of this once-thriving institution which used to attract thousands of people on Bank Holiday Monday where a vast area was covered with stalls and traders held mock auctions. It was apparently a high-spirited affair. You might come home with a tea-set, a new coat or biscuit barrel. It was not unknown however for a pair of stockings to be of different sizes or a cheap shirt to have one arm a different colour from the rest. But did you visit it – or recall when the cattle market was just that, the gathering place for farmers from miles around.

Write to Mike Petty at the News

MEMORIES, 11TH February 1999. by Mike Petty

Mr H. Bye of Ely has written following my mention of Arthur Askey programme broadcast from Babraham.

“This reminds me of the 1932 and 1933 Chivers Christmas Parties. We were transported from Shippea Hill estate to the Dorothy Café in Cambridge for a tea, then to the Guildhall where the Percy Cowell band played to accompany a sing song. Then the Chivers Brothers would deliver some state of the firms profits or failures, followed by the usual, in my mind, boring speeches.

“A variety show would follow with all sorts of classical comedy or London acts. It was either in 1932 or 1933 that a bespectacled comedian came on stage in the usual actor’s evening dress. I had never heard of this man, Arthur Askey, I was more familiar with Sandy Powell. One piece I remember: he said a friend who kept a pub told him his best customer was the teetotaler. The heavy drinker upset his customers in his drunken behaviour so they would leave early. The light drinker would spend all the evening drinking half a pint. But the teetotaler would nip round the back several times a day when the pub was closed and say “A pint please”. He’d drink it quickly and was gone like a shot

“These Christmas parties ended for some reason and the last treat was a cinema show at the Central. The main film was Chivers silent film called “From Orchard to Home”. On that particular morning our special steam train from Shippea Hill arrived in Cambridge thirty minutes late. We missed some of the cowboy film but we did see Mickey Mouse, then the main Chivers film. After the show Mr Sidney Lamb, one of the directors, made a speech which in some eyes had a flavour of blasphemy. He said: “Unfortunately the Shippea Hill train arrived 30 minutes late. It says in the bible that God created all creeping things, so he must have created the London and North Eastern Railway”

C.W. Barnard of Foxton writes : “I am sure there are many elderly readers of the CEN who remember the hot mushy pea stall on the market every Saturday. It was situated where Mr Gawthrop has his meat stall today. Whether the pea stall was on the market other days, I do not know.

The stall consisted of a square tent, containing three wooden trestle tables and forms to sit on. I believe there was another square tent at the rear where the peas were served and the washing up done. Outside were two coke braziers where the mushy peas bubbled away, and where water was heated for the washing up in a large kettle.

For children there was a fairly large tea cup (minus its handle) for a penny, a small basin for 2d and a large one for 4d. I am sure too one could purchase a slice of bread and margarine for a penny. Salt, pepper and vinegar were available on the tables.

On bitterly cold days I remember how good it was to have a warm by the braziers. How many years the stall was there I have no idea. It was there in 1927 when I was eight years old; probably it was there up to the outbreak of the war, or during the thirties did the authorities consider it unhygienic or too dangerous to people walking past the braziers?"

In one of those strange co-incidences I visited Mr Barnard in between him writing the letter and my receiving it. Next day I mentioned it at a meeting at St Martin's day centre and the stall-keeper's daughter was in the audience! Do you remember it and is it the same stall shown on Midsummer Fair

Richard Badcock of Rampton writes: "As an avid fen skater I seem to recall we skated "everywhere" in 1963 but the ice wasn't particularly good because the snow had spoilt it. Nevertheless all sorts of things were achieved on skates, many of which may never been repeated during our lifetime". He then encloses a cutting from the Cambridge Independent Press of 18th January 1963 recounting an adventure in which he took part. It reads: "On Saturday there was quite a gathering of Cottenham skating enthusiasts at Twentypence bridge to skate on the Old West River. Then a party of a dozen set off for Smithy Fen engine, but soon only half were left skating in a heavy snowstorm. On reaching the engine it was decided to skate as far as Aldreth Causeway High Bridge and then forward to Willingham Flats. Eventually Earith bridge became the target and this was reached in just over one hour's skating time – a distance of 6 ¼ miles". The party decided to beat that time on the return journey and succeeded in what they believed to be a record time. As well as Richard the skaters concerned were named as Edwin Gifford, David Gilbey, Dudley Morgan, Colin Norman and the Youth Leader Mr Roy Carter, then well known locally as an athlete and school teacher – and now for his sports and injuries clinic at Cottenham.

MEMORIES, 18th February 1999, by Mike Petty

Last Thursday morning I was speaking to a class at Queen Edith's school, Cambridge. Over coffee beforehand got to talking to one of the staff about her memories. She recalled the hard winter of 1963 when they had no water for weeks, of walking to school in the snow and draping cold wet clothes around the tortoise stove to dry – a stove which the boys were responsible for keeping supplied with coal and in front of which the lady teacher aired her knowledge – and her bloomers!

We wondered what memories the youngsters would have of their earlier days, would it be of television cartoons, of football matches – or even of somebody showing slides of the 1947 floods. Only time will tell just what fragments will stick.

When Terry Staines of Ely was challenged to record his memories, he wasn't sure where to start. So he thought out a series of headings to help him. The first was smells – the smells of Ely brewery, the smell of the dray horses and of burning wood as the cooper put the rings on the barrels. There was also the burnt smell of horse hoof at Brand's smith where they watched the great shires being reshod.

Then it was fears – of going by the green when the gypsies were selling their horses, of being chased across King's school fields by Mr Bailey the groundsman. The thrills of opening the railway crossing gates for Mr Garner, the signalman or cycling to Waterbeach to watch the first Meteor jets based there just after the war.

Scares – of being trapped in the mud at the sugar beet settling ponds – and sights like the Ely cattle market when bulls, heifers, horses, pigs and every sort of animal and bird would be put up for sale. Then he thought of sounds such as the "Oyez, oyez" of the Ely town crier who would stand outside Reeder's butchers shop at the end of St John's road to call out his news and people would come from their houses to hear the announcements.

When others were stimulated they came up with other fantastic happenings. Phyllis Trevor recalls how her father, when a lad, used to go to election meetings: "they used to take sparrows and tie ribbons on their legs and let them through the school room to upset the meetings". Christine Kerswell recalled schoolday milk: "I loathed it especially as we had open fires and in the winter they stood the 1/3 pint bottles around the fireguards to warm and it was even worse, it had a skin on it and was revolting".

Many who attended Soham Grammar School will have memories of cross-country running - out of the school ground, over the railway crossing, across horse fen and onto Wicken road, and back. As Terry remembers: "Mr Thomas, a little Welshman would bike along the road waving an old bicycle tyre which he had cut in two, and if you happened to be in his way you got hit. He didn't like it but we simply jumped into the field beside the road where he couldn't reach us".

Lilian Martin went to West Row junior school in 1943. "The only thing that wasn't very good was bucket toilets in the playground, and they were grim places. At the beginning of the war an air raid shelter had been added and I remember going in there wearing a Mickey Mouse gas mask". In 1962 she moved to Soham and was horrified with what she found: "I was shocked by the poverty in some areas; there were people living in houses with dirt floors, with a sack on the floor".

Hopefully today's children will never have occasion to remember wartime – not like Maureen Scott: "Most weekends after school on Friday I would cycle to my aunt's house at Prickwillow, returning home on Sunday to get ready for school. One Thursday in February 1945 an American bomber ploughed into my aunt's bungalow, killing my little 19-month-old cousin and an evacuee sent to the country for safety. My aunt was on the danger list for weeks and had it not been for the RAF hospital in Ely she would not have survived. As it was she was in hospital for many, many months and always remained very badly crippled"

June Strawson recalls another side of life. "Death is all hurried now. You no sooner die than you're removed from your house, taken to a chapel of rest and then the church service comes later. It wasn't like that. It was all given proper reverence and the body was kept in the front room. When my mother died I just went in and looked at her every now and again. Those few days between the death and burial was eased over by the mourning. It wasn't morbid, just got you acclimatised to it. It was part of dying and part of mourning, having the person in the house"

Memories can't just be summoned on demand. They sneak out when you least expect them – stimulated, as Terry says by a smell or a sound. But they are personal to us, we don't usually share them and they disappear again. Trying to capture them for posterity is a difficult task, taking commitment and time, and the need to learn new skills.

For the last three years Cambridge University Board of Continuing Education have been undertaking a fenland oral history project as part of their programme for widening the range and number of people participating in high education. Now the results of their work are being published, with "Voices of the fens", edited by Pamela Blakeman due in the shops very shortly at about £4.50.

Brian Peck of Cambridge has needed no help with his memories of the Cambridge cattle market. "In the early 1950s us kids would go there via a mud pathway from Rustat Road. The gateman wouldn't let us in unless we were with a grown up, so we used to go and jump over the wall to watch the cattle sales. Bank Holiday Monday was a day out. The stalls were in the hundreds and people in the thousands. They stopped cattle sales on a Bank Holiday when a large bull ran amuck in the crowd after injuring itself jumping an iron fence. A cattleman roped it round the horns then tied it to a tree. Someone shouted it was getting loose so more people were injured in the rush to get away. The bull was shot on site”

Memories, 25th February 1999, by Mike Petty

Just 100 years ago Cambridge was preparing for a special exhibition in the Corn Exchange. The room had been tastefully decorated with festoons of artificial flowers hung from the arches of the roof, choice pot plants arranged and the creature comforts of visitors would be catered for by the Kardomah Tea Company.

The opening ceremony was performed by the Mayor, George Kett, though he confessed he knew little of the subject of part of the display. Certainly he was acquainted with the bicycle for it had made man independent – it was his own horse and driver in one. There had been those who had predicted that the craze for bicycles would soon pass. They had been proved wrong. The demand for cycles had stimulated manufacture, there were hundreds of different makes many of which were represented in the exhibition.

Conspicuous amongst the stands was that of F.W. Lawrence from King Street, Cambridge exhibiting his own “Belmont” machines alongside “Royal Enfield”, “Osmond” and “Star” makes. Nearby was the stand of the Humber Supply Company of Regent street with some 64 machines, including a “cut line” priced at just ten guineas, while H.J. Gray of Sidney street displayed “Marriott” machines.

But today the bicycle was being eclipsed in the public imagination by that new development – the motor car. Since the first London to Brighton run just two years earlier the car had become so common that now even the boy in the street would hardly turn his head to look at one. Indeed there were now as many styles of motor vehicles as of horse vehicles.

There in the hall were displays from the Motor Manufacturing Company from London, claiming to be the original manufacturers of motors in England, with enormous works at Coventry. They showed some of their latest, 1899, models, including a motor char-a-banc with seating for nine people who it could carry at a massive 12 miles an hour on the level at an average cost of three farthings a mile. Also on display was an Ariel quintette – a Daimler four horse-power sporting drag which had already accomplished 350 miles without a hitch.

H & G. Bedwell, of the New Town Cycle Stores were sole agents for the De Dion Bouton petroleum motor tricycle whose previously troublesome accumulator had now been replaced with new electric ignition. The new model promised acceleration from four to 25 miles an hour, with an almost instantaneous increase or decrease of speed. By attaching a dainty little carriage to the tricycle two people could travel in comfort and without exertion.

Amongst those people attracted to the display were William King and H.H. Harper. Unlike Mayor Kett they were experienced in the modern technology, indeed they had been present in the Corn Exchange a year earlier when an undergraduate drove a motor cycle round the room, in between the cycle stands. Like Messrs King and Harper that young man went on to develop his own motorised vehicles, though his name has achieved more lasting fame – for he was the Hon. C.S. Rolls.

All that was in the future. In February 1899 Mayor Kett was sure that virtually the whole of the population now aspired to “mote” and the motor car had come to stay. Over the years other Motor Shows would be held in the Corn Exchange and other young boys turn their heads to look at them. Were you one – and what do you remember.

.....

Mr D.M. Cracknell of Lt Abington writes with his memories of Tiny Spicer, of Pampisford. Tiny was small and vicious, he would bite anyone he could get near, but had no ear for music. This could not be allowed to stop a lad practising on his mouth organ, a little burst of “God Save the King” here, a few bars of a tune there, and then off before Mrs Richards came out to remonstrate with him in her thick brown rimmed glasses, slippers and apron. But there was no escaping parental retribution, and a swift clip around the ear from his mother would discourage further torment of that scruffy little dark brown mongrel dog.

But what breed was Tiny? Horry [SUBS THIS SHOULD INDEED BE HORRY – MJP] Hawes thought it was a cross between a step ladder and a doormat – but then he was always a bit of a wit, especially after a few pints in the Chequers. Like on one occasion when Bert Allan asked him how his garden was coming along. “Not too bad”, said Horry: “I’ve got some decent carrots and peas”. What are yer spuds like? “I got some as big as marbles, some as big as walnuts and a bloody lot of littleuns!”

.....

Dennis Gifford of Victoria Park, Cambridge writes : “I was very interested in your article on the 1963 winter. There is no doubt it was severe. I had just started at King’s college and I well remember having to retrieve two of our very heavy iron seats along the ice from St John’s Bridge of Sighs where they had been taken for a prank. I also remember the winter of 81-82 when we were felling the elms on the Backs when my outside thermometer went down to five degrees Fahrenheit. Our contractor had to thaw out his diesel pipes which were frozen solid with a lighter rolled up newspaper before he could grind out the stumps. We were not able to replant before March”

.....

Jim Richardson of Cherry Hinton drops a line to say: “I remember the pea stall on Cambridge market was run by a Mr Mickey Holland who lived in the Romsey Town area. This was when the market closed at 10 00’clock Saturday nights”. He goes on to ask: “Could you tell me by whom and why roads in Romsey Town were named after countries abroad – Cyprus, Suez, Natal, Madras and Hobart Road”. I believe this had something to do with the route followed by a ship en route to Australia – can you help?

Having spoken recently to a group at St Martin’s church in Suez Road, Cambridge I was delighted to receive a letter from Maurice Kidd of Chatteris with some details of St Martin’s road there. Apparently St Martin was a Roman soldier who became a Christian and ended up as Bishop of Tours in France. He is Patron Saint of soldiers, horsemen, travellers, tailors and reformed drunkards. His charity and compassion became notable, related in stories as to how he tore his robe in half, giving half to a shivering poor man. Exning church is dedicated to him.

ILLUSTRATIONS

PHOTOS OF AN EARLY CAR AND MOTORCYCLE EXHIBITION IN THE CORN EXCHANGE – NB not the one mentioned in the article

MEMORIES 4th March 1999, by Mike Petty

As we approach the end of this Millennium the county seems even more alive with people anxious to discover – or to dispose of – material relating to the history of their community.

In the former category are those investigating their past for a history or recording their present as a modern Domesday survey. They are discovering the wealth of material listed and accessible through such places as the County Record Offices at Shire Hall Cambridge or Huntingdon, libraries such as those at Lion Yard Cambridge, Saffron Walden or Haddenham and museums like the Cambridge Folk Museum or the marvellous Norris at St Ives. The results of their investigations will doubtless be manifest in a myriad of booklets, videos, oral history tapes or CD Roms. Hopefully the compilers will remember to deposit a copy of their finished projects at whichever depository they used to compile it.

At the same time there are numerous people for whom local history is no new discovery. They have been carefully collecting and recording for decades – indeed in some cases they have inherited material compiled by their fathers. Now, no longer young, they have the agony of debating what should be done with the items they have been instrumental in saving. The spectre of a bereaved family faced, with the prospect of clearing a home, electing to solve one of their problems by binning or burning the old papers is one which haunts many of them.

The ideal solution is to pass them to somebody who shares your passion – but often they are also becoming elderly and may be reluctant to accept the burden. Some might form the basis of a history display in the local church and the local schools may welcome other bits and use it to death, but the donor often wants his collection to live on after him. So one is back to the museums, record offices and libraries. Each will probably have its own storage problems and long backlogs of unrecorded accessions but that is something they have to manage – they are the professionals in the field and material in their care is there for posterity, available to everybody.

A simple little item such as a newspaper cutting lent to me by Gerry Young of Cottenham can give an insight into the problems of not so long ago. It comes from the News Chronicle of 22 June 1938

It reads : “There’s a crisis in parts of Britain. To the thousands of people involved its effects crowd out all talks of foreign war and the possibilities of war. It is to many the greatest disaster in their lives. It is the failure of the fruit crop of 1938. Early in the year there was severe frost & prolonged drought. The results are apparent now when the fruit should be ripening on the trees and in the fields”

It goes on to examine the situation in Cambridgeshire, then one of the great fruit growing areas, which normally produced a million pounds worth a year and discovered what people involved thought about it. Their reporter talked with large-scale growers and village smallholders in Cottenham. They told of exceptional losses, and of a number faced with bankruptcy. He saw for himself how crops had been wiped out over thousands of acres.

One picture shows a man, a fruit tree, and one small plumb tied with a piece of string. This was the only plumb growing in an orchard stretching across 24 acres, and this was the only way the grower could find it. Normally his crops were worth about £3000, this year he thought himself lucky if he harvested half a ton, valued at £25.

W.S. Barnes, 56, a smallholder with 5 acres paid £3.5.0 a year rent said: “I spend all my time from dawn to sunset tending my orchards. I don't expect a penny”. 72 year old Herbert Wiseman and Herbert Leete, aged 58, had planted and tended their orchards, but would get no return for their labour. Miss Winifred Roberts of Newington said “I've been out for five hours this morning and picked only 24 chips of strawberries. (A chip was a 2lb basket.) They're harder to find when they're scarce and picking takes much longer. There should be three times as many”. Mr C Chivers expected to get only 40 per cent of his normal strawberry crop and nothing at all from 12 acres of plums, apples, cherries and pears.

Cottenham had 7000 acres of fruit, and a population of 2446 dependent on fruit and flowers. Eleven years earlier the parish had leased 200 acres of land from a Cambridge college for a rental of £450. It was secured on the parish rates, but the maximum of 8d in the pound now produced only £27. The land was divided among 160 tenants who, after five difficult years had no resources to meet the debt. The village parliament talked of nothing but the disaster overtaking them.

By contrast the problems of celebrating the year 2,000 seem very minimal!

Fortunately there was a war on the horizon to provide employment for the men who Gerry remembers seeing queuing up for any farm job that might become available. Yet this is one side of local life that does not seem to have been adequately recorded. Do you remember it.

.....

John Durrant, himself researching a certain best-seller of old Cambridge pictures, lends a photograph of Ditton Fields nursery school in 1949, at a time when Ditton Fields were open countryside. Does anybody recognise the mothers or their children?

.....

With some parish councils now preparing for elections in a month or so I conclude with some lines from “Misguided missiles” by P.F. Franklin, anticipating the Cottenham election of 1958.

“Under the spreading chestnut tree some village voters stand,
They’ve seen the list of candidates, a truly motley band,
Who range from eager untried youth to really ripe old age ...”

“The voters wear a worried look, they’re really at a loss
To know just who should have their vote, made by the usual cross”

The poet then goes on to summarise the claims of each including the oldest:

“And you may think he’s far too hold, please don’t sustain this grouse,
For he has served the village well and any new recruit
Will earn our lasting gratitude, if he can follow suit”

The tragedy is that many will this year be elected unopposed – and then you’ll only have yourselves to blame if your Millennium commemorations fizzle out.

Memories, 11th March 1999, by Mike Petty

As Cambridge continues to grapple with its traffic problems so attention is focussed on the stretch of road leading from the “Four Lamps” roundabout,(where Victoria Avenue, Maids Causeway and Jesus Lane meet) towards Drummer Street. Here Emmanuel Road runs between two grassed areas, Christ’s Pieces and New Square – havens of tranquillity which seem to have been that way for centuries.

But many will, like me, remember New Square as being a most convenient car park not so very long ago. It is an area that has seen the battle of the car fought on more than one occasion.

The Square was developed by Jesus College as a spacious urban development in the 1830s, the houses overlooking a green park. Postcards from the Edwardian age show elegant ladies and gentlemen strolling across as they make their way to the historic centre. By the 1920s photographs show a truly rural area with cows grazing on grass which resembles a meadow.

But change was in the air. With the growth of the motor car came the demand for somewhere to park them. In 1925 a small piece of Christ's Pieces was taken as part of a scheme for a combined bus station and car park at Drummer Street. This caused great protest with a mass meeting lobbying the Mayor to demand that the council change its mind on the desecration of such an important open space. Nevertheless the scheme went ahead.

Within a few years the car parking problem was again acute and eyes turned this time towards the large grassy area of New Square. Opponents urged the Cambridge Daily News to take a stand but the paper commented: "Most people smile when they think of the tremendous agitation worked up against Drummer Street ... but nobody is one penny the worse. The only fault is that Drummer Street was not big enough ..."

In 1932 New Square opened as a car park and was soon packed with 188 cars. By 1950 over 43,000 vehicles a year were using it, despite the increase of other parking areas.

Park street multi-storey car park opened in 1963, Queen Anne Terrace in 1971 and Lion Yard a few years later – but still New Square continued. It was improved by the addition of a pedestrian bridge in 1966.

Then came proposals for a comprehensive redevelopment of the Kite Area, to include more provision for cars. One element of the plan was that New Square should revert to grass. Thus it was that the concrete was removed and – for the first time – nature regained ground lost to the motor car.

Now Emmanuel Road might be closed to most traffic and the traffic congestion of this part of Cambridge at least may become just a memory.

My "Memories" postbag this week has included a number of letters from readers seeking your help.

C. Winterton from Thornton Road, Cambridge, draws my attention to the 50th anniversary of the "Yangtse Incident", which became the subject of a film. The episode involved the British frigate H.M.S. Amethyst, one of a number of ships protecting British interests in China during the civil war between Communists and nationalist forces. In the confusion of the time she was shelled and badly damaged as she tried to make her way from deep inside China down to the sea. Various attempts to rescue her were made by other warships, but they were forced back by shore batteries. Amethyst was badly battered and trapped with Communist howitzers trained on her from less than a quarter of a mile away. Under a scorching summer sun life became intolerable for the 86 men left on board with temperatures below deck rising to 120 degrees. With fuel running low its captain, Lt Cdr Kerans decided to cut and run the 168 miles to safety. Her battling journey back to the sea, during which it was again repeatedly shelled, ended with the sending of a message: "Have rejoined the Fleet. No damage or casualties. God save the King".

One of the crew, a stoker, came from Cambridge. When he returned home crowds turned out to meet him from the station. Mr Winterton remembers crowds lining the whole length of Station Road. Do you remember the occasion?

.....

Mrs J. Clements of Campkin road writes following my appeal for memories of electricity. “I think it was about 1936 when a man called at our house in Blossom Street, Cambridge, and asked my mother if she would like electric light. He was doing a survey to find out if it was worth putting the cable in the street, my mother said yes. They would put the light in two rooms for 10/6, any other rooms would cost more. We just had the two rooms as money was short, but in time the while house was done. There was even more excitement when we had an electric wireless.”

.....

Norman Thompson writes from 5 Chiltern Avenue, Bedford, MK41 9EQ:

“I very much enjoy reading your “Memories” pages in the C.E.N. I now live in Bedford but make sure that I do not miss this weekly reminder of the years I spent at Haslingfield in the thirties, forties and fifties.

“My father, Norman Thompson ran his buses from Harston and the surrounding districts to Cambridge and Royston. He named the business “Harston and District Motor Company”. In 1936 he sold it to Premier Travel and became a manager.

“At present I am researching his life story and would be grateful if any of your readers have any memories of his early buses or later the wartime services of Premier Travel. Hopefully someone may have a photo showing his buses or of groups of passengers on outings in those distant days. This Cambridgeshire exile would be grateful for any help”.

.....

By contrast Miss Daphne Freeman of Sturton st, Cambridge is looking for assistance from people in the north of the area: “When I was a child, living in Hilgay, Norfolk, I remember my mother telling me about a village boy who became a famous professor. John Taylor was born on the Hundred Foot Bank in 1865 and worked on farms from seven years old to twenty. When aged 22 he decided to devote himself to Phrenology (the study of the shape and size of the head as an indication of character). He ended up with a string of letters after his name and wrote several books”. How, she asks did he make that leap from fen boy to student and what happened to him. If you can help please let me know

.....

When exploring “Pickwick’s Cambridge scrapbook” at Trumpington Local History Group the other evening I noticed they have produced an interesting array of booklets relating to their area. Amongst them is a reprint of extracts of entries from the Spalding’s Cambridge directory of 1939 which lists just who was living in which house from the Pembertons at Trumpington Hall to the college servants in Alpha Terrace. The 1939 directory was the last to list people’s occupations, giving an indication of the diverse skills then available in the area including Walter Dring plumber and hot water fitter, Benjamin Stone the farrier, Percy Robinson schoolmaster and Mrs Harvey at the General Stores. A complete file of the directories from 1864 can be consulted in Lion Yard Library but this little extract is well worth £1.50 including postage from Arthur Brookes, 46 Lantree Crescent, Trumpington CB2 2NJ

.....

Other people were grateful for any kind of accommodation. George Sewell recalls that old railway carriages provided homes for families in the days before caravan parks. As early as February 1920 the Chesterton Rural District Council had purchased two and were planning to erect another in Shelford. The “Cambridge Chronicle” published a photograph showing just how comfortable they could be. But how, George wonders, did they get them to the chosen site – presumably on the back of a lorry? Are there any still in use?

.....

As the century draws to a close a countdown to the Millennium has been erected on the front of Cambridge Guildhall. There is of course another clock at the top. Have you noticed the two figures on either side – an owl and a cockerel. Unkind people used to say they were an appropriate choice for the owl sleeps all day, and the cockerel makes a lot of noise but does little!

There were other Cambridge street sayings – King’s Parade was a most miserable place – it had shops owned by Sadd, Greef and Pain, while it was very difficult to get down Fitzroy Street because there were Gates at either end and a cart right (Cartwright) in the middle. Do you recall others?

MEMORIES, 18th March 1999, by Mike Petty

It has been a week of interesting discoveries, several of them photographic.

The first occurred when I was invited to give advice over a suitable home for some of the manuscript, printed and photograph materials collected by the late Frank & Harold Fossey of Eversden. Much of their magnificent collection of bygones have long since been deposited in the Farmland Museum at Denny Abbey, more has been auctioned off and found good homes with other collectors. But it was the unvaluable, yet invaluable, documentary sources that now concerned their executor. A morning’s sorting resulted in the delivery to the Cambridgeshire County Record Office of a box of assorted material.

Amongst the other material were a few Victorian cartes-de-visite –small photographs of forgotten faces that were so popular nearly 150 years ago. Two in particular stood out for me. They were taken by William Nichols, Cambridge’s first photographer, from his premises in St Mary’s Passage. Nobody now knows the subjects, but they are less important than the painted background in front of which they were posed which I had never seen before. It shows the scene virtually outside his door – King’s college chapel.

Another exciting find was awaiting me at the News. Robert McBeth came to Cambridge to study photography at Huntingdon Regional College, bringing with him two reminders of his grandfather, George McBeth, an Aberdonian. Of George himself we know but little. He served in the Great War, and he was a photographer. His medals have survived, as have his snapshots of family members.

But two of the glass negatives are somewhat more exciting. One appears to show Lord and Lady Baden-Powell at their home in July 1928 at a reunion of members of a camp on Brownsea Island 21 years earlier. The second is a magnificent snap of the Graf Zeppelin which was launched on 8th July 1928. This giant machine cruised at 68 mph and pioneered a direct postal service across the South Atlantic, picking up sacks of letters by rope whilst flying slowly over a lorry at one end and delivering the mail by parachute at the other. In 1934 a letter could be posted in Berlin and a reply from Santiago received within seven days. The machine was broken up in March 1940. As far as Robert knows the picture has never before been published and I am grateful for this opportunity to print it.

If you can shed more light on either Graf Zeppelin or the Baden-Powell garden party let me know and I will pass it on to Robert. If you have other reminders of the early days of Cambridge photography I should be delighted to see them.

Norman Thompson writes from 5 Chiltern Avenue, Bedford, MK41 9EQ:

“I very much enjoy reading your “Memories” pages in the C.E.N. I now live in Bedford but make sure that I do not miss this weekly reminder of the years I spent at Haslingfield in the thirties, forties and fifties.

“My father, Norman Thompson ran his buses from Harston and the surrounding districts to Cambridge and Royston. He named the business “Harston and District Motor Company”. In 1936 he sold it to Premier Travel and became a manager.

“At present I am researching his life story and would be grateful if any of your readers have any memories of his early buses or later the wartime services of Premier Travel. Hopefully someone may have a photo showing his buses or of groups of passengers on outings in those distant days. This Cambridgeshire exile would be grateful for any help”.

.....

By contrast Miss Daphne Freeman of Sturton st, Cambridge is looking for assistance from people in the north of the area: “When I was a child, living in Hilgay, Norfolk, I remember my mother telling me about a village boy who became a famous professor. John Taylor was born on the Hundred Foot Bank in 1865 and worked on farms from seven years old to twenty. When aged 22 he decided to devote himself to Phrenology (the study of the shape and size of the head as an indication of character). He ended up with a string of letters after his name and wrote several books”. How, she asks did he make that leap from fen boy to student and what happened to him. If you can help please let me know

.....

When exploring “Pickwick’s Cambridge scrapbook” at Trumpington Local History Group the other evening I noticed they have produced an interesting array of booklets relating to their area. Amongst them is a reprint of extracts of entries from the Spalding’s Cambridge directory of 1939 which lists just who was living in which house from the Pembertons at Trumpington Hall to the college servants in Alpha Terrace. The 1939 directory was the last to list people’s occupations, giving an indication of the diverse skills then available in the area including Walter Dring plumber and hot water fitter, Benjamin Stone the farrier, Percy Robinson schoolmaster and Mrs Harvey at the General Stores. A complete file of the directories from 1864 can be consulted in Lion Yard Library but this little extract is well worth £1.50 including postage from Arthur Brookes, 46 Lantree Crescent, Trumpington CB2 2NJ

.....

Other people were grateful for any kind of accommodation. George Sewell recalls that old railway carriages provided homes for families in the days before caravan parks. As early as February 1920 the Chesterton Rural District Council had purchased two and were planning to erect another in Shelford. The “Cambridge Chronicle” published a photograph showing just how comfortable they could be. But how, George wonders, did they get them to the chosen site – presumably on the back of a lorry? Are there any still in use?

.....

ILLUSTRATIONS

SCANNED : NICHOLS : one of the earliest photographs taken in Cambridge, some 150 years ago, showing the painted backdrop of King's college

GRAF ZEPPELIN & THE BADEN-POWELLS

ROBERT McBETH WITH HIS GRANDFATHER'S UNIQUE PHOTOGRAPHS

MEMORIES, 25th March 1999, by Mike Petty

It is that time of the year when adult classes are coming to the end of their current session. If they are fun and instructive to attend they are much more so to those fortunate enough to teach them. There is much to be said for the opportunity to drive home in Spring sunshine through rolling rural Huntingdonshire having enjoyed the company of a group at Alconbury chapel schoolroom on a Tuesday morning, or negotiating the twists and turns of the dark fen tracks home from Burwell on a Thursday night. Whatever members of the class learn it is nothing to what the tutor discovers from having the challenge of answering their perceptive questions.

In my case there is the added bonus of their assistance in supplying material for "Memories", even if sometimes it takes a little while to come through. Four months ago Mrs Rosslyn Kellock of Cottenham promised to look out for me a prize-winning essay that her mother had written for East Barnwell Over-60's club and now she has found it.

In it Mrs Bertha Stone recalls her schooldays in Hadstock. She writes: "I started school on Monday June 3rd 1907 the days following my fifth birthday. To reach it all children had to walk through the churchyard. The building consisted of a large room and a small one for infants. Boys and girls had separate entrances with a lobby to hang our outdoor clothes. Lighting was supplied by oil lamps. There was a head mistress (who was also the school post mistress, the Post Office being closed during school hours) and two teachers for about 100 children. Toilets were about 25 yards from the entrance and could be a very muddy approach so we avoided them if possible. The girls were all proud of their clean white pinafores which had to be boiled and starched. Our hair had to be either tied or plaited

"On the afternoon of May 27th 1913 we had a terrifying experience. The sky became very black with thunderclouds and we had a most dreadful storm. Lessons were abandoned and every one was very frightened. Teachers gathered the children at one end of the room as the hailstones smashed the windows. Everyone was crying. When at last the storm was over and we were able to go home it was a scene of desolation. Nearly every house had windows smashed and hailstones as big as eggs laid around for hours

"In winter the school was very cold, the only heating being provided by a tortoise stove which burnt coal and it was often getting bunged up with clinkers which made it difficult to get any heat or even keep a fire going at all. We would push the desks towards the centre and would march around clapping our hands and stamping our feet to get warm. When there was snow we would fill an enamel bowl and stand it on the stove for hot water. Why we did this I can't imagine as we had no washing facilities or towels for drying. It has given me much pleasure to think back on these things"

It was a privilege to be at the Headquarters of Cambridge University's Board of Continuing Education, the great Jacobean Madingley Hall, last Friday when a coachload of students gathered for a special reception. They were all dressed in their Sunday-best and had travelled from the far north of Cambridgeshire. Most were well into retirement age, and many of them were celebrating the result of their first university course ever – and looking forward to going on to gain further credits towards a degree.

The occasion was the official launch of two volumes of fenland oral history, “Fen Voices” from the Ely area and “The Light of Other Days” from Wisbech in which people from Gorefield, Friday Bridge, Manea and Bunkers Hill shared their memories of days gone past. They recall tied cottages and farmwork, make-do-and-mend, paraffin delivered by the horse-drawn grocers van and school-day memories which have lasted into old age. They all left with extra memories to treasure - of being feted by Cambridge University in the tapestry-bedecked grand saloon - as impressive in its way as the hall at Three Holes - & of the cake baked in their honour. They also took copies of their contribution to Cambridgeshire history, the books now signed by other members of their class, which, at just £4.50, will be making an appearance as many a grandchild’s Easter present

More schoolday memories were being aired last week when Lt Thetford village school was formally launched into the Twenty-first century, with the opening of its new buildings. Not so long ago it was being considered for closure and the community agonised about accepting massive new housing development as the price to pay for its retention. A year ago June Shrubbs (nee Barwick) of Lode sent me her recollections of teaching there in the bitter winter of 1946-47.

“Each day started with assembly – a hymn, a prayer and a reader. Then we would split into the two rooms for spelling and mental arithmetic plus tables. PE or drill came next. When the milk supplied to school by local farmers was declared unfit a huge paraffin stove was delivered and powdered national milk – so we had to heat water and stir the milk powder into large jugs which was very messy and time consuming. After a break we went on to do comprehension, dictation & composition and or sums.

“Most of us had sandwiches for lunch but a lot of children went home for the midday break. Afternoons were spent doing history, geography, art, poetry, music – using the wireless for singing together – and games. Reading & silent reading ended the day with a story read by the teacher and then a prayer. Once a week we opened up the library, talked to parents and collected national savings.”

One thing never changes; June remembers, “I was terrified when the Inspector called” – and last week OFSTED descended on the WEA. They never found their way to the methodist chapel at Alconbury which was a pity for – quite by coincidence – one of the class had brought in a marvellous collection of old photographs of the village that everybody was fascinated by, even an outside like me!

ILLUSTRATIONS : MEMORIES OF BYGONE LIFE IN NORTH CAMBS

blacksmith at Wisbech, 1933

Harvest cart c1926

Memories, 1st April 1999, by Mike Petty

Twenty-five years ago today – and some said it was an appropriate date, being April Fools day – local government underwent its biggest upheaval ever. Out went South Cambridgeshire Rural District Council and in came South Cambridgeshire District Council, out went Cambridge City Council and in came Cambridge City District Council and above all out went Cambridgeshire and Isle of Ely, Huntingdon and Peterborough County Councils and in came Cambridgeshire County Council – which was of course not the Cambridgeshire County Council which had existed until 1964 until it had merged with the Isle of Ely ...

Some new councils had new powers, others, like Cambridge city, lost services they had developed since before County Councils were first thought of. They also lost the advice of university councillors, who had helped to bridge the gulf that had previously existed between town and gown interests. It was all in the name of greater efficiency and public accountability. Happy birthday to them all.

One thing councils cannot change, in the short term at least, is the weather. Maureen Hardingham of Sturton Street, Cambridge was browsing through family photographs when she came across a scrap of newspaper containing a poem entitled “In Trinity” which she believes was written by her father, A. Jex who was for many years employed there. He wrote occasionally under the pen name “Ajax”:

“Oh; have you seen the crocuses
In Trinity – just where one sees
Right through the archway – where the path
Leads on beneath the tall lime trees?

Oh, spare the time to go and see
The trinity of colour there –
For through the year there will not be Another sight one-half so fair!”

But what was the date? There are few clues on the surrounding fragments of newsprint but a brief news item records the burial of Dr John Storrs, Dean of Rochester. A quick check in “Who Was Who” gives his death as 28th February 1928, making “Ajax’s” poem 71 years old – yet it is as true today as anyone who strolls along the Backs will testify.

Many other poets have praised the Backs in different seasons and times. One woman’s poem recalls how the unchanging scene will never be the same, for the young man she used to stroll it with has died in a corner of some foreign field. He was just one casualty of the Great War, one of many that enlisted and was slaughtered.

There was another side to that story. Throughout the period 1914-1918 local weekly newspapers were full of letters back from casualty clearing stations or hospitals – like the one which started at Trinity college and moved just across Queens Road. But they were also full of another side of the war – rural tribunals.

As the flow of volunteers failed to keep up with the increasing casualties so commissions were set up to adjudicate between the conflicting demands of those needing to keep some semblance of normal life at home and the demands of the war machine.

I showed a slide from a part of one page whilst speaking at Burwell recently. It reports that Pte A. Nicholls of Sutton was wounded on August 20th 1915 at the front. He received a bullet wound in his left hand, necessitating the amputation of the forefinger. Alongside is a report: “We regret to record another casualty from the firing line in the death of Percy William Nightall of Silt road, Littleport. He received a wound in the head and wrist from a bursting shell last October and after a short convalescence returned to the firing line in December last, where the young hero met his death on the battlefield on March 18th, being killed by a German sniper”

I however was emphasising some applications under the Military Services Act before the Newmarket Rural District Tribunal where farmers were appealing to be allowed to keep workers on the land. Men like 19-year-old Sidney Ashman of Soham, horsekeeper to Jesse Wake, William Hitch of Soham, hay-trusser, & Charles Adams of Chippenham. A voice from the back asked me to read another section, relating to her grandfather. “Mr James Carter, farmer and lime burner, Burwell, applied for two sons, Arthur (24) and Edward (28). He said he had brought up a family of thirteen and had four sons serving in the army, while another one had been rejected”. The chairman of the tribunal told him he could not keep them both – one had to go. The agony of that choice must have been enormous. The co-incidence that of all the pages I should have shown that one was even more remarkable. The story itself appeared in the Ely Standard on 7th April 1916, and like other such news in that paper right through the First War has been indexed and recorded in the Cambridgeshire Collection, Lion Yard Library, Cambridge.

There is however one mystery yet to be solved. Amongst the 400,000 or more pictures they have there is one showing Trinity Hall bumping Caius in 1892. Nothing unusual about that except they are shown rowing along King’s Parade with hansom cab drivers looking on. My indexes have no reference to a flood in 1892 – can you assist?

Meanwhile Mrs P. Anderson of Cherry Hinton Road writes: “I always enjoy reading ‘Memories’, being an old original ‘Cambridge citizen’. Do you remember how we once used to say that in Cambridge you could get milk from Bulls and ink from Heffers”. Come on – who are you trying to fool?

ILLUSTRATIONS

THE PICTURE OF THE ROWING RACE HAS BEEN COPIED BY PHOTOGRAPHIC. IT WAS IN FACT A SPOOF PICTURE, PUBLISHED AS A SUPPLEMENT TO “THE GRUNTER” BUT IS PERHAPS APPROPRIATE TO USE ON APRIL 1st

BULLS WERE DAIRYMEN – I WILL TRY AND FIND DISPLAY ARTICLE FOR THEM

CATHARINE STREET OUTING, August 12th 1955. This shows an outing to Wicksteed Park organised by the Catharine Street Social Club, Cambridge . The officers were Mr E. Norden (chairman), D. Hobbs (secretary) and E. Charge (treasurer) PLEASE RETURN TO ME IF NOT USED AND I WILL KEEP IT IN MY FILES FOR ANOTHER DAY

OTHER PICS AS ENCLOSED

Memories, by Mike Petty 8th April 1999

My photograph of “Trinity Hall bumping Caius in the floods of 1892” seems to have fooled few people. Perhaps it was the fact that it was published on April 1st! Everybody is now just too aware how easy it is for pictures to be faked nowadays by computer wizardry.

But the bumping picture was not faked by the technicians at the News. There truly is a picture in the Cambridgeshire Collection. Underneath is the claim that it was published in the May Week supplement, 1920, to “The Grunter”. “Grunter” is obviously a parody of “Granta”, the humorous undergraduate magazine that ran from Victorian times, but just who produced the photograph, obviously by melding together two separate images, is unsure.

Such faking of pictures is nothing new. The photographers of the 1930s, like Briscoe Snelson, were adept at combining a landscape taken on one day with a cloudscape taken on another, whilst Ramsey and Muspratt and their predecessor photographers employed skilled assistants to retouch and remove blemishes from portraits.

One of the earliest instances of manipulating the image by Cambridge photographers dates back to 1889. One would expect a picture taken in the centre of the historic – unchanging – town of Cambridge to have changed very little in such a short period of time. When I first show it people are puzzled, but soon they recognise Joshua Taylor’s premises on the corner of Market Street and Sidney Street. Except that it isn’t there at all.

As you can see by comparing it with a more recent photograph it is a view across the front of the Guildhall, looking down Petty Cury – and everything has changed completely. The shop on the left corner was replaced by Hallack and Bond’s grocery store, and is now Burtons, the buildings on the right were replaced by the Guildhall in 1938 and the whole south side of Petty Cury in the distance disappeared some thirty years after that for Lion Yard.

Even the traffic congestion has gone – no more vehicles blocking the streets or fighting their way past pedestrians. But here come the fakery. When the old photograph was reissued by the Victorians as a postcard they coloured in the buildings but they also painted over some of the people in the foreground, creating an impression of a much less congested town.

.....

I have recently been lent a document which nobody would have believed had I reported it last week.

It is an Indenture, properly drawn up, stamped and sealed, made 16th January 1926 Between Albert Gabriel Warboys of West Street, Comberton, builder of bungalows and mansions of the one part, and Sarah Ann Wells of Welwyn in the county of Hertford, judge of coddlin, pippins and russetts & inspector of Woolworths, Selfridges Bargain Basement and other places of entertainment.

It “Witnesseth that the consideration of the natural love and affection for the aforesaid lady, the said Albert Worboys doth hereby assign and give unto the said Sarah Wells All and singular his whole heart which being pierced in the year Anno Domini one thousand nine hundred and twenty three doth need a woman’s kindly sympathy and affection to guard it ... moreover the said Albert Worboys doth journey abroad to wit Hodges of Hitchin to purchase one circular gold band to ward off all intruders and doth also journey to Charles Wayres in the County of London to purchase on Mongoleon wolf fur to protect the said lady from the inclement Comberton climate ...”

The whole document was signed, sealed and delivered by 27 people, including H.E. Reynolds, M.G. Taylor, H.H.P. Thulbourne and S. Goode. It is a fascinating and very personal piece of somebody’s family history.

.....

Ralph Crawley of Cambridge contacted me following my mention of Hadstock schooldays, a couple of week ago. He was born in the village in 1911 and also attended the school when it was kept by Miss Salmon. His family used to run a thrashing tackle set and one day a policeman came into the yard which they were repairing the machine and put a paper parcel on the wheel. It contained the body of a new-born baby which had been thrown out of a train between Linton and Bartlow and picked up beside the line. They were told to take it up to the churchyard and bury it. As the hole was being dug the Rector came out to ask what was going on – and when told he did not believe it. He cut the string around the parcel and the baby fell out. Immediately he went into the church, came back dressed in his robes and said a prayer over the body.

Mrs Boyce of Cherry Hinton also writes with regard to a graveyard. “During the 1960s and again in the 1980s I took my dogs around the grounds of Fulbourn Hospital, where there was a small cemetery plot which backed onto the railway line. The cemetery was consecrated in 1860, the paupers were buried two to a grave and the ground was in use until 1955. There were also stones for staff members, one of which was for the matron who died in either 1952 or 1955. I recall that when I used to walk along there about 1983 the remains of the chapel had been removed & only a commemorative slab remained. The stone for the matron was leaning against the wall near the railway line. I regret that I am not now able to walk to see for myself if the plot is still kept separate”. Can anybody tell here whether it is still there – write to me and I’ll pass the letters on.

MEMORIES, 15th April 1999, by Mike Petty

I have been spending some considerable time recently scouring through the photos files at the News in preparation for an exciting new book on Cambridge to be available in the Autumn.

“Memory Lane, Cambridge” will be just that – a selection of pictures of how Cambridge used to be between 20-40 years ago, with just a little glance before then. In a folder heading “Signs” I came across a picture of the front of a newspaper shop belonging to Loker and Company. I’m pretty sure I know where it was – East Road, but can anybody confirm it for me. And while you’re working that out, how about trying to put a date on it. There are a number of clues on the billboards to set you thinking.

The “Street Vendors” file came up with a picture of the last hand push milk cart to be used in Cambridge, renovated in 1985 by Stephen Harris. It originally belonged to Edward Goodrum of Hemingford Road about 1923. Do you remember seeing it in action. In our village the milk used to be delivered by a horse-drawn milk float, which was an excellent idea because the horse gently wandered down the road, keeping up with the milkman as he moved from house to house. And what other vendors, rag-and-bone men, scissors-grinders etc do you recall

Whilst on the subject of milkmen, Margaret French of Stapleford, tells me she remembered Bull's Dairy. She writes: “As a child I lived near, in Norwich street, and had a friend who lived in a flat above the dairy. There were cowsheds at the back of the dairy, in Russell street, and the cows would be on Coe Fen in the summer for grazing. I remember seeing a cow give birth to a calf in the cowsheds. We also used to play on the sacks and straw in the loft above the stalls. We were interrupted in the middle of our sherbet dips by Mr Bull poking his head through the hatch and wanting to know what we thought be were doing! Our pleasures were simple, but such fun to look back on.”

Another twist to the “Milk from Bulls” comes from Mike Tebbit of Ely. He writes: “In 1957 I left agricultural college and joined my grandfather, Frank Oswald Tebbit, at Glebe Farm, Trumpington. He had another farm at Hauxton. At each farm we had two cowmen and about fifty cows. We had our own bottled milk supply business, in particular in Trumpington, Gt Shelford and Cambridge. I remember Bull's Dairies as our biggest local rivals. They had a fantastic motto which was: “You can whip our cream but you can't beat our milk”. The Tebbit motto was “T.T.T.”, short for Tebbit's Tuberculin Tested”. We sold our milk round business in about 1957 to Woolards Lane Dairies in Gt Shelford and continued to supply them with milk in bulk. Our roundsmen & women, bottles, bottling plant all went to them.”

And just when I thought the story could not get more complicated comes a letter from a lady in Upper Gwydir Street, Cambridge. "Yes I remember 'Milk from Bulls', in fact my late husband Percy Cream delivered it around Trumpington and Grantchester for several years from 1928. The cow-sheds were in a yard next to the "Coach and Horses", opposite Alpha Terrace. The cows were taken to and fetched from a meadow between the river and Grantchester mill. After milking the milk was poured from a rather primitive 'cooler', it was then put into a churn and taken to customers in a pony driven cart. Customers used a jug, and milk was measured with measuring cans that hung inside the churn. Later of course they had to use bottles. My husband, "Phil" as he was known, will be remembered standing in the cart and driving back to the yard after finishing his round, as if in a chariot. He was also called 'Creamy' before anyone in the village knew his name". So Creamy delivered Bull's milk – thank you Margaret Cream.

More recent memories come in a newspaper cutting from the C.D.N of 28th September 1960 reporting concerns about the jive sessions at the British Legion Hall in Cherry Hinton. These were very popular, with groups like The Tornadoes (not the 'Telstar' one – this was an earlier Cambridge version) attracting teenagers from the surrounding villages, an evening when youths and their girl friends arrived to let off steam in an energetic manner. There were no complaints about the music, there was no drugs or drunkenness – it was soft drinks only at the bar. No, the complaints were about the noise made by the motorcycles which kept children awake at night, roaring up and down the lane as late as 10.30 p.m!

The article was accompanied by a number of photographs which I have yet to find in the News files – and this is something that you can help us with. If you have a favourite Cambridge Daily News photograph amongst your family files that would evoke memories for somebody else, and are willing to lend it to me for consideration for the book, I should love to see it. Please put your name and address on the back, jot me down some notes for a caption, and sent it to me at the News. We will take a copy and post it back to you. Together we can make "Memory Lane, Cambridge" truly a book about Cambridge by Cambridge people.

Oh yes, the Loker shop picture has a date on the back. It was taken on 16th November 1965

MEMORIES, 22nd April 1999, by Mike Petty

Many thanks to everybody who responded last week to my picture of Loker's newsagents shop on East Road. Writing in the News in June 1963 Erica Dimock reported: "It is 100 years since Mr Frederick Loker first started a newsagents business in East Road, a business which is still being run by members of his family - two of his grandsons, Mr Denis Brown and Mr D.J. Oakman. But although Loker and Co, wholesale and retail newsagents are known far and wide in the trade, older people will also recall the humbugs, rock and other sweets which used to be made on the premises by Mr Loker's wife and other helpers".

Mrs Lucas looked it up for me in an old edition of Spalding's Directory, Roger Birch tells me his father sold papers there for many years, John Josling shopped there as a boy. Ted Cash, Jimmy Easton and Mrs J. Jenner of Bourn have contributed some excellent reminiscences both of the shop and the area, which I will try to include in the forthcoming "Memory Lane, Cambridge" book, due out in the Autumn. Ron Smith from Gt Abington writes: "I have waited outside for the delivery of the Cambridge Daily News, as it was in those days. The van would pull up with the papers hot from being printed in St Andrews Street and hand them to me to take into the shop. You may ask why a nine year old boy was there every day. Mr Bilton the butcher in Burleigh Street gave me 2d - a penny for the paper and one for myself for fetching it. It was a lot of money in those days, one whole penny!"

Reg Oakman of Cambridge tells me his mother was a daughter of the original Mr Loker. Not only was it a flourishing newsagency but also a successful sweetshop. The bicycle incidently belonged to his cousin, Frank Brown. Barry Moore knew it well as he often visited his grandparents in James street - and also remembered Goodrum's milk cart.

Whilst mentioning Goodrum's cart I have a letter from Graham Smith - its restorer - to say it is now in Sutton Windmill and Broads Museum, near Stalham in Norfolk. Terence Sweeney from Lichfield Road tells me that two streets away from Goodrum's was another dairy, that of C & A Pearson of Thoday Street. They delivered milk by handcart into the 1950's. Bob Nicholas of Milton Road recalls that the Alsop Brothers from Garlic Road dairy also had a hard-cart well into the fifties - or was it electrically driven?

Tom Ponder from Trumpington recalls Bull's bull, Tom. They both lived in Russell Street. Tom's house backed on to the dairies, which had a pasteurising section where churns and bottles were filled, and a large dung heap. A cowshed opposite housed about 12 cows and Tom, the bull. Each morning the cows went to Coe Fen. As a twelve-year old Tom and a dog took them two at a time. He fetched them back again at 3pm for milking. He writes: "The bull was kept to sire the cows as necessary, and it and the cow made love in a part of the yard. Sometimes the bull broke loose at night and we had to go to Hills Road to knock up Stuart Bull and three or four men with pitchforks were needed to get the bull back into his lock up". Tom - the writer - worked for the firm for some months. His day started at 6am when he got the horse and cart ready, loaded and delivered the milk, before he unloaded the cart, booked up his accounts and got the milk ready for next day, finishing after 4pm. It was a seven-day-a-week job, though he got some time off on 23rd March 1946 when he finished work at 12 noon - to get married two hours later

Keeping on the milk theme let me try you on another picture from the "News" files. This one is dated 13th September 1963 and shows a building labelled "London Co-operative Society, Cambridge Creamery". Can you place it, & share your recollections of it please.

I have had less success so far in locating early 1960's pop pictures, but did come across a photograph labelled "Ted's Party", which is undated. The cake being held seems to be inscribed "Happy 26th from Shirley". Does this mean anything or can you recognise yourself or a friend. It might have been taken in the Saffron Walden area. Please write to me at the News with any memories of the "Teddy Boy" years

If, while sorting through your pictures, you come across anything of interest relating to Histon and Impington then Eleanor Whitehead of 21 Cottenham Road, Histon, CB4 9ES, would be pleased to see them. The Village Society are in process of producing a Millennium Book and would like to hear memories of anybody who went on the 1952 Chivers seaside outing, or who used to play cricket for the Histon team before the war, since they are trying to put names to faces.

One lady who has not waited until the Millennium to publish another volume of her memories is Beatrice Stevens from Stretham. Her family, the Acreds, have long been connected with the Methodist church throughout the area. She tells tales of the problems of ministering to rural communities - like when the borrowed pony refused to pull the preacher's cart up the hill into Coveney and had to be left beside the road, or the time when George Richardson and Ely butcher Arthur Lemmon were unceremoniously dumped in a ditch near Littleport by another ill-behaved mule. Fortunately it was a dry ditch and the only harm they suffered was a scattering of grass on their dark Sunday suits, though such an incident would surely almost be enough to make a Methodist swear! Her fascinating "A family memoir" costs just £2.50 or with her earlier "Feast of Memories" at £5 the two (plus 50p each postage). I'm always pleased to learn of such publications that might be of interested to "Memories" readers.

Mr G. Stelmaszyk of Cambridge has set me a puzzle I am having some problems solving. He recalls a story from between 1945 and 1947 of a case of black-marketeering by long-distance lorry drivers. The ringleader kept a "little black book" recording all the transactions. Scotland Yard was aware of what was going on and, to trap the lorry driver, put a female detective on the case. Her job was to hitch lifts on as many long-distance lorries as possible. On one trip she found her man, but he murdered her and dumped her body. Following most lengthy investigations a lorry driver from Wisbech was convicted and hanged. It's all a long time ago, but does anybody recall it.

MEMORIES, 29th April 1999

More milkman memories have been received in my pigeonhole.

Mrs Peggy Brutnell of Howard Road, Cambridge writes: "Your Memories page brought many memories flooding back to me about dairies, cows etc. I was born in 1921 & lived in New Street all my childhood life in a house where my Granddad, Bob Beamiss (nickname Far) who worked for Arnold's Dairies, rose at 4.30 in the morning to milk the cows which were housed in a cowshed opposite the dairy part in Abbey Street. A bit later he drove them every day along Newmarket road & down Auckland road onto the common where they stayed until 4 o'clock & were fetched home again. [Cows being driven down Newmarket road! Does anybody have a photo please]

"I had three uncles – Bill & Cyril Crook and Arthur Beamiss - who also worked at the dairy, delivering milk. I remember being taken when I was a youngster in my uncle's pony & trap, sitting on a little seat beside the huge churn of milk & watching him skilfully tip a pint into the customer's own jug. In the late afternoon they would come home, wash and change and drive to the railway station with churns of milk and pick up the empty churns for cleaning out and using the next day. That was my granddad's job as well, and every night he would have churns to mend, which were soldered, and he did that in front of the fire in the living room – didn't that please my mother – solder all over her mat!"

John Towler of Haslingfield used to live in Cam Road, Cambridge, (now Elizabeth Way), just opposite the dairy run then by Mr & Mrs Clarke who delivered milk locally. There were cowsheds behind the Cam Road premises where the cows were housed for the winter & during spring and summer months they grazed on land close to the river at the end of Fen Road, Chesterton. Mr Gazeley of Catherine street recalls Mr Biggs delivering milk with a churn on a pushcart in 1940-41, David Sharpe of Darwin Drive tells me his father worked both for Bulls and Goodrum's dairies where he drove a de luxe milk float with car type wheels and hubcaps, chrome handrails & a lovely padded seat.

Barbara Rooney of Chesterton recalls that a Mr Holm used to deliver milk to her gran in Covent Garden. He came with a small hand cart and poured her milk into a jug which gran then covered with a lace cover with beads at each corner to keep it clean. She also recalls a gypsy lady who called with a big basket of ribbon and lace and an Indian lady who made and sold perfume on Cambridge market

Mr R. Thompson of Gt Eastern Street, Cambridge has sent me a wonderful letter packed with memories which answers some of the points I have raised in earlier articles. They includes the old railway carriages, used as homes. He writes: "In 1923 my father bought one to live in. It was brought to Harston station on a truck and transferred to a big trailer and pulled by traction engine to the site. In 1944 he had the electric put on and later moved out and used it as a grain store. There was another carriage came at the same time. I think Mr Sutton lived in it between Harston and Newton. Dad said it cost more to transport it than the price of the carriage”

He also recalls other itinerant traders – the tinker who came round the village who was a scissors grinder, knife sharpener and pot repairer. There was an old tramp with a can begging for hot water for tea and a man who came to the door selling bottles of peppermint essence which you diluted with water. Then there was another man who came round buying snakes, toads, frogs or rats – what did he do with them? Whilst on the subject of animals Mr Thompson also recalls cycling from Harston to Cambridge Midsummer common to see somebody showing a big whale on a trailer. It had a motor ventilator to blow air through it. This was about 1938, but I’ve heard of another whale being exhibited in the 1950s or 60’s – do you remember either, or have a snap

If, while sorting through your pictures, you come across anything of interest relating to Histon and Impington then Eleanor Whitehead of 21 Cottenham Road, Histon, CB4 9ES, would be pleased to see them. The Village Society are in process of producing a Millennium Book and would like to hear memories of anybody who went on the 1952 Chivers seaside outing, or who used to play cricket for the Histon team before the war, since they are trying to put names to faces.

Mr G. Stelmaszyk of Cambridge has set me a puzzle I am having some problems solving. He recalls a story from between 1945 and 1947 of a case of black-marketeering by long-distance lorry drivers. The ringleader kept a "little black book" recording all the transactions. Scotland Yard was aware of what was going on and, to trap the lorry driver, put a female detective on the case. Her job was to hitch lifts on as many long-distance lorries as possible. On one trip she found her man, but he murdered her and dumped her body. Following most lengthy investigations a lorry driver from Wisbech was convicted and hanged. It's all a long time ago, but does any body recall it

PLEASE KEEP THE GOLDEN WEDDING MEMORIES IF POSS

MEMORIES, 6th May 1999, by Mike Petty

Memories from the further-flung part of the News’ area have caught my eye this week.

Writing from Ware Mr H. L. (Bert) Hewett recalls Cambridge, where he was born in 1911 in Guildhall Place, just off Market Hill. In those days they had no electricity, all rooms were lit by gasbrackets fitted with mantles and cooking was done on the fire or a gas stove. When, aged 14, he left school, he was thrown onto the labour market, like so many of his colleagues. When Bert went to the Juvenile Employment Exchange in Hobson street he was told that a firm called Baily Grundy and Barrett, electrical engineers in St Mary’s Passage, required an errand boy. If he fulfilled that role for a year they would offer him an apprenticeship to learn the trade of electrician.

His main work was to deliver accumulators, low voltage batteries used to power radios which had to be charged from time to time. He collected them with a three wheel box tricycle and one day was challenged to a race by a laundry boy on a similar machine. They collided, one battery fell over and the acid spilled out. “I decided I would fill it with water from a nearby ditch and left it on the doorstep of the house I was to deliver it to. A day later I was asked to see the works manager, a Mr Morley. The customer had returned the battery as their radio had faded out after a short time. Mr Alf Male was the man in charge of the charging plant, and on inspection found the specific acid of the battery was nil. But when he held it up to look at the plates to his astonishment there were tadpoles going up and down. They obviously had got into the battery with the ditch water”.

Within six months he was out of work – so many people were buying radios the firm had to invest in a van to collect them - but was taken on as apprentice. “It was not long before I went as a wireman’s boy with an electrician. Most of the time I was with Dick Matthews, though others were Ernie Ellis, Ron Cowell, Mr Duke and Mr Froment.

Once a year they would put on temporary lighting in the college grounds for the May Week Balls. The marquees would be lit by 300 watt bulbs enclosed by pink fabric shades and would have carpets and furnishings loaned by Eaden Lilleys. Another job was to hang lighted Chinese lanterns in the trees which overhung the river banks, making a magical sight which used to attract crowds of onlookers to the gates at the Backs.

“I remember being on duty one night with an electrician at Trinity Hall. In those days when a gentleman asked a lady to dance with him they both carried dance cards which had numbers on them. The couple would meet at a rendezvous also shown on the card. The Band Leaders would change the numbers at the end of each dance and show them on a small board or easel on the stage. A lighted box number would also be on the bridge to attract people maybe in punts on the river. I had the job of changing it when the band leader pressed a bell button. In the early hours of the morning the bell kept ringing too frequently. That night a well known London band was playing, either Joe Loss, Ambrose, Henry Hall I cannot remember which. The leader, a little unsteady on his feet came to me and said I was changing numbers too quickly. I found out later he was contriving with the band and some of the unsobber ones to make things difficult by upsetting the dance card arrangements.”

The last job he had with the firm was in 1931 when Baily Grundy and Barrett carried out the complete electrical installation work at the Victoria Cinema. Bert had to be present on the opening night with Dick Matthews just in case anything went wrong. The sound tracks were not on the film but on large records on turntables in the projection room which had to be changed as necessary by the projection staff. But now electrical work was scarce and Bert moved to a job with the North Metropolitan Electricity Supply Company in Hertford where he stayed for nearly 40 years.

Mrs Audrey Coleman from Stowmarket recalls how an electrical fault brought her true love. In November 1946 she worked at Heffer’s bookshop, Petty Cury, when fire broke out in the early hours of the morning. By the time the firemen arrived flames were shooting out of the roof and as all roofs opened into each other the whole block was in danger. Extra engines were called from Newmarket, Linton and Letchworth in case the blaze spread throughout the town centre. Hundreds of books were destroyed or damaged by water and shop assistants Audrey Wright, Doris Pilsworth, Jean Mayle and Norah Thomas worked with others to rescue what they could. Also called in was electrician Peter Coleman from the Cambridge Electrical Supply Company. He and Audrey started dating and the rest is history. Last month they celebrated their Golden Wedding.

PHOTO : corner of Petty Cury and Guildhall Place about 1972, after Heffers had moved to Trinity street & Bert had left Cambridge

MEMORIES 13th May 1999, by Mike Petty REVISED TEXT

Last weeks “Memories” had scarcely been printed last week before John Taylor phoned up with details of the Teddy Boys party. He was quickly followed by Ernie Booker from Sutton and Len the Ted of Chesterton. The definitive account comes from Mrs Y.S. Brooks of Saffron Walden who writes: “The Ready Teddy go photo is of a surprise 26th birthday party I arranged for my boyfriend, who I later married". It features members of the Cambridge Rock and Roll Club celebrating Bill Brooks' birthday party at Gt Chesterford village hall in October 1973 where they danced to the Bluebirds Rock & Roll Band. One who missed the bash was Trevor Noddles from Eaton Socon who tells me that many of them, like himself, went on to become successful businessmen. Some, he says, "still make their presence known on the Rock'Roll circuit, though probably cannot jive the night away these days but can still muster a pint or three". Paul Murden from Willingham (third from the right) remembers they also featured in a television documentary. He's tried to trace it but without success. I suspect this was one in the "Portraits of Places" series, screened on ITV in July 1974, which was reported in the News on 13th June 1974 and will feature in my "Looking Back" column this time next month – keep reading!

Flushed with such success may I try you with the Cambridge Freebooters Coffee Bar and club pictured here in February 1961. I believe it was formed by a Cambridge graduate, John Ewing, who was then teaching in the city. But where was it, and who's on it

**

25 years ago, in May 1974, "Diddy" David Hamilton was being rocked and rolled as he endeavoured to broadcast a live edition of his Radio One show from a punt on the Cam. About 30 other boats packed with cheering youngsters surrounded the radio punt, squirting water and bombarding him with bags of pepper before his three-hour programme was abandoned four minutes early.

His day had started quietly on Cambridge cattle market where moos and baas cued in Abba's chart-topping "Waterloo". He then interviewed a butcher, an auctioneer and an office girl. Obviously some people were listening for he had acquired an escort of youths on Suzuki motorbikes by the time his van drove down Hills road towards his next stop. At the Pye factory in St Andrew's he chatted to the people making the police pocket radios which were later to bring in his rescuers. He stopped for an apple at Reg Finch's shop in Chesterton road & handed out Diddy Hamilton T-shirts to girls in Jesus Lane.

By the time he arrived at Market Hill a crowd of about 200 young people were shouting jibes. As he interviewed a porter at King's college somebody started up a powerful rival record player in an upstairs room and a voice warned "We've got a torpedo for your punt".

Safe inside Old Addenbrooke's hospital Hamilton interviewed nurses while his producer called in for a police escort. Then it was on to Garret Hostel bridge where students with short-wave radios eavesdropped on private conversations between the producers in London and Cambridge as the radio crew made their way to their punt for what was supposed to be a tranquil tour of the academic calm of the Backs. Instead it turned out into a full frontal assault summarised in the headlines of the time as "Diddy David cut short by a drenching"

.....

Reg Wood of Saffron Walden has responded to my request for old "News" pictures that we might use in the "Memory Lane Cambridge" book with this picture of the interior of a well-loved Cambridge shop, Pigott's tools of Sussex street. It was taken in May 1963 when the company celebrated its centenary.

The firm was started by John Pigott, a member of a Landbeach farming family who walked with a wheelbarrow every day Saturday to Cambridge market and sold nails and screws, small hand tools, hammers, chisels, sand-paper etc. He first set up shop in Sidney street and had several moves before establishing himself in Sussex street shortly before the Second World War. Throughout its history the business was handed down from father to son and a feature of its service was that some member of the family was always behind the counter. They prided themselves on giving the best possible service and kept up with the times, giving up hip and slipper baths but retaining a wide range of tools, including up to 140 different types of pocket knife. But like so many other long-established firms they found changing times brought problems and closed in the mid 1980's

Reg writes : "I joined the firm in January 1955 when Mr Robert Pigott opened up a DIY shop in Hills Road (later moved to Victoria Road). The staff at Sussex street were a very happy team. Although there were other shops with tool departments Pigotts were the most popular and served most of the University labs. As far as I can remember other shops in Sussex street in those days were Beales the chemist, Granta Wool, Paris House Fashions, Easiphit shows, W.H. Peak carpets, Ridgeons florist, Rothman's tobacconist, Greta Thorpe lingerie, Roses Fashion centre, Gordon Thoday fabrics & Rogers gents' tailors.

"By the way I was the assistant in the photograph. I left the firm in February 1974 to take over Hadstock Stores and Post Office"

MEMORIES 20th May 1999, by Mike Petty

Whilst scanning the News files for possible "Memory Lane, Cambridge" pictures I have come across a strange photo from June 1961. According to the article which accompanied it "thirteen members of the Christ's College Milton Society took part in a traditional annual "pilgrimage" from the college to the main door of St Mary's church to burn the works of T.S. Eliot. With caps and gowns and carrying a bust of the poet Milton they walked in procession through the crowded Market Square. Then in front of the church the "damnable and dangerous works" of T.S. Eliot were set in flames on the paving stones. Crowds appeared from nowhere and passages of Milton were read before the procession returned to the college where they consumed noggins of nut brown ale".

Is this a "tradition" which survives, or was it just a student jape. Did you ever witness it, or anything similar.

Bert Hewett from Ware recalls an earlier rag that he saw: "In 1922 an archaeologist, Howard Carter, discovered the tomb of Tutankhamen. Next year a note was circulated in Cambridge that his mummified body would be brought up from his tomb in the Market Place. At the specified times students dressed in Egyptian robes with red fezzes on their heads brought up a sarcophagus from the underground Gents' toilets. With other Egyptians playing mournful music on their ancient instruments it was placed on a raised draped platform. They took the lid off and there was the mummy all swathed in linen, which they started to remove. A yell went out from the crowd when he sat up in his coffin and asked for a drink. They brought up from the tomb a case of Bailey & Tebbutt's beer and a kind of goblet which he had a drink from. Needless to say he was given the usual treatment – bombarded with squashed tomatoes, flour, cabbage leaves etc. It was all good fun"

**

Milk stories continue to pour in – and one News reader, Raymond Alsop, was shown a recent "Memories" article mentioning his father – the only thing was that he was on holiday in Spain at the time! He makes the point that in those days before refrigeration the milkman was a vital part of the community – if there was a new-born baby in the street his father would deliver to that house first before starting the rest of his round. Milk bottles had the firm's name embossed on them, but often one bottle would be returned to a different dairy so a firm called Milk Vessels Ltd used to collect them up and return them to their proper home. The bottles had to be thoroughly cleaned each night and the milk pasteurised by boiling in a big copper. When it was icy the horses that pulled the milk cart had special shoes with a hole in them though which a thread was put so they could get a grip on cold mornings.

Kathleen Morgan recalls how her father had a herd of dairy cows at Fen Ditton during the Great War. "The milk was delivered in a churn and measured by a half pint measure kept hanging inside, either into a jug belonging to the customer or a metal can with a tightly fitting lid attached and engraved with the name of the dairy. The cans were in two sizes, pint and quart. Hence the saying 'Mind your P's and Q's' means don't give short measure."

Thomas Taylor from Newton tells me he was born in Christ's Lane, Cambridge in 1919. (Do you remember this lane which led down to Drummer street before Bradwell's court was built in the 1960's?) Their milk came from the Stetchworth Dairy in King Street and was delivered by a milk lady called 'Auntie Nelly'. His grandfather, J. Doggett used to keep the Granta Inn on Newnham Road and he often saw cows from Motts Dairy walking through the mill pool after grazing on Coe Fen. Mrs I. Bloy of Cherry Hinton thinks the milkman I showed recently in Chesterton was Mr Jacobs who kept his cows in a field in Fen Road

Mrs S.A. Ramsey (nee Froste) [subs – is FROSTE – MJP] of Cambridge used to work in the London Co-op Creamery in Ditton Walk between 1956-57. She recalls: "Milk was delivered to the depots in churns from farms in East Anglia and then tested by us for fat and protein content and for freshness. There were three in the laboratory – Betty Speed, Hazel Warren and myself. When the milk was passed fit it was passed through a cooler and into large tankers to the transported to London Co-op's bottling plant and then delivered to customers in the London area. One of my least favourite jobs was climbing into the tank of the tankers to take swabs to test for bacteria. Milk came into the depot every day including Christmas and all public holidays so that someone was on duty every day until all the milk had arrived and been processed. There was another building on the site where eggs were graded and packed. I believe the whole enterprise transferred either to London or the Cambridge Co-op in the early/mid 1960's"

RESERVE STORY IN CASE I CANNOT FIND THE PICTURE TO GO WITH THE MILTON SOCIETY STORY. PLEASE DON'T USE WITHOUT THE ACCOMPANYING PHOTO

Does anybody recall the Cambridge Freebooters Coffee Bar and Club which in early 1961 launched an appeal for £20,000 to pay for a new type of youth centre which would include a coffee bar and even a fish shop. In true "The Young Ones" style the members had already raised £400 and redecorated the main part of their premises. Photographs in the News showed them indulging in typical youth activities, playing dominoes and reading books whilst others played ping pong and tuned up for a spontaneous "rick" session. The article doesn't tell me where it was or what became of it. Can you help?

PHOTOS

CHRIST'S COLLEGE MILTON SOCIETY STUDENTS BURN WORKS OF T.S. ELIOT, 1961
BRADWELL'S COURT, ST ANDREW'S STREET AT OPENING 1961
FREEBOOTER'S YOUTH CLUB MEMBERS 1961

Memories 27th May 1999, by Mike Petty

Last week's photograph of the "Freebooter's coffee club" has prompted Pam Lucas (nee Gentle) from Gt Shelford to contact me. She was a regular attender at the club, one of many who travelled there from all over Cambridge. She participated in the fund-raising events of February 1961 and won a 25-hour jiving competition with her partner Fred Elliott, beating Linda Warboys and Adrian Meade in the process.

Whether Geoff Bye of Burwell says the Freebooters was a regular haunt for him and his friends and the "in" place at the time. It was situated in Wellington street, off Newmarket Road, Cambridge in what was originally either a church or school hall. He writes: "I remember playing ping pong in the front hall as in your photograph, but a lot of the activities took place at the rear of the building where there was a soft drinks bar, juke box and T/V room. The Freebooter was well thought off at the time because it kept us teenagers off the streets and out of trouble".

This indeed was the prime aim of a remarkable project as Joan, a former helper told me. The club was started by John Ewen, a theology student at Ridley Hall. As part of his training he organised an open-air service at the Mill Pool. Local town boys went along to heckle and stayed to chat to the young preacher, accepting an invitation to join him back at his college. This was a strange experience for them, opening their eyes to a different lifestyle to the one they knew. Student and townees became friends.

John got permission from his college to open up a room at King Street Boys Club, the lads went – and the girls followed. The project snowballed and was fully backed by the Cambridge Education authorities who gave them use of old church premises in Wellington Street. It was not an instance success. Although they offered soft drinks, beer was readily available from nearby pubs. There were fights with motorcycle boys, disturbances, trouble. Police and Probation services became involved – but in a fully supportive role. More theology students came along to help, and so did Joan.

Gradually they built up a remarkable atmosphere, organised film shows, debated taboo subjects – such as birth control. John got himself a motorbike, joined them in their pub trips, provided safe accommodation when they had problems with parents, and got to know them on their own level.

John Ewen himself gave up his training as a Minister and became a paid youth leader. Then he moved on to similar work in Harlow, Leicester, Oman, Nigeria, Australia – and is now employed by the Government in Zambia. He keeps in touch with his helper, Joan, who now lives in Hertfordshire.

From the summer of 1960 to December 1962 the Freebooters Coffee Bar and Club offered local 15-18 year olds a unique experience – one they obviously remember, yet one which may have passed unrecorded had not the News photographer popped in to one of their sessions in February 1961.

If you have memories of the Freebooters, or other youth clubs which changed your life, let me know.

Regular "Memories" readers may recall a letter some months ago from a Mr McClure in Cumbria who had discovered a grant of arms to a gentleman called Fred Crisp. With your help we tracked him down to the Willingham and Over areas, found pictures of the store he established in London, but then the trail went cold. But not for long. Now thanks to a "News" reader I have been contacted by Andrew Forman from Skipton, Yorkshire, who is a direct descendant. The two are now in touch and another mystery solved.

Recently while engaged in the sad task of clearing a house I chanced upon a programme for the Stretham annual sports of 14th July 1956. This was obviously a lavish affair with some 42 events including a half-mile cycle handicap that attracted contestants from Leicester and Tottenham as well as M. Chilvers of the Littleport Wheelers and G. Human from Ely City Road Club. Other local participants included R. Houghton and R. Summerfield of Coleridge A.C. in the 100 yards flat handicap, competing for a first prize to the value of £3. In all there were over 42 events including 20 for children. I have a vague memory of participating in the slowest bicycle race but all this took place more than 40 years ago – in the decade I call the “forgotten Fifties”. Did you used to participate in such events, or have snapshots. Write to me at the News.

PICTURE:

This week’s “Memory Lane” picture is one for you to puzzle over. The caption reads: “Neighbours exchanging the time of day in the autumn sun”. It was taken by “News” photographer Eddie Collinson in 1976 but where is it, and who are the gossipers

SECOND PICTURE IF NEEDED :

These pictures of Newmarket Road, Cambridge, were probably taken in 1963. Do you recognise the area, and can you offer me some ideas for captions in the forthcoming book?

MEMORIES 3rd June 1999, by Mike Petty

Mrs J. Jenner of Bourn has responded to my plea for memories of Christ’s Lane, which was at one time the most well-known bit of Cambridge to those who came in by bus, as it linked Drummer Street bus station with the town centre.

As she recalls: “There was a toll bar about half way up which was always open, except for Rag Day. Then the students held it shut and put sludge around it about an inch thick and ten inches long. This meant that people passing had to give them something to walk through the small gap in the sludge. The opening was only wide enough for one person at a time to pass. They gave mums with prams a helping hand by lifting the pram over the barrier”.

She also remembers another Cambridge institution. “When the bus office ceased to look after passengers’ parcels a man, who lived in the Sturton street area, came and sat by the wall, near Milton’s Walk, to watch the parcels and sometimes cases, when people had a long wait for coaches. He charged according to the length of time parcels were there. Those to be collected before noon were placed on his right, between then and two p.m. were in front, and two to four or five on his left. He charged 1/- a parcel for each period of time. Each customer was greeted by Good Morning or Good Afternoon and he touched his cap to lady customers.” She remembers that the News took a photograph of him, but I’ve never seen one – have you?

More milk memories have come in from Doreen Brett of Haverhill. She writes: “We lived at Carlton Green, when I was born and our milkman delivered the milk from a churn. My mother bought various quantities of milk which was measured into her jugs (one pint, half pint and a little gill into my jug as I was under six years old and school children had a third of a pint delivered to their school. If my father had not died just before my sixth birthday the milkman would have taken me and the neighbours young children to Carlton village school. As it was, mother and I moved to live with my mother’s parents who had a small farm in Norfolk and sold milk at the door, either full cream milk or separated, which meant skimmed milk. My grandmother turned that cream into butter to sell to the grocer who called on her each Wednesday”

Mrs T.A. Harrall from Willingham has lent me a marvellous photograph of her grandfather, Andrew Biggs who had a dairy and shop in Fitzroy street, Cambridge. His sons also had shops selling milk, Will in Sturton street & Fred in Gwydir street.

Mr G. Stelmaszczyk of Cambridge remembers a tale of black market skullduggery and murder from over 50 years ago. He writes: "In the late '40's I was employed by the Artificial Stone Company in Mill Road, Cambridge. With me worked a very friendly chap from Wisbech, whom I knew only as Bert. During our morning breaks we used to have some very interesting conversations and it was during one of these that he told me of how police used a female detective to break a black marketeering ring operated by long-distance lorry drivers. I was fascinated to hear about the painstaking enquiries which Scotland Yard were pursuing because, as a high-school boy in Poland before the war one of my uncles was a policeman. I think this is why this story stuck in my memory". Sadly he can't quite recall the end of the tale

One family that was happy, in distressing circumstances, is recalled by Mrs Mary Denny of Arbury. When just one year old, in 1939 she was evacuated with her with parents John and Phyllis Cook to the vicarage at Gt Shelford to stay with the Rev Frederick William Jeeves as housekeeper and gardener. Her dad was deaf, and going blind and the Rev Jeeves was like an uncle to her. The vicarage had two large towers and ball tops with lavender along the walls to the front doors. It had many rooms, and beautiful gardens. The Rev Jeeves retired 1947 and they moved to Histon as a family. He died in 1964. Her father John Cook was then blind and deaf & worked for the blind making rush chairs. But with sign for blind/deaf they were able to talk and get about Histon very well. Mary went to work at Unwins seeds when aged 15, retiring after 44 years in 1998. She has suffered sad family losses but says bravely: "memories are forever, life goes on". She adds: "I don't suppose many people at Gt Shelford would remember the Cooks and I haven't been there for over 30 years. There were some good times but I'm sure everything changes"

Somebody who does not let a challenge defeat him is Ernie Papworth of Over. He spotted a "Looking Back" article for March 1924 relating to an exhumation at Over churchyard when the body of French refugee who had sought shelter in the village during the Great War was returned to his old home. Through careful research he has identified the gentleman and even turned up a photograph of the family.

PHOTOS

BIGGS : Andrew Biggs with his milk cart, Cambridge

SHELF : Shelford station, 1930s

MEMORIES, 10th June 1999, by Mike Petty

On Saturday I got lost in London. I'd arrived early for a meeting in Stationers' Hall, in the shadow of St Paul's, so decided to wander once round the Cathedral. A quick trip down to the river, and there I was lost. I tried everything – asked a policeman, hailed a black cab, even stopped a lad on his moped who was doing "the knowledge" with his street map & list of destinations. No use. It didn't help that the centre of London was wreathed in scaffolding and builders' hoardings, hiding half-familiar landmarks. Once I did get to my meeting I made sure I got somebody to lead me back to the railway station for home.

Even here I am experiencing that frustration of half-recognising something I ought to know to caption pictures for the forthcoming "Memory Lane, Cambridge" book, poring over maps for streets which are now no more in those areas of Cambridge which have been comprehensively "redeveloped" in the last 40 years. Pictures of Campkin Road when it was nothing but a building plot, bits of East Road which have gone and in particular a photograph which was taken by a "News" photographer on 28th February 1964. It says "Wrays Court" on the back and I know I ought to know it, but for the moment, once more I'm lost. Can you help – where is it - and knowing "News" readers – who is it?

Sam Harris of Fallowfield, Cambridge writes to say the article on the Freebooters Youth Club brought back many memories for him, and he can add more to the story of youth clubs. He tells me "Wellington street church hall was first given to the "Cambridge Boys Club" in 1949 after we lost out to the Army Cadets who took over our first club on East Road, exactly where the new Working Men's Club stands now. After many meetings we finally got the old church. There were drawbacks because they could not afford to do it up for us. We got together just before Christmas and decided to go carol singing and raised about £200, what with raffles made up for us by the late Terry Thurston's mum and sold in the George IV pub we had enough to start. We bought a table tennis table, dart boards and equipment for the canteen."

The club was one of several in Cambridge at the time, they organised their own football, cricket, table tennis and boxing tournaments, as well as outings and holidays which proved very popular as most of the lads had never been outside Cambridge before. He particularly remembers their first club camp at Stockheath Camp, Hayling Island and a trip across to Ryde, Isle of Wight in 1948. Most members were called up for National Service and lost contact with each other and Sam wonders what happened to the club between 1954 and 1961.

Going back further in time is Deryck Chambers from Duxford. He has been endeavouring to find details of an air raid on Cambridge which he experienced as a youngster. He writes: "I cannot recall the year, but I do remember it being during the summer school holidays. I was staying with my aunt in Great Eastern Street, off Mill Road. The house immediately opposite where I was staying received a direct hit. I still have vivid memories of this and would like to establish more accurate details. My relatives who would have been able to help me have all died."

The Cambridge Daily News of August 29th 1941 carried the following report: "An old lady and a four-year old boy lost their lives when high explosive and incendiary bombs were dropped on an East Anglian town last night. A Sunday School was destroyed and a chapel and private houses seriously damaged. A high explosive bomb which fell outside the chapel caused severe damage to the interior but incendiaries which were dropped were promptly tackled by ARP personnel and neighbours and overcome before they could gain a hold. A lady who was living in the house where the lady and boy were killed said: "We went to bed as usual and all I can remember is being encased in something. I was badly bruised and received abrasions. Mrs Jones, whose house is nearby told a reporter that she woke up suddenly and heard a terrible explosion. "I nearly fell down stairs with my child", she added. Next door to a demolished house lives Mr Webb who was also asleep in bed when the bombs fell. "My wife shook me up and I heard rubble flying. I got up and had a look out and when back to bed when things quietened down".

This was but one of several raids on Cambridge, which left parts of the town looking something like the St Paul" area of London did on Saturday! If you remember seeing bombs fall on your area, and feel like sharing the experience please write to me at the News.

PICTURES :

WRAYS COURT (off Sidney Street, Cambridge – but don't tell the readers!)

GT EASTERN STREET FOLLOWING THE BOMBING

Memories, 17th June 1999, by Mike Petty

Thanks to everybody who contacted me to locate Wrays Court following the photograph in last week's Memories. Roger Cork from Stretham, Mr Offord from Barnwell road, Cambridge and Mrs Doreen Ellum from Trumpington all consulted their old directories to place it between numbers 42 and 43 Sidney St. Mrs Badcock of Cambridge knew it without looking up as her aunt lived there some 70 years ago. But the definitive answer comes from Mrs Cheryl Bolton, of Sawston, who writes: "My husband, Philip Bolton, was surprised to see himself playing with his dog Sue in the courtyard of Wrays Court. He lived at number five, a large Georgian building at the end of the court and the picture was taken when he was eight years old. The entrance to the Court was in Sidney Street, which was demolished to make way for Sainsbury's. It brought back happy memories for my husband and his father".

Colin Moule, from the News, was prompted by the picture of the bombing in Great Eastern Street, which damaged Sturton Street Methodist Church. He writes: "I would have been six years old then, but I remember the crump which woke us all up – the bomb fell ahead of the air raid warning. Our house, (number 6) was in Ainsworth Street which runs parallel with Sturton Street and my dad, Percy, was one of the air raid wardens – he used to organise the fire practice with stirrup pumps. On that particular night, and because the bomb preceded the warning, he was not on duty outside our side passage – a position he always took up during air raids. When he rushed outside it was to find that many house windows had been blown in, including ours. But most sobering of all was that, embedded in the wall just behind where he always stood, was a piece of red hot shrapnel! My mum always said that God really loved us that night! She felt that the direct hit on the chapel must have prevented a much higher number of casualties. Everyone called it a miracle for years afterwards. My brother still has that piece of shrapnel".

A picture of Chesterton housewives practising using a stirrup pump appeared in the C.D.N. on 19th June 1940. Alongside it is a list of casualties caused by an earlier raid on Cambridge – the attack on Vicarage Terrace. I showed the slide during a talk to Sawston Senior Citizens last week and afterwards a lady came up to tell me that her boyfriend had been killed – his name was amongst those listed in the newspaper. Suddenly memories of nearly 60 years ago had come flooding back.

Later that week I was giving a similar talk to the Royal Air Force Association, whose members have remarkable knowledge of such matters. From Lacey Anderson I learned that the first Americans to arrive in Cambridge during the war were initially encamped in Dick Downham's cornfield, Green End Road, with a second group near the railway crossing on Milton Road. Does anybody have a snap? His mother took in their washing. Lacey himself used to entertain the troops both as a solo artiste and with his own band.

More musical memories have come from Dave Bott of Duxford who was involved with the Riverside Jazz Band from 1957 when they played at the Criterion pub, now swallowed up as part of the Joshua Taylor complex. Initially this was a part town/ part gown band but it was decided to make it town only, so it could do more gigs during the vacations. This prompted a move to the YMCA building in Post Office Terrace where a thriving Thursday night club operated until the Rock & Roll era took over from Trad Jazz. Other thriving bands at the time were The Idle Hours, The Fenland Feetwarmers, The Savoy and The Cardinal Jazzbands. Dave would also like information on a publication called "Gunsite Gossip" – the unofficial journal of Cam / 101 Battery A.A. a copy of which, for November 1943, he came across recently. Does anybody have copies?

Most wartime memories were revived in the peaceful setting of Wentworth church on Saturday when members of Cambridge Antiquarian Society, on a coach tour of the Isle of Ely, popped in on their church fete and came out laden with home-baked produce. The small community is struggling to maintain their combined church and hall, a remarkable building which includes a stone statue of St Peter, dating from the 11th century. But it was the visitors' book which caught the eye of one Antiquarian. Since they do not attract a vast number of people one book goes a long way and names of troops based in the area in the early 1950s feature prominently in the earlier pages.

More tangible memories of the area's military past is visible each weekday at the RAF Witchford museum, housed in the offices of Grovemere Holdings, amongst the industrial units on the old airfield site. The base had a short three-year existence, opening in June 1943, but the mementoes amassed by Barry Aldridge are a remarkable testimony to their activities and well worth a visit.

Meanwhile Ken Booth from 3432 N. Wisconsin St, Racine, Wisconsin 52402, USA, has been reminiscing about another small village, Lode. He writes: "My first visit to Lode was in 1938 where I stayed with relatives during my summer holidays. Here I romped freely in the fields with my cousins, gorged myself shamefully with Victoria and greengage plums, played cricket with the village lads, and followed the binder when the last rows of grain were cut to chase the rabbits with sticks as they scurried for safety. Our uncles Johnny and Aunt Rosa Shipp lived a stone's throw from the old mill. Their cousin George lived in a wooden shed in their garden. Wounded in the First World War and later contracting tuberculosis he spent his days in and out of hospitals, always returning to his little hut which, except for inclement weather, was always open to the elements. That was sixty years ago and remains fresh in my memory today" Ken is seeking copies of some booklets written about Lode by Marjorie Sabin –can anybody help him?

NOTE : IF YOU NEED TO CUT COULD YOU LOSE THE SWANSEA STORY

Memories, by Mike Petty, June 24th 1999

The article about Wray's Court, Sidney Street, Cambridge continues to bring forth mixed memories. For Sally Whyte it was a frightening, dark, dingy, eerie place inhabited by witches. As a girl she lived just a few doors along, over the shop of Moore and Co. and one day she and her sister went out on their scooters, as usual. This time something went wrong. Out from the dark recess of Wray's Court came an old lady, bent over, dressed in black – "Come back with me, I'll put in right for you". As Sally followed the lady into her lair her twin sister dashed off to fetch their father to rescue her from the 'kidnapper'

Yet, as a young married woman just after the War, Mrs Joan Goody, now of Cherry Hinton, was delighted to be offered the chance to move into one of the houses in the Court– until she & her husband Felix saw it. Wray's court might look quaint but the buildings were occupied by old people & in very poor condition. The houses had no back door, no water, no light except gas and just two toilets for all the residents, some of whom could not get out to them! Their house was on three floors and had a basement full of cobwebs like upside down umbrellas – they threw buckets of water down it to force a way through. Overcoming their initial revulsion they set too on the other rooms. They stripped many layers of wallpaper – one layer containing pins and needles placed there by a long-dead seamstress. With blistered hands they decorated and made the place look something like a home. Only then did they discover to their horror that they had not, after all, got the house. The person who'd made the offer had no rights over it - that decision had to be made by a Committee, they would need references. The couple wept.

The Trustees of Wray's Charity, who administered this court and also maintained almshouses in King Street, were impressed by their hard work. They could have it subject to certain conditions: there was to be no washing hung out in the court – this was after all part of 'old

Cambridge' and admired by visitors – and they were not to have children. But a baby came. They could stay provided it was not heard to cry, but the pram was not to be on view in the court.

As the other elderly residents died or moved away more young families were moved in. One of these were Mr & Mrs K.P. Harris, now living in Witchford. They too worked hard to create a "little Palace". They scrubbed the cobbles, for now babies would be crawling around (despite the committee!), though the washing lines were still confined to the basements. The young community bonded together, organised child-minding so that each could have spare time, and they have stayed friends together ever since. But then the Council said they couldn't live there as the properties had no back doors and the occupants were re-housed in various parts of Cambridge. Yet they look back on Wray's Court with the greatest of affection

Joan Fitch, of Highsett, knew the King Street almshouses. They belonged to the Charity of Henry Wray, which had been founded in 1634. From 1958 to 1968 she was Clerk to the Trustees of the Foundation of Edward Storey. One of her duties was to take a small monthly pension to a scatter of old ladies living in the parishes of St Giles and Holy Trinity, one of whom lived in Wray's court. There were then three sets of almshouses in King Street: Wrays, which have disappeared, Jackenett's which is still there but given over to other uses, and Knights and Mortlocks, still managed by Cambridge United Charities.

Another example of the 1950's society is recalled by Mrs E. Bradford of Sawston who lent me a newspaper cutting showing an outing organised by the Trumpington Tenants Association to Wicksteed Park in August 1950. She tells me that Trumpington was the first council estate to be built after the Second World War and most of the 400 homes went to returning forces. "We were a happy crowd", she recalls, "and Paddy Harris supplied the coaches". Did your estate organise similar outings, and did it stay one big happy family?

Can anybody shed light on a picture taken by the News. On first glance it would seem to be one of those posh Cambridge University May Balls but this dates from December 1986 and I believe relates to a Ball at Hills Road Sixth Form College. Do any of the younger readers have any memories of it that I can use for a caption in the "Memory Lane, Cambridge" book?

More memories were generated by the references to second world war bombing in Great Eastern Street. Miss M.R. Bavey of 4 Cavendish Rd, Cambridge writes: "I, too, remember the bombs that fell in Great Eastern Street. In August 1941 I was seven years old and I remember being woken up in the middle of the night by the rattle of falling debris on the roof. On that occasion "Gerry" dropped a stick of bombs, one falling on the Baptist chapel at the corner of Stockwell Street, one in a garden a short way down Cavendish Road, and another in Great Eastern Street. At number 4 Cavendish Road we were in one of the gaps! My father was in the ARP and he immediately went out to give assistance. Mr R. Thompson of 84 Gt Eastern Street remembers that after that bomb fell bricks, dust, wood and feathers from the beds were scattered all over the area, an aviary at the back of his house was set on fire by an incendiary bomb. But he has another memory he seeks assistance with. He writes: "Does anybody remember when a Flying Fortress crashed at Royston Road, Harston. I think it was before the Americans came into the war and it was a secret plane with British crew. I was there and helped the farmer pull bodies from the plane, but had to get away as the ammunition was exploding". Over to you

Memories 1st July 1999, by Mike Petty

Opening the box file containing my “Memories” letters the first one on top is written in an elegant hand in black ink. It contains the story of a French family of refugees who had fled their homeland at the start of the Great War and found sanctuary and friendship in the Cambridgeshire village of Over. It gives information only discoverable by somebody with an intense knowledge of his subject, prepared to spend hours delving for detail. Pinned to it is a typewritten sheet, “from my £3 Car Boot Cannon Electric Typewriter, not exactly thrilled with it, may have been ‘overcharged’. Hope to see you soon, thanks again for all you have done – yours sincerely, Ernest”. Sadly I will receive no more letters from Ernie Papworth, the Over village historian, who died at the weekend. All who knew him will have their own memories and stories of him. He taped the tales of many local folk, and set down the history of his village in literally hundreds of elegantly written articles for his church magazine. We will not see his like again – thanks again for all you have done Ernest.

I am no football fan, indeed the last time I attended a match at Cambridge United’s Abbey Stadium I had to have permission for not doing my French homework – not something you asked lightly of ‘Slug’ Riley at Soham Grammar School! Now I need help in captioning two pictures taken by the News in April 1973, when the team won promotion to the Third Division. One shows jubilant players, the others celebrating fans – but who are they, and has the scene changed at all. Over to you.

Continuing on the football theme, I have had a letter from the Zion Eagles Football Club, which was launched in July 1998 and plays in the Cambridge and Bedford Churches League. Craig Hatfield and his team are now delving back into the early history of their sport. He tells me that in 1848 representatives of various groups met to agree the rules of the game and “affixed them to trees on Parker’s Piece”. When the Football Association was established in 1863 the Cambridge rules were adopted and were later accepted throughout the world. Apparently the FA say no copies of these original “Cambridge Rules” have ever been found – unless you have one. Zion Eagles would like to commemorate this major connection between Parker’s Piece and international football. If you have ideas, or would like to help you can write to them at the Zion Baptist Church, 1 East Rd, Cambridge CB1 1BD.

From Prifysgol Cymru Abertawe – the University of Wales, Swansea, comes a plea from Christopher Stray. He is trying to track down a painting by Harston artist Mary C. Greene of the Albany Café which stood in St Mary’s Passage, Cambridge in the 1890s. It shows various well-known locals who used to gather there for morning coffee and a chat, including Robert Bowes, Prof. McKenny Hughes, Sir William Ridgeway and the artist herself. The picture was featured in the CDN on 12th March 1936, the Folk Museum think they might have had it once and that it went to be framed but was retained by the framer who thought he had been underpaid. Christopher Stray thinks it is probably hanging on a wall somewhere locally. If you know where he’d be pleased to hear from you at the Department of Classics and Ancient History, Singleton Park, Swansea, SA2 8PP

From even further afield comes a letter with a Lusaka, Zambia, postmark. It reads: “By some extraordinary co-incidence, I received here in Lusaka, a cutting of your “Memories” article on the Freebooters Club (27 May) on the same day that I was awarded the Order of the British Empire in the Queen’s Birthday Honours list. I believe the award was for 40 years of service to youth, and it all started with Freebooters in the summer of 1960”. Prof. John Ewen then goes on to sketch out his extraordinary career which has led to his position as the Commonwealth’s National Advisor on Youth Affairs to the Government of Zambia. He has sent me three pictures, one of himself – without the motor-bike and leathers of his Cambridge days – and two more of the 25 hour jiving competition winners in October 1961. So if you are or were Pam Gentle, Fred Elliott, Linda Warboys or Adrian Mead and would like a picture of yourself in your younger days just let me know. Prof Ewen, OBE, MA, concludes: “If any of your readers who were Freebooters from that period would like to contact me at the Ministry of Sports, Youth and Child Development, Memaco House, P.O. Box 50195, Lusaka, Zambia, I would be delighted to hear from them. Meanwhile thank you for bringing back so many happy memories on a day when I was both feeling highly honoured by the Queen's award, and when nostalgia was flowing through my veins"

Memories 8th July 1999, by Mike Petty.

A couple of weeks ago Mr R. Thompson of 84 Gt Eastern Street asked whether anybody remembered when a Flying Fortress crashed at Royston Road, Harston. "I think it was before the Americans came into the war and it was a secret plane with British crew. I was there and helped the farmer pull bodies from the plane, but had to get away as the ammunition was exploding".

Two readers have responded. Mr W.F. Collins of Gt Shelford remembered the event as if it were yesterday:

"At the time I was in class at Harston school, aged about 12 years, when suddenly we heard this aircraft approaching so low and making a terrible noise – so low in fact that I thought it was going to take the roof off the school. Two or three minutes later we heard a heavy thud and knew the plane had crashed.

As it was about mid-day meal time we were let out of school, many of us used to go home for dinner. When we got outside there was a big pall of black smoke rising from the Royston road, Harston mill direction. Instead of going home for dinner a lot of us ran or cycled towards the scene. When we got nearer to Harston mill, which used to grind the corn for local farmers at that time, we could see the flames and black smoke billowing upwards, about ¼ mile behind Hayes farm, a bit beyond the Queens Head pub.

When we got there the fire was so intensive we couldn't get too near the burning plane, lucky for us as suddenly the ammunitions started to go off with tracer canons flying through the air, of course we couldn't see the other shells but could just hear them whiz as they went over our heads. Some of us saw where the canon (tracer) landed, one boy (a London evacuee) dug into the soft ploughed field and pulled out this tracer still steaming with his gloved hand. We were then told to move back out of danger, which we did. The A.F.S. then arrived, soon covering the burning plane with foam.

Now I would like to point out that the plane certainly wasn't on the secret list. We knew it was a B.17 Flying Fortress and understood it was returning from a daylight raid with 8 American crew members who all perished in the flames."

Mr D.J. Beynon of Haslingfield has supplied more details based on his researches. The plane was indeed a B17C "Flying Fortress", flown by No.90 Squadron from Polebrook, Northants. It was one of twenty early-model "Forts" which had served with the squadron since mid-1941. Found to be unsuitable to operations with Bomber Command the surviving aircraft were subsequently engaged in a series of very high-altitude test flights, which might explain Mr Thompson's belief that it was a "secret plane". This particular aircraft was on a routine training flight on 9th January 1942 when it was seen to come out of cloud in a left-hand spin before crashing in a field near the Queens Head. The crew of five were all killed in the crash. There are graves in the Service Plot at Whittlesford Churchyard of three aircrew who were killed on this same date.

Mr Beynon points out that this should not be confused with another B15 of the 8th USAAF based at Bassingbourn, which crashed at Royston road, Foxton, on 24th December 1944 – so did anybody see this one?

More schoolday memories have come from Mrs Jane Hough (nee Dyson) from Guildford, Surrey, following a photograph a couple dancing on the table at the Hills Road Sixth Form College Christmas Ball, 1986. “Guilty as charged – it was me, but I am sorry to disappoint you – the photograph in the newspaper was very much staged by the photographer; no-one was really dancing on the tables – it was quite unstable and it was a relief to get down once the picture had been taken!

At that time the Christmas Ball was definitely the highlight of the social calendar. Much of the organisation was undertaken by the students themselves. The music alternated between an hour’s live band (with ballroom dancing) and an hour’s disco. A large number of students took up the offer of ballroom dancing lessons during the lunch hour in the weeks preceding the ball. After Hills Road Jane went on to study at Brunel University and now works as an economist for the House of Commons. She’s lost touch with her partner in crime for the photograph, Andrew Noble who also went to Brunel to study engineering.

This week’s picture to ponder is a mystery at present. It might date from 1973 and shows a protest meeting near the entrance to King’s college, Cambridge. The speakers notes refer to “A struggle” – but for what. And when did you dress like this?

ALTERNATIVE OR ADDITIONAL

I found this picture amongst the News files, but there is no date or place. It might be in the Saffron Walden area. The dustcart’s number is NNK 307H. But who are the men clearing away the dust, and where? Memories please

MEMORIES, 15th July 1999 by Mike Petty

It is time to catch up with some of the mystery photographs. Two weeks ago I featured Cambridge United on one of the greatest days in their history. The date was 28th April 1973, the opponents Mansfield Town. Whichever team won would be promoted to the third Division. When Ronnie Walton fired home the winning goal in the 62nd minute the record 10,542 people packed the Abbey stadium went wild with delight. Doubtless the cheering echoed around the surrounding countryside and may have reached the ears of John Taylor one of United’s neighbours – though he lives some distance away across Coldham’s Common

John has written with his memories of house-history hunting. He writes: “It was in March 1958 that I picked up from the Cambridge Guildhall the key to my new home. The label said “Pinder’s Cottage, Coldham’s Lane”. Cycling over Coldham’s Lane bridge I got as far as Cherry Hinton before I realised I had missed the cottage, turned round and found it near the Greyhound pub, trying to hide amongst the shrubs and weeds in the garden.

“What an odd looking building. I unlocked the door and went inside to find only three rooms plus a tacked-on lean to which looked as it doubled as kitchen and bathroom and potting shed. Of the three other rooms the middle one was 14 foot by nine foot and the other two – one each side of the main room – nine foot square. And then I noticed something odd: the dividing walls between the centre room and the two smaller ones either side were OUTSIDE walls. This seemed to indicate that the building started life as only one room and later a room was tacked on to each end”

This was confirmed when John researched into the house’s history. He discovered it had been built in 1857 as a weighbridge house. This was to enable the corporation to keep check on the amount of coprolite – fossilised organic matter which was dug up, ground down and used for fertiliser. He then dug down along his front wall and found where the weighing mechanism entered the building below ground level. The coprolite did not last for ever and the house was empty until the council decided to add on two rooms to house the gatekeeper for the Common. She was Elizabeth Layton - her initials were carved into the end wall. She ended up in the Workhouse.

So most of the story was complete – except for something a neighbour had said when he'd first moved in. John continues: "He asked me if I'd seen the ghost yet."

Nearly 20 years later John was having some extensions done: "I was levelling the lawn when the fork struck something hard. It turned out to be an oddly coloured stone about 40 inches by 20 inches by four inches thick, and looking closely I noticed a number of brass pins set in the stone". He contacted the County Archaeologist who identified part of a 14th century tombstone, the pins being to hold the effigy of the person buried beneath the slab, together with an inscription saying what a good person he had been. It had probably been placed there when stone was cleared from Barnwell Abbey in 1810.

But who was buried under it – and who is the ghost. John is not sure. 216 people died during the Great Plague of 1665/6 at The Pest House, which was situated between the present allotments by Stourbridge Grove and Sainsbury's – and the bodies were loaded on to the plague cart and buried somewhere nearby in 'the dead of night' – so there are plenty to choose from.

More details of burials on Coldham's Common, and other parts of Cambridge, are included in a new book "Cambridge, the hidden history" by former County Archaeologist, Alison Taylor, (Tempus £18.99) which is essential reading for anybody interested in any bodies which might be around their own homes.

Last week I featured a picture of a crowd of students at a rally on Kings Parade. The date was 12th February 1973, the occasion a rain-drenched rally which had reduced demonstrators from an expected 1,000 to just 300. The protest was over student grants and the speaker outside King's college was Mike Terry of the National Union of Students.

This week I invite comments on a picture taken inside Alex Wood Hall, Cambridge, when council dustmen and other outdoor workers were on strike despite an 11% pay increase. This seems a high percentage, but in February 1979 would have amounted to £4.50 a week extra. While the men struck council environmental health officials were keeping watch on the state of 55 emergency refuse tips set up around Cambridge – trying to ensure there was no outbreak of infection such as that of the 1660s

A few years earlier Len Hutt had been sweeping his way along Maids Causeway when up came this chap with a notebook and stopwatch. It was September 1966 and the City Council had called in a "works study assistant" to increase the efficiency of their refuse collection services. Photographs don't capture thoughts, but I wonder what Len was thinking!

Memories, 22nd July 1999 by Mike Petty

As the end of July nears I have been working very hard to try and complete the "Memory Lane, Cambridge" book which has to be with the publishers, Breedon, by the end of the month.

I have scoured the photo files at the News, whittled the chosen pictures down to just under 350, and sorted out the arrangements. It looks as though there will be one chapter on the Petty Cury – Lion Yard area & another on central Cambridge streets. The Kite area needs to be covered separately and then its off right around the town, starting at Castle Hill via Arbury, Chesterton, East Road, Mill Road, Coleridge, Cherry Hinton, Trumpington, Newnham – and a bit on the University to finish off with. The photographs selected range from the 1960s to the 1990s – hopefully the period that will jog some memories, whatever age you happen to be

There are some pictures which I still need help captioning, please can anybody help.

This group of cinema-goers are leaving the Victoria, Market Hill after an all-night film session, but I don't have a date. The main attractions at the cinema is "Innocent" or something similar starring Stanley Baker. The Still and Sugarloaf is open, as is the Seven Star Grill, but the shop next door has a "sold" sign on it. The negative reference would indicate it was taken about November – December 1972, but can anybody tell me more

The next picture come from the "Portugal Place" file and might date from about August 1965. I know that the street was then home to Jack Carter robe maker who hired gowns, tails and dinner suits to students and townsfolk, and also to Joshua Taylor who then made the large proportion of the robes worn in universities, councils and courts throughout Britain and the Commonwealth. In September 1965 they took an order for robes for an Australian University Chancellor, but is this it? And who are the couple admiring them?

My third choice is doubly frustrating in that there is the remnant of a cutting stuck to the back of the picture and I know the date is sometime in 1975. But I have checked the Nursery Schools files in the Cambridgeshire Collection so far without result. The caption reads "St Luke's playgroup in progress in the big room complete with tricycle track". It would be nice to be able to identify some of the children – and of course if it was taken 24 years ago they may well have children of their own by now. So if you see yourself or your mum please drop me a line.

If you were up at Trinity in about 1969 perhaps you will recognise a face or two in this group. As part of the Rag, Trinity college undergraduates, with help from the women's colleges, were trying to break the world record for the number of people who could squeeze into a mini-car. They were aiming at crushing 27 inside – but did you succeed?

If you worked at Marks & Spencer in July 1966 can you identify either the customer or the sales girls in the days when foam interlined bras were 7s.11d.

Some other points I'm still trying to confirm. How many pints were consumed in how many pubs as part of the King Street Run. What happened to the White Ribbon Hostel on East Road and when was the Eastern Counties Bus garage on Hills Road demolished

If I do ever get it finished the book should be out in the Autumn

MEMORIES 29th July 1999, by Mike Petty

Last Thursday, while the England test team was being bowled out by New Zealand, a group of senior Cambridgeshire cricketers met at Fenners to look back on the history of their sport.

The former secretary of the Cambridgeshire Cricket Association, Bernard Green, had for many years cared for the group's archives, carefully tending files of old newspaper cuttings, score books and minutes which dated back to the Victorian period. Now the time had come for them to pass these valuable documents over to the County Record Office for safe keeping, where they will be more accessible for researchers. So it was that Association President Tony Douglas together with other officials gathered for a last browse. Just turning the pages of the scrapbooks there are wonderful records – of how 19 members of the Cambridge Borough Police played the Cassandra cricket team. In their first innings the constabulary scored 47 runs for 18 wickets, in the second just 12. Needless to say they were well beaten by the Cassandra team – despite the fact that they batted using broomsticks in place of bats!

There was one item that particularly caught my eye: a cricket ball with an inscription commemorating how in a match between Kimbolton and Keysoe on 29th July 1903 Dan Hayward took 11 wickets for five runs. I promised to research this wonderful feat through the files of old newspapers held in the Cambridgeshire Collection – but none of them mention it! But at least I know the answer can now be found amongst the archives of the Cambridgeshire Cricket Association at Shire Hall. – or can somebody give me details. Do you have cricketing memories to share – please write to me at the News.

Last week I sought your help identifying various people and photographs. As usual readers were very quick to respond. Barbara Wilson recognised herself and fellow assistant Maureen Stratton (now Jeffery) at Marks and Spencer. They think it must have been taken when the upper sales floor was opened. John Luckham and Mary Burdett have come to my rescue with details of the White Ribbon Hostel. Mary did a student placement at the Hostel for a while and John was secretary of Coulsons the builders, next door.

We have also sorted out the details of the robes in Portugal Street. They were made by Joshua Taylor for the Coronation of the King of Tonga in 1965 and were displayed in their shop. But Brenda Goodall comes up with the fascinating detail that the King's robes were being modelled by Norman Douglas, who worked in the Finance department of Joshua Taylor. Because he did not quite have the great stature of King Taufa'ahau Tupou IV Norman was actually standing on a box when the picture was taken.

As yet nobody has come forward to tell me that the crowds leaving the Victoria cinema at 8am on 18th November 1972 had just experienced Cambridge's first all-night horror film show, 8½ hours of Frankenstein, Dracula, vampires and gore, sustained only by hot-dogs and soft drinks. Perhaps some horrible fate has overtaken them! Fortunately I have tracked it down for myself.

There is another picture for which I need help and it is doubly frustrating because there is a remnant of a cutting stuck to the back of the photograph and I know the date is sometime in 1975. The caption reads "St Luke's playgroup in progress in the big room complete with tricycle track". It would be nice to identify some of the children – and of course if it was taken 24 years ago they may well have children of their own by now. So if you see yourself or your mum please drop me a line

Jason Hoare of Newmarket Road, Cambridge was browsing through his family snaps when he chanced upon a picture of a steam boat on the Cam which looked remarkably like the one featured in the News last week conveying commuters from Ely to Cambridge. When his mother, Freyja, snapped it at Biatsbite lock in the early 1970s it was owned and operated by the late A.F. Leach. He had restored an old craft to make it the largest, finest and fastest steam boat on the Cam. Many of Mr Leach's old pupils might remember how he occasionally took them on trips on the boat, regaling them with tales of river history as they stoked the furnace and got covered with sooty smuts in the process. If you made such trips let me know

Sheila Mann is seeking information on the early days of the Evelyn Hospital. As far as I can gather there was once a nursing home in Thompson's Lane, Cambridge, which was somewhat inconvenient in that the operating theatre was on the first floor. There were no porters and patients had to be carried up and down narrow zig-zag stairs at an angle of 60 degrees.

Nevertheless it seems to have provided excellent service. When the wife of Charles Agnew, a Bond Street art dealer, underwent a successful operation there he was so grateful that he built a new nursing home, about 1922, by extending a large house called The Orchard in Trumpington Road which he named Evelyn after his wife. If you can add to the story please contact her at the Hospital, 4 Trumpington Rd, Cambridge CB2 2AF

Sawston is a village that has been blessed with a number of histories. The latest is "A stroll through Sawston" in which Dennis and Barbara Poulter have pooled their extensive knowledge and considerable research to record the story of the people and buildings that have made the village what it is today. They have illustrated it not only with photographs but also a fascinating selection of billheads and notices issued by local firms. Should you be on your uppers then G & W. Garner "Desire to inform the inhabitants of Sawston and neighbouring villages that they make all kinds of Boots and Shoes to measure, and trust by using good material, with good workmanship, and at fair prices to have a share of your support". A good pair of men's boots for land work cost just 14/- the pair. The book itself is £7.50 from Sawston Book Shop, 6 Morley's Place, Sawston (Cambridge 837456)

Simon Hill of Linton writes with a strange request for information. "In June 1940 the Royal Gloucestershire Hussars were stationed at the private estate of Babraham Park for training before they went overseas. Cpl. Harvey, who was in charge of the cookhouse, wanted a sump dug for the waste. A site was chosen near a huge oak tree and a group of six men started digging. About a foot down they came across a gruesome discovery. They found six bodies buried standing up, three adult, one child and at least three incomplete skeletons. The bones were yellow and frail. A group of experts from the Archaeology Unit of Cambridge University arrived and they were taken away. I never heard any more about who or what they were or what happened to them". Do you know, or have you had similar discoveries. Keep the letters flowing the modern picture of the Cricket Association taken last Thursday (22nd July)

ILLUSTRATIONS

St Luke's playgroup – submitted last week

Jason Hoare's mothers snap of a steam boat at Baitsbite Lock

MEMORIES, 5th August 1999, by Mike Petty

My mention last week of A.F. Leach and his steamboat brought memories flooding back to Ron Malby of Bottisham and John Ianson of Stretham, both of whom were taught by him at various times, either at Brunswick or Chesterton Senior School, Cambridge. Both remember him as an excellent teacher and John recalls that if by a Thursday afternoon a pupil had caused him no aggravation that week there was a chance he might be amongst four lads invited to take a trip on the boat, which was then moored near the Fort St George. Whilst one polished the boiler until it shone, another would stoke it with wood, producing black smoke as the boat chugged down to Baitsbite or even Bottisham lock where they would enjoy a picnic of sandwiches. They might come back covered in sooty smuts but it was well worth while.

Bill Leach's involvement with boats had started when he and his brother discovered an old capsized hulk in 1926. Together they managed to make the wreck float and steam again. For 20 years this relic of a bygone age could be seen plying up the river, "a dirty, stinking old thing" to some, a source of unmitigated delight to its owner. In 1952 the dream had to end, as the hull was just too weak to take any more pupils on river trips. But he was not finished, he acquired another which he rebuilt and refurbished, polished and perfected until once more he owned the largest, finest and fastest steamboat on the Cam. Bill died in June 1989, much loved by many of his pupils

Transport memories of another type have been shared by Jacqueline Saville,. She tells me that her grandfather, Thomas Priestley, was a representative for Crawford's biscuits in the days before the First World War, travelling by train throughout East Anglia. When he died her mother's young uncle, Thomas Daisley, took over the job, which now came with a 1912-vintage Renault car. All went well till Thomas was called up for the army in 1916. In those wartime days women were starting to do jobs previously the preserve of men and it was decided that his wife Kate should continue the work until he came home again. There was one snag – she did not drive.

Jacqueline's mother, Doris Priestley, didn't drive either – but such a small problem was not allowed to stand in her way. She took rudimentary lessons, learnt how to hang the headlamps and trim the sidelights and together the two women went off on their journeys. They left Cambridge on Monday mornings, staying in hotels around the region before returning on the Friday, just in time to leave the car in a garage near the Catholic church so that it could be checked over ready to repeat the experience the next Monday. I've been lent a photograph of the two young ladies with their car. Kate looks on while Doris, with her long pigtail, cranks the starting handle. This could be a hazardous exercise On one such occasion her scarf got caught up in the engine – so after that she wore her pigtail up!

The two ladies plied the roads of East Anglia till Thomas came home from the war, then Doris took another job which also involved some driving. Later she met and married James Saville, an airman who had crashed his machine and spent some time in Cambridge's First Eastern General Hospital. With such a background of transport history it is no wonder that Jacqueline herself inherited a love of driving which she has shared with many through her Gainsborough School of Motoring.

I have been passed some motoring memorabilia relating to the hazards of driving issued about 40 years ago by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents. They highlight the hazards of being an "amber gambler", the madness of speeding and the problems that one stationary car could cause. Their owner would like to find a good home for them and I would appreciate your motoring memories, especially those with a local slant. The answer is obvious – they go to the sender of my favourite automobile anecdote.

Rodney Dale however is barred from entry – for few could match the wealth of recollections of post-war vintage motoring contained in his latest book "Halcyon Days" (Fern House, 1999). Here is one such tale. "We lived on Chesterton road, Cambridge, opposite Hallen's showroom on the corner of Hawthorn Way. One day in 1944 father discovered a chassis in the show room, a Bentley chassis. Although it had no body, petrol was unobtainable, and he didn't know how to drive it, Father forked out £125 and the chassis was pushed round into our garage. Needing a body where better to go than Les Rich's yard in Coldham's Lane. Father and fellow Addenbrooke's porter Harry Rooke went along to do a bit of measuring and came back with the news that a 1923 Sunbeam tourer body (£5) would fit the chassis – with a bit of work".

The work involved a considerable amount of measuring, adjusting and improvisation, eventually it was ready. "Petrol was virtually unobtainable, but you could get lighter-fuel if you tried hard and we were able to procure a box of those squidgy capsules of Ronson lighter fluid. Laboriously we squirted the lighter-fluid into the Autovac; Bunty Smith wound the handle; the engine started instantly. He sprang round into the driver's seat and depressed the clutch – it made a noise like a tiger. Into reverse, and the car leapt backwards into The Lane and stopped. It had run out of fuel. Father climbed on to his tricycle and pedalled off in such of more lighter-fuel. He returned bearing two 1/6 bottles of Ronson and we carefully poured them in. Bunty started the engine again; not wanting to risk running out of fuel during a trip to the end of the Lane and back, he drove back into the garage, and that was that"

Later they got proper petrol from W.J. Ison's vintage petrol pumps up Chesterton Road, which gives me an excuse to feature a picture of King and Harper's garage, Milton Road. It was taken by Ted Mott in the 1920s – about the time that Steamboat Bill Leach was discovering the joys of boating.

PICTURE : Doris and Kate with their car
King & Harper's garage, Milton Road

MEMORIES, 11 August 1999, by Mike Petty

All the excitement of yesterday's eclipse prompted Jose Parr of Ely to turn up her family postcard album which was compiled by her late great-uncle Harry Vail. There she rediscovered a view of a previous eclipse of the sun as seen at Ely at noon on 17th April 1912. This has prompted me to see how the News reported that occasion.

The eclipse of 1912 took place between 11am and 1.30pm and at its peak a trifle over nine-tenths of the sun's surface was hidden. In Cambridge the morning was beautifully fine, the sun shone and the phenomenon was observed under the most favourable conditions. The News fine prose describes how the sunlight seemed to fade away, the temperature fell perceptible, the songs of the birds were hushed and familiar objects assumed an almost spectral appearance.

Inevitably people chanced a peek, and inevitably they suffered as a result. "One lady complained that after glancing at the sun through her veil the pavement seemed tessellated and everything she looked at had a mottled appearance. Hundreds of people were out peeping at the sun through smoked or coloured glasses. An excellent medium proved to be an old photographic negative. Here and there a cyclist might be seen lighting his lamp and smoking the glass and then observing the eclipse through it"

At Newmarket "the greatest interest was shown. At the Conservative Club the steward had provided a large thin sheet of glass, thoroughly smoked, and a little crowd outside the club were able to watch the increasing black disc as it crept across the face of the sun. A few persons tried the method of providing a pail of water and watching the reflection in the pail. For fully an hour the keenest interest was maintained as it was generally understood that no portion of the sun's surface had been eclipsed since 1858 and the novelty attracted popular attention"

This great natural phenomenon was however eclipsed in the news columns. The main story was not the loss of the sun, but the loss of the Titanic. By Wednesday April 17th 1912 no more survivors had been picked up and it was feared that over 1,200 people had glimpsed their last sight of the sky and been lost beneath the waves

OTHER PICTURES ENCLOSED :

Another treasure from Jose Parr's postcard album. Taken by A.J. Davis of Rose Crescent it shows a large gathering of Scouts inside the Cambridge Corn Exchange, I would guess just before the First World War" and / or

A group of members of the Cambridge branch ASLEF (locomotive engineers and firemen) with their banner about 1913

Do you have an interesting snap in your old albums, that might spark memories - let me know.

pictures : ECLIPSE AT ELY, from Jose Parr's album

Mrs Jean Clements of Cambridge writes:

"Reading in the paper that the Regal Cinema, Cambridge, is changing its name made me very nostalgic. Before the war my mother used to take in lodgers to help with the family income. Two of them were bricklayers on the start of the Regal, after them we had two plasterers, then in due course two electricians. When the balcony was in place an advert was placed in the News asking for men to go to the cinema on the Sunday morning and stand on the balcony to test it out!

"My uncle who had just arrived home from India with the army, managed to get the job of doorman and "chucker out". He was a very big man and looked quite formidable in his green uniform and gold braid. Our family went to the very first show, it was "Swing Time" with Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers. My mother had the programme up to her death, then it disappeared. My uncle only had the job for about eighteen months as he was recalled into the army and was later wounded at Dunkirk. His name was Dick Summerfield"

Jean wonders if anybody has a snap of Uncle Dick in his resplendent uniform - and were you ever chucked-out by him

Various people have been remembering various old country saws and sayings, like "If sun shines through the apple trees upon a Christmas day, When autumn comes they will a load of fruit display". So often elderly members of the family seem to come out with them, they become familiar, and then fade away from memory as the years pass. Do you have any which are peculiar to your family? Share them with me at the News

Memories 19th August 1999 by Mike Petty

My mention of A.F. Leach in "Memories" of 29th July, has continued to prompt his old pupils to put pen to paper - or in Mike Payne's case onto the E-Mail. Through the ether he recollects that Mr Leach was his form master at Milton Road Junior School in 1944, when Mike was 10. "I met him again in 1982 and as we had not met since 1945 it was a bit of a surprise for both of us. I always imagined him to be about 9 feet tall and was very surprised that he was only about 5ft 6 inches. I mentioned to him that he had taken us out in a barge towed by the same steam launch you illustrated and he mentioned that his propeller had stopped due to weeds having tangled themselves round it. He was a great man"

Roger Coleman from Gilbert Road, Cambridge also came across him while aged 10 - in 1959: "His science lessons were most memorable and exciting and would now be banned on Health and Safety grounds". He recalls a voyage made on the steamboat "Artemis" with fellow pupils David Howard and Derek Cowling. Their destination was Fen Ditton, "where he produced a battered leather suitcase that was normally attached to the back of his ex-WD 1st World War Triumph 500 cc motorcycle, and produced ice-cream wrapped in newspaper in an attempt to stop it melting on the sweltering summer's day". Roger concludes with a sentiment expressed by many "I feel honoured to have known him - a gentleman amongst gentlemen". Thomas Taylor of Whittlesford made three trips on the boat while a pupil between 1929-30 at the Brunswick School in Walnut Tree Avenue (and you have to be fairly old Cambridge to remember that street, now replaced with that part of Elizabeth Way between the river and Newmarket Rd)

Elizabeth Lane of Ely got to know Anthony Leach better than most and treasures letters he wrote her in 1983. In one of these he describes the other side of boating: "humping coal about, and clearing ashes out after the trip; setting a new fire and doing at least some of the brass again. Running a steam boat is hard and dirty work: so dirty that getting your hands clean afterwards is a job in itself".

But Bill Leach had other loves as well, including his motorbike, "It was a 550 c.c. single cylinder side-valve Triumph, with a Sturmey-Archer 3 speed gear box and chain-cum-belt drive. It was an ex-army machine rebuilt by the makers who claimed they had supplied 30,000 of them to the Allied Forces during the 1914-18 war. I never had an accident with it although I used it for just over 50 years, but it had very poor brakes. In spite of its big engine, its top speed was fifty two m.p.h. and at that speed it felt rather unsafe." The bike was still in existence in 1983 and being taken to rallies. I wonder if CE 6043 is still around and if the owner knows that Elizabeth's autograph book includes a sketch of it made by Mr Leach himself. (Autograph books - whatever happened to autograph books and all those things people used to write)

In one of his letters Mr Leach recalled a memory of early motoring, dating from about 1910. "There was a doctor working in the Chesterton area who used to use his car when visiting patients in their homes. This was Dr White; his car was white, and it had the name White on the hub-caps, and I was naive to suppose that he had built the vehicle himself! His car behaved differently from all the others. The others had to be started by cranking a handle on the front of the vehicle. Dr White's had no starting handle. When he left a patient's house he got straight into the driver's seat. First he sat back and did nothing for two or three minutes, except that he fiddled about with something low down near the floor. Then after about three minutes the car moved off, but what a difference from the others!. They made rather a sort of noise - chug-chug-chug apart from other general noise. Dr White's vehicle moved off in a quite dignified silence, apart from a slight crunching of the tires on the gritty roads. Very superior, I thought, and what a clever man!

"It was some years before I discovered the truth about the car. The "White" car was American! It was a steam car. Its fuel was paraffin. I later learnt that such a car might take about 15 minutes to get enough steam pressure from cold for the car to move. But once the boiler was hot one could turn the flame of the paraffin boiler down, and if you were lucky could get away after a short wait. Say three minutes!"

Pauline Anderson of Cambridge has been trawling her memories and files for information on the King Street Run. She tells me it was a comprehensive drinking circuit when there were 14 public houses and the race was to drink a pint of best bitter in each pub whilst running the full length of King Street without being sick or using the loo, and be able to stand at the end. It was said the record was 19 minutes. Needless to say most of them were on their hands and knees at the end, and this – she says – is how the “pub crawl” was invented.

In turn she seeks help: “In the 1930’s I remember seeing an old cannon on the green where Tenison Road, Lyndewode Road and St Barnabas road meet. It disappeared at the outbreak of WW.II, but was it a relic of the Great War, or did it go further back in time?” – over to you

ILLUSTRATION

Pic no.2 : Can anybody help me identify this view of a local blacksmith’s shop – and did you ever see the blacksmith at work – your memories please

Memories, 26th August 1999, by Mike Petty

Life was far from sweet in Cambridgeshire twenty-five years ago. Whilst the government debated, the EEC agonised, the Commonwealth were consulted and pundits pontificated all that mattered to local housewives was the shortage of sugar in supermarkets.

By August 1974 the crisis was reaching epidemic proportions. Many shops in Mid Anglia were trying to beat the sugar shortage by selling specially-imported supplies, and customers were eager to buy the new stocks although they are having to pay 20p a kilo as against the old price of 11½p for 2 lb. Even so a Haverhill market trader found himself attacked for profiteering by housewives when he charged the higher price for the lower weight

Sugar was still available in shops at the old price, but supplies were strictly rationed, so people turned to various means to stock up their larder.

Children on their own were banned from buying sugar in Lipton's Huntingdon supermarket because the manager claimed they were running a high price black-market. John Fareham, also reported how each member of a family were coming in individually to purchase a bag. The shop was receiving about 80 per cent of their normal supplies and he was filling the shelves at different times each day to avoid a rush. At the nearby Keymarket the manager was adamant that if people stuck to their normal amount it would be all right. Civil's in St Ives reported that "It's like the gold rush. As soon as its out on shelves it's gone"

By August 28th white sugar was unobtainable at most Cambridge supermarkets, though Arbury Discount had enough for everyone to have one bag each at the beginning of the week and two at the end. They were however right out of artificial sweeteners. Sainsbury's had only brown sugar, while the International Stores on Market Hill (remember them?) had only a small amount of demerara at 10p a pound.

In St Neots there was virtually no sugar on the shelves, though by strict rationing Dudeney and Johnstons had seven bags left on sale. Woolworth's had had none for three weeks. The situation was similar in Saffron Walden and Royston was rationed.

John Wilson, manager of Ely Tesco, told how customers swooped on 1,400 packets of sugar in only two hours. His was not an easy position to hold: "Customers are so insulting. What do they say to me? It is unrepeatable. By the end of the year there will be so many shortages that managers' lives will be hell. First it was toilet rolls, now it's sugar. We are all going to end up nervous wrecks"

Later in the year the panic switched to salt and by December queues formed outside a new shopping experience – the giant Sainsbury's superstore on the corner of Coldham's Lane and Perne Road, Cambridge. Traffic came to a standstill and queues built up as eager shoppers converged on the packed shelves and crowds formed round the plentiful supplies of sugar – though rumours circulated that the town-centre store had been denuded just to give a boost to the new one.

One useful man to have in a sugar shortage was a teacher like Bill Leach, as Rosey Rossiter (nee Sward) of Cherry Hinton, remembers. "In one of his science lessons, at Milton Road Junior School, 1944, he brought in a sugar beet which had "fallen off the back of a lorry" and proceeded to demonstrate how it was eventually made into sugar (with the help of a bunsen burner to melt it down!)"

"Colin Fleming is still alive – are you?" Perhaps you remember him from his days at a cycle shop in Burleigh street, Cambridge or earlier with the "Marfly Entertainers", a troupe of 20 entertainers who comprised the Marshall's Flying School concert party and toured British and American bases and army camps during the war years. The man responsible for it all was Bert Miller, a comic, whilst Colin provided the accompaniment on the piano and performed accordion solos.

There was another name from those days which still haunts him. Joan Hicks was a ‘chaser’ at Marshall’s, a job which took her all over the factory. Whenever she came into hangar number four, where Colin worked, she spoke to him. Sometimes they took their tea breaks together with biscuits on the flight deck of an aircraft. They never dated and one day she stopped coming. But Colin still treasures some poetry she wrote. He includes some of her verses in a little volume entitled “Poetic Encounter, 1938-1947” which also includes poems written by his father, Harry Colin Fleming, who some may remember as landlord of the Sun Inn Waterbeach or as head porter at Jesus College.

As for Colin himself, one-time juggler, unicyclist, plate-spinner of Butlins, Pontins and Warner holiday-camp fame, not to mention numerous tv appearances. Well, he’s still alive and living near Sandown, Isle of Wight. If you’d like his address let me know.

Memories 2nd September 1999, by Mike Petty

Haddenham is usually a peaceful village, but some still talk of the day, 75 years ago, when things turned distinctly nasty. It was all to do with the sale of a haystack.

Farmers throughout fenland have always had an additional burden to bear – the payment of drainage rates on top of all their other expenses. Fred Peacock had paid the first instalment of his Ouse Drainage rate, but many of his neighbours had not. So Fred was upset when asked for the second half, and refused to pay until the others had forked out. The Drainage Board decided to make an example and sent in an auctioneer to sell one of his haystacks and get the money that way. The scene was set for the fun that followed.

George Love, auctioneer of Bridge Street, Cambridge arrived at the premises in Hill Row, Haddenham to conduct the sale. He found a considerable crowd of farmers and their wives. He also found the hay, which had been grown by Peacock to feed his stock during the coming winter. People pointed out that it had not been grown on land subject to drainage rate, and was standing on land that did not belong to Peacock. It was however visible from the man road, and on the main road Love took up his position.

The auctioneer called for bids, but no bids were forthcoming. Instead eggs made their appearance & things got lively. The eggs came from all directions, some hit him on the hat, some on the chest, some on other parts of his body, in fact he was hit all over. The eggs were thrown singly and in volleys, but nobody was really sure where they came from – though Mrs Peacock did have a large shopping bag with her. Nor were they good eggs, in fact they were well rotten.

Nobody really saw who was throwing them – Fred Searle did have one in his hand “but was only egged on by the others”. Fitch Everitt was seen hurling one, though even the policeman confessed that egg had not been thrown at the auctioneer at all, but at somebody else – perhaps he was practising – and that immediately afterwards Fitch had been overcome with the pong, & dashed behind a hedge to be sick.

In fact it appeared the farmers of Haddenham were just very bad aimers – intending to hit the Board’s bailiff, or to settle old scores amongst themselves. But none could dispute that before very long the auctioneer stood like a hero besmattered with yolks of many hues, and with a dead chicken sprawled across one shoulder of his suit. The suit could not be produced in court as it was still too smelly.

The Ely Police Courtroom was too small to house all the crowds of well-wishers who flocked to the trial and a larger court-room had to be pressed into use. The proceedings were as liberally smattered with wisecracks and laughter as the auctioneer had been with eggs. In the end all six accused were found guilty, and in one voice declared they would go to prison before they would pay the fines, at which the gallery burst into applause. As they were led down a voice from the rear of the court offered to pay the fines for them.

The battle of Hill Row was concluded, but the battle against the drainage rates continued, and still causes controversy to this day.

Do you remember Colin Fleming from his days at a cycle shop in Burleigh street, Cambridge or earlier with the “Marfly Entertainers”, a troupe of 20 entertainers who comprised the Marshall’s Flying School concert party and toured British and American bases and army camps during the war years. Colin accompanied comic Bert Miller, on the piano and performed accordion solos.

Joan Hicks was a ‘chaser’ at Marshall’s, a job which took her all over the factory. Whenever she came into hangar number four, where Colin worked, she would speak to him. Sometimes they took their tea breaks together with biscuits on the flight deck of an aircraft. They never dated and one day she stopped coming. But Colin still treasures some poetry she wrote. He includes some of her verses in a little volume entitled “Poetic Encounter, 1938-1947” which also includes poems written by his father, Harry Colin Fleming, a former head porter at Jesus College.

As for Colin himself, one-time juggler, unicyclist, plate-spinner of Butlins, Pontins and Warner holiday-camp fame, not to mention numerous tv appearances. Well, he’s still alive living near Sandown, Isle of Wight, and would love to hear from you. If you’d like his address let me know.

Memories 9th September 1999, by Mike Petty

The news that Cambridge will shortly be home to the biggest pub in the country, when a new hostelry opens on the site of the former Regal Cinema is a reminder of how things keep repeating themselves. For the Regal cinema was built on the site of one of Cambridge’s oldest inns, the Castle, which burnt down in August 1934. The inn dated back to the thirteenth century and had been reconstructed about 1620. It even had a room in which Oliver Cromwell was said to have slept – and which it was said his ghost still haunted.

It prompts me to look back on some of the pubs that Cambridge has lost and gained in recent years. By 1990 it was reported that Cambridge had lost half of the 500 pubs it had in 1950. My own knowledge of these is strictly limited, but if the names ring bells with you I should be pleased to hear. They include:

1950s :

Plume of Feathers, Park street- demolished 1953 – but we gained the Weathervane and the Carlton Arms in 1959

1960s

gains : Racehorse, Newmarket road 1961; Queen Edith, 1961; Man on the Moon, Norfolk Street, 1964; Jenny Wren, St Kilda avenue, 1965; Plough & Harrow, Madingley Rd, 1968 losses : Angel, Market Hill, 1962; Pelican, East Rd, 1967; Criterion, Market Passage, 1968; House of Commons, 1969; gains : Alma Brewery (embracing Alma pub), Russell St & Kings Arms, King St (replaces old Royal Arms), 1972; Ship, Arbury (transferring the name from a pub in Coronation street), 1974; Granta, Barton road reopened after rebuilding, as did the Red Cow which reopened after Lion Yard redevelopment 1975; Spade & Becket, Thompsons Lane (formerly George & Dragon), Salisbury Arms opened as CMRA pub after closing 1973, Panton Arms refurbished – all 1976; Free Press reopened 1978 having been threatened with demolition in 1960s;

1970s

Cambridge Arms 1980

losses : Wheatsheaf, Castle Hill, 1970; Britannia, East Rd, & Old English Gentleman, Fitzroy St, 1971; Brewers Arms, Gydir St, 1972; 1975 saw the loss of the King William IV, Newmarket Rd & The Bun Shop, St Andrew's Hill – of which the "Romsey Town News" in 1974 commented: "Scores of people still flock there to enjoy friendly and lively hospitality. Two rooms are served by one bar, it is not tarted up and few places are left in the town with such character" losses : Ancient Druids, Fitzroy street – last of nine pubs closed due to the Kite Area redevelopment (but opened in Napier St 1984) & Rose, Rose Crescent 1981; Eagle, Bene't street closed temporarily in 1988 for redevelopment but reopened later to great acclaim

1980s

What others do you remember?

Frank Dobie, a Texan, who knew Cambridge during the war recalled: "There are numerous pubs in Cambridge – The Baron of Beef, out of bounds for American soldiers; The Angel, there soldiers are too thick for anybody else to get in bounds; The CastLe, where the matured barmaid combines dignity with easy welcome; The Jug and Bottle, where citizens take their pitchers to be filled; The Red Cow, too cavelike for cheer; The Bun Shop, often in stock when other pubs have run out but too garrulous for conversation; the Hat and Feathers, too far away; The Little Rose, just what it should be."

The Volunteer in Green Street was one of the busiest pubs in town during the early 1950s. It had been enlarged in 1947 and redecorated with furniture from bombed-out Gt Yarmouth pubs. It enjoyed an all-day trade with snacks considered definitely superior to college lunches and in 1948 was serving 100 gallons of bitter on an average Saturday night. Their speciality then was an audit ale called "Old Nog" which had kept up its pre-war strength – "you can't comfortably carry more than four – we hope to have it on draught soon" commented landlord Fred Godlington. By 1963 it was a popular meeting place for undergraduates with social evenings featuring chess, skittles, billiards and draughts. They also hosted an inter-college competition for drinking a yard of ale in the shortest time – the record then being 11.4 seconds, held by an undergraduate from Sidney Sussex college. When did it close?

Villages too have lost their locals. My memory of the Chequers in Stretham is of playing darts – something else I was no good at. The dart hit the light over the board and put it out. End of game. The next player tried to put it back on again, which fused the entire pub. End of going to that pub!

Of course the pubs are one thing, their clientele another. The late Harold Painter, from Sutton, used to collect masses of village memorabilia and compiled fascinating notebooks of sketches and rhymes. [SKETCHES ENCLOSED AND ON DISK] One of these was :

“I remember, I remember
The noses long and red
That hung o’er glasses tall
When day had long since sped:
The tables ringed with beer spilt,
The settles, where still they set.
The gossip of that yesteryear
Rings in my ear yet”

If it rings in yours too let me know. It’s not that long since the old men would gather in our village local, when they had their own seat and woe behold anybody who inadvertently sat in it. They’ve gone now, and we miss them – as is the spittoon which they invariably hit (or most of the time anyway)

Thank you to those who confirmed that the picture of a couple of weeks ago was indeed of Barton Road. Mrs B. Pratt from Trumpington tells me that on the left of the picture there was a large house, since demolished, which had a basement. She worked there from 1936-37 for Lady Macintosh and her daughter. At one time there was a small house adjoining the Red Bull.

Michael Payne from Cambridge has sent me an extract from his autograph book which contains a verse from teacher A.F. Leach. It is entitled “Crying for the Moon” and starts:

“I’d like John Dunn to get his sums all right,
And Michael Payne to know what’s nine times three
And Malcolm Gill not to be such a blight;
And Maurice Frost to know his A.B.C.”

There is one name at least that should be familiar to us all for Malcolm Gill went on to become Chief Cashier at the Bank of England and it was his signature on the old £1 and £5 notes.

PICTURE SCANNED ON DISK

Mrs P. Konsiewicz of Haslingfield has lent me a picture that may stimulate a few memories. It was taken on a staff outing from the Laurie and McConnell store in Fitzroy Street, Cambridge in the early 1950s. Two names to start you off: the third lady from the left is Daphne Dearsley and the fourth Shirley Conner (or O’Conner). If you’re having difficulties remembering Lauries I include a picture of Fitzroy Street

OTHER PICTURES – SEE SEPARATE NOTES

NB : TEXT ON DISK MAY BE DIFFERENT FROM THIS PRINT-OUT

MEMORIES 17th September 1999, by Mike Petty

I was invited the other the day to give some advice to a lady engaged in that awful job of having to clear a house, full of books. One item which caught my eye was a copy of the University's "Varsity Handbook" for 1957-58. So just how were the new undergraduates being prepared for their big adventure of Cambridge life, 40 years ago.

The freshman would be one of some 8,000 undergraduates arriving in the city. He would find awaiting him either a gyp or bedder who "will have cleaned the rooms of many generations of undergraduates, and will have no illusions about them. He can be a very great help to you in many ways. The small tip that you are expected to give him at the end of each term does not indicate that you are the victim of a protection racket. It is just part of his regular wages".

Many students would find themselves living in lodgings. Here the Varsity guide is less than flattering: "It would be pleasant to say that the traditional tyrannous landlady is a mythical figure, but the fact is she does exist. Most landladies are normal people and some are exceptionally kind but a few gorgons remain. Tough, poker-faced and filled with strange obsessions they can make your life miserable". Students were encouraged to develop "a reasonable aloofness, and a brisk way of talking" which would engender a certain amount of respect. (Were you a 'gorgon' and did you have cause to be. What was the reality of being a college landlady in those days?)

College porters were another group it would pay students to cultivate for they could be of great assistance on many points of information and University etiquette. This would include a knowledge of University regulations, such as not using a radio or gramophone on the river or in any other public place, without proctorial permission, and of course the rules over gowns. These had to be worn after dusk, or when in the University Library, in church or the Senate House. They must be worn "in decent order and in the proper manner" and not over a sweater, or by ladies in trousers. There is no mention of students "climbing in" after returning back to college too late, or had the practice of locking the main college gates ended by then? Certainly Mr T. Miller from Orwell has shown me a photograph of himself and friends, bedecked in their gowns, climbing into Peterhouse in 1943 – a picture taken to send to Russia, though why they would want such an image of Cambridge during the dark days of the War I cannot imagine.

So what was the fashion in 1957. The customary outfit for everyday wear was the sports jacket together with grey flannel or cavalry twill trousers. For relaxed occasions the coloured ski-sweater and the silk cravat were most popular. For social functions you needed a smart lounge suit – along with a good selection of not too gaudy ties. A dinner jacket would be a necessity – although it could be hired for £1.2.6 a day from Jack Carter of Portugal Place, or bought second hand from Normal Bradley, Bridge Street.

Accessories included an umbrella, "which adds character to your appearance when neatly rolled", a duffel coat was indispensable for winter and the normal custom was to complete the disguise with a college or boat club scarf. That left just one more essential – a cap, which would give an added touch of affluence. Select a tweed cap as opposed to a corduroy one, but remember not to wear it with a gown. Even on a cold winter night you were only allowed to warm your head with a mortarboard, as this was the only legal headwear with a gown.

By 1960 Cambridge tailors were bemoaning the changing face of undergraduate fashion, now that 80 per cent of undergraduates were on a grant and boaters and blazers no longer the accepted fashion. The trend to more casual wear, sloppy-joes and 17 inch trouser bottoms was hitting their trade. Cambridge's oldest bespoke tailor, Pratt, Manning & co. closed in 1962 lamenting how: "Thirty years ago students were proud of their dress and bought four suits at a time. Now they shuffle around in jeans and sweaters and do not have two halfpennies to rub together"

The Varsity Handbook advice to women in 1957 was: “the men will outnumber you by ten to one. So what are you going to do about it. You can sit on your laurels and wait for the flies to swarm around the honey pot. You don’t have to dress as if you were a Vogue model ... but beware! Most Cambridge men are explorers at heart. The excavator is the man who believes the real you is only to be found under all those layers of (we hope) attractive clothing”. I am not sure such comments would be encouraged today, nor that female students would compete for the title of University Rag Queen in quite the same way some of them did ten years later in 1967

So what was the social scene of the late 1950s. “Parties are very popular in Cambridge, but most of them are unfortunately very dull. The day of the small dinner party ended when grants made their appearance. You should try and give the odd party, for the mean man is soon shunned. A ‘Please bring a bottle and a partner’ will not cost you very much and one party a year is plenty”

The Varsity Handbook offered one final tip to the newcomer: “Don’t be too abashed at the great men who are at the top when you arrive. In three year’s time they will be Joe and Alf to you, so why not now? All you need is a little self-confidence. But don’t be bumptious. You may get on, but you won’t be popular”

There are surprisingly few pictures of 1950’s student life but I feature a selection from a year or two later

READERS WRITE

Ann Brown, nee Wilkins, of Histon has contacted me to say that she and her friend Betty Dale used to perform with Colin Fleming in the Marfly Concert Party. Her mother made their costumes out of blackout material, edged with orange binding.

Mrs O. Osborne from Comberton writes to say my picture of Coronation Street (Memories 2nd September) reminds her of when her parents kept the Hare and Hounds public house on Newmarket Road between 1932 and 1934. “Father used to write the drayman’s order on Sundays and often as juniors we walked to Lacons Brewery in Coronation Street to post the order in the letter box, then straight home again. This errand would surely be out of the question for young children today, with the horrendous traffic and modern day hazards. Thank you for these memory reminders Brendan Wyndham or Burwell spent part of his youth touring Cambridge looking for public houses, which he plotted on a map, remembering also the various ales they stocked. Mr A. Driver of Cambridge has sent an impressive list of pubs that he remembers having closed since the last war. These include the Still and Sugarloaf on Market Hill, the Duke of Cambridge in Short Street, the Air Port Hotel on Newmarket Road and a pub in James Street, the name of which has slipped his memory. He has sharper memories of a Wellington bomber crashing on Histon Road early in the war. It smashed into two houses belonging to a Mr Ison and the Misses Allen who kept a sweetshop with its tail resting on houses on the other side of the road. Does this jog memories with anybody else?

MYSTERY PHOTOGRAPH

Some years ago I came across this photograph in the News files, but failed to note down where or when it had been taken. The car in the distance carries L plates and had the number BE 28. Can anybody identify it please

SCANS :

photo of 3 Cambridge undergraduates from Varsity Handbook 1957-58
caricature of the modern undergraduate from a Co-op advert 1957 line of houses in street – mystery picture

OTHER PICS : see separate notes – include contestants at the Cambridge University Rag Queen competition, 1967

Memories, 25th September 1999, by Mike Petty

Mrs P. Konsiewicz of Haslingfield has lent me a picture that may stimulate a few memories. It was taken on a staff outing from the Laurie and McConnell store in Fitzroy Street, Cambridge in the early 1950s. Two names to start you off: the third lady from the left is Daphne Dearsley and the fourth Shirley Conner (or O'Conner).

If you're having difficulties remembering Lauries I include a picture of Fitzroy Street which will locate it for you - next to Peaks the furnishers near the corner with Fair street.

The shop first opened about 1883 but in 1903 suffered a disastrous fire. Fire fighters rushed to the scene but had no fire engine they could bring - just six hose reel carts stationed at various parts of the town. With no pumping equipment they relied entirely on the poor mains water pressure and quite expected the whole of Fitzroy Street to be devastated. They considered wiring to London for an engine to be sent up by a special train but felt this would have taken too long.

In the event the street was saved though the shop was just a mass of blackened ruins. But Mr McConnell was not one to accept defeat. He moved some of the salvaged stock to the garden of the house in which he was lodging, opened a temporary shop in Fair Street, accepted an insurance settlement of £22,650 and set to work constructing a new building.

The new premises featured a little bandstand from which the Cambridge Town Band used to play to entertain Saturday shoppers, while teas were served in a roof garden. For a while the Police Band performed but their woodwind instruments could not be heard in the street below.

Throughout the century the firm expanded until it occupied much of that side of the street. In 1950 a planning report suggested the Fitzroy street area would be a valuable relief for shopping pressure in the historic centre. The debate dragged on for over 25 years blighting other developments. In 1977 Laurie & McConnell announced their closure, blaming planning indecision.

Even before that, Fitzroy street was an area which had seen considerable change as Sara Payne found when she visited it for her wonderful "Down your street" articles in the Cambridge Weekly News in September 1981 - can it really be 18 years ago!

One of the characters she interviewed then, and somebody I had the privilege of chatting to myself, was Percy Moon, whose father used to keep a draper's shop in the street. He used to tell me that it was a very astronomical area since another trader was a Mr Starr. Moon and star, people would say, where's the sun? I'm the son, said Percy, because my dad keeps the shop.

He also recalled some most important local traders, Norman Bradley and Frederick Morley, two pawnbrokers. The women used to go into Morley's on a Saturday to get the suits out so that their husbands could go to church on a Sunday morning. The manager, C.J. Fordham recalled in 1964 how "Monday morning used to be very busy and we often had queues waiting outside to put their Sunday clothes in pawn for another week"

Richard Benstead of Ely recalls another local trader, Frank Evans, who used to have a tailor's shop at 6 Fitzroy Street. He writes: "Frank was a countryman at heart and would set out in a pony and trap to offer tailoring services to farmers and villagers around the town. Being near to Jesus College, a certain amount of University tailoring was also undertaken. Most of the work was not done at the shop as it was very small inside, just sufficient for one man to work sitting on the back room bench, under the glass skylight. The rest of the work was sent to outworkers. I actually still have my old college blazer, made by him and the badge embroidered by my mother on the pocket"

Somehow Sunday best clothes is not something usually remembered in connection with the area of Fitzroy street nearer East Road, which was hit particularly badly by the planning indecision that surrounded the development of the Grafton Centre.

Pictures in the News library show run-down shops and houses in the 1960s & Percy North, who you may remember as a chiropodist next to the Festival Theatre on Newmarket Road, took many photographs of the area in the 1950s which are now in the Cambridgeshire Collection. But none of them tell us much about the people who lived there - was it a pleasant place to live, or were folk happier in new homes on the new Arbury Estate.

If you knew the area before all the redevelopment, or remember other local shops, please drop me a line at the News. And if you have pictures to jog post-war memories I'd love to see them.

R.H. Oakman of Cambridge is the first to recognise my mystery picture of last week. It was of Brandon Place, taken from the City Road end. The left hand side shows the back entrances to houses in John Street and is the same today but the houses on the right have long since gone and been replaced by Brandon Court, a sheltered home complex. Thank you.

I have dug out another unlabelled picture from the News files. I think it's somewhere in the Fitzroy Street, Burleigh street area, but do you recognise your backway or the tall building in the background please

Keith Ward from Canada is trying to contact some old boys from the Central School for Boys. Some of the teachers that come to his mind are Jock Livingstone, Dinger Bell, Taffy Evans, Dick Ansley, Buster Brown, Ted Edser, Percy Franklin and a French Teacher by the name of Parker - he's forgotten the first name - perhaps excusable since he's thinking back to 1945. If you remember Keith & have E-mail you can contact him at kward@netcom.ca or otherwise write to me at the News

More memories of pubs have come streaming in. Olive Osborne from Comberton recalls some others which have closed, including The Tiger & Granville Arms on East Road, the Old Abbey in Beche Road & The Rabbit in Gold Street, while Bob Nicholas of Milton Road, Cambridge sends a list of over 60 that he recalls.

Brian Poulter has lived in Cambridge for over 60 years and remembers how before the last war the family used to walk out to the Plough and Harrow on Madingley Road on Sunday evenings and eat in its gardens. He recalls the Granta on Newnham Road and the Bun Shop on St Andrew's Hill which was a favourite watering place for himself and fellow soccer players in the 1950s and 60s. At the time there were two bars and it was very popular with both town and gown.

Another correspondent recalls that Walter "Wally" Hall was 'mine host' of the Fitzroy Arms in Fitzroy Street, where the staff of Boots, just opposite, used to gather each Christmas Eve for a seasonal toast. "Happy memories of that area and its residents will always remain" for my shy reader, who omits to sign the letter. Nelly and Paddy Munnelly were the final landlords of the Tiger in East Road, until it closed in October 1972. They then went on to celebrate 30 years in the licensed trade, and send a list of other good pubs they remember

Mrs P. Anderson of Cherry Hinton Road, Cambridge has a favourite story of the landlord of "The Angel" in Market Street. She writes: "Being situated where it was, it was popular with students, and one day, in the 1930's there was a college rugby team in there doing what rugby teams usually do when they are celebrating. As they left one of the students said to the landlord 'What do you do we we aren't here?' 'That's easy son,' the landlord is reputed to have replied, 'We just put away the half pint glasses

Peter Hall recalls his grandparents, Rue and Kate Elsdon who took over the tenancy of The Fitzroy Arms in Fitzroy Street in 1914 and together with his parents ran it until 1954. The pub was quite a social centre in its day being the headquarters for The Albion Angling Society, The Preservation Society, a Buff Lodge, Foresters lodge, Gogs Ragle Club etc. How many remember the Albion kids annual fishing matches when seemingly millions of snotty nosed kids were taken off for a day by the river somewhere with the prize giving usually held on Parker's Piece

Memories of The Eagle come from Mrs J. Pryme of Willingham. She recalls: "In the 1950s by mother and father, Frank and Phyllis Lawrence worked for Corpus Christi college. Ted Gent was the landlord of the Eagle and on Christmas Day he would open the pub in the morning and close for the rest of the day. We would be invited to the Eagle big room upstairs for a big Christmas party. At the bottom of Eagle Yard was a printing press where my dad printed the late football results for the Evening Standard

PICTURE :

SCANS : LAURIE & McCONNAL staff outing

BACK GARDENS OF HOUSES SOMEWHERE AROUND FITZROY ST - BURLEIGH STREET - CAN ANYBODY PLACE IT PLEASE

OTHER PICS ENCLOSED, WITH CAPTIONS

MEMORIES, 1st October 1999, by Mike Petty

NB THIS PRINT OUT MAY DIFFER FROM TEXT ON DISK

In April 1963 the News went "Down your street" along Histon Road. Reporter Erica Dimock found a street where residents were gradually witnessing the countryside slipping away from their doorsteps. The latest development was the new McManus Estate where it was planned to build 500 flats, houses and bungalows as demand arises. On the other side of the road people were still living in prefabricated houses and seemed very content with the "temporary" homes erected as an emergency measure during the war.

Much of the road still had a semi-rural aspect with two nurseries, the Clive Vale run by the Dear family and Scotsdale Nurseries where they specialised in geraniums & bedding plants.

Nearby was the Scotsdale Laundry where the washing used to be done by hand and hung up on ropes to dry, although now roller mangles, coppers and flat irons had been replaced by electrical machines of every type. Mr R. Turvill, its director was confident that trade would continue to boom, despite washing machines now being within the budget of most households and laundrettes springing up on every corner – besides which laundries eliminated the gruelling task of ironing. But just down the road was the Midland Co-operative Laundry, who operated a “bagwash” service where customers could send their sheets, towels and other articles to be washed and collect them clear and dry, but unironed.

The oldest florist shop in the road was operated by Ernie Phillips, while others might recall Clark’s newspaper shop, W. Welch butchers and Yallop’s fish shop, whilst Ison’s corn merchant’s business was the biggest distributor of its kind in Cambridge, employing over 40 people

But amongst all the details recorded, nobody mentioned the wartime incident recalled by Mr A Driver of Cambridge when a Wellington bomber crashed on the road

This almost forgotten incident sparked memories for Les Ray of Histon. He writes: “I lived on one of the houses opposite Mr Ison’s and apparently the crew abandoned the aircraft over Newmarket Heath after dropping its bombs over Germany, but still with incendiaries on board. The plane carried on to take the chimneys from my parents’ house and then to take the roof off Mr Ison’s houses and the two Misses Allen next door, who were unfortunately killed. The plane ended up on a tennis court belonging to Mr Freeman who owned a plumbing business”

Mrs Rosemary Kunish of Dry Drayton was actually involved in the incident, as she relates. “There were four terraced houses. My late father and mother, Mr & Mrs Ison, with myself, were in the first house, then the Misses Allen, then Mr & Mrs Waldock, & I cannot remember who lived in the fourth house. As a result of the crash there was someone killed in each of the houses except for ours. One of the Wellington engines ended up on the tennis court at the rear of the houses.

“The crash happened at night, we were all in bed & in my family house my father had to climb over heaps of debris, first carrying my mother downstairs & then returning to rescue me from under a pile of bricks. So the Ison family were lucky.”

“The following day the crew of the aircraft, who had parachuted out, were brought to view the wreckage. Although the top half of each house, together with the roofs, all disintegrated into rubble, the lower parts of the houses remained. They were eventually repaired and are still in use today.

Such horrific incidents are part of the pitfalls of war, but does anybody remember a potentially much more serious incident which occurred just 50 years ago – the crash of a US Atom bomber.

The Cambridge Independent Press of 14th October 1949 reported how Newmarket and surrounding districts were shaken by an enormous explosion when a giant six-engines American B50 stratobomber, the latest type of U.S. bomber still on the secret list, crashed at Isleham. The plane was carrying a load of 12 live 500-lb bombs. It made a crater 30 feet by 20 feet and 10 feet deep. Wreckage was scattered about the stubble field on Beck Road, where the crash occurred. Neighbouring farm buildings and stacks were set alight and blazed for hours afterwards. Houses had their windows & ceilings blown in and the walls of the village school were cracked.

Or perhaps you recall another incident at Ely in August 1951 when a Harvard training plane crashed on St Mary's street, coming to rest in the showroom of Messrs T.H. Nice & co. One member of the crew was killed, along with a passing lorry driver whose cab was ripped from his lorry by the plane.

[ONLY USE IF WE FEATURE THE PICTURE Such tragedies highlight the dangers faced by servicemen in war or peace and it is appropriate that Derrick Mallows of Lt Eversden should this week have sent me a picture of a war memorial "somewhere in England". Does anybody recognise it.]

On a much lighter, flying note, Anne Brown (nee Wilkins) has now found her photo of the Marfly Concert Party, taken in 1944. They entertained thousands of British & Allied troops at various camps and aerodromes. Amongst the faces you might recognise are Arthur Miller standing tall at the back and next to him Colin Fleming. Anne is in the centre of the middle row wearing a 'military' top as is her friend Betty Dale (now Milnes) in the front. Also there are Hazel Hargreaves, Irene Watts, Cynthia Cockerton and Beryl Turkentine. Anne and Betty have had many happy times reminiscing about the picture and would be delighted to hear from anybody else. I'll pass on letters.

Doris Kriesi of Cambridge has been scouring her photo album since the picture of Brandon Place appeared in Memories a couple of weeks ago. She has sent a snap of her grandmother, Martha Bonnett, standing outside her house in that street. "I and my two bothers were always happy going to see granny Bonnett", she recalls. "She was left a widow with three girls and a boy, my mother, the oldest was only 10; granny died in her 93rd year at the same house"

ILLUSTRATIONS

Histon road, Cambridge in 1960s

HEADLINES of the Isleham bomber crash, CIP 14 October 1949 & of Ely plane crash, 1951
—copied by Photographic from Cambridgeshire Collection

Marfly concert party 1944 —SCAN ON DISK

Village war memorial – where is it? – SCAN ON DISK

Memories, by Mike Petty 7th October 1999, by Mike Petty

The news that the name of Eaden Lilley is set to return to the Cambridge shopping scene with a new food hall in Sussex street, will delight those who lament the loss of old names and services. Their return is not unprecedented for the name that once dominated the grocery trade in Trinity street – that of Matthews, which closed in 1964, is now to be found gracing a coffee stall on Cambridge market. This in turn is just yards away from where the aroma of freshly ground coffee used to waft from the premises of Hallack and Bond, on the corner of Petty Cury – and just around the corner was Jo Lyons teahouse, where Central Library staff used to take their breaks in the 1960s (the library staff-room being reserved for the Admin staff). Then when a late-night shift beckoned (and the library opened until 9pm in those days) there was the Civic Restaurant for a hot meal to sustain the final hours.

So many names have disappeared from central Cambridge over the last few decades. Older readers may remember Coad's drapers and tailors in Sidney street, while Bodger's the tailors and Gallyon's gun shop which closed in 1982 after 198 years are more recent.

But change has always continued and often been lamented. When George Stace closed in Petty Cury in 1951 people lamented the closing of yet one more old established firm which had filled a special place in the local fashion scene for many years, its place was taken by a big, modern multiple tailoring store. Another tailor, Suttle, closed in 1958.

More tailors gave up in the “swinging 60’s” as student fashions changed, but new shops came in. Did you shop at Pussy Cat Boutique or the Alley, Cambridge’s answer to Carnaby street. Names that disappeared included Weatherheads stationers on Market Hill, taken over by W.H. Smith and Macintosh ironmongers just along the street. But there was a new addition to the shopping scene when Tesco opened in St Andrew’s street in 1964 – does anybody have memories of shopping at Tesco I wonder (they were there till 1983).

The ‘70s brought traffic restrictions in the city centre and the start of superstores with the Co-op’s Beehive designed as a discount warehouse for people wishing to purchase in bulk, but then opened to the public. Marshall’s applied for an out-of-town complex on Newmarket Road, Tesco tried for another in Milton Road – unsuccessfully – but the Government overruled local planners to allow Sainsbury to open in Coldham’s Lane. Mitcham’s on Chesterton Road and Laurie’s in Fitzroy street closed, but the opening of Lion Yard was followed by shop rent rises which were unaffordable by small local businesses as the multiples moved in. Now the old Lion Yard is once more wreathed in scaffolding as redevelopment takes place – will we look back in nostalgia in years to come?

Throughout the 1980s the “3 R’s” – rents, rates and recession – contributed to the demise of Wards cycles and electrical goods, Bacon & Ora tobacconists, F.O. Sennitt on Peas Hill, and specialists such as Grays bookbinders in Green Street & Pigotts tools in Sussex Street, while Barrett’s china shop moved out of the city. Meanwhile the Grafton centre with its big-name stores opened in 1984

In more recent years name such as Joshua Taylor and Eaden Lilley have gone – but now one at least has come back. What shops would you wish to see reinstated. But remember that shopping used to be very different not that long ago. People have mentioned queuing at Sainsbury’s old shop in Sidney street, waiting for the assistant to bring goods to the counter, then queuing to pay at the desk; and although waiting for your change as it swished through the air on those contraptions on wires was something to be remembered, surely it was much less convenient than today?

Mr H.J. Midge of Cambridge has written with his own shopping memories in the Fitzroy street area from the 1930s. He remembers J.A. Sturton, where the front part of the ground floor was a retail grocery and hardware shop, whilst the back and two upper floors operated as a wholesale business. Then there was Lawrence’s bread and cake shop & Freddy Hopkins Fish & Chips. Nearby was Suttle’s confectionery and tobacco and on the corner of City Road W. Thompson the furnishers.

B.D. Thompson recalls Pages the bakers, Pearkes the grocery store, Taylor the chemist, Mrs Tarrant’s sweet shop, the International Stores and Home and Colonial – “gosh didn’t we have a choice of food shops?” he remarks.

But the main point of Mr Thompson’s letter was to share his memories of old schoolmasters at the Central School in response to the appeal from Keith Ward of Canada. He recalls Rowland Parker who taught French and wrote two books on the history of Foxton, Jock Livingstone had served with the Royal Marines during the Great War, Dick Annely taught geography – “one day he decided to give us a rest from topography by playing classical music on a gramophone”. Taffy Evans taught woodwork, Dinger Bell music and sport – “a dapper little man, he drove a super sports car, while Buster Brown was loved and admired by all who knew him – but he would keep brushing my unruly locks with a file brush”. H.F. King – (who many will remember as the first head of biology at the Grammar School) – tells me that several of the teachers moved to the new Grammar School in Queen Edith’s Way. Jack Cornwell of Birdwood Road, Cambridge was at the Central between 1943 & 1949 and played football and cricket for the school. He too remembers the Burleigh street area as his father ran a second hand furniture shop there and was a well-known local character.

Trevor Gill from Burwell attended the Central School between 1947 and 1951. He has sent me a photograph of a group of footballers in training on the Cambridge City ground off Milton Road. Trevor is in the front of the left hand line, behind him is Ron Gibbons and behind him Michael Rice. They all played for the Central School and the other two went on to play for Cambridge schoolboys and St Andrew's Football Club in its early days. On the right with the leather football is Spud Driver who also played for the Cambridge School boys. Do you recognise anybody else

MYSTERY PICTURE – ONLY USE TEXT IF WE USE PICTURE

An older generation of young sportsmen features in a photo lent by Jim Laughton of Cherry Hinton Road, Cambridge. It shows the sporting prowess of the Albert Institute, featuring their boat that, according to one of the shields, was head of the river from 1891-97. The Institute were also cross country champions according to another shield, but there are also boxing gloves and cricket kit on display. The group are posed outside the half-opened door of Kerridge the builder. It may be too far back for anybody to remember, but does anything ring any bells?

Last week's Millennium Memories picture shows a queue for potatoes on outside S. Green's shop on Mill Road during the Great War, when food rationing was intense. The potential danger of long queues caused margarine to be removed from central shops and distributed from the Corn Exchange

PICTURES ON DISK : SCHOOLBOY FOOTBALLERS August 1952 ALBERT INSTITUTE SPORTSMEN

MEMORIES, 14th October 1999, by Mike Petty

Twenty five years ago, in October 1974, the debate was opening on the future of the Cambridge Corn Exchange with proposals unveiled to turn it into a concert hall. It would, it was said, be contentious – but then much associated with the building has prompted controversy

Right at the start there were what is recorded as the Death Riots. In November 1875 John death, Mayor of Cambridge, was also owner of a livery stable. As he drove in his robes and chain to open the new Corn Exchange various undergraduates called out "Whoa Mayor" – but he carried on to do his civic duty.

Then two days later an inaugural concert was held, arranged by the Cambridge Musical Society. The building was packed, the reserved seats patronised by dignitaries and members of the University being separated from the promenade by a barricade. During the singing of the National Anthem certain undergraduates in the promenade began to yell and stamp. When the Mayor and Corporation attempted to reach their reserved seats they were jostled and had to force their way through.

Before long the concert was interrupted and twice the Mayor appealed to the undergraduates to keep order, but to no avail. Women fainted, children screamed and many of those standing rushed the barrier and pushed people out of their seats. Goaded to anger the Mayor sent for a body of police to keep order and seven arrests were made. This led the undergraduates to attempt to "rescue" their colleagues and some of the police were roughly handled. Under such circumstances the concert had to be abandoned.

The next day undergraduates burnt effigies of the Mayor, crying “Death! ... Death!” and after the arrested men were heavily fined a mob marched on the Mayor’s house, which stood on the site of the present Wesley church. Here police were able to prevent the house being broken into, though stones smashed the windows and the situation seemed out of control.

Then onto the scene strode “Black Morgan”, tutor of Jesus College, a popular figure in the University. As the crowds parted before him he climbed on a wall and addressed the crowds. “You young scoundrels, you ought to be ashamed of yourselves frightening a lot of old women out of their wits”. He told the multitude that he would be quite blind for five minutes, but no longer and during that period the crowd dispersed with three cheers for the Tutor of Jesus. No further action was taken by proctor or police.

Since its dramatic inauguration the Corn Exchange has echoed to tranquil dance music & the heady beat of pop bands; to the ping-pong of table tennis competitions, the rumble of roller-skating wheels and the patter of motor car salesmen. It was the place where the Hon C.S. Rolls first rode a motor cycle – before going on to found his car company. Winston Churchill addressed a meeting of undergraduates there in 1939 and I’m told the Home Guard’s rifles were assembled there at the start of the Second World War. It has been home to violence of a different sort – with boxing and wrestling tournaments, while drink has played its part through beer festivals. There have been dog shows, book shows, children’s entertainment and old people’s teas, twist and bingo sessions. For a while it was even used as a corn exchange, when farmers and merchants conducted their business, though this aspect of its life is surely all but forgotten – or do you remember it.

One man present through much of its varied career was Jonas Webb, whose statue used to dominate the hall in commemoration of his prowess as a breeder of sheep at Babraham. But in 1971 Jonas was taken away on the back of a lorry.

Throughout the 1970s the search was on for a source of funding to allow the transformation of the old building to be completed. Mayor Jack Warren started negotiations with millionaire recluse David Robinson, who having funded a new college, was now looking to make a contribution towards the city itself. But he found the Corn Exchange too ugly and the cost too high. Mecca became involved for a while, but things move at a leisurely pace in Cambridge and it was November 1986 before the hoped-for Concert Hall actually opened and the building itself started a new phase in its most varied career.

What are your memories of the Corn Exchange

READERS WRITE

Gilbert Crisp from Quy has identified one of the group on the Laurie’s outing as Billy Brigham. He also remembers how just before Christmas I featured a letter from Mr W. McClure of Barrow-in-Furness, Cumbria who had discovered a century-old parchment conferring a coat of arms on one Fred Crisp. Mr McClure was trying to discover something about this gentleman with a view to returning this most important document to the family. Now thanks to News readers we have tracked down a relation, Andrew Forman, an architect in Skipton, who is the proud possessor of the certificate to add to his extensive research about his long-lost ancestor. I will pass his research notes to the Cambridgeshire Collection.

Two readers have mentioned the man who used to keep an eye on shopping bags in Drummer street. Graham Clarke says his name was Jim Wooders and he used to charge 6d to 1s. Graham remembers he had only one leg and thinks he was probably injured in the 1914-18 war. Reg Wood from Saffron Walden also remembers that across Christ’s Pieces there used to stand a blind man who played a gramophone on top of a wooden box on which was written 'The public is my only support' –do you remember him?

John Furbank of Gt Shelford has supplied more details of the bomber that crashed on Histon Road, Cambridge on the night of 11-12th February 1941. The aircraft was a Vicars Wellington from 115 Squadron. It had taken off from RAF Marham on a mission to Bremen, Germany. The pilot, Pilot Officer Clarke, and his crew of four abandoned the aircraft in the vicinity of Cambridge. The squadron lost two other Wellingtons on the raid, one crashed attempting to land at RAF Finningley, Yorks and the other was abandoned over Saffron Walden. Mr D.C. Fordham writes to tell me he now lives in one of the Histon Road houses damaged that night, and lends me a picture of the famous Vicarage Terrace bombing.

Colin Webster of Wendens Ambo recalls an incident at a munitions site at Lord's Bridge. During the war it was used for bomb storage, including mustard gas. After the war one of the containers was being neutralised with petrol gas when it exploded. He thinks the date was about 1955

Mrs G. Buck from Blossom Street, Cambridge has sent me a cutting showing the last of the horse trams standing outside its depot in East Road in February 1914. The vehicle is virtually submerged by customers and besieged by crowds of onlookers. If it had attracted as many users normally then they would never have closed – for this was the last one. A reminder of the trams has been visible recently in Senate House Hill, Cambridge, for when the road works were in full flight it was still possible to see some of the old tram lines below the present road level

MYSTERY PICTURE – ONLY USE TEXT IF WE USE PICTURE

Jim Laughton of Cherry Hinton Road, Cambridge has lent a photograph demonstrating the prowess of the Albert Institute, featuring their boat that, according to one of the shields, was head of the river from 1891-97. The Institute were also cross country champions according to another shield, but there are also boxing gloves and cricket kit on display The group are posed outside the half-opened door of Kerridge the builder. It may be too far back for anybody to remember, but does anything ring any bells?

MEMORIES, 22nd October 1999, by Mike Petty

This being Flood Awareness Week it seems appropriate to recall some of the occasions when homes and their contents have suffered the devastation and disruption of flooding.

Of all the post-war floods that of March 1947 must be the one most remembered, certainly I seem to spend most of my lecturing life on about it. Many have forgotten that this local devastation also hit Cambridge with the area around Mill Pool under water, people marooned in their houses and buses ploughing through flooded streets

Many remember the awful flooding of 1953 when a very high North Sea tide overwhelmed sea defences, causing great damage and loss of caravans, and more significantly loss of life, in the area around Kings Lynn and Hunstanton. Certainly I remember being told about it when our family went for our annual sea-side holidays over 40 years ago. In Cambridge the local Women's Voluntary Service were busy distributing clothing for victims and were visited by the Queen Mother. Were you there?

Riverside areas of Cambridge are vulnerable to flooding from the Cam, as in January 1959, but even streets far from the river, such as Campkin Road can find themselves under water, as on one memorable occasion in June 1970 when on “Monsoon Day” 2½ feet of water gushed into houses and was made worse when waves from passing traffic pushed water back into houses that had been baled out. But it was fun for some, as the News reported: “As parents brought out buckets and mops the children dived for water wings. Within minutes the road took on the appearance of a seaside carnival, except that it was in the centre of Cambridge’s biggest housing estate, 60 miles from the nearest beach. There was even surf and breakers and heavy lorries and buses barged their way through the swirling water”

Outside Cambridge in 1974 the Ouse was well over its banks at many points between Houghton and Huntingdon and the river came up to the front door of the Fish & Duck at Lt Thetford – one of the difficulties of building a pub beside the river. Next year it was Swavesey where some farming land was under water for six months. But it was May 1978 when after 24 hours of rain – the heaviest for ten years – areas alongside the Cam flooded, including the new Pye factory at Chesterton then due to be opened. Aerial pictures taken by the News show some of the extent of the inundation. There was more flooding at Ely and the banks of the Soham Lode leaked like a sieve – for it is only when the floods come that the state of the banks can be properly known.

The area was on the verge of a major flood alert in March 1980 & engineers kept a round-the-clock vigil; torrential rain in April 1981 saw the bank burst at Kimbolton with conditions on a par with those of 1947. By the end of the year the conditions were right again, with heavy rain coinciding with a thaw and the icing up of roadside culverts. There was a red alert in January 1988 on one of the worst nights of floods in 10 years and in January 1993 alerts on almost a daily basis as rainfall 40% above average was recorded, more followed in October. February 1995 saw vast sheets of water laying at St Ives which were very slow to drain away.

Throughout all this the various agencies responsible for flood protection have been active, strengthening banks, putting in new warning systems, learning the lessons

The flooding of April 1998 is too recent and its effects too painful to be looked back on with nostalgia. Placenames familiar in the annals of flooding were once more affected – Alconbury, Hemingford, Earith, St Ives. Since then more steps have been taken, more lessons learned – and this Flood Awareness Campaign introduced.

Amongst the analyses of the events of April 1998 is one produced by Cambridgeshire Constabulary in a “Blueprint flood special”. The comments of Inspector Steve Lodge seems to me to sum up the story of flooding. He wrote: “ ‘The environment agency says that these floods will be at least as bad as those of 1947’. Wow! That sounds serious. What were the floods of 1947 like then? If we could retrieve data from the 1947 floods then we would have something to work to. Data, what data? None had been preserved and no-one could remember what the floods were like. No-one from any of the emergency services knew anything about 1947, and strangely, neither did anyone from the Environment Agency. So we had to start from scratch.” He concludes “The main lesson gleaned from the event was the need to preserve records and provide guidelines for the next poor devils who are faced with the phrase, ‘The environment agency says these floods will be at least as bad as those of 1998’. Wow! That sounds serious. What were the 1998 floods like then?”

If you have memories of flooding that you can bear to share I should be pleased to hear them

My appeal for your shopping memories has kept the postman busy, thank you to everybody who has written.

Pride of place must go to Miss Daphne Foreman of Sturton street, Cambridge who writes: "In 1947 I worked for Denton-Smith, architects at 40 Regent street. The offices were over Dobby's gown shop. The shop was later taken over by Currys electrical.

On the left was Sanders' garden shop and coming down Regent street from the traffic lights was Singers Sewing machine shop, where I took home-made garments to have machine-stitched buttonholes. There was Adams and Dellar newsagents, with three high steps up to the door. The Eastern Counties Library housed a sub post-office, where we bought the office stamps, then came a chemists, then Sanders and Dobby's. Further down were Woodward's typewriter service, who shared a doorway with Smith's dry cleaners. Opposite were the Glengarry Hotel, Brown and Pain haberdashers, Alkit men's store and Moore's pianos.

Later I moved to Llandaff Chambers over Robinson's Garage. Next to the entrance to Downing college the first coffee bar in Cambridge opened, called Snax, and after an evening at the Regal we girls would go there for coffee and fancy cake and feel we had really been 'on the town'

Dress materials were still hard to get so when the Belfast Linen Co. had a consignment of printed curtain material in three shades - pink, blue or yellow, we all hurried down and bought lengths to make dirndl skirts. Further down Vogue was a store into which we could only gaze, but instead of having a sale they would down-price one garment in the window. I once bought a gorgeous rust-red coat for £3 and later found the label inside marked at £25 - a lot of money for a coat in those days.

Rose's Fashion Centre in Sussex Street sold attractive women's fashions at a reasonable price, which felt a lot 'different' from M&S yet were within the reach of young office workers.

I wonder if anyone else remembers the 'invisible mending' shop in Corn Exchange Street, where we took our precious nylons to be repaired, by a system of picking up the dropped stitches in 'ladders' and re-knitting them up?

I remember Coad's - an old-fashioned shop even then, but one could often get accessories there which you could not find elsewhere. And Miller's Music Shop with the lovely sloping glass front where I bought sheet music each week. It all seems another world now"

John Witt of Histon used to be a partner in Hobbs Sports Outfitters in Trinity street remembers the Whim across the street. "I had coffee there most mornings during 1949 until it closed down. Often there would be long queues outside the door, right round into Green Street. The owner, a Miss Thoinber, would have a Christmas party for the shop owners of Trinity and Green streets & one year, in the early 1970s, Thora Hird was at one of these parties. She was filming in Saffron Walden with Marlon Brando in "The Night Comers" and found time to walk round and talk to all the guests". (Have you memories of meeting celebrities locally - or of filming in your area).

John used to purchase sale items from Shepherd's, but was not in the picture I featured. However Jeanne Barker of Hardwick was: "I had quite a shock when I opened the CEN and saw myself in the queue at Shepherd's sale in 1964, and still have the sheepskin coat which I was wearing. I recognise several of the 'regulars' who came to the sale each year but unfortunately can only see the back of my husband's head. I expect he was keeping well out of the way as he was skiving off work! Having been born in Green street (& my late husband Ray in Mill Lane) I am very interested in all your memories of Cambridge and can talk about them for hours"

The picture of Shepherd's sale, together with others featured today and over 300 more from the News' photo files appear in my new "Memory Lane, Cambridge" book, which is due to be received from Breedon Books any day and will be in the shops very soon at £14.99 [OR ARE WE OFFERING A READER PROMOTION?] There's a lunch & lecture at Gresham's (next to the YMCA), Gonville Place, on Thursday 28th October 12.15 pm (phone Cambridge 354012) & a presentation at Waterstone's in Sidney Street at 6.30 on Wednesday 17th November - so come along if you can

I do not however include this picture of an eminent group of "Old Boys" of the Central School, since Sally Whyte of Babraham has just lent me it. It was taken by the News in March 1956 at an Old Boys' dinner and shows Mess Fardell, Ray, Livingstone, Williamson, Henn, McFarlane Grieve, Bowman, Cogman and her father Cyril Moore, who organised the annual dinner dance at the Dorothy Ballroom. Through most of the 1950s Sally lived above Moore's the tobacconists, her grandfather's shop, at 50 Sidney Street. It was a lively meeting place during their breaks for many of the people who worked in nearby shops (Johnson's the tailors and Stockbridge's antiques on either side, Bodgers and the Gas Company alongside them). Employees of larger businesses such as King & Harper's garage in Jesus Lane were also regular customers, as well as policemen taking a quick break from point duty at the Market street junction who could be found drinking tea at the back of the shop. Mr Matthews ran a men's hairdressers on the ground floor at the back of the building, and for some years there was a ladies hairdressers on the first floor which was run by a Mrs Marjorie Womack. My family lived on the second and third floors, along with a resident ghost! (Have you encountered local ghosts - memories please)

More Central School memories have come from Thomas Taylor of Whittlesford who remembers staff and some of his class mates from the early 1930s. He still has all his terminal end of term and year reports together with the copper bowls and pots made in Mr Barnet's metalwork classes. Another treasure is a personally written guide book to the school camp at Looe in 1931 and 1933 which was produced by Mr G. Martin, the headmaster

A somewhat unusual plea has arrived from Mrs Beryl Johnson of Cherryhinton Road: "I have in my possession a tin nearly full of Wellington knife polish, which we cleaned and sharpened the old steel knives on. Knowing the original firm will be long gone would it be worth trying to trace them to see if any one is interested?" Can anyone help

Bonfire Night will soon be upon us, with all its organised firework displays. But do you remember when Cambridge was a place to avoid on November 5th, students forbidden to go into the centre, and the armed forces banned from the town. And how did you celebrate in your family or village. Does anybody have snaps?

MEMORIES, 29th October 1999, by Mike Petty

Recent correspondents to the News have bemoaned the number of abandoned cars littering the streets of Cambridge, though pictures in the News files indicate that such wrecks were also around in the 1960s.

Rodney Dale recalls how 55 years ago such old vehicles could be recycled. He writes: "We lived on Chesterton road, Cambridge, opposite Hallen's showroom on the corner of Hawthorn Way. One day in 1944 father discovered a chassis in the show room, a Bentley chassis. Although it had no body, petrol was unobtainable, and he didn't know how to drive it, Father forked out £125 and the chassis was pushed round into our garage. Needing a body where better to go than Les Rich's yard in Coldham's Lane. Father and fellow Addenbrooke's porter Harry Rooke went along to do a bit of measuring and came back with the news that a 1923 Sunbeam tourer body (£5) would fit the chassis - with a bit of work".

The work involved a considerable amount of measuring, adjusting and improvisation, eventually it was ready. "Petrol was virtually unobtainable, but you could get lighter-fuel if you tried hard and we were able to procure a box of those squidgy capsules of Ronson lighter fluid. Laboriously we squirted the lighter-fluid into the Autovac; Bunty Smith wound the handle; the engine started instantly. He sprang round into the driver's seat and depressed the clutch - it made a noise like a tiger. Into reverse, and the car leapt backwards into The Lane and stopped. It had run out of fuel. Father climbed on to his tricycle and pedalled off in such of more lighter-fuel. He returned bearing two 1/6 bottles of Ronson and we carefully poured them in. Bunty started the engine again; not wanting to risk running out of fuel during a trip to the end of the Lane and back, he drove back into the garage, and that was that"

But in those days you did not need petrol to operate motors. Charles Silverman senior is used to recycling office furniture from his base in Fen Road, Chesterton, but now seeks your help. In 1958 he was responsible for cutting up the sad remains of what had been one of the proudest and best vehicles available – a “Super Sentinel Wagon”. Described at the time as ‘a fire-eating gargantuan of a bygone age’ wagon no V.E. 181 had been acquired by the Cambridge Gasworks in 1928 and for over 30 years was used for carrying coal from the Coldham’s Lane sidings to the Gas Works.

Then it was something special – a steam wagon. With its glowing fire underneath the driver’s cab and the funnel above belching clouds of steam and smoke the Sentinel made a most impressive sight. It would require 150 per inch steam pressure in the boiler before the engine could move at the correct speed, but once rolling could be handled by only one man. That man however had to be fully trained in its operation and the first men to drive it had to go on a four-day instruction course organised by the makers so that they were well-versed in the handling of the monster’s controls and the vagaries of its diet – a massive demand for coke, two cwt of which remained in its boiler when Mr Silverman started to cut it open.

There used to be two such vehicles at the Gas works and one carried on for a while. But few would mourn its passing for at its best the Sentinel was not much of a charmer – but now the search is on for a photograph of it. One appeared in the CDN in March 1956, do you have a print. Meanwhile I enclose a snap of it from an earlier period.

Similar vehicles seem to have been used on the roads. In January 1924 the News reported how a steam wagon belonging to a Birkenhead haulage contractor was travelling from Cambridge to Chatteris with a trailer attached. The driver left Cambridge about 7.45 pm and intended to get there some time in the morning. On the way he stopped to put water into the engine from a pond. The engine was in a bad state on account of their having had to use dirty ditch water, and it would not travel at more than three or four miles an hour. It was run into by a motorcycle, with tragic results for the rider – perhaps he had not seen the steam belching monster. Earlier in 1922 Lynn Road Ely was the scene of another accident when a Ford car collided with a steam lorry, with predictable results : motor wheel spokes and pieces of lamp glass and rubber from an inner tube which was burst littered in profusion about the road. The near side front wheel of the lorry crashed almost broad side on into the motor's off-side front wheel which it splintered beyond repair. So badly wrecked was the front of the car that it took mechanics about two hours to lift it sufficiently to get it away.

On a happier steam-powered note I reported a story in “Looking Back” from August 1949 of how much amusement had been caused at a scramble organised at Old Bank, Littleport, by a vintage 25-year old Scott motorcycle which careered round the course with large volumes of steam issuing from its radiator. Now its rider of 50 years ago, Mr J.H. Diver of Impington, has written to tell me he still rides such a machine!

Do you have memories of steam-powered transport?

READERS WRITE

Shirley Dodson of Swavesey writes. “Your Memories article about Cambridge shops, particularly the Alley reminded me that I still have two dresses bought from there, as well as my first long dress which I bought from Vogue to attend the ‘Firemans Ball’ held at the Dorothy in the late 1960s. Shopping at Vogue was a very different experience from the Alley. I believe it was run by the Harris family who were also connected to Modiste in St Andrew’s street. I also have a long pink dress which I bought from Wallis when it was opposite Marks and Spencer

Mrs O. Osborne of Comberton is also prompted to reach for her pen once more. “I well remember Jim Wooders who looked after bags at Drummer street. It was said he was a London orphan. Also I remember the blind gramophone man, his name was George Pope from Staffordshire street and Bowry O’Dell with his home made chicken coop on pram wheels, or similar, from which a customer could purchase a freshly-killed chicken for dinner. There was a quaint old man with a long brown coat who regularly walked along Newmarket road carrying lengthwise a very long pole. He never spoke, they say he lost his money at Newmarket horse racing”.

H.J. Midge of Lichfield Road, Cambridge, has an answer: “Some little while back you conjectured as to whether Saffron Walden Lillies football club had any connection with eaden Lilley’s shop in the town. In Fact I think you will find that, as they played in a white strip they called themselves the Saffron Walden Lilywhites which eventually got shortened to “Lillies”

Do you remember Auntie Jean and Uncle Dennis, the childrens’ entertainers who would organise games on the beach at Hunstanton in the mornings and shows in The Lounge – the stage covered but the auditorium open – in the afternoons. “Uncle” Dennis Collins has contacted me in connection with the aftermath of the terrible 1953 coastal floods to say that they organised a show in Cambridge Corn Exchange to raise money for the flood relief fund. 1,200 people packed in, at 6d. a go, and raised the princely sum of £34. Dennis in his younger day a member of the Cambridge Daily News Robin Goodfellow Club – were you?

NOTE :

J.H. Diver, 5a School Lane, Impington CB4 9NS – photographic were going to take a picture of him – is it available to use in Memories?

Memories Nov 5th 1999, by Mike Petty

Judi Pollard (nee Moore) is first out of the postbag with her memories of Bonfire Night in Cambridge. She writes: “Living most of our childhood in Sidney Street I remember that when we were young my father used to take us to a friend’s house in Chesterton to share their celebrations. But inevitably we would return home to find Sidney Street blocked off by the police to avoid the Market Square crowd rampaging. On one such occasion my mother, who had stayed in the flat, was bombarded by fireworks being thrown up against our windows. I can remember when in my teens my boyfriend and I crammed on to Market Hill with a few hundred others. Somebody let off something – probably home made – because it was the loudest bang I’d ever heard and the ground actually shook. As a finale to that evening we were then pelted with bags of flour by the people residing in flats over the Milk Bar and other premises on that side of the Square”

30 years ago, 1959 was being heralded ‘the roughest fifth for 20 years’ with a pitched barrage of squibs and bangers descending on the crowds. As more and more people came onto Market

Hill preliminary skirmishes quickly developed into war on all fronts. The News reported how youths poured oil on the water in the fountain and then set it ablaze, the heat felt by bystanders on the Victoria Cinema pavement. "After an hour's bombardment the square was blanketed under a thick pall of sulphurous smoke into which more and more people groped their way. Nearly everyone was caught at one time or another by a squib, many people's clothes were scorched and burnt and several people injured", it reported

One of the most serious of disturbances was in 1948 when a newspaper headline read : "Bonfire damage worse than enemy action during the war" over a report of how the interior of the Senate House was severely damaged by an explosive charge and 70 panes of glass broken. The priceless medieval glass of King's College Chapel narrowly escaped destruction and three motor vehicles were damaged and four constables and at least four civilians were injured. In the aftermath a Colonial Civil Servant was fined for obstruction – he had been caught with a "Keep Left" sign, 'which he had found' and had tried to get a car to turn into Rose Crescent. He was fined £5 and asked for time to pay as the Government 'does not pay us much money'

Given such horrendous acts the police and university authorities took steps to control the situation, with students being banned from the centre of the city – a ban which was also extended to members of the armed forces.

Eventually sanity was restored with the start of the large-scale organised bonfires on Midsummer Common which now attract thousands of spectators. But should anybody feel tempted to recreate the madness of past times it might be worth recalling that: "Any person who casts or fires a squib, cracker, serpent or other firework in the public street shall be committed to the House of Correction to hard labour for one month or forfeit 20/-" - and when that rule was made in 1786, twenty shillings was a great deal of money!

Returning to Judi Pollard's letter she gives further information of the resident ghost at 50 Sidney Street, Cambridge, which was mentioned by her twin sister, Sally Whyte in an earlier "Memories". "We were never sure who or what the ghost was. My father thought it was his great uncle who didn't want my grandfather to have the business. Rumour had it that a servant girl had been murdered in one of the back rooms and one of the resident hairdresser's staff left the premises screaming because she'd 'met a man on the stairs dressed in an old-fashioned uniform'. We, as the immediate family living there, didn't encounter too much trouble with the ghost but my grandmother became mysteriously locked in an upstairs bedroom when she went in to clean, and a lodger asked us one morning who had tried to pull his bedclothes off in the middle of the night. As perhaps a final proof of a likely 'presence' I'd add that a few years after the building was sold to the Woolwich Building Society a friend of mine stopped me in the street to ask if we'd had any ghostly happenings when we lived at no.50. Apparently none of the Woolwich staff would stay long in the flat because they heard strange noises and felt very uncomfortable there. I wonder whether any of these people, or subsequent residents have anything to add?" Over to you. PICTURE OF SIDNEY STREET

Anne Brown of Histon has lent me a picture of a VJ party at St George's church, Cambridge in 1945. People present included Kenneth Rumsy, Richard Biggs, John Dring, Tony Tiller, Geoffrey Dale, Christopher and Caroline Cointwaite, Roger Edwards. Robin Whyatt and Anne herself. PICTURE SCANNED ON DISK

L.M. Chaffe has rediscovered pictures of fenland flooding including one taken from the railway bridge on Longstanton Road, Over looking towards Swavesey station showing waves threatening to cover the railway line. He recalls the Mare Fen at Swavesey was regularly flooded in winter so that when it flooded skating matches could be held there. PICTURE SCANNED ON DISK

Red Wood, my regular correspondent from Saffron Walden remembers that in the 1920s-30s when he lived at Caxton End, Bourn, the Bourn Brook flooded at least twice a year cutting Caxton End and Alms Hill from the centre of the village and also flooding the road between Kingston and Toft. Reg adds: "The last flood I remember at Bourn was March 8th 1941. It was my sister's Wedding Day. We had to walk ½ mile to reach the stiles and cross the meadows. Cars were waiting the other side of the water to take us to church. This had to be repeated on the way home" [What wedding-day problems did you encounter?]

H.J. Midge of Lichfield Rd, Cambridge has given me further notes about the Cambridge and District Thursday Football League which was set up when shopkeepers were encouraged to grant workers a half-day off each week, though other teams also joined in. Teams played on Parker's Piece on Saturdays as well as Thursdays. Mr Midge was associated with the Fitzroy Thursday Football Club and other teams include Beehive, King & Harper's, Exning Thursday Athletic, Royston Thursday, Eastern Counties Bus Company and Sawston P.M. (what did the P.M. stand for, I wonder?)

I BELIEVE WE WERE GOING TO TAKE A PICTURE OF THIS LADY WITH HER DRESSES :

Shirley Dodson of Swavesey writes. "Your Memories article about Cambridge shops, particularly the Alley reminded me that I still have two dresses bought from there, as well as my first long dress which I bought from Vogue to attend the 'Firemans Ball' held at the Dorothy in the late 1960s. Shopping at Vogue was a very different experience from the Alley. I believe it was run by the Harris family who were also connected to Modiste in St Andrew's street. I also have a long pink dress which I bought from Wallis when it was opposite Marks and Spencer

Mr Charles Silverman's appeal for a picture of the Sentinel Steam Lorry that used to operate from Cambridge Gasworks has been answered by Jack Hagger from Saffron Walden who used to work there, and also remembers the late Phil Prior who used to drive the vehicle
PHOTOGRAPHIC WERE TAKING A COPY OF THE SENTINEL VEHICLE AND
THERE WAS SOME HOPE OF GETTING MR SILVERMAN AND MR HAGGER
TOGETHER FOR A PICTURE. JACK HAGGER IS ON 01799 522473 – 20 VICTORIA AVENUE, SAFFRON WALDEN

SPARE GUY FAWKES STORIES

If ever there was an illustration of the determination of Cambridge town and gown not to be done out of the fun associated with the Fifth it has been afforded in 1899. The anniversary of the discomfiture of Guy Fawkes fell on a Sunday, and moreover on an exceeding wet day, but the 4th and the 6th was made to do duty.

It was Monday that by general consent the noisy section of the community chose for the display of their fighting, drinking and shouting powers. Effigies for the purpose of collecting pence were few, the most noteworthy being that stuck in an old hansom cab, and attended by some half-dozen black-faced personages, carefully thrusting collecting boxes in the face of all and sundry who came near

The police were fully alive to the occasion and made ample arrangements to cope with any threatened disturbance. The largest force possible from the borough was posted on Market Hill and environs, and, in addition a contingent of the county constabulary was brought into the town.

Almost as soon as it was dark a large number of youths made their way to Cambridge Market Hill which was in a short time alive to the crackling and bangings of the smaller fireworks. The 'Varsity', after hall time, joined the townspeople and from eight to eleven there was a roaring, rushing crowd of several hundreds about the hill and neighbouring streets. In a few instances there were evidences of the survival of the old Town and Gown feud, but as a rule, the representatives of both corporations found a common cause in the very restricted display of pyrotechny, in the exercise of very powerful lungs, and in the baiting of the police. Certain of the townsmen who had begun the day not to wisely by profusely drinking were responsible for the greater part of the disorder and were seized and marched off by the ever-vigilant gentlemen in blue.

As far as one could judge the majority of the fun consisted in mad, headlong, rushes from one side of the square to the other, back again, & down one of the narrow streets leading therefrom..

There were, however, some ugly incidents in which the police played a leading part. Occasionally they would spy a delinquent breaking the law by lighting or discharging a firework. The humble imitator of Brock would be pounced upon by the representatives of the outraged law, and with scant ceremony hurried into the Guildhall, there to be charged with the offence. The constable and their victim would be followed by the mob, hurling very uncomplimentary and unparliamentary expletives at the captors, and in some instances the police were roughly handled. In one affray in Wheeler Street one constable was struck and kicked in a brutal manner.

So the game went on, for two or three hours, the bang of a firework, the seizure of the law breaker, the hurry and scurry to the temporary police station at the Guildhall and the rush of the crowd after the police.

Later in the evening the proctors appeared, and with them the gradual melting away of the 'Varsitymen, leaving townspeople in sole possession of the square. Towards 11 o'clock the crowd had thinned considerably, small and noisy parties were making their way home. Even then more arrests were added to the considerable number already made, and the cells had new occupants charged with being drunk and disorderly, and not a few with assaulting the police.

1949

The quietest Guy Fawkes night “rag” long-service Cambridge police officers can remember passed off without even a street lamp being extinguished – another “within living memory” record. A crowd gathered on the Market Square by 7pm and fireworks were thrown. A police car which arrived on the scene radioed for reinforcements. These shepherded the crowd off the square. After that police posted at the entrances to the square prevented people entering the area. Early in the evening a few rotten eggs were thrown, and a smoke bomb exploded in the Sidney Street area. These incidents, and the intermittent throwing of fireworks, constituted about the only “excitement” of the evening, though there was an occasion when a “bulldog” pursued a man at full speed in front of the Guildhall.

Memories 12th November 1999 by Mike Petty

With the approach of Armistice Sunday the Memorial at the end of Station Road, Cambridge, prepares for its annual pilgrimage of dignitaries and servicemen, as those who have grown old join with others in paying tribute to those who did not.

Yet this year there is an added emphasis for now there are plans for the memorial itself to be moved. But this is nothing new, for the figure atop the plinth has seen all the debate and discussion before.

At the end of the Great War Cambridge decided to erect a War Memorial and a collection of £6,000 was made for the Nurses’ Home at Addenbrooke’s Hospital. In September 1920 a meeting of the Cambridgeshire Joint War Memorial Committee agreed the erection of a statue at the corner of Station Road. A Canadian sculptor, Tait McKenzie was commissioned, and he modelled the figure of a private soldier, in full kit, striding along bareheaded, helmet in hand, a German helmet as a trophy strung on his back and partly concealed by a laurel wreath, carelessly flung over the rifle barrel. In his hand he holds a rose, another rose thrown to him has fallen to the ground. His head, based on that of a Christ’s college undergraduate, Kenneth Hamilton, is turned to the side, his expression alert and happy, and his lips slightly parted as if he has recognised an old friend in the crowd. As he glances over his shoulder he looks down Station Road from which he left for the war. But now he is at peace, for the statue is of The Homecoming.

The day for its unveiling was set for July 3rd 1922. The Duke of York, who was in Cambridge to open the Royal Show at Trumpington, would perform the ceremony. The plinth was erected, the crowds anticipated. Everything was ready. Almost.

Meanwhile the sculptor was feverishly trying to get the design just as he wanted it. In his studios at the University of Pennsylvania he was working constantly, inviting artist friends to comment and criticise. At last he was ready. The mould for the statue was complete, it just need to be shipped to England. But the boat was delayed and the bronze could not be cast in time for delivery.

With the day booked, the Duke booked and the plinth erected the Committee was faced with a dilemma. They could not unveil a statue that was not there – or could they. They decided on a subterfuge. A plaster cast of the statue was erected and painted to look like bronze. Then they prayed that it would not rain – for that might dissolve the paint, and that the wind would not blow and the covering canvas rub out essential details. And being Cambridge it rained and blew. But nobody noticed and in the presence of thousands of people The Homecoming was unveiled.

Then ten days later a lorry drew up with the proper figure. The copy was taken down and for a while Cambridge had two war memorials – but not identical, for the sculptor had made slight changes once he'd seen the figure in place. As far as I know nobody took a picture of the switch-over and the fact that it happened has thus faded away.

For years the memorial has witnessed acts of Remembrance, though as the years have passed so the proud “Old Contemptibles” of the First World War have faded away and new soldiers have taken their place. In the Summer of 1937 there was something a little different at a commemoration service, for at a wreath-laying by German ex-servicemen the Nazi salute was given. THERE IS A PICTURE OF THIS IN THE Cambridgeshire Collection REF NO V.R.K37 20459 – IT APPEARED IN THE CAMBRIDGE INDEPENDENT PRESS ON 2ND JULY 1937 P12

Then just 50 years ago in October 1949 there were plans for the statue to be moved to make way for a new traffic roundabout at the junction. Views were sought, and opinions expressed – very much like those now being repeated in 1999. There was a feeling that unless it was moved the beauty of the statue would be lost, being surrounded by traffic signs. It would be better, some urged, to move it to a position in front of the entrance to the Botanic Gardens, into a restful haven away from the traffic. But there was another option, to move the statue just twenty feet to the middle of the new roundabout. This compromise was agreed and work got underway at the end of January 1950.

Then in January 1982 the County Council proposed to move it again to make way for a revised traffic island and new lights. Once more the opinions were expressed, with suggestions for resiting in at New Square, or in the middle of the Market Place. The MP, Robert Rhodes James suggested diverting traffic away from the area during the commemoration period and in the memorial stayed, though some felt it was obscured by the new traffic lights.

So now the discussion is raging once more but wherever The Homecoming finds itself in the new Millennium may it always remind us of the lads that did not march back from the station

I HAVE ALSO SCANNED A PIC OF THE UNVEILING OF THE ELY WAR SHRINE, 1922

Memories, 19th November 1999, by Mike Petty

Dora Tack from Fenstanton writes to tell me that her wonderful book “From bombs to buckets” has now been reprinted and is being relaunched shortly. It seems appropriate that it should come out again so close to Remembrance Sunday, for while we remember the hardships of those who fought for their country, the tales of those who fought to maintain everyday life in the country can be overlooked.

Dora was not a country girl. She was born in Peckham and lived in Brixton until the incessant bombing forced her to escape to rural Huntingdonshire. While working at Papworth Settlement she met and married Frank, a farm worker. So it was that the London girl found herself living in the depths of the countryside in the tiny village of Papworth St Agnes with no gas, no electricity, no running water and the most primitive of sanitary arrangements. Dora's memories make most interesting reading. Take the “coffee shop”, her mother-in-law's name for the little brick building with a slate roof outside the back door, which contained the bucket lavatory.

Dora recalls: "The lavatory seat was made of a large oblong piece of wood with a smooth hole, adult bottom size, and on a lower level a smaller piece of wood with a child-size hole, so parent and child could sit side-by-side doing their daily duties in their respective buckets. On one occasion I had need to occupy the lavatory for a "big job". I was seated on the wooden seat, just reaching for some lavatory paper, when I felt a mighty draught up my bottom, and a hand appeared and removed the bucket. There was I with a soiled piece of paper in my hand, and nowhere to put it! I folded it into a clean piece of paper, took it indoors and placed it in my handbag for disposal later on. When Frank came home he roared with laughter at the incident. Apparently it was Ken's task every Saturday to dig a hole, remove the bucket, empty its contents into the hole, thoroughly clean the bucket and return it. The operation took ten minutes and he always did the task at the same time so all the family knew they must keep out to the "lav" then. Apparently he grew the best potatoes in the village – and put it down to the quality of the bucket contents." Somehow it puts the problems of French beef into perspective!

.....

Alf Lawrence has written with more details of the blind man and his gramophone, who several readers have recalled. He writes: "George Pope (Uncle George) was cripple and blind in one eye. He seemed to cope quite well by always wearing wellingtons and with a stick and his cap. He might have been remembered at Maids Causeway, at Midsummer Fair or in the Burleigh street area tin in hand with his gramophone with the horn and his 'Thank you Lady or Sir'.

"He lived in East Road, was married twice and outlived both. He pumped the organ at St Matthew's church for some time and he knew every hymn and would sing to them. I used to walk with him when I was a young lad and sometimes pull his cart with the gramophone on it and would get him gramophone needs from a shop in Burleigh street. I used to help him count his pennies and he would give me 2d or 3d. He also used to play a mouth organ and taught me how to vamp on it, he was a character.

"He died in 1977, aged 81, and is buried in Newmarket Road cemetery. I had a gramophone engraved on his headstone"

Alf and Jessie Lawrence also recall other great characters, sadly missed, including Bowey & Bob Odell of Staffordshire Street, Scot the green grocer with his horse & cart in New Street, Dave who used to stand and open the gate on the common at Garlic Row when the workers from Marshall came home at night, Tarrant with his barrel organ and Silverman with his horse and cart collecting scrap. Did villages have characters too – and who do you remember?

.....

Mr J.D. Williamson from Romsey Mews, Cambridge recalls a character who used to patronise the Fitzroy Arms in Fitzroy Street. He writes that this pub had an very narrow archway at the entrance about four feet wide, and one regular customer had a horse and cart. "Some of his cronies plied him with drink, while others unshipped the horse, turned the cart on its side and dragged it through the arch, replacing the horse in the shafts. Imagine the owner's surprise when he came out after several beers!" Can anybody corroborate the story.

Mr Williamson also lent me a marvellous photograph of Brunswick Primary School. It was taken in 1928 & shows him next to the head teacher, Miss Jules. He remembers many of the names from all those years ago. The school was in Auckland Road Cambridge, next to the Star Brewery stables and was later turned into the school dentistry run by Mr Grandison. His mother was an assistant there when it was in Mud Lane. PICTURE SCANNED ON DISK

Just across the river there was another school that some may recall. Chesterton Preparatory School had opened in “temporary” premises at the bottom of De Freville Avenue in 1910 and for over 60 years young children aged from three to 11 learnt their lessons – of country matters, hedgehogs, squirrels, birds and water voles. The school closed in July 1972 with the retirement of headmistress Miss Dorothy Hodder. Did you attend, or do you remember it. PICTURE ENCLOSED

Shirley School in Green End Road opened in 1932, and was the first with up-to-date nurseries for infants. Here youngsters cross the road under the protection of a “lollipop lady” in June 1964. Are you amongst them? PICTURE ENCLOSED Mention of Auntie Jean and Uncle David in “Memories” the other week has stimulated more reminiscences from Mrs O. Osborne of Comberton. “I well remember them entertaining the children. So Uncle Dennis was a Robin. I was also a Robin and still have the badge in my possession. It’s fairly heavy round metal and the blue outer circle reads “Robin Fellowship Cambs Press & News”. The chubby robin is in the centre red-breast with a copper coloured background. I well remember attending a party at the Cambridge Guildhall for Robins with my brother and sisters about 1931. My memories are of a huge hall with a stage and music. This was the song we learnt quite jolly: ‘I lift up by finger and I say TWEET TWEET CUSH CUSH NOW NOW COME COME’ At the finale we came down the stairs and each was presented with a huge bar of chocolate – Cadburys, ¼ pound costing then in the shops 4d. Parties were few and far between so it really was a great treat for us” Were you a Robin too?

WE WERE TAKING A PHOTOGRAPH OF THIS LADY WITH HER DRESS

Shirley Dodson of Swavesey writes. “Your Memories article about Cambridge shops, particularly the Alley reminded me that I still have two dresses bought from there, as well as my first long dress which I bought from Vogue to attend the ‘Firemans Ball’ held at the Dorothy in the late 1960s. Shopping at Vogue was a very different experience from the Alley. I believe it was run by the Harris family who were also connected to Modiste in St Andrew’s street. I also have a long pink dress which I bought from Wallis when it was opposite Marks and Spencer

Bill Northill of St Matthew’s street Cambridge has lent me a composite photograph of where he used to work – Barrett’s china shops in Cambridge. It was taken when they celebrated their 150th anniversary in 1932. The pictures show the two shops, one in St Mary’s Passage and the other in St Andrew’s street, together with the various departments including the riveting room where Miss Stephens & Miss Bailey are shown repairing broken china. The transport yard was in St Tibb’s Row and Bill started in 1932 by looking after the horses in the stables. After the war he moved on to become a rep, driving a three-gear Bradfield car & touring the villages and pubs in the area supplying milk bottles & plain beer mugs which Barretts would stamp using their machines. He remembers the firm with great affection, especially is old master, Tom Barrett. PICTURE SCANNED ON DISK

Christopher Jackson from the Cambridge Catholic History Group needs your help. Did any of your family get married in the Catholic Church of Our Lady & the English Martyrs during the war. If so do you have any wedding snaps taken outside the building. It appears that there used to be iron railings surrounding the church which were taken down for the war effort, but nobody quite remembers when. Church railings were allowed to remain after others had been removed and might not have gone until perhaps May-June 1941 or February-March 1942. Perhaps your wedding snap may give a clue. If you can help please contact Mr Jackson on Cambridge 353260

PHOTOGRAPHS SCANNED ON DISK

Brunswick School group 1928

Barrett's china shop 1932 – the riveting department with Miss Stephens & Miss Bailey and/or the whole composite view

MEMORIES 26TH NOVEMBER by Mike Petty

During the draw for the next round of the League Cup [PLEASE CHECK I'M RIGHT ON THIS!] on Sunday Big Ron Atkinson, who was choosing the numbers for the teams to play at home commented how he seemed always to be selecting his old teams. The he pulled out Cambridge United.

It is just 25 years since the News reported how Ron Atkinson, then the 35-year-old manager of Kettering and former Oxford United skipper, was to be Cambridge United's new manager.

The story would have delighted football fanatic Denise Langram, aged 15. She had not missed a Cambridge United home match for four years – until she went into hospital more concerned about missing United's home game against Rotherham than about her treatment. But she was given some consolation when two of her heroes, United's longest serving player and former captain, Terry Eades and full-back Ray Seary took her a bouquet. Denise hoped to be out quickly: "And I hope I never have to miss another match", she said.

As Paul Daw records in his history of the club, United had been in the heights of Division Three the season before, and were joint favourites to make their way back following relegation. But the 1974-75 season had started badly, the team winning regularly at home, but losing consistently away. With gates down and the team in the lower half of the league fans turned against the manager, Bill Leivers. Although the team threatened a strike if he were to go, he was dismissed.

So in came Atkinson bringing with him confidence-building training methods. He was quoted saying "I think it is a club with a good chance of going places. I am not the type of guy to float in there and clear everybody out. There are some good players, although possibly they need a bit of a lift. There is still a chance we can get into the promotion race. All I promise is that I shall work as hard as possible to get the right results".

One of his early moves was to bring in Steve Fallon from Kettering town. An unbeaten run of eight league games in early 1975 saw the club close the gap on the promotion contenders – and brought Atkinson the Bells Scotch Whisky Manager of the Month Award. The scene was set for another title challenge the following year.

The 1975-76 season saw the debut of Steve Spriggs and Alan Biley but the hoped-for promotion eluded them and the fans drifted away – not helped by trouble off the pitch.

A new floodlighting system was in place for the start of the 76-77 season, the team was strengthened by the signing of Tom Finney, an Irish international forward, and experienced defender Dave Stringer. The results followed and United soared to the top of the league. In January 1977 they entered the Guinness Book of Records when they scored after only six seconds of their match at Torquay. They went on both to secure promotion and the Fourth Division Championship.

Ron Atkinson had resisted an approach to manage Watford but succumbed to an offer from West Bromwich Albion in January 1978. He left Cambridge United top of Division Three and John Docherty saw them gain promotion to the Second Division. The impossible dream had come true and champagne flowed.

Memories 3rd December and 10th December 1999, by Mike Petty

“You ought to write that down, mother”. How often have we all said something similar to elderly people when they come out with some special memory of their experiences. Whilst engaged in the most sad experience of having to clear her mother’s belongings June Stittle of Soham was delighted to find that she had done just that. Violet “Tiny” Bullman was 93 when she died a couple of years ago and there amongst her papers were some jottings of her early life

Both she and her husband, Hekla, had worked for Waddingtons of Soham, Hec in the grocery trade, Violet in the drapery. It was a thriving concern with a warehouse at the back of shop from which the firm supplied most of the small shops and almost every pub in the village at prices cheaper than they could buy direct from Cadbury’s and Tobacco wholesalers. They had a china and wallpaper department in Churchgate Street and in 1929 bought the nearby premises of Rhuben Long the Soham millers for their drapery, men’s suits and boots and shoes section. Later they acquired the Wesleyan Chapel, now the Soham Carpet and Bedding centre, and then Morris’s shoe shop. At Wicken Waddingtons had another shop, and also one in Bury St Edmunds..

She wrote: “I started work at Waddingtons on March 13th 1919. At that time everything was delivered by horse and cart or carrier bikes. At Christmas we worked until two o’clock in the morning, we didn’t get extra money; we also worked until eight o’clock on Fridays and nine on Saturdays. I got 31d per week – 15p in today’s money.

“Everything had to be weighed, sugar, flour, butter, lard, soda, even tea. Ernest Waddington was a very good tea blender. How many people remember Waddington’s Tea Tray Tea, one of his special blends? A fly from the Crown Hotel met the trains at Soham station bringing travellers and their trunks of samples to stand on the pavement outside the shop, the travellers taking their turn in the queue, some sporting carnations in their button holes, and seven some with tail coats and top hats. I’ve known Ernest to spend a whole morning just buying towels and towellings. We used to order one gross of men’s boots at a time to sell at 12/11 per pair. Blue Bird toffees were bought by the hundredweight, as was rock. We sold lots of Locas Beans, one never hears of them today.

“The war and rationing forced Waddington’s to sell out, first to Burton’s stores; they later sold to Fine Fare, who have now sold up. The other departments were sold to Duponts who continued to trade as Waddingtons. Sadly they have also sold out so now there is no Waddingtons of Soham”

But the most disturbing of Mrs Violet Bullman's notes are those which relate to a diphtheria outbreak in January 1922

It all started at a farm at Brook Dam, Soham. The farmer's wife had a sister who was a nurse. She came home on holiday and brought the germ with her. When the diphtheria outbreak occurred they were unable to sell milk from the farm. Tony recalls: "the family asked if my sister Doll could go up and sell it in a barn so long as she didn't go in the house. February was a very cold month, and the family felt so sorry for Doll out there in the cold that they asked her into the house to have a hot drink. That was the trouble, she caught the germ, a deadly one causing five deaths. My Grandfather Engledow wouldn't hear of her going to the fever hospital on Newmarket Road. His house was in Clay Street and had a blacksmiths shop behind it which was very isolated. Mum went to look after her there and Doll got over it.

Most folk were frightened even to speak to us, other members of the family were ordered to stay away. I didn't have to go to work, which was at Waddingtons.

Meanwhile at home little Peg wasn't so lucky; she was taken to the hospital. The house we lived in at Brook Dam was on the river mouth, horses used to drink in the river. When Peg was taken ill we had her downstairs in the front room. Mum wouldn't let her friend Kath in but Peg heard her outside, & tapped the window saying to my Mum "Let me see Kath, you know I won't to see her anymore." She was very ill and the Doctor sent her to hospital the next day, that was Thursday 12th January 1922, I can remember it well. The horse drawn ambulance drew up in the river, a nurse had Peg in her arms in a red blanket and Peg's little legs were a purple colour, I knew she wouldn't get better.

Vurdon Douglas, little Jim to the family was the next to get the Dip. He was the youngest, five years old, Mum wouldn't let him go to the hospital. She had a room at my Granny and Granddad's house. It was a big house so mum and little Jim were able to be isolated. As little Jim lay dying in Mum's arms he said to Mum, "Peg wants me to go and sit with her," what a strange thing for a five-year-old to say, but mum knew Peg was dead. She had word from the hospital the next day to say that she passed away at 2:30, just six hours before Jim, both on the 13th January. Both Peg and Jim were buried on the same day on the 16th January 1922 in Soham Cemetery, a sad day. My mother never got over it.

On the 18th of January Cecil Victor, Jack to the family, was taken to the hospital & passed away on February 7th. He was getting on well and we were expecting him home but he was put on a ward with a chap who at the time was covered with sores. Our Jack caught them, he was so weak he couldn't take it, the third one to die in the family

On the 6th of February it was my turn, I didn't have Dip. but I was very ill with Quinsy's, I was in bed until the 15th of February until the doctor would let me get up. I worried Mum who quite thought she was going to lose me, but I made it. On the 23d of February Ivy was taken to hospital with Dip. but she was lucky, she came home, but she had her thirteenth birthday there.

In our family the older ones than Doll - Sam, me and Lon didn't get the Dip. but the younger ones, Ivy, Peg, Jack and Jim did. Only Ivy came home from hospital, that left her the youngest of our family of eight, now only five.

SCAN ON DISK : the late Violet "Tiny" Bullman

PICTURES OF SOHAM FROM THE NEWS LIBRARY WHERE INCLUDED WITH LAST WEEKS' NOTES

PHOTOCOPIES ATTACHED OF PICTURES OF BROOK DAM, SOHAM, WHICH COULD BE COPIED IN THE Cambridgeshire Collection

MRS JUNE STITTLE OF 3JS, 6 BROOK DAM LANE, SOHAM – ELY 721001 HAS THE ORIGINAL NOTES AND ALSO SOME PAINTINGS OF THE HOUSE WHEN VIOLET LIVED

.....

Tales of talking dogs seem something that belong to Television consumer programmes – but nearly 50 years ago it brought a Royston man home from the army when Dennis Brissenden was given special leave to be at hand when his famous family pet appeared on television's "Picture Page" in September 1946. "I've never seen more cables than those laid down Green Street for that broadcast", Dennis recalls. Unfortunately the star performer almost "let down the side" by mistaking a fellow artiste's fur coat for a cat

"Ben", the talking dog was owned by Alfred Brissenden of Royston and in November 1949 was about to appear on the BBC Light Programme with his rendition of his catch phrase "I want one"

Alfred had discovered his pet's unique vocal attributes when, on returning from his job as a night watchman, he'd offered the animal a biscuit. What made Ben special was the way he used its tongue to form the words – something that impressed the eminent veterinary surgeons that examined him.

"Ben" was certainly a celebrity. He was headline news in the national dailies and earned himself and his owners a fortnight's holiday at Butlin's Clacton camp. He posed for advertisements, performed before thousands of factory workers at concerts, and gave pleasure to countless children. But nothing was ever certain with a dog. There had been an unfortunate session of "mike fright" when he'd made his NBC broadcast to Canada and it was fingers crossed until the latest performance was "in the can".

Although he was offered a fortune for his pet – even Roy Rogers wanted him to perform alongside "Trigger" – Alfred never sold him. Eventually the animal died and Dennis buried him in the garden of their Royston home.

Do you have memories of special pets – write to Mike Petty

PHOTOGRAPHIC HAVE PICS OF DENNIS BRISSENDEN AND THE DOG

.....

Sometimes when reading newspaper reports of council meetings it all seems old news – surely we've heard all this before.

Looking Back recently I find a report that seems worthy of fuller perusal. 75 years ago Cambridge council were discussing the question of parking spaces for buses and cars. This was a topic which had occupied their minds for some long time past. Hitherto the buses had been parked on Senate House Hill and now the University authorities had complained. It disfigured a beautiful corner which should not be used for parking purposes.

Drummer street would be a good alternative parking place for country buses which would then not go into the centre of town and block up the traffic there. There would be accommodation for 12 buses and 35 cars. They would need a few yards off Christ's Pieces but this was practically waste ground and surely could be taken.

But the Commons committee felt this would disfigure Christ's Pieces. Children played there and it was dangerous to attract traffic to a place where children played so much. They suggested Butts Green. Others felt it was out of all reason to expect cars and buses to go so far from the centre of town. They might in the future require a parking place there and elsewhere as well. In fact in the near future they might have to have several places.

One councillor proposed New Square be used as a parking place, it was absolutely waste land. Ald. See disagreed. He had been hoping for years that something would be done to make New Square as beautiful as Christ's Pieces. It would be a perfect disgrace to fill it up with motor cars making an infernal noise. Students lodged in the vicinity and wanted to work. He did not see why motorists should not use Butts Green. He suggested also that the town end of Coe Fen might be used ...

After the debate had rumbled on the council decided the best thing to do – refer it to another Committee for further discussion.

Memories 10th December 1999, by Mike Petty REVISED TEXT ABOUT BLACKSMITHS

While speaking to a group at Swavesey the other day I was reminded of the excellent reminiscences of the late F.C. Wood, which form such an important part of that village's history. Of all his notes my favourite is that of the village blacksmith.

Charlie Colpin, the Swavesey blacksmith was a mighty man, six foot tall and approaching middle age; he wore a flat cap well grimed with soot and smoke, pulled down over his dark hair; he had a straggling black moustache - and usually an overnight stubble of beard. His jacket he wore unbuttoned displaying a leather apron which was belted below his middle-age spread and came down below his knees -Charlie wore it constantly.

The forge was in the High street, next door to the grocer's shop; it had a large door extending from floor to eaves which could be opened and fastened back and a stable door beside it, the top half of which was always open during working hours. Inside the building was open to the tiles. At the far end was the brick built hearth with its short brick chimney. On the left of the hearth stood the huge vertical bellows with a long wooden arm, a steel tank full of water for quenching the hot iron. Two anvils each mounted on a great section of tree trunk faced each other across the floor. Two benches lined the walls. You stepped over plough shares or banged your shins on pieces of a dismantled harrow; a pile of discarded horseshoes and odds and ends of angle iron awaiting the periodic visit by the scrap merchant.

And everywhere there was dust. As you walked from the hard earth floor of the stall to the forge itself so you walked into an ever-increasing depth of dust which reached four inches and more around the anvils. It rose in puffs around your feet at every step, intruded into trouser turnups and infiltrated into laceholes on boots and shoes.

And above was the roof filled with long lengths of all sorts of iron and steel; from every rafter hung huge festoons of dusty cobwebs from whose shelter hairy spiders of large size and ancient lineage maintained a malignant and disapproving watch on the activities going on below.

Spiders were not Charlie's only audience. Whenever he had a cart-wheel to retyre the men of the village would gather to help and the village children liked to peep in during the gathering gloom of a winter evening to watch the smithy at work

Not all boys however looked forward to a visit to the blacksmith. One of Charlie's customers was a farmer who kept a team of huge Shire horses, magnificent beasts whose care and grooming often left something to be desired. In order to avoid any loss of horse power a visit to the blacksmith was deferred if possible until a rainy day when one of the farm lads was told to take one of the horses to Charlie's shops. In most cases the lad waited until he knew the blacksmith would be quenching his thirst in the 'Rising Sun' then quickly tied up the beast in the stall and fled for his life.

Sooner or later Charlie came across the road - to be confronted by a placid monster, its coat steaming gently and the copious Shire feathering round its hooves clogged up with great gobbets of Swavesey clay and manure. Sometimes for good measure the horse would have greasy legs. For a moment Charlie would stand in stunned silence. He knew all the horse in the district and knew quite well where this one had come from. Arms akimbo he would stand on the cobbles and curse the absent owner. "Hah Fred Day! Yew cunning old beggar yew allus leaves your horses 'ere when yew cant work 'em. What a ruddy state. Look at them legs". At this the horse looked round in protest. "And yew can stop staring" roared Charlie.

With much grumbling and puffing through his moustache he proceeded to clean off the horses legs with a piece of old sacking and to find out what shoe replacements were needed. By this time a group of us small boys were looking over the top of the half doors, watching the blacksmith cleaning up the hoof shaping up the shoe and trying it while hot for fit. White clouds of pungent smoke swirled around and Charlie puffed, coughed and blew through his moustache. The horse, an amicable creature, now standing on three legs, decided to rest on Charlie - a roar went up: "Stop leaning on me yew lazy great beggar - You're breaking my ruddy back". As he let the hoof drop Charlie looked up and saw our row of heads staring at him over the door, "What yew staring at? What yew boys want" "Nothing Mr Colpin" Well yew slubber orf 'ome duz yew'll get 'urt. Goo on. Ruddy boys" he grumbled as we vanished. Needless to say we were back again a few minutes later. We knew Charles Colpin for a kindly man - and he knew we knew!

Such tradesmen are a dying breed. In 1937 the directories were listing a variety of "Smiths, blacksmiths and farriers" in the Cambridge area. Do you recall Fred Bloy or J. Day & sons of East Rd, George Borley of Cherry Hinton, William Chapman, Union Road, of Walter Parkington of Ross street, Cambridge. By 1964 the only Cambridge blacksmith was H.E. Webb of Russell Street, who was visited by Erica Dimock in August 1964. She describes what she found then:

"A large gateway leads to the forge and workshop of Mr H.E. Webb, the only blacksmith left in Cambridge. The business was started by his grandfather at East Road in 1865 & before becoming established at Russell street in 1874 had made one intermediary move to Union Road. Much of the work is concerned with steel fabricating for local builders, making springs of various types of motor vehicles and all types of general repairs and metalwork.

Hundreds of horses are shod each year for local riding establishments. His forge is very reminiscent of days gone by, apart from the fact that electricity has replaced the old fashioned bellows." Even then it was a business in decline for it was becoming difficult to get young people to learn the blacksmith's craft

Others may recall another connection with the age of the horse, Runciman's veterinary surgeons who had premises in Downing street until the 1960s. Earlier in the century some of the stable doors opened out onto the pavement so that when horses standing in the stables had their heads out, over the bottom halves of the doors, people walking along Downing street had to step off the pavement and walk around the horses' heads – something had to imagine in today's traffic choked street. Even towards the end of their occupation of the site it contained a set of horse stocks where awkward horses were put, particularly when they had to shoe them. A forge was part of the premises and at one time the site had room for 20 horses & the firm employed six men. Do you remember it?

Another side of the blacksmith's craft is commemorated in a picture published in the excellent book "Photographic memories of Histon and Impington", the first edition of which has sold out with a reprint being rushed through by the Village Society. It shows Ken Oates and Harold Muncey busily at work in the Histon blacksmith's shop, modifying the Histon church bell frame to accommodate two new bells which were to be added to the original peal of six. Generally however good pictures of blacksmiths are somewhat rare – unless you have some Jean Potter of the Coleridge area of Cambridge was last week reminiscing to me of her uncle, Percy Day, a blacksmith and wheelwright at the Britannia pub in East Road. Many businesses had their carts made and repaired there. Sometimes uncle Percy who would comment on his wife's "hoity-toity friend" who would pop in to their house for tea. A few months ago Jean was sorting through her aunt Julia's possessions and came across a little booklet commemorating the life of that friend, Marion Seward, wife of the Master of Downing College. Then in "Looking Back" recently I featured this same lady and singled out her involvement with the Tipperary Club. This was set up in 1915 to aid and cheer the sorrow-stricken women of Cambridge during the war. With the coming of peace in 1918 the work continued and Mrs Seward would take a great interest in the welfare of her working-class sisters, as she did the undergraduates at her husband's college. Others may remember her as the founder of the Cambridge Drawing Society.

Tucked away inside the booklet was a scarp from the C.D.N. of 23rd February 1938 of a Tipperary Club Tea. Julia Day is the elegant lady in the right-hand corner – does it spark any memories for older readers?

SCAN ON DISK – BOYS AT A BLACKSMITH'S SHOP – WISBECH – "SMITH"

PICTURES OF SWAVESEY FROM NEWS LIBRARY ENCLOSED

Do you have memories of village tradesmen – write to Mike Petty

READERS WRITE

Mrs Shirley Levill (nee Webb) of Swaffham Prior writes: "I and my three brothers were Robins and Goodfellows. Mother collected ship halfpennies & bun pennies (what were these?) for the Robins Fund, and I laid in Addenbrooke's Hospital in the Robins cot with mastoids"

There was obviously more to the Cambridge Daily News' "Robin Goodfellow" club than I realised – can anybody tell me more please

Mr P.J. Parks of Alex Wood Road, Cambridge was clearing a house when he found a picture postcard which seems to show some of the crowd at the opening of the Cambridge War Memorial. In the background is the Station Road Café, its windows filled with advertisements for Frys & Cadbury's chocolate, Brooke Bond tea and ice cream

SCANNED ON DISK – "WAR" with 2ND SCAN ZOOMED IN ON SHOP

Keith Ward has written from Pickering, Ontario, to thank everybody who responded to his memories of the Central School. Although a lot of the respondents were not in his actual year he did receive a letter from somebody he knew as a boy and this contact will allow him to visit and rekindle boyhood memories next time he's in Cambridge.

Memories, 17th December 1999, by Mike Petty

Last week I was too late to meet Father Christmas. We'd spent much of the day at Aldeburgh, strolling by the sea in the winter sunshine. Then returning to the welcome of the log fire at our Elizabethan hotel near Woodbridge there was the sign: "Father Christmas arrives her today, by boat". So we pulled into the car park at Snape Maltings, along with everybody else, and toured the various shops and galleries. There we glimpsed a red coat – but it was not Santa. I searched everywhere – but he had gone.

Perhaps I will be lucky and catch up with him before the Big Day. Perhaps he will arrive outside Eaden Lilley in his vintage Model-T Ford, borrowed from his pal Dr Who – as he did in November 1983. Except of course that the big Eaden Lilley store in Market Street is no longer open.

So what was Santa shopping for in 1983. Many stores were bulging with latest wizardry of silicon chip with computer games selling at between £4.95 and £7.85 – just a cult it was thought but "today's youngsters like to feel they are in the swim". If so they would be into Darth Vader or C-3PO masks and costumes - just under £5 – or huge space vehicles from the Star Wars film which were still tops with the boys that year. And if the budget did not stretch to factory-made toys you could make your own from a plastic construction set with a space command centre, mission control and other space age gizmos.

But one of the main hits of the 1983 season was a sonic puppy – a cuddly wriggling bundle who boxes his paws as he rises on his hind legs to be petted. Clap hands and he freezes, another clap and he scampers around in search of more fun. The price: around £13. Do you still have yours?

For youngsters on a budget there were leg-warmers at £1.50 but for the fashion-conscious females Eaden Lilley had a simulated two-tone mink jacket with contrasting edging at just £79.95

In December 1976 you could be guaranteed a visit from Santa when a Cambridge businessman set up a "rent-a-Santa" scheme which brought Father Christmas walking up your garden path on Christmas morning making a personal delivery service. The charge was £1 a house, no matter how many presents were delivered, and there was a considerable response from the Arbury road area. In Comberton Santa arrived by helicopter at the village college - courtesy of the PTA. This was far better than trying to shop in Cambridge where at Christmas 1975 there was parking chaos, with 400 cars going round and round looking for parking spaces

In December 1974 it was the lights in Fitzroy Street that were attracting the crowds, shining out again after the previous Christmas had been blacked-out, along with almost everything else, during the National Emergency that had restricted power supplies. Now however the Fitzroy-Burleigh area, with the best ever display of Christmas lights, two departmental stores and the city's only indoor market, was determined to prove itself a worthy rival to the city centre & traders had entered into the spirit of Christmas. So the traditional lights glowed in defiance of the wintry weather and the general uncertainty hanging over the Kite Area

And there were bargains to be had. Terence Wines of Burleigh street came out cheapest in a News survey - with Booths gin at £2.60, Johnnie Walker Whisky at £2.52 and Double Century Sherry at £1.13 it undercut everybody else. Tesco at their Regent street store had a pack of six Mr Kipling's mince pies for 23p, or a family pack of Golden Wonder or Smiths crisps for 13p. They were facing competition from Beehive 1 which now had a new access from Coldham's Lane, in addition to York St. They had a 7½ oz tin of John West Salmon for 45p and a twin pack of Andrex Toilet rolls for 16p

For the children Ren-Models, of Fitzroy street offered electric train sets from £3.65 to supplement the essential present of "a bumper colouring or painting book, boxes of gaily coloured pencils or perhaps a small toy" as recommended by the "News" shopping expert

For mum to watch the Queen's 1974 Christmas message Wards of Burleigh Street & Bradwell's Court had Pye 170 20" black & white televisions down from £81 to £61. For dads Barney's Superstores of Mill Road had Combie Overcoats - all wool, heavyweight, high fashion at £11.95. But for the ultimate present for the whole family you could pop down to Gilbert Rice of Hill Road where a 1971 Capri 3000E in maze yellow with black interior was marked down from £1079 to £700

Not that Cambridge was a place to come shopping by car. In December 1969 the police had come to the end of their tether with the city's traffic problems when Chief Supt Barlow attacked the abysmal parking facilities. As columns of cars jammed Pembroke Street and Downing Street heading for the piece of waste ground that was the Lion Yard car park police appealed to motorists to keep out: "there is plenty of room at the Cattle Market and on the city perimeter" and Father Christmas was at Mitcham's, the store for fashion and furnishing, on Chesterton Road, where a parcel from Santa was 1/- (5p).

But who could resist driving their new cars - an Alfa Romeo 1300 LT £1199.99 or Fiat 124 for £985.76 from Maloney & Rhodes - for the bargains that year. Roses Fashion Centre, The Colonnade, Sussex Street offered stunning full-length coats in Bri-Nylon, Orlon collared and fleece lined throughout for £88.00 (£84.00) while the Co-op had dreamy night-dresses in frilly, floaty nylon from 29/11 (£1.49). Meanwhile Reeds in St Andrews street offered roll-ons, corsets, girdles, step-ins, (whatever any of those were), bras with straps and bras without them and Eaden Lilley had Gay Party Frocks for children and teenagers in flock and taffeta nylon from 57/6, (£2.75)

For the great day itself Dewhurst & Eastman, “the modern butchers”, offered top quality fresh-killed turkeys at 3/9 (18p) lb. whilst Dolamore Petty Cury offered the perfect accompaniment with South African sherries from 10/- (50p) per bottle, Yugoslav Reisling at 8/- (40p) & Three Stars cognac 43/-, (£2.15)

What’s more money was no longer a problem as advertisements explained the new way to pay - Barclaycard, now in its 4th year. So out to Renbro, in Mill Road for a Pye 22 inch "Squared Screen" tube tv, with push-button selection of BBC1 BBC-2 & ITV in beautiful teak finish cabinet for £265 or to Coxheads of Regent street Cambridge, Royston & Haverhill for Blue Spot Radiogram, full stereo for records and VHF radio, with £38.1.0 off the normal price - now just £89.

Such advanced music technology would bring new life to those records you’d bought for Christmas ten years earlier. In 1959 Millers of Sidney street had been selling top LPs "Cliff sings" by Cliff Richard, “Lonnie Rides Again” by Lonnie Donegan & his skiffle group or “Conway Twitty Sings” - all for 34/1½ . (£1.70)

Perhaps you still have copies of that December’s top ten, which had included "What do you want", “Little White Bull”, “What do you want to make those eyes at me for”, “Travelling light” and “Jingle Bell Rock”. And while you might recall the performers – Adam Faith, Tommy Steele, Emile Ford, Cliff Richard & Max Bygraves, who now could can recall another Christmas 1959 top ten hit – “Happy Reindeer” by Dancer, Prancer & Nervous

Now that’s a clue – watch out for the reindeer. But despite park and ride the car parks are too full for sleighs. But who knows I might meet Santa shopping for last-minute bargains at the supermarket – like the children who met him shopping in the Co-Op in Burleigh Street in 1979, snapped by News photographer Chris Morton. Even if you never meet him, I hope he comes to you.

Memories, 24th December 1999 – by Mike Petty

Are you dreaming of a white Christmas?

Extremes of weather always make headlines at the time - and are then forgotten.

Who now recalls the very great frost of 1895, which lasted from January to March, the heavy snow of April 1908, or 1916 when trainee soldiers fought snowball fights with townspeople on Parker's Piece?

There was the snow of 1927 that began on Christmas Day and led to the most complete stoppage of road and rail traffic since the coming of the motor car. It was followed two years later by the hardest frost since 1895.

There was more heavy snowfall in 1947 when hundreds of acres of fenland subsequently disappeared under floodwater after it melted, and the even worse outbreak of snow in 1958.

We forget the heavy falls of January 1962, but probably not the great blanket of snow which started in December that year and continued into 1963. For this was the great freeze.

Right at the end of December 1962 Cambridge felt itself fortunate to escape the worst of the weather sweeping the rest of the country. Buses and trains kept running and roads continued open. But it was not to last, by January 1st 1963 snow drifts up to seven feet deep were blocking access to many local villages and Cambridge itself was cut off for the first time in living memory.

Temperatures remained below freezing for days and the River Cam froze, prompting skaters in their hundreds and cyclists by the score to turn out on to the river. By 20th January Cambridge police station was turned into a temporary boarding home to accommodate 15 people cut off by blizzards from their country homes. Bus services grown to a halt as their diesel froze.

By 22nd January the temperature was 32 degrees below freezing as arctic conditions persisted. Next day the city's water mains froze and fuel supplies of all types were under pressure. A brief thaw saw Parker's Piece turned into a lake, quickly turning into a skating rink when it froze again. Throughout January air frost was recorded on 28 nights. The bitter conditions continued throughout February with air frost on 27 nights. The Lent bumps were cancelled for the first time in 136 years.

Eventually Spring-like weather arrived on 6th March, with temperatures soaring into the 60's and people started to calculate the cost of it all. The winter had been bitter, but picturesque and numerous people took photographs of what was the worst that Cambridge had suffered – up to that time.

Since then the News cameramen have been out and about to capture the changed world that snow brings to familiar landscapes

Do you recognise yourself – or indeed even the places where the photographs were taken. They include : Cambridge : Emmanuel road (no date), Cement Works, Coldham's Lane (no date), & Park street on 23 Oct 1974,
St Mary's street Ely Dec 1968,
Castle street Saffron Walden (no date),
High Street, St Neots, Dec 1981,
Chalkstone estate, Haverhill Feb 1991,
Stuntney horse (no date)

Do you have snow scenes that also show a changed landscape – send them to Mike Petty and the News

Readers write

Beryl Dye writes from the warmer climes of Seaford, South Australia, having finally caught up with a “Memories” article of June 1998. It featured where a class of St Matthew's Infants School, Cambridge, in 1941. For Beryl (nee Cole) was on it. She writes: “I remember during the war we used to go to an Air Raid shelter in Young Street when a raid was imminent. I was brought up in Bradmore Street, my dad was a coalman. If an air raid went off during the night we used to go to the shelter under the Zion Chapel”. Beryl emigrated to Adelaide in November 1968 and has been back to Cambridge a couple of times since, but the house in Bradmore street has been demolished. Do you remember the area? If you would like Beryl's address let me know.

Ann Whitmore (nee Free) from Impington has sent another school picture to tease anybody who attended Richmond Road school, Cambridge, in 1940-41. It shows the school band with their scarlet jackets with white bells and brass buttons and navy skirts or trousers and caps. The material, she remembers was very thick and itchy,

As for the building itself, Ann recalls: “The school was small – one large room with a folding partition to separate the five-year-olds from the six-year-olds. The high windows allowed no distraction during school time. In the winter the only heat came from a large fire in the man room. Very often the milk would arrive frozen and would be placed around the blazing fire, inside the fire guard, to thaw out, which caused the tops to burst open. We used to have our own spoons for the spoonful of malt that was dished out of a large jar to us each morning by the Malt Monitors. I remember the wood block floor was always very sticky after this ritual!

“It had a very dark entrance porch, where we hung up our coats. This was also used as an air raid shelter —we enjoyed air raid practice because we were all given a boiled sweet from a large jar!”

Muriel Talbot writes from Trumpington. “As a child living in Heydon I, too, was a Robin. My number was 345, and I still have my blue badge with the Robin on it! For many years my family and I collected “ship halfpennies” and “blue pennies” for the Robin Cot in Addenbrooke’s Hospital. Happy memories!”

Jim Longstaff is one of that group of people who have to keep finding speakers for his society. Now he is trying to build up a list of people willing and able to lecture on local historical topics in the South Cambridgeshire, North Herts, North Essex area. If you would like to go on his list please contact him at 8B, St John’s Street, Duxford, CB2 4RA. The Reference Library at 7, Lion Yard, Cambridge, CB2 3QD also has a database of speakers and would be keen to hear from you too.

IF YOU NEED TO CUT PLEASE HOLD OVER THIS ARTICLE FOR ANOTHER TIME

Roynon Howes writes from Isleham following my mention of the Dunmow Flitch. “Your article certainly brought back memories. I can well remember my mother telling me about the time when my father had just lost his job (which only paid £2.10s.6d. a week) and we had to give up our house in Chingford and go to live with my grandparents in Cambridge. We were only there a short time before father got another job at the Ortona Bus Company, but at a reduced pay. On this he was able to rent a house in Hardwick Street at 10s. per week.

Money was still tight and when somebody suggested my parents should enter a local competition for happily married couples and the prize was a £10 food voucher, they jumped at it. They won the competition and were then told they would be automatically entered for the famous Dunmow Flitch. All this was in 1935 but I can remember travelling to Dunmow in a car my father had borrowed and we sat all day in a courthouse. There was a judge in a wig, and jury and barristers, just like a normal court.

After my mother had given evidence on how they would react in various circumstances, my father was brought in to answer the same questions and say how his wife would react. As he was led to the dock I shouted out “Daddy”, which prompted the Prosecution Council to leap to his feet and proclaim this was clear evidence that my father was an unfaithful man (I was sitting with a lady who had come to support them). My mother, who was a forthright woman, jumped up and shouted back: “You daft idiot, he’s my baby. Can’t you see he’s got red hair like me?” This caused the court to roar with laughter and from then on the jury were with my father.

The object was to prove to the jury that you had lived with your wife for twelve months with never a cross word. It was all very tongue in cheek, although taken very seriously, but it was to entertain and the best entertainer won. My parents won the “Flitch”, which was a whole side of bacon, which they proudly carried back to Cambridge and distributed among their friends. We might have been poor but we never went short of food.

Memories 31st December 1999 by Mike Petty

On this last day of the 1900s I thought it might be interesting to see how our ancestors commemorated the start of the Twentieth Century, 99 years ago. For to our Victorian forebears the new century started on the 1st January 1901.

The year was launched, like all years had been launched since 1825 – by the firing of rockets. At five minutes to midnight Alderman Arthur Deck strolled from his door on King's Parade across to the space in front of King's College chapel. Two rockets were placed in a crate and just as King's college clock struck the midnight hour the Alderman applied a lighted match to the touch paper. With its flight was symbolised the flight of the nineteenth century. A few moments later a second rocket heralded the arrival of the twentieth and at that moment the bells of the churches near at hand rang out their message to the wider world.

The century was born & Mr Deck was cheered back to his house. Then all adjourned to Deck's back parlour where steaming punch was ladled out with unsparing hand and the Alderman's health was drunk time and time again.

But you do not have to be 100 years old to remember the custom, for it continued. Arthur Deck saw the start of 1908, but not its conclusion; his rockets continued until 1913, then Dora - the Defence of the Realm Act - forbade them for the duration of the war.

In December 1919 those Cambridge people looking forward to a general return to pre-war conditions at the festive season were disappointed to learn that there would be no rockets to signal the New Year.

Sometimes, Mr Deck junior explained, the rocket sticks caused damage when they fell and - perhaps more significantly - the crowd had been rowdy - things not to be tolerated in those days. So he had decided that his father's custom must not be his. It seems a pity said the paper - "there are many losses we -could submit to with less regret than the loss of the rockets and the abandonment of a celebration which was based on good fellowship".

It was the end of a chapter, but not the end of the story. In 1922 the custom was revived in response to continued pressure. But it was thought no longer safe to use Kings Parade for the launch and the ceremony transferred to Parker's Piece. Midnight found a thousand people assembled to watch the rockets. But it was not quite the same, numbers dropped off and people found other attractions in the town on New Years Eve.

So it was that 1929 arrived uncelebrated by any rockets and one of the most celebrated of Cambridge customs fizzled out.

Do you remember the New Year rockets – or does the New Year hold especial memories for you – write to Mike Petty Roynon Howes writes from Isleham following my mention of the Dunmow Flitch.

“Your article certainly brought back memories. I can well remember my mother telling me about the time when my father had just lost his job (which only paid £2.10s.6d. a week) and we had to give up our house in Chingford and go to live with my grandparents in Cambridge. We were only there a short time before father got another job at the Ortona Bus Company, but at a reduced pay. On this he was able to rent a house in Hardwick Street at 10s. per week.

Money was still tight and when somebody suggested my parents should enter a local competition for happily married couples and the prize was a £10 food voucher, they jumped at it. They won the competition and were then told they would be automatically entered for the famous Dunmow Flitch. All this was in 1935 but I can remember travelling to Dunmow in a car my father had borrowed and we sat all day in a courthouse. There was a judge in a wig, and jury and barristers, just like a normal court.

After my mother had given evidence on how they would react in various circumstances, my father was brought in to answer the same questions and say how his wife would react. As he was led to the dock I shouted out “Daddy”, which prompted the Prosecution Council to leap to his feet and proclaim this was clear evidence that my father was an unfaithful man (I was sitting with a lady who had come to support them). My mother, who was a forthright woman, jumped up and shouted back: “You daft idiot, he’s my baby. Can’t you see he’s got red hair like me?” This caused the court to roar with laughter and from then on the jury were with my father.

The object was to prove to the jury that you had lived with your wife for twelve months with never a cross word. It was all very tongue in cheek, although taken very seriously, but it was to entertain and the best entertainer won. My parents won the “Flitch”, which was a whole side of bacon, which they proudly carried back to Cambridge and distributed among their friends. We might have been poor but we never went short of food.

Beryl Dye writes from the warmer climes of Seaford, South Australia, having finally caught up with a “Memories” article of June 1998. It featured where a class of St Matthew’s Infants School, Cambridge, in 1941. For Beryl (nee Cole) was on it. She writes: “I remember during the war we used to go to an Air Raid shelter in Young Street when a raid was imminent. I was brought up in Bradmore Street, my dad was a coalman. If an air raid went off during the night we used to go to the shelter under the Zion Chapel”. Beryl emigrated to Adelaide in November 1968 and has been back to Cambridge a couple of times since, but the house in Bradmore street has been demolished. Do you remember the area? If you would like Beryl’s address let me know.

Ann Whitmore (nee Free) from Impington has sent another school picture to tease anybody who attended Richmond Road school, Cambridge, in 1940-41. It shows the school band with their scarlet jackets with white bells and brass buttons and navy skirts or trousers and caps. The material, she remembers was very thick and itchy,

As for the building itself, Ann recalls: “The school was small – one large room with a folding partition to separate the five-year-olds from the six-year-olds. The high windows allowed no distraction during school time. In the winter the only heat came from a large fire in the man room. Very often the milk would arrive frozen and would be placed around the blazing fire, inside the fire guard, to thaw out, which caused the tops to burst open. We used to have our own spoons for the spoonful of malt that was dished out of a large jar to us each morning by the Malt Monitors. I remember the wood block floor was always very sticky after this ritual!

“It had a very dark entrance porch, where we hung up our coats. This was also used as an air raid shelter —we enjoyed air raid practice because we were all given a boiled sweet from a large jar!”

Muriel Talbot writes from Trumpington. “As a child living in Heydon I, too, was a Robin. My number was 345, and I still have my blue badge with the Robin on it! For many years my family and I collected “ship halfpennies” and “blue pennies” for the Robin Cot in Addenbrooke’s Hospital. Happy memories!”

Jim Longstaff is one of that group of people who have to keep finding speakers for his society. Now he is trying to build up a list of people willing and able to lecture on local historical topics in the South Cambridgeshire, North Herts, North Essex area. If you would like to go on his list please contact him at 8B, St John’s Street, Duxford, CB2 4RA. The Reference Library at 7, Lion Yard, Cambridge, CB2 3QD also has a database of speakers and would be keen to hear from you too.

PICTURES SCANNED ON DISK :

RICHMOND ROAD SCHOOL 1940

Memories 2000 in one sequence

Memories, by Mike Petty, 7th January 2000

It would seem as if many people received mobile telephones in their Christmas stockings this year. However the honour of owning the very first telephone in Cambridge was claimed by an Undergraduate at Pembroke College in 1878. He fixed up two between his 'diggings' in St Andrews Street and a summer house at the bottom of the garden. The little retreat was an excellent place for an illicit game of cards and the telephone allowed his landlord to give warning of any approaching Proctor.

In January 1927 came the first trans-Atlantic telephone call to be received in Cambridge when President Lowell of Harvard University spoke to senior members of the University of Cambridge.

The call travelling via Boston and New York, then "through the ether" to Rugby and finally down to the switchboard at the Cambridge telephone exchange in the usual way. Reception was somewhat "mushy" but nothing worse that was often experienced in domestic calls.

Much of the conversation reflected the formality of the occasion, an exchange of greetings and ideals but once others joined in more mundane matters were discussed. It was Sir Ernest Rutherford who introduced the inevitable topic of the weather, informing the New World that in the Old it had been snowing.

When Cambridge Rotary club chatted to their opposite numbers in Ohio in 1948 it was to thank them for their dinner, which had been shipped over by their American cousins and served by the chefs of the Dorothy Cafe

A minute or two after midnight on Christmas Eve 1948 between 60 and 70 men sat down to what must been the first Christmas dinner served in Cambridge that year. They were members of the night operating staff at the Telephone Exchange, and they chose that unconventional hour because their periods of duty make it difficult for them to hold a social function at a more normal time. They were served with turkey, plum pudding and mince pies as they sat at their switchboards.

Were you one of those switchboard operators, or did you used to play your part in providing post office services in the region. If so Betty Eveleigh from St Neots seeks your assistance in connection with an advanced diploma in Local History run by the Cambridge University Board of Continuing Education. She is seeking memories of the post offices and their role in the local communities from 1930 to 1950. She has given me some memories she's already collected, just to jog others.

At Bottisham the telephone exchange had to be kept open 24 hours a day in 1939. Frequently the operator had to get up in the middle of the night to put through manually (by turning a small handle) the red, yellow or green air raid warnings to the police station. Things got more hectic when the United States Army Airforce arrived in 1943.

Evacuees also added to the post office clerk's problems – does anybody remember sorting out the wartime allowances to families of servicemen on active duty. And then there were the wartime National Savings and Post Office Savings Bank.

Linton also had a Labour Exchange on the premises, where the unemployed signed on for the dole. Sub post offices were often a business within a business. At Yelling sweets and some groceries were sold in part of the living quarters. Oakley in Bedfordshire had a very small extra business indeed. A large container of vinegar stood in one corner of the post office, and people brought bottles to be filled. In contrast Cottenham post office incorporated a chemist's business with numbered drawers with Latin names as well as a small library.

Bicycles were generally used for mail deliveries in the villages though in Bottisham at wartime this could be tricky because the tanks that came through the village broke up the road service.

Were local post offices used to advertise village events, perhaps dances or whist drives to help raise funds for National Savings or Warship Weeks? Were propaganda posters displayed inside? Was the post office and general stores a "gossip shop" or a useful meeting place, what did it look like inside and out – this is the sought of thing Betty needs to know

If any of this jogs your memories please write to me or contact Betty Eveleigh direct at PO Box 55, St Neots, PE19 6SJ – or ring her on 01480 880454

**

Rodney Dale from Haddenham recently entertained Chesterton Local History Society with his memories of life in the Hawthorn Way area of Cambridge as he first knew them when an evacuee during the war.

He recalls : "Our end of Hawthorn Way was dominated by Hallen's Showroom. To the west was Matthew's off licence (I think run by the Mr Hall who later became a greengrocer), and to the east Alex S Thom, the pharmacist. Mr Thom ('Sandy') was a bird watcher in his spare time; he had a strange Scottish accent and his enquiry as to whether my mother had 'read his pamphlet on the moustached warbler' met with a puzzled stare. Mr Thom's other claim to fame was playing chess with the stone-deaf lawyer Thorold Gossett , who gave up shaving when his wife died and consequently sported a bigger and bigger beard.

On the Hawthorn Way sides of Hallens were BF Norman, hardware, and Stanley Gibbons, the Lemona Stores (which later crossed the road). You could scarcely get into Norman's shop with its smell of paraffin, firelighters, creosote and oil and everywhere built up to the ceiling with shelves of goodies. It never occurred to me that there might be some items of ironmongery Mr Norman didn't keep. Mr Norman also had a travelling shop, also piled high with goodies, but I'm not sure what area he covered. The Lemona Stores, by contrast, seemed to have scarcely any stock at all. It was a subject of continued debate how he managed to make a living. Mr Gibbons had a peculiar method of locomotion which included sudden sharp turns on one foot to get him where he wanted to be. It was said that he had been injured by a recoiling gun in the Great War, which had affected his muscular control. One tended to buy only prepacked goods from him, as he would open a paper bag by blowing into it, sometimes producing a plosive cough for good measure."

Does any of this jog your memories of out-of-centre shops

**

Peter Wells, an enthusiast from Norwich, has written in with additional details about two of the Sentinel steam wagons that were used at the Cambridge Gas Works. One, a tipper, which they bought second-hand in 1945 and used till 1963 is now in private hands in Glasgow. These wagons cruise at 30-40 mph and will touch 60 mph if needed, although the speed limit for lorries was only 20 mph until the mid 1950s. Do you have memories of the earlier days of lorry driving before motorways and bypasses.

The other Gas Works steam vehicle is a Sentinel railway loco. Called 'Gas Bag' she was used to steam coal trucks at the Gas Board's Coldham's Lane sidings and was last heard of at the Steamtown Railway Museum in Lancashire.

**

Eugene Gavin of Cambridge has contacted me with a story of childhood disappointment concerning Royston. Having heard of Alfred Brissenden's wonderful talking dog (Memories 3rd Dec) Eugene and his friends decided to pay a visit on the celebrity animal at its home in Green Street one evening in 1949. They took with them the necessary packet of biscuits to get it to speak and performed the necessary ritual – pretending to eat one themselves, safe in the knowledge that the dog would then say "I want one". Only it didn't. It wasn't that the animal was not hungry, it was just too hoarse to speak!

**

Ann Whitmore (nee Free) from Impington has sent a school picture to tease anybody who attended Richmond Road school, Cambridge, in 1940-41. It shows the school band with their scarlet jackets with white bells and brass buttons and navy skirts or trousers and caps. The material, she remembers was very thick and itchy,

As for the building itself, Ann recalls: "The school was small – one large room with a folding partition to separate the five-year-olds from the six-year-olds. The high windows allowed no distraction during school time. In the winter the only heat came from a large fire in the man room. Very often the milk would arrive frozen and would be placed around the blazing fire, inside the fire guard, to thaw out, which caused the tops to burst open. We used to have our own spoons for the spoonful of malt that was dished out of a large jar to us each morning by the Malt Monitors. I remember the wood block floor was always very sticky after this ritual!

“It had a very dark entrance porch, where we hung up our coats. This was also used as an air raid shelter —we enjoyed air raid practice because we were all given a boiled sweet from a large jar!”

**

Muriel Talbot writes from Trumpington. “As a child living in Heydon I, too, was a Robin. My number was 345, and I still have my blue badge with the Robin on it! For many years my family and I collected “ship halfpennies” and “blue pennies” for the Robin Cot in Addenbrooke’s Hospital. Happy memories!”

**

Jim Longstaff is one of that group of people who have to keep finding speakers for his society. Now he is trying to build up a list of people willing and able to lecture on local historical topics in the South Cambridgeshire, North Herts, North Essex area. If you would like to go on his list please contact him at 8B, St John’s Street, Duxford, CB2 4RA. The Reference Library at 7, Lion Yard, Cambridge, CB2 3QD also has a database of speakers and would be keen to hear from you too.

Memories, January 14, 2000, by Mike Petty

Just 50 years ago County Planners were preparing to launch a document that would have a profound impact on the development of Cambridge. They had employed planning consultants to consider the future and now Professor W.G. Holford and Mr H. Myles Wright were ready to reveal their proposals.

It would be a Cambridge with several new roads, three new bridges, an expanded university with one or two new colleges and a maximum population of 100,000 people.

One of the major concerns, even then, was traffic. To cope with the increasing number of vehicles two new routes were proposed. One would leave Huntingdon road at Storeys Way and strike south, over Madingley Road & open fields till it reached Barton Road. It would continue towards the town before a new road struck off across Lammas Land, crossing the river on a new bridge before joining Trumpington Road alongside Chaucer Road.

The second major route would strike south from Milton Road, effectively along the line of the present Elizabeth Way, continuing to link with East Road & Trumpington Road.

These routes would be supplemented by a spine relief road from Huntingdon Road through the houses in the Alpha Road of New Chesterton area before crossing the Cam on a brand new bridge and running over Jesus Green and Christ’s Pieces to Drummer Street. The impact of this road across Cambridge’s commons would have been enormous.

More major highway construction would see Downing Street and Pembroke Street continued down Mill Lane and across another bridge to West Cambridge. All this would enable things to continue until outer by-pass roads were constructed.

Later there would be another link from St Andrew’s Street to Guildhall Street where would be a three-storey car park at Lion Yard to accommodate 400 cars, with shops on the ground floor. This bit of the jigsaw was finally implemented some 25 years later, much of the rest never saw completion.

Away from traffic considerations the planners felt that University expansion was inevitable and proposed that all sites west of the river between Huntingdon and Barton Road should be regarded as a reserve for University building.

But the town itself had already grown considerably in recent years and a further large growth of population would have no benefit to its residents, thought the County's planners. Anyway the housing shortage was already so great that the present inhabitants could not be housed within ten years. The area had virtually no unemployment and there were already about 1,800 jobs on offer so industrial development was to be prohibited. Cambridge would remain a small University market town. Not everybody agreed & the stage was set for a battle that was to continue for decades.

Were you involved in the battle to shape Cambridge's future in the fifties – and was traffic really all that bad back then?

This week has come a reminder that not all County decisions always come to pass, with the news that Coleridge school has been saved from closure. When the school opened in 1938 it was the first of its kind with new facilities such as libraries. When it celebrated its Golden Jubilee in 1987 its retired headmaster, Freddie Kingston recalled how he had set up a garden laboratory at the school. He bought an old bus for £7 and sold the seats for £25. He fitted it out with gas and electricity and turned it into the laboratory. It gave the school extra space, but it was not long before the planning authority discovered it and it had to be taken away. Now it looks as if it is set to continue well into the 21st century.

Some schools are delighted to turn their back on history. Children at St Andrew's school, Chesterton back in 1981 were delighted to see the end of their old school and look forward to a new one in Nuffield Road. Pupils at Cambridge's Newnham Croft Primary School in 1985 were having to endure overcrowded classrooms, leaky roofs, mildew and outdated lavatories. Their prefabricated dining room had been demolished because it was unsafe and so they brought packed lunches to eat in class. They got their new school in March 1990.

Other schools have closed, never to reopen in communities such as Wicken, Stuntney and Prickwillow. Their children transferred to bigger schools elsewhere.

But was bigger better, or did new buildings lack the atmosphere of old ones. What do you think. If you remember changing schools involuntarily, or had experience of adapting to new premises only to find them not a patch on the old, let me know.

When Beryl Dye (nee Cole) wrote from Adelaide, South Australia about her schooldays in the 1940s she happened to mention that she used to live in Bradmore Street, off East Road, Cambridge. Now three readers have contacted me who used to know her all those years ago. Shirley Turpin (then Horn) used to join her in the air-raid shelters under Zion chapel. Grace Deas (nee West) and her three brothers Harry, Ron and Bryan also lived in the street. Grace is in touch with another childhood friend from the area, who also lives in Australia. Its a small world.

Steven Newport from Worthing is seeking information on the village feast at Milton. It was apparently known as Peas Porridge Sunday and was held in May. Do you remember it, and was there a traditional dish for the feast. At Stretham I believe it used to be frumenty which was made with milk, wheat, sugar, currants and spices. Did Milton or other villages have other church-related observations such as Easter Sepulchres, Church clipping, Shrovetide or Pancake Bells. Please write and I will pass your letters on.

**

I would like to thank everybody who has contacted me to say they've seen themselves or their relations in some of the pictures in "Memory Lane, Cambridge" and for pushing it to the top of the Heffers best-selling list. Mr G.T. Tyrrell of Cherry Hinton points out that the plaque taken down from the old Drill Hall in East Road was taken to the Territorial Army centre on Cherry Hinton Road (not Coldham's Lane). He knows because he took it there and hung it up himself!

Rosemary Myers from Cambridge has spotted the same mini-car appearing twice in the book. Once parked in King's Parade during a Cambridge rag day and again in Bateman street. She writes: "Cambridge parking has been so difficult for so long I can't believe the same car can star twice!" So does anybody know who owned an Austin Mini registration FER 680D. Did it perhaps belong to the News photographer who took the picture. Can you help.

If you'd like to see something of the book before you buy why not come along to Gresham's club on Gonville Place (beside the YMCA) next Thursday, 18th January at 7 o'clock when there'll be a talk and slide show. Admission is £2 and you can get refreshments and bar food at the club.

NOTE AM STILL WAITING FOR EXTRA DETAILS ON THIS STORY.

More smiling children are pictured in a snap lent me by Anne Cousins of Milton. Amongst them is her mum who is their with her sister. She is not too well just at present and would love to hear from you if you were there too. So where is it, when was it and who's on it. Over to you.

Memories, by Mike Petty 21st January 2000

Anne Cousins from Milton has written to seek your assistance over a mystery picture.

"I wonder what my Mum, Mildred Plumb, would say were she to open the Cambridge Evening News that she reads avidly every day, only to see this familiar photograph smiling up at here from your pages. It would mean a lot to her as she is on the picture somewhere with her sister Daphne I am sure it will also mean much to several other faces appearing here".

We really know very little about the snap, which was sent by a friend. Mildred used to live in the Cherry Hinton area, and it might be a Cambridge Gas Works Christmas party. There's not much to go on, so over to you.

And while you're in the helping mood I have other calls for assistance. Mike Dimambro of the Cambridge University & District Rugby Referees' Society is trying to establish quite when his society started. His research so far show that a Cambridgeshire Rugby Referees' Society was in being in the season 1949-50 when the Secretary was L.H. Elliott of Regent St., Cambridge. The University Society appears in the 1950-51 handbook. But local club members who were active in the 1940s recall the Society appointing referees for their games.

Amongst notes collected by the late Frank Reeve I find reference to the early days of rugby in Cambridge. Apparently in 1861 some old boys of Rugby school joined forces to play the new game of "rucker" on Parker's Piece. "They made a circle round a ball and butted each other". So unacquainted were the sporting fans with the game that they tried to separate the players under the impression they were fighting each other. Then in 1872 a group gathered in a room at Clare College to found the Cambridge University Rugby Union Club and adopted new rules which abolished hacking, tripping and scragging (twisting an opponent's neck round). One early star of the game was R.T. Finch in the 1870s. He was somewhat on the small side and able to dodge through the Oxford backs who were too tall to tackle him – on one occasion he is said to have run between the legs of a large Oxford player!

All this is a long time back – do you have memories of more recent rugby characters?

Rosemary Eason seeks assistance with the early days of the Cambridge One-Act Drama Festival which started in 1969. She believes that an earlier Town and Village drama competition used to take place sometime before the Second World War. Do you remember it, or can you help. Drop me a line and I will pass it on or E-mail her at ken.easton@tesco.net

The recent picture of the Richmond Road school band has brought letters from Ian Worland of Milton and Jean Pilmer of Elsworth. Ian is on the back row in the picture, which was taken in the school yard. He thinks one of the teachers was a Miss Chandler and recalls that the school used to have a big deck chair near the fire that you could sit in if you didn't feel very well. Jean has a photo of the original band, about 1937, and recalls that the uniforms were made for them by a tailor who used to live in Richmond Road. She started school there when she was three! – she followed her brother to school and Miss Chandler said she could stay.

Dorothy Thwaites of Swavesey has written with further memories Bradmore street, off East Road, where she lived during the war. "I remember very well the regular night trips down the air raid shelter under Zion chapel. Our air raid warden was Mr Brown who made sure everybody left their houses and used the shelter." She also remembers our Australian correspondent, Beryl Cole, and the others who lived in the street including the Philpott family, Mrs Palmer and Joan with their dogs. At the other end of the street on the right hand side was the Souter family who ran a small shop, while Tom and Clara Palmer had another shop on the corner. "It would be nice to get in touch with a few people who lived in that area – the houses have all gone – but the memories live on". I will be happy to pass letters on to her.

Ron Smith from Gt Abington has sent me some detailed memories of the East Road area . He remembers an old jam factory with a large brick chimney which was taken over and became the Walls Ice Cream depot. On the corner of Norfolk Street was Ward's cycle and pram shop managed by Bill and Jack Cairns. Ron adds: "My brother Fred was the cycle mechanic, brother Sid was the van driver, first in an Austin Seven which was replaced by an Austin Ten, both vans painted yellow with the wording J. Ward & Sons on the side. Many makes of cycles were stocked and Ward's produced their own called 'The Crown' which was assembled on the premises. Brother Fred brought rims, hubs and spokes home and built the wheels on a payment by number agreement"

"On the corner of Brewhouse Lane stood the remains of an old hand laundry. At the rear stood a huge building called the drying sheds, this became a store for bundles of canes, willows and materials used in basket making. My mother held the key and basket makers would come along, select their requirements and pay my mother. These monies were taken by my brother Len on Saturday morning to the Shrive basket shop on Peas Hill I derive a lot of pleasure going back over 70 years ago down Memory Lane". Thank you Ron, we enjoy reading them.

Miss Pamela Habgood from Waterbeach was thrilled to see last Friday's picture of the Coleridge Girls' School reunion. She tells me that Miss Mabel Waddelow was the Deputy Head of the school for many years, teaching maths and geography and was a greatly loved and respected teacher. Her girls decided in 1988 to hold a reunion to celebrate their having left the school 21 years before. The picture features former head girl Margaret Hagger (nee Smith), with Gina Robinson and Christine Blackwell. Two members of staff are also shown, Mrs Anne Winnick and Mrs Glenys Williams. Mabel died in Waterbeach in 1991. There is an estate in the village named after her father.

Mrs Betty Tweed of Cheveley has discovered a photograph of a Boxing Day shooting party at Moulton Manor about 1956 when it was owned by Mr Lyndsy Lane. Amongst the folks shown at the back are Eric Tweed who was the gardener & Les Johnson who worked on local farms. In the front row are Mr Green who kept the King's Head in the village and Inspector Lummis of Newmarket police force.

From Thriplow comes a letter from Eva Hall with regard to the old Cambridge Daily News Robin Fellowship. Her brother Alec Wilson and herself both enrolled in the Robins in the 1930's. They used to save bun pennies for the Robin cot at Addenbrooke's Hospital. The coins used to be taken to the CDN office to be counted by Uncle Robin and they would await eagerly for our names to appear in the Robins' column of the paper. Eva's late husband and his three brothers were also Robins so when her son Peter was born in 1950 he was enrolled, as were his sisters Pamela and Jennifer and their children in turn joined up, everybody saving their loose change for the funds. By the mid 1950s the Robin Fellowship had grown so big it was making regular donations to several local charities. Later the Fund was used to sponsor children abroad and people lost interest and the club folded.

Rita Moore of Sutton phoned to tell me of an interesting discovery she had found amongst her mother's things. It is an old brown wallet advertising H. Goodall's 'Leading house for footwear, Sutton'. She has asked local people but nobody remembered him. I have done some checking in the old Kelly's County Directories in the Cambridgeshire Collection and discovered that Harold Goodall was a bootmaker in the village in 1916. He is not listed in the nearest other directories, 1912 or 1922. This is far too far back for anybody to know anything (or is it?)

PICTURES ON DISK

Anne Cousin's mystery picture, perhaps a Gas Works Christmas party
Shooting party at Moulton Manor 1956

Memories, 28th January 2000, by Mike Petty

This week we are back to the dance band days, thanks to two readers' letters..

Charles Sharp from Burwell was born at a cottage in Union Lane, Chesterton which was best remembered as the Wayfarers' Rest, offering tea and a slice of bread to tramps, sometimes consisting of whole families with small children, who were trudging their desperate way to Chesterton workhouse, nearby.

But his memories are of the building next door. He writes: "Recent completion of redevelopment at the junction of High Street & Union Lane Chesterton finally did away with the Premier Hall, which formed part of the site first developed by my old friend, Leslie Hallen. But demolition revealed that the main structure of this once highly popular public venue, much favoured by dancers in the thirties, had survived surprisingly intact.

"My father, Ben Sharp, who was caretaker at the Premier, continued to look after the building when Leslie Hallen moved his business there from Chapel Street. Motor bikes took over the dance floor and a switch to war-work saw a large extension built on the lawn. My dad divided his time between looking after what had become a small factory, being a fireman at Marshall's airdrome and meeting up again with World War I comrades in the Home Guard. But long after it was all over it was still the halcyon pre-war days of the Premier Hall that he loved to recall, when princes from exotic lands vied with jockeys from Newmarket for the privilege of doing the Charleston with the prettiest girls in Cambridge"

Charles has now started some serious research about the Dance Hall, and has his own memories of being pulled up and down on a blanket to polish the marvellous floor on which people danced to the music of Reg Cottage and Percy Cowell. But he is lacking pictures, and would welcome more recollections. Write to me and I will pass them on, or contact him on 01638 742540

What would be ideal would be posters advertising the events there – but who would keep such items? Well Percy Seeby of Trumpington for one. He has a notice dating back to 1937 advertising a “wonder boy” accordionist – himself! Percy was just 12 years old at the time, a small boy with a large accordion. And on this occasion he did not get to play with other members of the band – he was thrown in as a solo performer. When it came to the interval the band disappeared and Percy was instructed to walk round the room playing the accordion to keep everybody entertained. For a shy young boy it seemed a very long interval!

Because of his age he was not allowed to accept cash, so when he started to play with local bands he was often paid in chocolate bars! This might have made him even more popular with schoolmates at St George’s Senior School.

But by then he was an experienced musician, having won several prizes for piano playing at musical competitions in Cambridge Guildhall. He added the saxophone to his repertoire and formed his own five-piece band, “The Ambassadors” which was later reformed and renamed “The Down Beats” featuring first Timothy Moore and later Ken Stevens on piano & Brian Lister of Lister-Jaguar fame on drums. In 1952 Percy secured a place in Freddy Webb’s band at the Embassy ballroom in Mill Road until it folded in 1957. Two years later, and in his late fifties, he formed a quintet with trumpeter Alan Broad and played at Cambridge Jazz Festivals.

Percy still plays at home with the very occasional public performance, as in 1994 when he and his pals played the night away whilst his wife, Mabel, entertained the guests. It was all very reminiscent of their wedding reception, 50 years earlier, when she had sat as a bride in solitary state whilst her new husband & his band played on in Trumpington Village Hall.

If you have such memories to look back on share them with me at the News

BBC Radio Cambridgeshire has been running a marvellous series of programmes entitled “The century speaks” as its contribution to a Millennium Oral History Project. Radio talks to you in a one-to-one manner and wonderful memories are shared daily but they disappear into the ether and there is seldom any opportunity to hear them again. But now Eva Simmons and her team have published some of the most memorable quotes in a new book “Cambridgeshire voices”(Tempus, £9.99) from which the following are culled.

“Monday was wash day and the neighbours had a competition to see who could get their washing out first. I’m sure one Soham woman cheated and got hers done on a Sunday, because she was always first. The washing took most of the day, You had a blue bag to keep the clothes white and had to scrub the clothes using a brush and a scrubbing board” – John Martin

“We had leftovers on Monday – washday – and Bubble and Squeak. On Tuesday we had rissoles and the leftovers went into the stewpot. We also had milk slop, which was vile stuff, disgusting. We were well off compared to some people. I can recall an old neighbour who used to get pig potatoes, they were the small potatoes (now so fashionable) which were then usually reserved for the pigs. But she was well off compared with the lady down the road who had no family and literally relied on everyone else feeding her. We never threw anything away, even leftover gravy would be saved for her and taken over in a screw top jar, she lived totally on other people’s leftovers” - Judy Fox (born 1955)

“We moved to a new council housing estate in Cherry Hinton, a village just outside Cambridge, in 1952. I can remember the back garden was facing onto yellow cornfields. They had little cottages in the High Street then, and they drove tractors and livestock through the village. All the kids grew up together and played together in the streets” – Paul Crossley

“I grew up in a small community in Ramsey Mereside and work with my grandfather on the farm from an early age. We were all working people and felt privileged to move into a council house with a school round the corner. I had two chances to go to a grammar school, but already I knew I wanted to go into farming, not be academic. I also wanted to continue to play rugby and the grammar school played football!” – Brian Abblitt

“There was an older man living near us who said there was a social dance and he’d walk me down there. The dance was held in a schoolroom, which smelled of paraffin. None of the men would dance and one man I spoke to said ‘I pay my money to see people like you make fools of themselves’” – Dora Tack

If any of this rings a bell with you and you missed telling it on the radio, share it with me.

Roger Coleman seeks your help in tracing the story of a 1937 Austin 6/18 horsepower York 7-seater car, registration number CER 100 which is remembered as “The Mayor’s car” by vintage car enthusiasts

For thirty years it was the property of Herbert T Wing of Huntingdon Road. He was mayor of Cambridge in 1936 &, Roger believes, ran Pratt Mannings’ civil and military tailors in Trinity Street. In 1964 Mrs Jeanne Wing sold the car, then still in its original royal blue-black condition, to local taxi driver Peter Fordham for around £30. By 1968 it was owned by Vic Harris who had it resprayed yellow as a promotion for his new ‘Jentri’ mens’ boutique in Regent Street. Roger photographed it then in Willis Road, Cambridge, when it was up for sale at £110, but parental opposition scotched his hopes of buying it. But he has it now and is busily restoring it. The car is so large and magnificent he is sure somebody must remember it and he would love to hear of any anecdotes of the car especially in its earlier days, or of the Wing family whose mayoral scrap books are housed in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library. Write to me at the News and I will pass letters on.

[PICTURE ON DISK]

[NOT FOR PUBLICATION : ROGER HAS THE CAR IN BITS AT HIS GARAGE 106 GILBERT ROAD BUT IS NOT VERY KEEN TO BE PHOTOGRAPHED WITH IT FOR SECURITY REASONS. HOWEVER I HAVE WARNED HIM WE MIGHT TRY – HIS PAGER IS 01893 755236, HIS OFFICE NUMBER 316481 & HOME 357569]

Memories, 4th February 2000 by Mike Petty

Tomorrow night Robert Manderson will raise his voice as part of the Huntingdon Male Voice choir in the Mayor’s Charity concert at St Ives Free Church.

But just 25 years ago that voice carried him into the Guinness Book of Records for a performance, not in the concert hall, but in the bar of the Square and Compasses public house in Gt Shelford.

On 2nd February 1975 Robert sang for a mammoth nine hours without a break, smashing the then record for non-stop singing by a whole hour.

The world record attempt had started at 6am with a throat pastille and a very quiet rendering of ‘Grandad’. He moved on to a repertoire which included ‘Abide with me’, ‘Now is the hour’, and ‘Where have all the flowers gone’.

Monotony was the worst enemy and Robert kept body and mind together by carefully timing each song, playing with his puppy and trying to beat his invigilators at chess.

He did not eat and paused only long enough to take a breath between songs, choosing mainly low pitched numbers which did not put too great a strain on his voice. ‘Show me the way to go home’ was the most repeated refrain as its simple melody presented few problems for him as he travelled from place to place by car. By mid-afternoon he had sung it – and several other songs – several times over.

Only once did he appear to be in difficulty, at that was at the crucial half-way point. But he reassured spectators with a scribbled note: ‘I feel all right, except for a tickle in the throat’ and another spoonful of honey fended off the threat.

At 12 noon he transferred to his local and from then on it was plain sailing. The encouragement he received boosted his morale. By 2 o’clock the record was his, but, only slightly hoarse and smelling slightly of lemon, honey and mentholypus, he jumped into a car for a last session with friends round a piano.

At three o’clock he finally called it a day, having raised more than £65 for cancer research and secured himself a place in music history. Not surprisingly he resisted the temptation to join a rehearsal for ‘Half a Sixpence’ at Sawston Youth Centre and went home for a meal and a sleep.

Tomorrow he will be back on the stage, still singing, 25 years after his world-record achievement, which as far as he knows has never been bettered, though non-stop events are no longer recognised by Guinness.

The Mayor’s Charity Concert by Huntingdon Male Voice Choir is at St Ives Free Church on Saturday at 7.30. Tickets are £6 on the door and proceeds will be shared between the British Heart Foundation and the Mayor’s Charity [PLEASE KEEP THIS PLUG – SPECIFICALLY REQUESTED BY MR MANDERSON AS CONDITION OF PARTICIPATING IN ARTICLE]

Music has been the theme uniting many of your letters this week.

Cliff Parker of Thriplow has written of his memories of the Cambridge Railway Silver Prize Band, of which his father, Leonard, was a founder member. The band room was built by railway volunteers and stood on the left side of Mill Road bridge approaching from Romsey Town. Before the Second World War the band competed at the Crystal Palace, won their section and moved up to a higher group, thus the name Silver Prize. Cliff was lucky enough to attend a concert at the Crystal Palace the year before it burnt down.

At the start of the war the band changed its name to the Home Guard Band and played at the passing out parades of the American forces. Once incident stands out: “I well remember seeing my father weaving an unsteady route along Mill Road on my sister’s bike, the Americans having plied him with whisky, something he never drank except at Christmas, and then only a teaspoonful in his tea”

“I attended many dances in the band room during the war. The lights were gas and when the siren sounded the lights automatically went dim. This was due to the fact that the gas supply was connected to the LNER service which was dimmed during the alert. It was said that this was connected without the knowledge of the railway, but I think they just turned a ‘blind eye’ to it”, adds Cliff.

Another reader sharing war-time memories this week is Mr G. Barton of Cambridge. He has lent me a picture of the Richmond Road & Oxford Road V.E. party with the Rev Partridge, vicar of St Luke’s, standing in black on the left.

But his main point of writing was to say that he too attended Richmond Road school around 1938-39 and has lent a picture of himself and playmates together with Miss Chandler and Miss North, her deputy. He is the lad sitting at the front, fourth from the right. Amongst the others are John Moore (3rd left at back), David Carter, John Allen, Richard Newling and Grahame Free. It might also include Mrs Margaret Cooke, (nee Brittain), then of Darwin Drive, now of Fulbourn, who saw herself on the previous picture featured.

Adrian Lemmon of Fordham has written to say he was chastised by his 11-year old daughter when she spotted him smoking – even though the picture of him in the Civic Restaurant was taken in 1968. There he was, right in the front with his friend Alan Ryall, totally unaware of the CEN photographer about to record him for posterity, though the picture was not actually published until I featured it in “Memory Lane, Cambridge”.

In 1963 Adrian had begun work at Gallyon’s of Bridge Street, Cambridge, as an apprentice gunsmith. At his starting wage of £3.15.0 (£3.75) a week the Civic became a regular haunt , providing good basic food at a modest price. By 1968 he had completed his apprenticeship but still patronised the restaurant, as did a wide cross-section of Cambridge folk. Amongst them was his companion at the table who later married one of the girls who worked there!

Do you recognise yourself at the Civic – write to Mike Petty at the News

A recent mention of H.F. Norman’s hardware shop in Hawthorn Way stimulated memories for Fred Miller of Histon for he has a photograph of himself outside that shop in 1934. He remembers that the firm also used to tour local villages, from Barton and Teversham to Bottisham and Toft selling everything from paraffin and Oxo cubes to baths and hardware. Their first vehicle was a Model T Ford which was replaced by an Austin van, to which they transferred the body from the Model T, a job undertaken at Marshall’s garage, Newmarket Road.

Fred started his own apprenticeship as a motor mechanic at Marshall’s in Jesus Lane in 1944 at wages of 25/- (£1.25) a week. He has lent me a photograph of the garage during wartime, with the blackout shutters let down to increase illumination. Mr Layton Smith was manager at that time, do you recall any of the others?

PICTURES

Robert Manderson world-record setter outside the Square and Compasses, Gt Shelford – CEN neg 298/75/17a – appeared CEN 3 Feb 1975 p7
Civic Restaurant, 1968

Richmond Road school c1939 – on disk
Richmond rd & Oxford Road VE street party, 1945 – on disk - both lent by G.Barton
Marshall’s garage, Jesus Lane 1944

MEMORIES 18th February 2000, by Mike Petty

It is always exciting opening the letters that arrive for me at the News, especially when they containing interesting items, such as that received from Mrs Kathleen Twinn of Cambridge. In fact it was more a parcel than an envelope. It was packed full with newspaper cuttings that had been carefully snipped and folded by her late husband over the last 30 years. Some he pasted into a notebook which he titled ‘Old scenes and views of Cambridge’. There are items compiled by a broad range of News reporters – Sara Payne, Pauline Hunt, Dan Jackson, David Waterson and Chris Elliott, plus one or two of my own. Most are on historical topics but some were very topical when they were published.

For instance it was in March of 1970 – nearly 30 years ago, that one of the main spans was being placed across the Cam as the new Elizabeth Bridge began to take shape. One of the biggest cranes in Europe was brought in to lift the 60-foot long concrete section into position, and of course the News was there to photograph it. In the background was the last of the chain ferries which used to ply their way across the river and beyond it something else which will soon be a memory – the gas holder. But as well as looking at the bridge the photographer turned his attention on the onlookers, snapping a group of children from nearby Brunswick School who were given time off to watch the operation. So who do you spot amongst them?

The need for another river crossing at this point had been anticipated back in 1888 when the legal steps to allow Victoria Bridge were being put in place. In the intervening years residents had petitioned for the new crossing, and petitioned against it because of the traffic congestion it would bring to Chesterton. Eventually it was opened in July 1971, though not without a hitch.

The official ceremony was performed by the Master of Trinity College, Lord Butler. Once speeches had been delivered he stepped forward to cut the ceremonial ribbon with the gold scissors – only to find that they would not cut! To everybody's embarrassment it took several hacks before the ribbon parted – and one photographer who missed the final moment shouted for it to be done again! He should have learned from history for when Victoria Bridge was opened with due pomp in December 1889, there was a similar problem when the bottle of Champagne, which had been suspended from a ribbon and was intended to christen the new structure, failed to break.

Strangely a similar hiccup also marred the opening of another bridge that features amongst Mrs Twinn's cuttings. It shows the scene in 1980 when Mill Road railway bridge, was being widened and heightened to make way for the electrification of the main Cambridge to London railway line. As part of the operation a temporary bridge was erected for cyclists and pedestrians. The original bridge was erected back in 1889 and there was, of course, an official opening. To conclude the ceremony the Mayor of Cambridge was to become the first to cross the bridge in his horse and carriage ... only the horse had other ideas and came to a dead stop!

Kathleen would like her cuttings to be shared by others and I already have most of them in my own files. If they would be of interest to your school or old-folks' home or club write to me at the News and I'll pass them on

Peter Wakeling of Cambridge believes he may have solved the mystery of the mini. You may recall that Rosemary Myers wondered how it was that the same car, FER 680D, appears twice in "Memory Lane, Cambridge". Did it, she wondered, belong to a News photographer? No, says Peter. It was used by a District Nurse (whose name eludes him but she married a doctor from Addenbrooke's and went to live in Canada). He distinctly remembers her for the way she changed his dressings and taught him to play Scrabble. (Does anybody have memories of District Nursing they can share?)

Talking of distant places Beryl Dye has written from South Australia to thank all of you who contacted her with your memories of the St Matthews School class of 1941 following her appeal in "Memories". She has even been sent a picture of the VE Day party in Bradmore Street which shows herself and family. Suddenly the world seems much smaller

Claude Ingrey from Wilbraham thinks he can help Jack Raven of Willingham who asked about school attendance medals in last week's Memories. Claude has a medallion presented to his mother, Violet Marsh, in 1911. She used to attend Quy school. He tells me they were awarded by the County Council for good conduct and industrious and punctual attendance. Apparently you got one medal and then a bar for each succeeding year. When you got enough bars you were awarded a watch

More schooldays memories have come from the good folk of St Andrew's church, Chesterton, when I showed them some slides last week. Mrs Ivy Jolley (nee Cream) had dived into her files and come up with a booklet compiled for the centenary of St George's School, East Road that was issued back in 1936. It is such a rare item that there was no copy in the Cambridgeshire Collection, (there is now!). Maudie Page-Croft (Day) can go back even further and lends me a picture of herself and friends dancing round the Maypole at that school back in 1929.

By absolute co-incidence Christine Green (nee Colpus) of Comberton has written with a request for any photos of the Maypole at Richmond Road school. It used to be erected in Mrs Golding's garden, a house called St Albans on the corner of Westfield Lane & Huntingdon Road, Cambridge. She would also like any pictures of the school in the 1940s and with May Day fast approaching how about more memories of the maypoles?

Mr G.A. Wilson from Newmarket Road, Cambridge has written sharing his memories of the dance band days. He started playing piano accordion at the age of eleven and played regularly for weddings. At fifteen he had a band called The Red Aces who played for dances at the Labour Hall, the Masonic Hall and the open-air dances on Christ's Pieces. After war-time service he formed the Post Office Social Club band. His mention of the Masonic Hall reminds me of that large old building that used to stand in Corn Exchange Street until the 1960s. I remember sneaking inside once and taking a snap, but would appreciate your memories of its role in the social life of Cambridge.

PHOTOS

ELIZABETH BRIDGE NEW SPAN

BRUNSWICK SCHOOL CHILDREN WATCHING

BRIDGE AT OPENING

MILL ROAD BRIDGE RECONSTRUCTION 1980 – 19438010

EAST ROAD SCHOOL MAYPOLE, 1929 – ON DISK

Memories 25 February 2000, by Mike Petty

The Good Old Days were perhaps not so good, as Sid Martin from Langdon House recalls. He writes: "I am now up to the ripe old age of four score years and ten and can recall how the working class people had to cope with old age problems in my young days"

In those days the usual trend was for big families. It was a family tradition that the daughter had to care for their parent until death. There were no state benefits. However as old age crept on sometimes people could not cope and this might bring a move to the dreaded workhouse or union, like the one at Chesterton, which survived as a Hospital till recently. Other inmates were tramps like those Sid used to see as he worked on the farmland that is now Bar Hill village. These men tramped from workhouse to workhouse and always carried a "billycan", an old tin with a wire handle to heat water and brew their own tea. They would call at houses to beg some water and hope a kindly housewife would offer him something to eat.

Provision for the elderly is now much better, he feels. In the 1960s and 70's a lot of large houses were adapted to house old people, their big bedrooms curtained off like hospital wards. But modern residential houses were also being built which offer a standard of comfort far higher than that available in the past.

Housing improvement was one of the major challenges of the post-war period, when more and more people were desperate for a home of their own. Despite extensive building schemes by 1953 there was a 15 year waiting list for council houses. At the same time 1,250 houses were reported unfit for human beings to live in with another 160 condemned before the war. By 1959 there were between 3,000 or 4,000 houses worthy of clearance. As the CDN reported in December, the North had no monopoly of slum problems, for Cambridge could offer conditions almost as bad as those in Leeds and Sheffield. Damp and unhealthy, lacking air and light, streets such as Gloucester terrace on Castle Hill, Saxon Street off Lensfield Road or the depths of Fitzroy Street were condemned and scheduled for demolition.

They were often owned by small landlords with incomes little larger than those of their tenants who regarded the properties as millstones round their necks. They had little incentive to recondition or modernise and once he demolished a condemned cottage at his own expense, the landlord was left with a most valuable site.

Dr Cyril Eastwood, the City's medical Officer of Health was busily inspecting properties for bulging walls and lack of ventilation, checking whether ordinary household tasks could be carried out in daytime without artificial light and enquiring just how many families were having to share one lavatory.

But the people who lived there did not want to move away to housing estates like Arbury, they wanted new houses in the areas where they already lived, convenient to the town centre.

One man who knew the problem more than most was Mr Edwards, the Chief Public Health Inspector. He remarked that "once the occupiers of unfit houses get into the new housing areas they wonder how they ever stood the old conditions. I am interested in the effect upon the children of the damp creeping up the walls. I am amazed at the patience of some of these people" Do you look back with nostalgia at houses that may have been condemned, yet were home – write to Mike Petty at the News

PICTURE ON DISK IS OF A CAMBRIDGE BACK STREET FROM THE NEWS FILES – BUT WHICH ONE?

My appeal for information on the Leys Laundry in Union Lane, Chesterton, has brought an instant response from Mrs Ruby Hunt (nee Everard) of Cambridge. She has lent me a photograph of it when she worked there for four years around 1935 as an ironer. Ruby's sister Low is first on the right and she is next. The laundry was owned by a Mrs Kay and managed by Mrs Briggs. Her hours were from 8am to 7pm, they were timed when they went to the toilet and not allowed to talk. "We ironed twelve silk night-dresses for 2/- (10p), a dozen socks for a farthing – 'Happy Days' she recalls, adding tellingly "The workhouse was next door"! [RUBY HUNT, 26 WALPOLE RD 245098 – SHE IS AN OLD LADY LIVING ON HER OWN. I DID WONDER ABOUT A PIC OF HER WITH HER IRON TODAY BUT I DON'T THINK SHE'D WELCOME IT]

Barbara Rooney of Edinburgh Rd also remembers the laundry when it was owned by a Mr Wheatley. "When I was young my friend's father was caretaker. They lived in 'Leys Lodge'; the house is still there, but its lovely gardens and the laundry have been sold to make way for Cambanks", she writes

Barbara also recalls Overstream House, firstly as a small child going to Joan Medcalfe's Dancing class, then as a teenager to be taught to Ballroom Dance by Mr Benstead. "It was so lovely then, mirrored walls, polished floors, Victor Sylvester – what more could you want!"

Mrs Rooney goes on: "I also remember fondly the Embassy Ballroom in Mill Road, now a Carpet Warehouse. For a teenager in the '50s it was one of the places we'd go every week. It was a bit flashy, not so plush as the Rex Ballroom, but a great place for having a good time. I met my husband there in 1953. I have heard there are plans to demolish it, wouldn't it be great if the owners allowed one last dance to be arranged there, I'm sure it would be well attended. If only!!" [BARBARA ROONEY 21 EDINBURGH RD - 364603 – MIGHT IT BE WORTH GETTING A PICTURE OF HER OUTSIDE IT?]

One group that found their dancing blocked by bureaucracy was the newly formed Cambridge Rock 'n' Roll Club back in March 1975. They all turned up to their club's first party at the Midland Tavern, Devonshire Road, only to be told there could be no dancing – not singing for that matter. Cambridge Magistrates were not opposed to the jiving, but to the fact that the landlord had only applied for a music licence. So the Rockers had to be content with just listening to the beat, and not joining in.[CUTTING ENCLSOED, NEG NO 618/75/13A]

Another school attendance medallion has been reported by Mrs Amy Robinson of Willingham. It was awarded to the late Mrs Bertha Few, formerly Denson nee Robinson, for good conduct, industry and punctual attendance in 1906. Bertha not only got the medal she was also awarded bars for an additional seven years. There are obviously several of these still treasured by families – but does anybody have one actually awarded to themselves?

MEMORIES, March 3rd 2000, by Mike Petty

Last Saturday was Rag Day in Cambridge and News photographs took to the streets to record the festivities. Once more it is a traditional part of Cambridge life, a day of odd and various activities, raising money for good causes.

But as a glance at this weeks “Looking Back” for 100 years ago will show that "Rags" - defined as a "noisy disorderly scene" - have been in the past equated with pitched battles with police, destruction and general hooliganism. The bonfires and disturbance which followed the news of the relief of Ladysmith in March of 1900 were blamed on members of the university, though correspondents were quick to point out that the ‘Town’ contingent had played their part too. Heavy fines for felony passed by magistrates on undergraduates enraged students; a mob march to the Mayor’s house in Brooklands Avenue and only massed ranks of police and a contingent of proctors succeeded in maintaining order. Petitions were raised containing names from both town and gown and the Home secretary recommended Queen Victoria to grant a pardon – it would be very hard to make undergraduates suffer for all their lives for what had been done in a rash moment on such a momentous day.

It was horseplay of this sort and the fear of further disturbance so near Bonfire Night that prompted the town authorities to refuse the British Legion permission to organise Poppy-Day collections for a number of years. But then they took the bold step of allowing the University to participate and on the 10th November 1922 the first Poppy Day rag was held. A procession of "animals" toured the town with a police escort and was hailed as one of the happiest Rags ever seen.

It started a tradition that continued until recent times and raised thousands of pounds for the Earl Haig appeal. But in the 1960s everything seemed to fall apart. Many colleges began to boycott the Rag, wanting the money collected to go to other groups as well as the Legion appeal. Following great debate and public concern other charities were added to the list but people became less tolerant of flour bombs, rotten tomatoes, water pistols and eggs and in 1967 the "Poppy Day" rag was held for the last time, its demise marked with fighting between student-s and local youths.

When revived in February 1969 the event flopped - many people did not even know it was on - subsequent years attracted little more support and by 1974 enthusiasm was reported at an all-time low. But Jubilee Year 1977 saw a revival in its fortunes and in 1980 the organisation was taken over by the Cambridge Students Union who succeeded in uniting town and gown and making the Rag a unifying rather than divisive feature of Cambridge life, as News photographers have shown so well.

When Anne Cousins contacted me back in January (Memories 21st January) with a picture of her mother taken about 65 years ago she hoped somebody might come forward who could shed light on the mystery. Now Mrs June Carter of Cambridge has done just that. She was just five years old herself at the time but recognised 20 of the people on the photo.

The picture was taken at the Cherry Hinton Village Labour Party children's Christmas party held in the British Legion Hut on the recreation ground about 1934. June's memories span the years as she writes: "It was a great event for us as we didn't have many parties. In those days Cherry Hinton was solid labour and all the people knew each other like one big family. All the children went to the village school until they were 14 and lots went on to marry. There was very little traffic in those days. We played marbles, hop scotch and skips on the High Street. It was such a lovely pretty village. The cows crossed from one meadow to the other; the length of Chalks Farm Drive was lined with huge walnut trees. Tommy Thompson our milkman from Coldham's Lane had a churn on the back of a barrow, we would go out with our jug and he would measure a pint, & Jess Patteen came from Fulbourn with a horse and cart with our bread, still warm. I'm four generations of Cherry Hinton and I'm always looking for Cherry Hinton faces, but they get fewer. It's not a village, but a small town now & I sometimes don't see anyone I know"

Now Mrs E. Poole of Scotland Road, Cambridge has issued another challenge. She has a photograph that she hopes somebody can identify. The gentleman in the flat cap at the back of the group is her husband's grandfather, Bert Jacobs. He lived with his Belgian born wife, Anna and their four children, Don, Joan, Eric and Marie in Fitzroy Street opposite the Old English Gentleman where he used to drink regularly. Around 1933 they moved to Ashfield Road, Chesterton and he switched his allegiance to the Yorkshire Grey pub in the High Street. The likelihood therefore is that the picture shows a pub outing. That's all we know. Over to you

More school medals have been reported by Dorothy Thwaites, who also has a silver pocket watch awarded to her mother, Nellie King, for perfect attendance at Cherry Hinton Church School. Delving amongst his late wife's treasures Keith Bullen from Orwell has found three presented in that village. Michael Pollard not only has a medal but also a Labour Certificate which was issued to his mother, Gladys Mabel Webb of Litlington who had made 350 attendances at school and was now able to start work – in November 1910

Jenny Lister from Fen Ditton spotted her father dancing round the maypole at East Road school in 1929. "We have never ever seen this picture of him and never imagined seeing him holding a ribbon and looking really pleased with himself. Both our parents have sadly passed away now and over the years family photos have been lost so it was brilliant to see this." Jenny would like a copy of the picture, which has now been added to the Cambridgeshire Collection.

Gerald Smith from Cambridge does not go back that far, but spotted himself amongst the pupils of Coleridge School in 1971 together with other school friends. They include Debbie who wore very short skirts ("there wasn't much truancy amongst the lads in our class!" he adds) and Linda, "a quiet shy girl who went on to marry one of the rowdiest lads in the school & surprised a lot of people".

Last week's "Memories" photos brought a triple bout of nostalgia for Derek Lay of Cambridge. He used to live in Doric Street, his wife worked in Gloucester Street and he thinks the mystery picture was of Leeke street off Newmarket Road where he used to go to a corner shop.

Michael Marshall writes from The Airport, further along Newmarket Road with a wealth of detail generated by the picture of Marshall's garage in Jesus Lane, 1944 which I featured on 4th February. He forwarded a copy of the article to Reg Peacock, now living in Cumbria, who started his own career at Jesus Lane. Reg is on the picture together with Mr Leyton Smith talking to Cyril "Tich" Porter. George Whithead (metal basher) Bertie Baker the carpenter, Len Dean the electrician and Bernard Tabram also feature. Mr Peacock had been called up before the picture was taken but recalls they had several girls training as mechanics then including Mary Mortlock, June & Irene Brown and Dora Housedon

Mr B. Fuller of Cambridge has been prompted to write with his memories of the Oyster House in Garlic Row. "I used to play in that house in the 1940's. It used to belong to Harry Lee who had another big house in Stanley Road. They used to say there was a tunnel between the two, but we never did find it. I've been chased out of the Oyster House a few times by Mr Lee on his way up to the Gardeners Arms pub, a well-dressed man, with a big watch chain and a flower in his buttonhole. I could tell yu a bit about that area!”

MEMORIES, 10th March 2000 by Mike Petty

Mrs Peggy Shortley of Cambridge has written with an interesting family story. “My father served in the R.A.S.C. during the First World War and drove army officers as a chauffeur. Afterwards he obtained employment as a chauffeur to Prince Arthur of Connaught who I believe was one of Queen Victoria’s sons.

“I remember being told as a child that dad used to receive an order sometimes to drive to Cambridge to rendezvous some evenings with H.R.H. Edward, Prince of Wales, who was at that time an undergraduate of one of the colleges, I believe Trinity. The Prince should not have been playing truant, but he loved the London nightlife and it was to London that dad used to drive him.

“After his evening in town, dad had to collect him and drive him back to Cambridge, usually in the small hours of the morning. Arriving back dad’s help was enlisted to help him get back into college without being caught. I seem to remember this involved dad having to help him climb over a wall or some railings or something.

“In appreciation, the Prince gave dad a cigarette case, which he treasured and never used. It was contained in a cardboard box with a jeweller’s name and address stamped on the lid. The address is rather badly rubbed but I have deciphered it as : ‘L & F. Cole Ltd, Jewellers and Silversmiths, 5 & 6 Market Street, Cambridge, tel.1406’

“My father was living in London at this time, which I believe happened around 1920. It was definitely before 1923. Is it possible to authenticate the story as I should like to write it up and put it in the cigarette case so that it can be passed down the family.”

The jewellers Peggy mentions were indeed in Cambridge from at least 1874 to about 1933 and Edward, Prince of Wales, was indeed in Cambridge in May of 1921 – but only to receive an Honorary Degree, as a picture in the News library shows. He was driven to King’s college chapel, lunched at Emmanuel college and arrived at the Senate House for his degree in the afternoon. Roars of cheers went up to welcome ‘Prince Charming’ to the ceremony at which the Public Orator said: “the only thing he lacks we give him – we make him a Cambridge man”. So he was not an undergraduate and Mrs Shortley’s story falls down.

But there were other Royals in residence at the time. Prince Albert, Duke of York - the future King George VI, and his brother Prince Henry, later Duke of Gloucester, were indeed at Trinity college from 1919-1920, though they resided at Latham Road.

Prince Albert entered fully into undergraduate life. He attended debates at the Union Society including one occasion when Winston Churchill was speaking. As he left the meeting the future King was accosted by a Bulldog – one of the University policeman – and later fined 6/8. His offence : smoking whilst in academic dress. The porter who ‘progged’ him was sent to collect the fine from the Prince himself and found himself quite put at ease by the Royal transgressor. Indeed he told the Prince that he had spotted him smoking on a previous occasion when leaving the Corn Exchange – but had mistaken him for one of the people who had been performing inside – a boxer!

So could the box have come from Prince Albert, and her tale add to the story of Royal misdemeanours, or did Peggy’s father chauffeur the Prince of Wales down to the degree ceremony? Whichever it was it makes an interesting addition to her family memories. [PICTURE OF PRINCE EDWARD AT THE SENATE HOUSE – PHOTOGRAPHIC HAVE A PICTURE OF READER WITH HER CIGARETTE BOX – PEGGY SHORTLEY, 8 GODWIN WAY, CAMBRIDGE – 245536 – DO NOT GIVE THE ADDRESS ON CAPTION]

Did your family have interesting contacts with Royalty – write to Mike Petty at the News

In last week's "Memories" I featured a mystery photograph of a pub outing, which had been sent in by Mrs Poole of Cambridge. Now R.J. Palmer of Trumpington has come up with the answer. The picture showed a darts club outing from the Crown public house, Wellington Street, Cambridge about 1936-37. They went to Gt Yarmouth by charabanc, just one of many such trips that were organised by Albert Braysher, the landlord. He is shown in the centre of the picture together with Jack Palmer & Reg Chapman, both well-known darts players, Bower Odell the greengrocer and Albert Waller who managed the Freeman Hardy & Willis shop on Market Hill for 50 years. [PICTURE ON DISK]

An even more difficult challenge has been set this week by Jenny James from the Burleigh street branch of Oxfam. The picture must date from the very early days of the 1900s and shows an intriguing group of what appear initially to be children, but are apparently very short adults. The donor thought they were an old Cambridge family, but not one known to me. How about you? [PICTURE ON DISK]

Chad Ashman from Stretham wonders if you recognise whether it was him in the bobble hat and mittens in the centre of a group of snowball-throwing youngsters in Chalk Grove, as featured in the "Memory Lane, Cambridge" book, page 157. Certainly he remembers that the man in the background clearing snow was Mr Bocock, a butcher. Can you put Chad out of his misery – he thinks he remembers the picture being taken but it was all a long time ago - November 1969! [PICTURE ENCLOSED]

A recent picture of Gloucester Street, off Castle Hill, Cambridge, has prompted memories for several readers. Connie Asplen of Cambridge lived in Gloucester Terrace, a small row of 18 houses. "It was just a dirt road – very muddy when it rained. It was gas light, there was no water in the houses – we shared two taps between nine houses in the back alleyway. We used to bath in a zinc bath in front of a coal fire. Then the water was bailed out into the toilet into buckets which we emptied into the toilet – thank goodness we had our own "lavvy". We eventually got permission to have electricity put in which a friend did for £10. Finally we all had a sink and one tap installed – but the pressure was poor.". The accommodation may have been basic but the rent in 1952 was 9/1 (45p) a week

Dawn Butler from Histon also lived in the Terrace; she remembers the 'fairy godmothers' to the children – the American servicemen who used to drink at the Sir Isaac Newton pub. Dawn also recalls the people who traded from there, including Tansleys typewriters, Dickersons & Sindalls. Mr G. Murffett [SUBS – THIS IS THE RIGHT SPELLING – MIKE] worked for the latter; he joined them as plumbing foreman in 1949 and the firm stayed there until about 1955 when they moved to The Paddocks on Cherry Hinton Road.

Mrs Mary Walker from Cambridge has other memories of the "Good old days". She writes: "In the early 1950s we considered ourselves fortunate to rent three rooms at the top of a very tall house that stood in Park Street at the junction with Round Church Street. We shared a toilet and washbasin with the people on the floor below, and all water had to be carried up and down from there. We had a gas ring, but any other cooking was catered for my going down two flights of stairs, along a passageway and into a room with three gas cookers in it. Imagine trying to cook a meal under those circumstances with a two-year-old toddler. Incidentally the passageway housed the coal which had to be carried to the top of the house. When the house was due for demolition we moved to Gothic Street – a whole house to ourselves. Looking out of the back bedroom window onto a small paved yard containing a toilet and tap I wondered why you would want a tap outside. I went downstairs – no sink, no water inside. Every drop had to be carried in and out. But we survived and at least we were together with a roof over our heads. And we had an added bonus – our own toilet – albeit outside"

Pat Reevel writes from Chesterton to say that it was her father, John Sturgeon, who designed the interior of the Leys Steam Laundry in Union Lane, and supervised the installation of the plant, subsequently becoming their steam engineer. Mrs Jean Clements (nee Rumbelow) of Campkin Road, Cambridge worked in their receiving shop on The Broadway, Mill Road during the war, together with Mrs Ethel Peachey. "Most of our customers had men in the forces and often one would come in to say they'd had a telegram from the War Office. The hardest hit were those who had someone in the Far East, many had written for 2-3 years only to find they had written to someone who had been dead all the time. Mill Road was a real community during the war, everyone helping each other. They were happy working days to me"

Compiled Eve

Memories, 17th March 2000, by Mike Petty

The Government's plans for more houses in the countryside are the latest attempt to meet a problem that has always seemed to be with us. In March 1950 it was a dilemma that was facing the planners in connection with the village of Barton where an estate of 200 houses was being proposed for land in Cambridge Road. The issues raised seem to have been echoed elsewhere at other places.

The developer contended that Barton was far from being attractively rural, because of the large numbers of council houses that had already been built in "yellow lavatory brick". Of course it did have a certain village life and there was the objection that the social services would be swamped by people on the new estate – but the developer would supply both electricity and mains water from a private plant. There was no gas supply nor mains sewer but they would construct their own sewage disposal station as soon as there were enough houses to justify it.

The county planners were adamant that Cambridge itself should not grow too large and acknowledged that there would be pressure on outlying settlements such as Barton and Cherry Hinton which would eventually become dormitory villages. If the development was in small units in the village itself the people would automatically take part in village life & become part of the social structure of the communities, then facilities such as shops and schools would be improved. This was not the same as dropping a London suburb of 200 houses bodily half a mile away. Now, 50 years later, Cambourne is in course of construction.

In March 1975 however Huntingdonshire planners were grappling with recommendations to prevent the town centres of St Neots, St Ives and Huntingdon from becoming "deserts of industry" where nobody lived. Until the mid 1950's the three town centres were mainly residential, except for small cores of commerce. Then came the dramatic house expansion of the 1960s and 1970s with shops and offices following hard on their heels. Commercial activity, together with worsening traffic conditions made centres less desirable places to live. Attempts to get developers to include flats and houses in town centre developments were unlikely to succeed & it would be difficult to provide private gardens or residents parking.

In Cambridge city-centre accommodation has always been at a premium, with much of the land acquired throughout the centuries by the colleges for their students, which makes your memories of town-centre living most welcome.

Did you used to live in the centre of Cambridgeshire's towns – share your memories with Mike Petty at the News.

Christine Green from Comberton adds her memories of V.E. Day as celebrated in Richmond Road, Cambridge and also lends a snap of the school's May Queen parade in 1944. She recalls how "All our mothers would stand by their gates on our journey from the school to Mrs Golding's garden, via Richmond Road, Halifax Road, Canterbury Street and then down "Piggy Wiggy Lane" to Westfield Lane and on to the Maypole". Christine's grandparents used to keep the White Horse Inn, Castle Street, Cambridge until 1934 and she has snaps of them with chickens and pigs in the back garden – impossible to imagine today! It now houses the Folk Museum, a veritable treasure chest of local objects and artefacts.

One day it might also house a very treasured medal preserved by Sylvia Clark. It was presented in February 1913 to her grandfather, Charles Corbey who was chief warder at the County Gaol on Castle Hill, Cambridge, and witnessed the last two hangings there before leaving Cambridge for Wakefield. The gaol closed in 1916 and was demolished in the 1930s for the present Shire Hall. This would have been remembered by Charles Asplin who used to live at no.17 Gloucester Terrace – the "mystery street” featured in “Memories” on 25th February and now positively identified by Jack Reynolds of Cambridge.

More memories of Overstream House, Cambridge, have come from Jean Garner (nee Spicer) of Cambridge. “My sister Sheila and I started dancing classes (tap and ballet) around 1936 with the Martin School of Dance, then run by Michael Walsh. When he was called up the school was run by Valerie Redfarn and her mother Joyce was pianist. We carried on throughout the war, doing over 1,000 shows for troops. Even when the school closed we had not seen the last of Overstream House. My husband and I held our engagement party there in 1951. It has seen many happy occasions and I for one would like to see it returned to its original use”. Mrs Jean Mitchell also has happy memories of Overstream House and has lent me some snaps of a Jazz Club meeting there in 1956. One shows her husband, Tony Mitchell (in suit), with saxophone player Bert Waller in full flow, while other musicians performing that night were Mick (or Nick) Parmenter on piano and Bernie Stubbings on drums. Do you recognise anybody else?

H.G. Benstead of Victoria Homes, Cambridge writes of his memories of the Tivoli cinema, Chesterton Road, which was opened just 75 years ago. “When it was built the news spread that they wanted young people to help test the circle on the following Sunday, and a gift would be given. I and several mates went along and joined a long queue. When the doors opened we went up the stairs and were told to sit down until every seat was full. A man came at the front of the screen and asked us to stand up – sit down – stand up and mark time – sit down – stand up and then leave. When we got to the bottom of the stairs we were given a shilling (5p). We were well pleased!” And doubtless many returned to spent their coppers on seats for the films.

Mr Charlie Denston of Abbey Road, Cambridge is seeking a picture of the 250th Field Company Royal Engineers marching down Station Road, Cambridge when they were returning from a fortnight’s camp at Canterbury in late August 1939. The photograph appeared in the CDN at the time. He writes: “My brother Cecil and I were among that column of men, but unfortunately I was in No.3 Section at the rear, or else I might have been spied wearing my best blue suit, though with all my kit and rifle. I had been issued a uniform but it was miles too large and the QuarterMaster’s Stores didn’t possess a smaller one. Of course I didn’t wear the suit at camp, we had denim overalls”. He has written an account of his war years and would like a copy of the photograph as one of the illustrations. Can you help?

Bryony O’Hara of King’s Heath, Birmingham has send me a cutting from the News of April 1972 about Louisa Salmon, then 100 years old and who ascribed her long life to hard work. “I used to go out cleaning until I broke my ankle when a motorcycle knocked me down. I was about 80 at the time”, she said. Mrs Salmon was then living with her daughter Mrs Hilda Webb in Norfolk Terrace. Bryony thinks Louisa might have married a Horseheath man, Edward Salmon and so be related to herself. It is all a bit complicated but as Bryony has traced the Salmons back to the 1700s she would appreciate any help in tracking down other relations. Write to her at 24 Wyche Avenue, King’s Heath, Birmingham B14 6LQ

PICTURES

Barton/St Ives/ St Neots / Huntingdon – from News files

Picture of Sylvia Clark with her grandfather’s medal – photographic have pic
County Gaol, Castle Hill – prison staff c1913 & view of gaol – on disk

Overstream House Jazz Club 1956 – 2 – from Jean Mitchell - on disk

Memories 24th March 2000, by Mike Petty

In March 1975 a group of undergraduates published “The Cambridge pub guide”, rating them from grimy to gracious. Grime, according to the guide, was synonymous with the Locomotive pub in Mill Road, and grace one of the virtues of the Plough Inn at Fen Ditton. Praise was lavished on the “thematic scheme” of the Galleon bar in the Burleigh Arms, Newmarket Road while The Free Press, a tiny back-street pub in Prospect Row had “exceptional character” and the Baker’s Arms, East Road, was a “refreshing surprise”.

A glance at the section on the city centre pubs is a reminder of just how much has changed over the last quarter of a century. Here is a selection of those now just memories.

The Still and Sugarloaf, Market Hill: “The recently-renovated Queen Vic Bar is very large ... the cellar bar is dark and stuffy and tends to become crowded and the loud juke-box does nothing to enliven the ‘skeleton in the cupboard’”

The Rose, Rose Crescent: “... the carpeted floor, the ample seating, the plush wallpaper and the piped music make this a comfortable but characterless pub”.

The Turks Head, Trinity Street. “This Berni inn consists of three restaurants and two bars. The first of these is the Cellar Bar which is dimly lit but nonetheless gay. At the far end of the room improvised dancing takes place to the strains of juke-box music. Sherry seems a popular drink here and beer is expensive”.

“The Bun Shop, Downing Street. “stands out as one of considerable character, and has an atmosphere all of its own. The two bars provide numerous diversions for the mainly young customers – including a dartboard, table-football, pin-ball and a fairground slot game. The walls are bizarrely decorated with paintings and murals or bright colours. The Bun Shop is something of a Cambridge institution and is well worth a visit. The pub does not open on Wednesdays”

The Heneky Tavern, Sidney Street. “More suited to meals than drinks. The Steak and Schnitzel Bar with highly effective Victorian décor ... the Chop House which is more rustic with beams and whitewash much in evidence. The large Alexandra Bar is entirely given over to drinking, it houses a superb collection of advertising mirrors, which in itself is worth coming to see – as are the signs to the toilets”.

If your taste was for wine, rather than beer, the students commented on Shades winebar in King’s Parade: “the custom tends to be cliquy and loud, there is a distinct lack of elbow room but if you are part of ‘the in-crowd’ you will appreciate what the establishment has to offer”. Over in King Street was Le Chien II “one of the few cocktail bars, styled on Continental lines with high-quality furnishing and Venetian blinds. The candles on individual tables lead to an intimate and seductive atmosphere. The brighter lighting of the semi-circular bar makes it the focal point of the room, but serves only to enhance the privacy of its darker parts”

Not all approved of the students’ efforts. John Williams, chairman of the Cambridge Licensed Victuallers’ Association described it as “a minority view for a minority of people”. What do you think, looking back 25 years? [PICTURES ENCLOSED OR PRINT FROM NEGS LISTED ON ATTACHED PHOTOCOPY]

More memories of Overstream House, Cambridge, have come from Jean Garner (nee Spicer) of Cambridge. “My sister Sheila and I started dancing classes (tap and ballet) around 1936 with the Martin School of Dance, then run by Michael Walsh. When he was called up the school was run by Valerie Redfarn and her mother Joyce was pianist. We carried on throughout the war, doing over 1,000 shows for troops. Even when the school closed we had not seen the last of Overstream House. My husband and I held our engagement party there in 1951. It has seen many happy occasions and I for one would like to see it returned to its original use". Mrs Jean Mitchell also has happy memories of Overstream House and has lent me some snaps of a Jazz Club meeting there in 1956. One shows her husband, Tony Mitchell (in suit), with saxophone player Bert Waller in full flow, while other musicians performing that night were Mick (or Nick) Parmenter on piano and Bernie Stubbings on drums. Do you recognise anybody else? [PICTURS SCANNED ON DISK]

Charlie Denston's request for assistance in locating a picture of his colleagues in the 250th Field Company Royal Engineers in August 1939 for his personal scrapbook sent me delving into the back files of the News, which are housed in the Cambridgeshire Collection, Lion Yard Library, Cambridge. The picture appeared twice, once in the CDN of 21st August 1939 and again in the Cambridge Independent Press of 25th August. The "News" also contained a report of the camp at Canterbury when the troops had fully satisfied their commanding officer, Major King, on their ability to "put their backs into it". They had practised demolition, barbed-wire fencing, & water purification techniques but liked the demolition part of the business best, especially the few heart-throbbing minutes before "up she goes". Charlie and his pals had Reveille at 6am, lunch at 2pm and despite the attentions of Sergeant Major Tabor there was only one appointment they were always on time for – pay parade! [C. DENSTON, 48 ABBEY RD . 352284 - WOULD IT BE WORTH GETTING A PICTURE OF HIM EITHER LOOKING AT THE PHOTO IN THE NEWS OF 21ST AUGUST 1939 OR WITH THE CUTTINGS I'VE MADE?]

I've received a most interesting letter from some O.A.P.s who have also posed various questions. They are interested in when the last Mammoth Fair, was held on Jesus Green. This great attraction was a mixture of a mini agricultural show with displays of decorated carriages etc. One year there was even a parachute descent from a balloon, when one of the jumpers ended up in a blackberry hedge and the other – a woman – just missed a ducking in the Cam. It hit all sorts of financial difficulties & finally closed down in 1926. Stourbridge Fair, once one of the greatest trading fairs in Europe lingered on a few years after, being finally abolished by the Secretary of State of the Home Department in 1934. One important part of the fair used to be a horse fair which was also held on Midsummer Common if my memory serves (I don't go back quite as far as my correspondents!). But I am beaten on one of my inquisitors' questions: what did warrior springs have to do with them?

They also ask about the connection of Professor John Hilton, St Regis House in Chesterton and the News of the World. This jogged a memory for when I was working in the old Reference Library at the back of the Guildhall, 30 years ago, we had visit from a very irate gentleman who had felt so annoyed about something in the John Hilton Column that he had come up to Cambridge to track the gentleman down. Only he didn't have his address. The obvious answer was to check Kelly's directory and together we searched the various sections, while the enquirer continued to explain just what damage he was about to commit. Sadly we failed to locate him, and the enquirer departed. Only then did I discover that somehow we'd been checking the Kelly's for Oxford – not Cambridge! (How did that happen?)

Had he been successful perhaps we would have been treated to another headline such as that of June 1930 when a Cambridge undergraduate shot his tutor, a Cambridge detective and himself at King's college. Paradoxically this was the same year that the old gallows at the County Gaol, Castle Hill, were sold off, just across the road from the Three Tuns Inn where on 12th January 1739 Dick Turpin is said to have left his velvet coat. This later found its way to Mr E. Rutter, the Cambridge antique dealer, who discovered coins hidden in the lining. My correspondents also remember how an old coat, thick with dust, was discovered in a bedroom of the inn and ended up in Roger Roe's antique shop, Bridge Street. As they say – this is Cambridge history, and I hope they will share more of it with me.

Anne and Roger Leonard from Sheringham have written to confirm that it was indeed Chad Ashman amongst youngsters in Chalk Grove, Cherry Hinton, that I featured on 10th March. The others were Tim Fitzgerald, Tim French, Simon Utteridge or Steven Barber, Brian Leonard, & Paul & Nigel Barber.

Sir Arthur Marshall has shared some of his memories of the Newmarket Road area and the multiplicity of public houses leading up to Cut Throat Lane next to the football stadium, which became the entrance road to the original aerodrome at Whitehill Farm. “There was my father’s old house “Whitehill”, built in 1880. It was a very large house with double stairways, a fountain and a summerhouse, lawns and woods, and a paddock on about a ten acre estate, originally known as Kent’s Folly – virtually a palace of a building in that area, and within 100 yards of Cut Throat Lane!”

Memories, 31st March 2000, by Mike Petty

On Saturday I met some of the people in the Coleridge area of Cambridge, at a community day organised by the City Council to bring people together and give them an opportunity of expressing their opinions on how their area could be enhanced.

When he surveyed Perne Road for his “Down Your Street” articles in 1989 Dan Jackson chatted to Arthur Howard who had moved into his new home near Cherryhinton Road in 1932 when it was virtually isolated. The next year he had ten new neighbours, and within four years he was in a street with 191 houses – the new Perne Road.

It was built wider than most because it was deliberately built to be a ring road, so the houses were set well back from the road in anticipation of the traffic due to thunder past. Doubtless traffic and ways of coping with it will have been high amongst the present residents’ concerns.

The land on which the houses and roads were built was formerly open farmland which was sold off throughout the 1930s with blocks of land bought by various developers, including Ridgeons, Twinn, Starr and Sindall, and all built houses in similar style. Those on the east side had long narrow gardens with plots about 100 feet long. When the houses were first built they commanded views of open fields stretching as far as Cherry Hinton. Now the views have gone as more houses have been built.

The growth was encouraged as one way of combating the scourges of that period, slum housing and unemployment, making work for people in building new roads, laying new water mains and building the houses themselves. In 1933 the Master Builders and Decorators published an advertisement: “Do you realise that 1,653 able-bodied men are totally unemployed in your own town. Do you realise that of this appalling total 543 men are of the building trade”. They then went on to urge people to spend money on home improvements or having their houses decorated.

Later with housing still a priority pre-fabricated bungalows were erected in the Golding Road area, designed to last for just a short period. Inevitably they continued to use used much longer than forecast, finally being demolished in 1974.

Now the needs for more and more houses are being addressed by the Labour Government with proposals for growth which will inevitably put more pressure on local councillors who have to identify just where the houses should go, and represent the needs and fears of their constituents.

Just who are these people? Well for Coleridge residents the answers are now available with the publication of a new booklet published by the Coleridge Ward Labour Party which interviews some of the individuals who have performed this often difficult and unappreciated task. ("Coleridge Ward from Tory to Labour" by Lucy Munby and Marie Ferguson-Smith – phone Cambridge 247162)

Some of them joined in my "Lucky Dip" session on Saturday, picking slides at random and talking about them. Several saw members of their family, and of course one councillor picked a slide of himself busily protesting against some new proposal!

One of the audience was less forthcoming when confronted with a view of a group at the Perse School for Girls in July 1963 – so can you help in putting names to faces of young ladies.

Names are of course not always easy to recall. Percy Seeby from Trumpington kindly wrote to me correcting the names of those members of the Jazz Club at Overstream House in 1956 and then phoned up to say one of the "corrections" was itself wrong. So as far as we know it was Chic Parmenter on piano, Mike Waller on sax and Colin Edwards on drums.

Mention of Edwin Rutter in last week's Memories, brought an instant response from Rodney Dale of Haddenham. My correspondents had described him as having an antique shop, but Rodney recalls him as a tailor – indeed by 1994, aged 94, he was being hailed as the oldest working tailor in Cambridge – who used to trade as "Stuart" opposite the Fitzwilliam Museum.

But it was a tailor's shop with a difference, for it included a Black Museum containing a mass of macabre exhibits including a mantrap, a scold's bridle, cats o' nine tails, knuckle-dusters, truncheons, tongue clamps, bone crushers – and skulls reputedly from Bosworth Field. Rodney got to know them well for the collection was brought by his father, Dr Donald Dale for his own private museum.

But there was more, including a hat left at Constable's hat shop at no.8 Petty Cury after its old owner had bought a new one. Although the owner is long dead, his head is still in his old college, Sidney Sussex. His name was Oliver Cromwell. Rodney's dad also had his hat, gloves, glasses, sword and boots. Just for good measure he also acquired various items from the old county gaol at Castle Hill, including the door of the condemned cell and the gallows on which Cambridgeshire villains were hanged – including those whose last moments on this earth were overseen by Sylvia Clark's grandfather, whose medals I featured a couple of week ago.

Dr Dale disposed of his museum in June 1970, though nobody wanted the gallows – the bidding stopped at £17.10.0, so he took it back home to Histon before disposing of it privately. The going price thirty years ago for a tongue puller or a cast-iron gag which was rammed down a prisoner's throat to stop him screaming was £49, while a double wrist crusher was £26.

Happier memories of the Castle Hill area have been shared by Laine Simmons from Cambridge. A recent picture of Gloucester Street reminded her of the Tansley Typewriter Company. She writes: "My husband, John, started working there as a lad before the last war helping to rebuild typewriters. This involved dismantling then re-enamelling the bodies, replating the shiny bits, regrounding the platens (rubber rollers) and replacing worn letters, springs etc. The company also went round the area servicing typewriters and adding machines."

Ron Griggs of Cambridge has sent his memories of swimming in the River Cam, or Granta. He recalls: "There used to be an annual Granta swim which initially started at Grantchester Mill and finished at Scudamoor's boatyard at Silver Street, a distance of some 2½ miles. This was a much longer swim than the Swim through Cambridge and was only attempted when the water temperature was approaching 60 degrees Fahrenheit. Nobody trained for this race except, perhaps, "Deafy" Hempstead. He was a remarkable character who obtained his nickname because he was a deaf-mute. He was a tailor by trade and used to amuse the swimmers at Sheep's Green by walking about the lawns on his folded knees, which was the position he adopted when tailoring. He represented England at swimming at the disabled Olympic Games". I have a picture of the start of a Swim through Cambridge – did you take part?

Derek Fuller of Coronation Street, Cambridge, seeks your help. He writes: "When I was about six years old (I am now 72) I can remember my father taking me on the crossbar of his bike to a Motor Cycle Cinder Track Race Circuit just by Marshall's Airport, the other side of the old Teversham Road and Newmarket Road junction. As I remember it was an evening meeting. I've no idea how long racing lasted there or if it closed with the approach of World War 2."

Charlie Denston's request for assistance in locating a picture of his colleagues in the 250th Field Company Royal Engineers in August 1939 for his personal scrapbook sent me delving into the back files of the News, which are housed in the Cambridgeshire Collection, Lion Yard Library, Cambridge. The picture appeared twice, once in the CDN of 21st August 1939 and again in the Cambridge Independent Press of 25th August. The "News" also contained a report of the camp at Canterbury when the troops had fully satisfied their commanding officer, Major King, on their ability to "put their backs into it". They had practised demolition, barbed-wire fencing, & water purification techniques but liked the demolition part of the business best, especially the few heart-throbbing minutes before "up she goes". Charlie and his pals had Reveille at 6am, lunch at 2pm and despite the attentions of Sergeant Major Tabor there was only one appointment they were always on time for – pay parade!

Memories 7th April 2000, by Mike Petty

Twenty five years ago next week Cambridgeshire was to welcome visits from two people, both of who would attract vast crowds and cause police problems.

First to arrive was the Prime Minister, Harold Wilson. He was no stranger to Cambridge having attended a Labour rally in October 1955 and more recently in October 1967 during which Police Sergeant Kenneth Paige had been injured in the ensuing student riot. Now he was back.

Civic leaders and Labour party officials entertained the Prime Minister and his wife at the Guildhall before the meeting. Here Councillor Peter Wright stressed the problems that cuts in financial aid for housing improvements had caused, and explained the plans for the £2 million improvement programme for the Corn Exchange – a building which he was now to see for himself.

A full-scale security operation was put in place, with 20 police providing protection. As the PM walked from the back of the Guildhall and across the road to the Corn Exchange he passed protestors from the Cambridge Anti Common Market & World Development Action Groups, the Civil and Public Services Association upset about pay, and the National Federation of Old Age Pensioners.

Once safely inside the Hall Wilson was further harassed by hecklers – anxious to get full value from their 15p admission fee – and experienced the notorious Corn Exchange acoustics, as he went through a list of election promises and outlined how each had been fulfilled. By the time he had finished he received a standing ovation from the majority of the 1,000 audience.

The main issue of the day was the Common Market. There would, Wilson stressed, be a referendum but both he and his Government were in favour of staying in the EEC. Meanwhile at Sawston Hall the Cambridgeshire MP and opposition spokesman on agriculture, Mr Francis Pym was attacking the referendum as the biggest blow suffered by parliamentary government in this country. It had been forced on the government by dissident elements in the trade union and Labour Party. There was hardly a better example of Party interest being put above the national interest. People elected MPs to take decisions of this kind, he believed. "There is no alternative to the Common Market which makes sense in the middle of the twentieth century", he claimed. The problems faced by farmers were caused by high prices of fertilisers, the market price for cereals and the rising costs. Consumers had got to pay an economic price for food which had been properly and efficiently grown. Cheap food would not work in the conditions which existed in the mid 1970s.

Whilst all this was occupying the minds of the politically active in Cambridge, something far more exciting was taking place at Haverhill. A new record shop would be opened by BBC Radio One DJ and television personality Noel Edmonds.

A screaming crowd of 2,000 teenagers blocked the High Street and as they rushed the shop where their idol was appearing the main window broke under the pressure and police had to evacuate the building. Police Sergeant Michael Pepper confessed "I have seen nothing like it in Haverhill before. We had to seal the High Street for half an hour".

Inside the shop 26-year-old Noel, suavely dressed in open-necked brown pattern shirt, cream jacket, brown flared trousers with turn ups and brown Cuban-heeled boots to boost his 5ft 6inch height was completely unruffled. After six years as a DJ, the last two on the breakfast-time slot, and with regular appearances on "Top of the Pops" he was used to it. "They really enjoy the creaming and the crush and it is good fun so long as no one is hurt. It makes a memorable day for them" he said.

For an hour he signed autographs and distributed LPs and posters, then he was smuggled out of a back door and driven away hidden under the back seat of a white Range Rover.

Sadly no one noticed how Harold left Cambridge.

**

Ian Cruddas from Uttoxeter in Staffordshire has written to remind the people at Cottenham that just 150 years ago their community was devastated, not by rampaging youths, but by fire. For on the night of the night of Thursday 4th April 1850 it was the scene of one of the largest conflagrations ever known in Cambridgeshire. Flames raged along the High Street, consuming houses, inns, breweries and shops. In all some 35 houses, 26 farms and seven shops were destroyed.

Both the Church Mission Hall and the Wesleyan Chapel were then housed in adjacent barns and a fight broke out amongst members of the two congregations as to who should have use of the limited supply of buckets. The Wesleyans lost and their building was burnt to the ground.

**

Thomas Taylor of Newton writes following mention of Roger Roe's antique shop on the corner of St Andrew's street and Christ's Lane, Cambridge. "Next to it in St Andrew's Street was a toy shop, further along a wonderful bakery and bread shop owned by Mr & Mrs Collier. Opposite it on the other side of the street was the Queens Arms Public House

"In Christ's Lane there was Ladd's grocery shop and a cutlery shop. I was born and lived in Christ's Lane from 1919 until 1947. My parents moved on in about 1963. Please keep your Memories of things well into the future. They make for wonderful reading for an oldie like me"

Thank you, Mr Taylor, but I can only report what people send me, so keep those letters flowing please.

**

Maurice Bidwell of Burrough Green has sent me a copy of his apprenticeship indenture, taken out in August 1923 when he was bound to Reginald Amos Pilbeam of Corn Exchange Street, Cambridge, to learn the trade of a hair dresser, His wages were to be three shillings (15p) a week for the first year, six for the second rising to ten shillings (50p) in the third year. For that he was to work from 8.30 am to 8 pm (9 pm on Saturdays), though he was allowed a half day on Thursday. Having successfully completed his training he had a barber's shop in Magdalene Street, Cambridge from 1929 to 1956.

**

Kay Thomas from the Cambridge Nursing Centre in Chesterton has started the excellent scheme of compiling memory diaries for some of their residents. She has one lady, Rosalie, who born in 1909 in Kingston Street, Cambridge. Her father, Cornelius Gilbert, had a butcher's shop in Fitzroy Street. Later she moved to Brookfields where they had a large house with a balcony. She attended St Barnabas and St Philip's schools, was married in the late 1930s at Christ Church, Newmarket Road & later moved to Whitehill Road. When Rosalie left school at the age of 14 she went to work at "The Tapestry" where she did some embroidery.

Do you have any snippets or pictures that might fill out he memory diary? Send them to me and I'll pass them on.

PICTURES

News pix of Wilson and Edmonds from negatives as listed on enclosed cuttings; pics of Wilson at this or other rallies from News library files

Cottenham Fire – scan of the High Street in April 1850 – and a more modern pic from Library if there is one

Christ's Lane, Cambridge as remembered by Mr Taylor

Memories 14th April 2000, by Mike Petty

It is now some time since we saw elephants walking through Cambridge en route from the railway station to their circus encampment on Midsummer Common, and today attitudes to performing animals are no longer what they were.

But on 11th April 1950 the prospect of Bertram Mills' circus saw Cambridge in a frenzy of anticipation.

The "News" reporter described the spectacle: "Here in the well-known romantic atmosphere where, strangely fascinating in its queer compound smell of sawdust and canvas, elephants, dogs and lions with bright spangles and brighter lights adding to the more conventional kind of glamour – here there is paraded for us an amazing display of human and animal talent.

"Have you ever seen dogs play football? Or a lion walk a double tightrope? Or elephants that do the elephantine equivalent of a handstand. It is surprising how graceful even an elephant can be when well-trained, though I hope that when they come again and see me sitting in the half-crowns they will shift me by trunk to the twelve-and-a-tanners."

The writer found himself captivated by performing horses which wheeled, turned and galloped with astonishing precision, & was entranced by Angus, an amusing animal clown. There was bare-back riding and the Cumberlands who leapt on their galloping steeds with ease. Coming down the animal scale were the acrobatic and footballing dogs with their somersaults and skill.

Amongst the human performers he enjoyed Edouardo the juggler with his spinning plates, the tramoplinists and Cavallini's Crazy Car. But others took to the air, the Raspinis, climbed ladders balanced against nothing at all, whilst high above the ring the Trio de Riaz, two men, a girl and an aeroplane swung at speed & kept the audience taut in their seats.

Today we have the Millennium Dome, where once more it is the aerial gymnasts who provide the spectacle in what some consider a white elephant.

Do you have memories of the circus – write to Mike Petty

Paul Taylor from Stuart, the University Tailor and Outfitter of Chesterton Road, Cambridge, has written with more details of his great uncle Edwin Rutter's magnificent "Olde Curiosity Shoppe" opposite the Fitzwilliam Museum. He has sent a catalogue which records some of the wonderful things it contained – Queen Victoria's stockings, a pirate's cutlass, a naval cockade worn by Admiral Nelson, a Chinaman's opium smoking cloak and various prison relics. There were several items relating to Dick Turpin including his hat, coat, mask and spurs, complete with a document dating from 1738 written by the innkeeper of the Three Tuns, Castle Hill, Cambridge, stating how these articles had been left there.

Edwin Rutter liked nothing better than to recall stories from bygone years, and those of no so long ago, such as how one evening he had become trapped in his Black Museum with a tourist after the door slammed shut behind them. As the entrance was a condemned cell door, it had no handle on the inside and the two of them were imprisoned until the early evening when the local "Bobby" tried the shop door (as they used to in those days). Finding it open he'd entered and discovered the captives in their macabre prison.

Mr Rutter's knowledge of Cambridge, his customers and his trade as a tailor was second to none. One of the great Cambridge characters he died in January 1997.

SCANS OF PAGES OF CATALOGUE

**

Another Cambridge character is recalled by Ros Shepherd (nee Audley). Miss Longbottom a formidable lady with a heart of gold. She was the teacher in charge of the Chemistry Laboratory at the Perse School for Girls in 1963 when a Cambridge News photographer snapped a class in progress. I featured the picture in "Memories" on 31st March and Ros has come up with most of the names, including Gillian Heatley, Celia Hatton, Susan Hill, Christine Hallam & Susan Milstein. She would be very interested in hearing from them, or any of the other Perse girls of the period. Write to me and I'll pass your letters on.

**

SUBS PLEASE USE THIS NEXT PIECE IF YOU CAN AS IT WILL GIVE ME AN INTRODUCTION FOR NEXT WEEK

Kay Thomas from the Cambridge Nursing Centre in Chesterton has started the excellent scheme of compiling memory diaries for some of their residents. She has one lady, Rosalie, who born in 1909 in Kingston Street, Cambridge. Her father, Cornelius Gilbert, had a butcher's shop in Fitzroy Street. Later she moved to Brookfields where they had a large house with a balcony. She attended St Barnabas and St Philip's schools, was married in the late 1930s at Christ Church, Newmarket Road & later moved to Whitehill Road. When Rosalie left school at the age of 14 she went to work at "The Tapestry" where she did some embroidery.

Do you have any snippets or pictures that might fill out he memory diary? Send them to me and I'll pass them on.

.....
Memories of the John Hilton Bureau have come in from Isabel Munro of Cambridge. She writes: "In August 1946 my husband answered an advertisement in the New Statesman for a solicitor to join the staff of the John Hilton Bureau which had been running for three or four years. It was financed by the News of the World to provide for its readers the same sort of advisory service that Professor Hilton gave to listener in his BBC broadcasts.

“After Prof. Hilton’s death the bureau was directed by Kenneth Barrett and 1946 saw a great increase of staff. The original offices in John Hilton’s old residence in De Freville Avenue were no longer big enough & the Bureau overflowed into accommodation in Quayside and then Bene’t Street Eventually sometime in the 1950s everyone was reunited under one roof in St Regis, Chesterton Road.

When Ruper Murdoch took over the News of the World he was not interested in running a free advisory service for readers and in the summer of 1974 the John Hilton Bureau was closed down.”

Thomas Taylor of Newton writes following mention of Roger Roe’s antique shop on the corner of St Andrew’s street and Christ’s Lane, Cambridge. “Next to it in St Andrew’s Street was a toy shop, further along a wonderful bakery and bread shop owned by Mr & Mrs Collier. Opposite it on the other side of the street was the Queens Arms Public House

“In Christ’s Lane there was Ladd’s grocery shop and a cutlery shop. I was born and lived in Christ’s Lane from 1919 until 1947. My parents moved on in about 1963. Please keep your Memories of things well into the future. They make for wonderful reading for an oldie like me”

Thank you, Mr Taylor, but I can only report what people send me, so keep those letters flowing please.

**

Ian Cruddas from Uttoxeter in Staffordshire has written to remind the people at Cottenham that just 150 years ago their community was devastated, not by rampaging youths, but by fire. For on the night of the night of Thursday 4th April 1850 it was the scene of one of the largest conflagrations ever known in Cambridgeshire. Flames raged along the High Street, consuming houses, inns, breweries and shops. In all some 35 houses, 26 farms and seven shops were destroyed.

Both the Church Mission Hall and the Wesleyan Chapel were then housed in adjacent barns and a fight broke out amongst members of the two congregations as to who should have use of the limited supply of buckets. The Wesleyans lost and their building was burnt to the ground.

**

Maurice Bidwell of Burrough Green has sent me a copy of his apprenticeship indenture, taken out in August 1923 when he was bound to Reginald Amos Pilbeam of Corn Exchange Street, Cambridge, to learn the trade of a hair dresser, His wages were to be three shillings (15p) a week for the first year, six for the second rising to ten shillings (50p) in the third year. For that he was to work from 8.30 am to 8 pm (9 pm on Saturdays), though he was allowed a half day on Thursday. Having successfully completed his training he had a barber’s shop in Magdalene Street, Cambridge from 1929 to 1956.

PICTURES

Cottenham Fire – scan of the High Street in April 1850 SCANNED ON DISK – and a more modern pic from Library & Christ’s Lane, Cambridge as remembered by Mr Taylor – SUPPLIED LAST WEEK

MEMORIES, 21st April 2000 by Mike Petty

Reference to the Cambridge Tapestry Company in last week's "Memories" struck a spark for Sylvia Clark of Cambridge, for she used to work there from 1924 until the war. The firm was originally founded at Ickleford, near Hitchin by Walter Witter and built up a great reputation for the quality of their repair work to valuable old tapestries and for the production of "period panels"

When Sylvia started work at the company's premises in Thompson's Lane, Cambridge, she was 15 years old. The workroom had formerly been a garage & had open doors looking out on Quayside. She was one of some 80 girls who worked in the tapestry section, while another 80 did needlepoint. Tapestries used to be brought in from around the world to be repaired, having been cut about where they had been fixed on walls. Some needed great research to piece them together again.

In 1934 Lord Fairhaven commissioned a completely modern design for Anglesey Abbey, near Lode. It was to depict the Abbey as seen from the air, with a view of the surrounding countryside, including the Jockey Club at Newmarket, St Ives, Ely & the Cambridge University Library – which was remarkable for that building had not then been complete, and they worked from the architect's sketches. A full size painting was made in colour to guide the weavers giving instructions as regard to the colour and the direction of every stitch to be woven. The coloured silks and wools had to be matched up with those from the artist's palette which meant that the company had to keep nearly a thousand different colours always in stock.

Sylvia spent many hours on this tapestry, working from the back and walking round to the front of the loom periodically to ensure everything was accurate. Like all the other girls she worked in silence as so many important visitors were always popping in.

One of these was Queen Mary who arrived in 1934, saw Sylvia & her colleagues engaged on the Fairhaven tapestry and congratulated them on for the beauty of their work. Next year personal friends of King George V and Queen Mary commissioned the firm to design and weave a tapestry of Windsor Castle for presentation to Their Majesties as a Jubilee gift. Although the King did not live to see the completed panel, the preliminary drawings were submitted to him and he commanded it should hang in the Guard's Chamber at the Castle. Queen Mary visited again in 1936 to see the work in progress, and to count every window in the tapestry to make sure they were all in place – of course they were!

The Cambridge Tapestry Works closed in 1941 and Sylvia went on to other war work. But she never lost her love for tapestry, nor her skills with the needle, and a recently-finished Millennium tapestry decorates her living room alongside reproductions of those she worked on for Royalty over 60 years ago.

PICTURE SCANNED OF THE TAPESTRY WORKS; PHOTOGRAPHIC TOOK A PICTURE OF MRS CLARK AND HER TAPESTRY IN EARLY MARCH – NEG
NUMBER AROUND 1599M18

On Saturday I spoke to a meeting of the Dorothy L. Sayers Society at Shuttlesworth, near Biggleswade where there is a wonderful display of early motoring and aviation memorabilia. One of the papers was devoted to the author's references to motorcycling in her novels and discussion took place on the women who rode such machines before the war. One whose name came to me was Dorothy Grainger, the Burwell photographer, who would travel by motorbike to the wedding, take the photographs, bike back to her studios to develop the plates and return to take orders at the reception. Do you recall others – or were you a lady motorcyclist in the more recent past?

Perhaps you took part in motorcycle scrambles or races such as that held 50 years ago this week at the first open meeting on a new racing circuit at Bedwell Hey, near Ely. It was run jointly by the Cambridge University Auto Club and the Ely Motorcycle clubs and was open to all members of the British Motor Cycle Racing Club. The course record was set by George Brown on a 500 cc works

Vincent, touching 98 mph on the 500-yard back straight, though his machine seized up half way through.

Another news story from April 1950 was the unveiling a new type of luxury double-decker motor coach by Premier Travel. It was designed for long-distance travel, could carry 53 passengers on its two decks and featured a pneumatic door normally opened by the driver. This most modern vehicle was christened “The County of Cambridgeshire” by Alderman Frost, the chairman of the County Council, who tore off an adhesive strip covering the small nameplate. Having wished good luck to everyone who drove it he and other guests went for a ride in the coach. Do you recognise any of the dignitaries who made that initial journey – or remember what became of the coach. [PICTURE SCANNED]

Staying with buses in the 1950s, Mrs R. Minns from Cambridge writes: “My late husband Colin was a bus driver in the 1950’s. Whilst driving in Chesterton he swerved to avoid a dog, and ended up colliding with a house. This I believe was almost opposite a fish and chip shop”. A picture of just such an accident appears in the best-selling book of old photographs compiled by the Chesterton Local History Group, but I cannot yet trace the date. Do you remember it? [PICTURE FROM BOOK SCANNED]

And whilst on bus accidents, one of my class at Ely recalls how a bus crashed into a row of cottages opposite the old “Royal Oak” pub at Stretham Ferry (now the “Lazy Otter”). When the bus was removed the cottages fell down. Once more do you remember the incident, and do you have a picture?

Kathleen Phillips of Cherry Hinton is able to solve the mystery of how Harold Wilson left Cambridge following one of his talks in 1972. He travelled by United Taxis to take the train back to London. Kathleen and her late husband John owned the company then and she’s sent a picture of the Prime Minister relaxing in the back of the cab to prove it. [PICTURE SCANNED]

**

Mrs Sylvia Howell (nee Bavester) of Landbeach is prompted to write following mention of the Tansley Typewriter Company in Gloucester Street, Cambridge. “I worked there during the last war, helping doing a lot of different jobs on the floor. There were only about six girls, the rest of them boys and men but I don’t remember their names. I also did fire watch duty with the boss’s wife at night, and was fire watching when we heard bombs drop and found they had fell along Huntingdon Road.

Eagle-eyed Jean Potter phones in to say that she spotted her son in last week’s picture of the elephant parade along Hills Road, a photograph taken in May 1971. She also tells me that she had a box of old music that they used to enjoy at the Tipperary Club which she’s be happy to pass on to any reader who can make use of it. Write to me and I’ll pass details on.

Can you help an Oldham lass whose trying to write a story about life in Cambridge in the early 1970s. She’s finding it difficult to remember just which cafes and restaurants were used by the students at that time. Do you have an old guide book or tourist map to jog her memory that I could post on to her?

Diane Scotting from Witcham has discovered a not-so-old photograph which I’m having some difficulty in identifying. It shows a gathering of gentlemen about to enjoy a meal, and a bottle of beer in a hall, probably in the Ely area. On a small table at the end of the room there’s an impressive shield and a variety of trophies. Can you identify the place, the occasion or yourself? [PICTURE SCANNED]

Memories April 28 2000, by Mike Petty

Twenty-five years ago the Cambridge Evening News was lamenting the decline of a Cambridge tradition – the King Street run. Like many traditions its origins seem obscure – or is it just that by the end of the day the participants were unable to remember anything.

The event involved drinking eight pints of beer in two hours, one in each of eight different pubs, though by 1965 it was varied to one pint in four pubs and two pints in two. Originally King Street had enough pubs of its own, but as numbers declined, and others declined to take part, so the organisers needed to look further afield for landlords willing to support the event.

As well as achieving a hangover, those who completed the course were entitled wear a coveted blue tie embroidered with a crown and tankard. But there were other symbols as well: a letter P was added to the design for each time an entrant was obliged to use the toilet or was sick. And that was the trouble.

Perhaps the beer was stronger, or the students had not undergone the necessary training, for landlord after landlord objected to the mess unruly contestants left behind them. "Once you have downed the first four pints you are over the worst", one entrant confided, but you had to drain every drop or risk being disqualified.

In 1975 there were said to be some 200 people, men and women, who were entitled to wear the tie. Are you one? But there was apparently an even greater academic honour. If your tie was also inscribed DD you were amongst the boozing elite. To earn this accolade the recipient needed to drink 13 pints between opening and closing time in any pub in the country. Now with all-day opening this is much easier to accomplish, but there is a snag. To earn the Drinker's Dozen tie you had to be accompanied by somebody else who had performed the feat, and in 1975 nobody knew of anybody in Cambridge who'd done it!

PICTURE OF KING STREET

SCAN OF STUDENTS DRINKING IN KING STREET PUB, ONE WEARS THE KING STREET RUN TIE – BUT WITH 2 "P"S.

Some things crop up so frequently that they deserve the accolade of a tradition. Members of the Hill Top Club in Primrose Street took part in my "Cambridge History Lucky Dip" last week and pulled one picture out of the hat which could apply to virtually any year. I promised I would share it with you. The comment on Cambridge traffic conditions was published in the old C.D.N. on 30th January 1948! One answer to traffic chaos was the construction of multi-storey car parks, as in Park Street snapped by a News photographer in August 1965

1948 CARTOON ENCLOSED; SCAN OF PARK STREET CAR PARK

Hundreds of Burwell villagers flocked to their village museum on Sunday. In addition to the usual attractions of a blacksmith's forge, a windmill, old carriages, cars and even a bus, not to mention the wartime display, telephone exchange and country life exhibits (and not forgetting the schoolroom where children chanted their tables, toddlers wrote their name in sand and older visitors recalled when they had learned to write on slates), there was a marquee. It contained the real attraction of the afternoon, the first chance to really look at a remarkable collection of village photographs that has been compiled by Jim Neale and features the people and places of Burwell. This project has so far taken him two years to amass, and been generously supported by East Cambs District Council. There were albums and albums of pictures to browse through of village industries, the school, sport, streets and houses as well as a tribute to those who fought in the two world wars, and survived.

The project was not however complete, and can never be complete. Whilst dozens saw pictures of themselves they had never seen before, and hundreds found their house when it was somebody else's home, there were others who did not. During the afternoon however many gaps were filled, with more pictures brought in to be photocopied for addition to the files. If you have snaps or postcards take them with you when next you visit the museum which is open afternoons on Sundays, Thursdays and Bank Holiday Monday until the end of September. Park in the Gardiner Memorial Hall car park in the High Street and follow the crowds.

BURWELL PICTURES FROM THE NEWS FILES

**

Mrs Pam Barlow of Impington has responded to my appeal for circus memories with a letter which really captures the excitement of the occasion.. She writes: "My husband was a police officer and always had complimentary tickets for his family. We always sat on the very first row and so were always in the thick of things. At one performance the clowns were fooling about as usual, and one appeared to be a "witch. Her head was on the top of a broom-stick with a long thin nose. This head and long neck kept being raised to an alarming height. My young daughter was terrified, and I bent over her to protect her, I had this awful head thrust down the back of my neck. Rather nerve-racking at the time,

"On the front row you could actually put your foot up on the ring. This was where the elephants used to circle around, put one foot on the ring and raise the other front foot in the air. All the elephants had beautiful girl riders who used to be picked up by the elephant's trunk and placed on their backs. The cages with lions in used to be erected during the performance, whilst we were all looking up high at the trapeze artists. The horses used to be spectacular, sometimes all pure white with pom-poms on their heads. They had bareback riders, leaping on and off & running from one side of the ring to leap and stand on their backs. There were also very small ponies. Their riders used to be monkeys, dressed up and doing various tricks"

**

Mrs Ella Challis of Barton recalls more memories of Overstream House, where she learned to dance in 1918 when a little girl of four years old. "Mr and Mrs Derby lived there. He worked for the Ortona Bus Company and she taught be dancing in the big room. We learned to do the Lancers, Scottish dancing and lots of dances they don't do today. I wonder if anyone else in Cambridge remembers this?" Do you?

**

A reminder of the hardship of previous days has come from Mrs L. Hind of Histon. She treasures the apprenticeship indenture of Richard Betson way back in 1841. Richard bound himself to James Presland of Cambridge, a bootcloser and shoemaker for four years, during which time he was restricted in what he could and could not do - "he shall not commit fornication nor contract Matrimony ... nor play at cards or dice tables, nor haunt taverns or playhouses". In exchange he received the generous payment in the first year of nothing at all, rising to one shilling a week in the second year & right up to three shillings in the fourth. But for this he was expected to work eleven hours a day!

**

John Lester from Grantchester has been reflecting on the cost of living – or more accurately dying – back in 1912. He has found a bill for the funeral of his father's young sister which shows that for a polished elm coffin with all the trimmings, and a baby hearse, the total charge was £1.17.0. The undertaker offering the service in those days rejoiced in the unmournful name of Ellis Merry.

COPY OF THE BILL

Memories, 5th May 2000 by Mike Petty

Ernie Tyler as has lived, eat and slept boats all his life – it has been his job, his hobby & his enjoyment for over 75 years. He started on the river when a lad at Fen Ditton. His mother worked as cook for the vicar whose daughters wanted a new boat so she scraped together £7 to buy the old one, on condition that Ernie, then ten years old, was given lessons on how to sail it.

Fen Ditton was a great place to be a boat boy, especially during the Bumping Races. Ernie can remember when people in punts four deep lined the riverbanks to watch the races. Others made the journey in one of the party boats such as the Enterprise, Glenrosa or Viscountess Bury. And however many people went to the races on the Viscountess, even more returned with her. For after the day was done & she cruised sedately up the river dozens of punters would hook their punts on to the boat and be towed back to Cambridge in splendour. When they were half-way there the Vi's skipper would pass his hat back to collect the fares!

Ernie went to Bottisham village college on the day it opened and left as soon as he could. When 14½ he attended school on the Monday morning, to tell them he was leaving on the Tuesday – for he had a job. That job was at Banham's boat yard.

Mr H.C. Banham took one lad a year, twelve months later he took another. Sometimes if there were two promising candidates he took both, but then missed a year's recruitment. Some of the lads had the necessary skills, some did not and were put back on the job Ernie started with – sweeping up the wood shavings. Then he progressed to pumping out bilge water from old boats, and other mundane tasks. It took two years for a lad to learn his tools and his trade. Ernie was put with some good tradesmen like old Mr Harris, if you showed an interest in the work he would show an interest in you, if you fooled around you had no chance. Ernie worked. After two years he was summoned to see the Governor. Go upstairs, he was told, and build some clinker pram dinghies. There's a bloke on the other side, ask him if you have any problems.

From pram dinghies – which sold the in the showroom for £8.10.0 - he went on to stem dinghies and then it was downstairs to where the craftsmen were making motor cruisers. He joined a team of four – two men and two boys - who hand-made the boat, any more and they would get in each other's way. If it sold well and good, if it did not it was added to Banham's hire fleet until somebody took a shine to it.

The boatyard built boats to order, one 'mad professor' came in with a model of a boat carved from a bar of soap, it looked hideous to Ernie, but they built it. Then came the war. Banham's switched to war-work, building lifeboats for minesweepers, fast runabouts to take navy officers to shore, wooden frames for the first radio location devices built by Pye of Cambridge and an 80-foot high wooden mast for Duxford airfield. One of Banham's boats was a casualty of the war. The prospect of air raids forced the authorities to plan for the possibility of fire in the colleges alongside the river. They would need a fire-fighting boat, Mr Banham offered the Duchess. But it was too high to get under the bridges, so Ernie cut it down to fit. Banham's workmen joined the Auxiliary Fire Service and trained to use it. In the event the fire boat was never needed.

When the war was over, and Ernie had been demobbed from the Merchant Navy he wandered back to Banham's. "What are you doing Ernie – you can start back here Monday". There was another lad starting at the same time, Mo Tyrrell, who was soon building racing eights.

The two of them came together for the first time in 1963, building the Jasmine, an African mahogany cabin cruiser. The pay was not of the best, but it was a family firm and the atmosphere was great. You were never told what to do, you were asked if you'd do it. But the world was changing. Wooden boats were giving way to a new material, fibreglass, and the Banham family firm became part of the Pye group. Whereas Mo used to sing on his way to work, now he sang only on the way home.

In 1969 the two boatmen left Banham's, with no idea what lay before them. Ernie thought about a job with Grays, making cricket bats, Mo contemplated a building job. Then Brian Lister, the engineering industrialist, offered them an opportunity to resurrect an old neglected, run-down boatyard in Water Street, Chesterton. Then he asked if they'd like a chance to start on their own – "we nearly tore his arm out", says Mo and Two Tees Boatyard was born. The first thing was to clear up.

For thirty years wooden buildings had rotted, trees had grown up and slipways deteriorated. There was piles of junk to be thrown out. And underneath it all Ernie found a little notebook. It dated back to the 1890s, and it had been kept by Ted Mathie who had used to work for Banhams before even Ernie started there. It contained his dimensions for Canadian canoes, for whiffs and skiffs, the prices he charged and the people he built for. Ernie still treasures it together with another kept by his old boss recording the boats he built and the prices he charged.

Mo and Ernie have continued to work on those same boats, many of which are still cruising up and down the fenland rivers. They even bought some of them when they started a hire fleet which they continued till Ernie finally got too old to go chasing boats that always broke down in the most inhospitable places in the fens, even though for some holidaymakers the prospect of helping him to strip down and repair a venerable piece of machinery was the highlight of their voyage.

But Ernie Tyler still has his own boat – one of those that Mo Tyrrell built all those years ago - and even when it is in dry dock he can cruise in his mind the river he has loved all his life.

SCAN OF BANHAMS BOAT YARD in 1969; PRINT OF ERNIE TYLER & MO TYRRELL WHEN THEY STARTED THEIR BOATYARD IN APRIL 1970; PHOTOGRAPHIC HAVE TAKEN A MODERN PICTURE

Note: original audio interview – MPC08

A picture of the Viscountess Bury, taken in 1919 when it carried members of Barham's brush manufactory on a trip to Ely, has been lent by Mr M. Rolph of Cambridge. They appear to have been accompanied by musicians. Did you ever take a boat trip on it, or hire a cruiser from Banham's. – SCAN – ONE SHOWS DETAIL

Mr Alan Bates of Cambridge has kindly responded to my appeal for an old guidebook to help a researcher trying to remember just what cafes and restaurants there were in the 1970. This particular guide dates from the mid 1960s. A browse amongst the advertisements recalls the Hong Kong Garden Chinese restaurant in Fitzroy Street, the "fashionable – and reasonable" Dorothy, the "ultra modern" Pagoda in regent Street which would serve a 3-course luncheon for 5/6 and offered a dinner and dance each night on the 1st floor. There was the Seven Star Grill on Market Hill, the Civic of course which offered a high tea from 3.30 pm, the Bombay restaurant in Bridge Street with “the finest selection of Pakistani, Indian, English & Continental cuisine”, Camsnax “the most pleasant coffee shop in Cambridge” and the Copper Kettle and Copper Dive on King’s Parade. Most are only names to me, did they mean something special to you? SCAN OF DOROTHY RESTAURANT AD

80-year young Mrs P. Miller has written to say she would welcome the old music that another reader is trying to find a good home for. She goes in for the talent shows at the Guildhall and was on Look East recently.

Mrs V.S. Pennell of Fowlmere writes: “I was so pleased to read your article about Premier Travel’s luxury double decker coach, the ‘County of Cambridgeshire’. My late husband, Sid was the driver of the coach. He is in the photograph to the side of Mr Lainson, but I can only see his cap.” More details have come by e-mail from Darren Kitson of Blackpool who used to drive for the company. He tells me the coach was one of only three double-deckers ever bought new by Premier Travel and they were not a success. They were fitted with bodies built by Messrs Wilkes and Meade but shortages at that time meant they were built using timber frames of poor quality, unseasoned wood. In consequence the bodywork was a major problems and expensive rebuilding had to take place. They were soon demoted to local bus work and all had gone by 1966. The County of Cambridgeshire was dumped behind their garage in Godmanchester where it quietly decomposed in the undergrowth until broken up during the 1970s.

Two people researching their family story have written to me. David Green of Rhyd yr Harding, Castle Morris near Haverford West, Pembrokeshire SA62 5EJ is trying to find details of his grandparents, Thomas and Jane Green who used to keep the Falcon Inn at Littlebury near Saffron Walden. One of their daughters later married a saddler who ran a shop near Clare College Cambridge in the 1900s. Its not much to go on but if you’re a Green and can help please contact him.

From Chesterfield USA comes an e-mail. Susan Oberman is desperate to trace any living soul with memories of her grandmother Dorothy Haines Baker. About all she knows is that Dorothy was born in Hereford, married in 1912 to somebody perhaps called Babstock and may have been an actress. “Perhaps an old admirer of the theatre will remember this lady!!” she writes. If so write to 14546 Tradmore Drive, Chesterfield, MO 63017 USA or e-mail Subake@aol.com

Memories 12th May 2000, by Mike Petty

Derek Harris of Histon has sent me some of his Memories of the 1950s, looking back on life in Ely just after the War. He writes: “When you married in the late 40s you would not own your own house unless the money was readily available or, an inheritance favoured you. Homes were at a premium; rebuilding had begun after WW2 but there was a tremendous queue for the Council built rented house, which the Government of the day was concentrating upon. Rooms with a parent or relatives was the nearest to independence that a young married couple could normally hope for. The problem was exacerbated by details of your length of residence at, or workplace in Ely, whether you had one or two children etc. etc.

Housing had become the top priority throughout the country. Ely UDC had it's share and new estates were being laid out but, they had a long waiting list. One redeeming feature was that they had acquired jurisdiction over the now redundant Prisoner of War Camp, on part of Barton Fields. The entrance was at the Cambridge Road boundary of the City. A concrete road, wide enough for one vehicle, remained throughout its length, terminating in a parade-ground like square at its eastern extremity. The Camp contained some 50 or so Nissen Huts, single and double size, for the detention of German, then Italian, prisoners of war.

These buildings had been standing for about seven years when the council was given leave to recondition the huts to house local families. The intention was to tide over the move to a rented council house and we applied for one (by this time we had a baby son and were still living in rooms).

The day dawned in June 1950 when we moved into our first complete home, the rent being 6/- (30p) per week. The Camp, by this time, had quite a large population. We had acquired one of the last batch of huts to be converted and these were situated around the back of the private houses, at the far end of Cambridge Road. Ours was semi-detached with a double brick division in the centre of a double sized hut.

Three rooms had been built into the interior of the two parts, with a separate pantry, inside toilet, a coal burning cooking range and all the fresh air the site had to offer. All the mod. cons. of the time, I would hasten to add but no bathroom! Hot water came from a kettle, always on the simmer in the winter months. Fortunately the electricity supply had been upgraded to full amperage and the building rewired. The earlier conversions had a supply, but only for lighting, so that was a bonus, and we were able to install an electric cooker! - a green enamelled "Jackson". Our black cooking range was also intended to provide the heating. This was 'improved' by removing the top, in the colder months and placing an upside-down "U" shaped sheet of tin over the open section. This enlarged the fire and heated the iron chimney to excess! The two bedrooms were kept aired with small electric heaters.

The living room had one fair sized window (but no view!) The two bedrooms had a window each about nine feet wide, the divisions being made by single brick wall. The flooring throughout was solid concrete.

The interior, of course, was half-moon shaped and had a layer of stiff asbestos sheeting covering the corrugated iron which had been freshly decorated with apricot emulsion. Outside repairs had included a coat of protective black stuff, with an iron chimney poking through the apex of the roof.

Considering that between us and the elements, was a barrier of 2 sheets of tin and a quarter of an inch of asbestos, we were, quite cosy. Which leads to the provision of fuel.

We were in the grip of a coal shortage. The Coalman would only come once a week but didn't on several occasions because of the limitations of his supply. So, an enforced rationing of deliveries throughout the town applied and, the 'Camp' seemed to be at the extreme end of the round. He was always very sympathetic and offered an invitation "... to come to the yard and collect a bagfull !! " which meant a potato sack filled and tied; then walked home, balanced between the bars of your bicycle. Quite a normal and efficient means of carriage, unless you had an old pram. A supply of coke from the Gas Works could also be obtained (to mix with the coal) and was transported in the same manner. This place had a queue of people every Saturday morning, in the winter months, for what was considered a supplementary method of eking out the coal ration.

A garden, of course, there had to be and a fence: not only to prove that it was ours but to protect our lad from wandering off. We were fairly isolated and had a large part of Barton Field at our back door; thankfully the City Council didn't mind if we dug it up.

Our daughter arrived during this period of our life. We remember it well ... at dead of night in October 1952, 'phoning an obliging friend for transport to the Grange Maternity hospital. The phone, by the way, was situated about a mile away. I was obliged to remain at home with my small son until daybreak. This birthday brought back the need to use the pram again...

Walking to shop was the norm. Most people in Ely had their 'shopping day' to top up the pantry for the weekend carried mainly in a large basket, or two if you could manage it, unless you had a bike. Bread and milk was delivered but groceries etc., were collected. The pram was a godsend, so much could be carried on or in it.

All the 'stores' were busy on most days of the week. Many must remember the Co-op in St Mary's Street where the provisions were fetched from the shelves behind the counter by the two elderly assistants who, it seemed, had been there all their lives. The clatter always evident at the Maypole when a pound of butter was knocked up and wrapped, so professionally, by the men there. And Bennett's, which was always perfumed by the aroma of their own personally ground coffee: all now but distant memories. We did most of our food shopping on a Friday, which was pay day for the majority of people and we all used cash, no cards or cheque books. With children on and in the pram with our weekly goods, the strain was taken out of the walk back home.

We were settled at the camp until after the Queen's Coronation in 1953. There was a party and games for the children to mark the occasion and Councillor Adams, who lived next door, presented the children with decorative mugs. It was during this period that the Camp was being cleared of its tenants and we moved into a brand new Council Semi-detached in St Ovin's Green which cost us £1.1.0 (£1.05) per week ... haven't things changed!

[NOT FOR PUBLICATION : DEREK HARRIS, 45 MERTON ROAD, HISTON – 234989]

One person seeking memories of her first home is Margaret Owen (nee Utteridge) of Cambridge. She tells me: "I am proud of the fact that I was born at no.31 Cambridge Place in 1931 – we moved when I was three to Bateson Road. I cannot member my family's time there and would be very interested to know more about it. The only information I have is a copy of a page from a local newspaper dated January 1937 titled 'Whole street of houses to go?' Over to you.

Reg Darley of King's Hedges Road, Cambridge has lent me a picture of the VE day party in Ditton Fields, 1945. He tells me that Curly Smart is right in the front – but do you recognise yourself, or others?

PIC SCANNED

John Wakefield of Gt Shelford can add more information about the Premier Travel luxury coach "County of Cambridgeshire. It was one of three they bought, the other being named after West Suffolk and Essex. They were intended for use on express services but due to Ministry of Transport licensing restrictions the routes were confined to only 60 miles. He remembers travelling on one in the mid 1950s during a Sunday School outing from Sawston

Roger Cork of Stretham has shown me some other pictures of the Cambridge Tapestry Works, where his mother Dorothy used to work. One is particularly interesting as it seems to show the designer of the tapestry of Windsor Castle, which was woven for Queen Mary, and gives some indication of the scale of the work [PIC SCANNED]

Mrs J. Haywood of Willingham has really been delving back into the family archives to find a photograph of the Perse School in 1924 which has been rolled up in its tube for over 75 years. Second from the left in the rear row is her late husband, Thom Hayward – the great, great nephew of Tom Hayward the cricketer. [PIC SCANNED]

Memories 19th May 2000

25 years ago this month Cambridge was preparing to take on the world, or at least that part of the world represented by its oldest rivals Oxford and its bitter rivals, Peterborough. At stake was not just glory, it was the knowledge that what Ely could do, Cambridge could do too.

Such an enterprise needed support and as early as March 1975 51 girls had volunteered their services. Thus Judith Slater of Sawston, a part-time model, Lynne Crussell of Conington, a nursery nurse along with Haddenham student Debbie Haddock and ballet student Anne Pretty were amongst those preparing to attend a vital meeting at the Cambridge Guildhall. Would they be amongst the selected few?

It was April before they were put to the test and by then nearly 20 contenders had already dropped by the wayside. They were soon touching their toes, kicking their legs in the air, running on the spot, doing press-ups and most importantly, smiling, all to the refrain of: "Two bits, four bits, six bits a dollar. All for Cambridge stand up and HOLLER!" By the end of a gruelling session fourteen were selected, their dream of cheerleading for Cambridge still intact.

And if they needed to train, how much more effort had to be put in by those athletes who were to carry the name of Cambridge to glory. Charlie Tennant, a rugby player, Eddie Sharp, non-playing captain, women's captain Linda Roberts and the rest would have to be at their best, but then eleven of the team had earned county, regional or national honours in a variety of sports, including hockey, swimming and javelin.

For this competition would take place in front of television cameras that would beam their efforts around the world.

It was the first heat of that most important of sporting events, "It's a Knockout".

15,000 supporters crammed into the Cambridge City Football Club ground as the Cambridge sporting heroes balanced, tugged, splashed, climbed and tumbled their way through a variety of crazy games to romp home to win. In a close-fought contest the home team scored 22 points, two more than Peterborough with Oxford languishing at the bottom of the pile with just 18.

Now triumphant Cambridge were through to an International round of "Jeux sans Frontieres" where they would be the only British team against contestants from six other countries. A win might see them into the grand final in Belgium, with the chance to emulate Ely's success of two years before.

Now thoughts turned to the glamorous venue for the tussle against teams representing Italy, Holland, Germany, France, Switzerland & Belgium. Prospects of a foreign trip loomed, and receded. This contest would take place in Southport. Now was the time for training and more training.

The rehearsals for the Southport contest in August were hit by a power failure. It was not an auspicious start. The Cambridge heroes, dressed in pirate costumes rescued damsels in distress from galleons, balanced on anchors, fought and splashed themselves to exhaustion. At the end they had beaten France by five points. Sadly Steenwijk of Holland had amassed ten points more.

The team were deflated, their travelling supporters (all 34 of them) disappointed. But they had given of their best, "Every minute has been worth it" said team member Angela Maxted. They returned to a Civic Reception hosted by Mayor Bob May, not champions of Europe – but at least they'd taken part.

PICS : SANDRA HAS PRINTED A SELECTION OF PICS TAKEN AT THE MAY CONTEST AT CAMBRIDGE CITY FOOTBALL CLUB GROUND. THE NEGS ARE IN HER FILING CABINET IN HER OFFICE. OTHER PHOTOS APPEARED IN THE PAPER THAT AUGUST – CUTTINGS ENCLOSED

**

My copy of last week's "Memories" article had not been delivered before Robert Stevenson from Cambridge was on the phone to tell me he recognised the soldiers shown outside a Nissen hut. Like him they were members of the Cambridge Territorial Army Unit who went to France in June 1940. Amongst the names are Kirby, Walston, Robins, Fowler, Hones, Wright and Chandler. And if the Nissen hut looks different to those you remember it may be because he thinks the picture was taken at Camier in France, though it might just be Lugan in Ireland. As it says, it is all a long while ago. On the other side of the page was the headline "Can you remember Cambridge Place?" "Yes", says Mr Stevenson, "I was born there!"

John Jenner of Bassingbourn writes following my article on river memories and the "mad professor" who ordered a boat to a design carved from a bar of soap. John writes: "The 'mad professor' was none other than the headmaster of King's College Choir School, C.M. Fiddian, 'Fid' to everyone, who was certainly mad on the river and water activities and invented all sorts of things. Over more than fifty years I forget the full details but he told us of this boat and he took it at least once on the sea to get it to the Broads among other places.

"He also revived the pre-war school outings, with swimming and a picnic, on the Viscountess Bury to Clayhithe, when we towed two punts loaded with canoes for use when we got there. Once I remember that the wheel had to be taken off as the water level was so high that we would not otherwise have got under the Railway Bridge at Chesterton. Alas in these days the whole day would break Health and Safety Rules, and I am certain we did not have the present ratio or staff to pupils, but we all survived even with an eccentric forgetful but excellent headmaster".

The Viscountess Bury may have disappeared from the rivers now, but John Norris tells me that she is currently being restored to her original glory at the International College of Boat Building in Lowestoft. A group of friends have started a trust to ensure its survival and return to the fens. If you'd like to help then contact John at 19 Gedge Close, Bury St Edmunds, IP33 2HD.

Paul Carter from Wadhurst, East Sussex, has finally caught up with my picture of the Premier Travel 'County of Cambridgeshire' bus and sent a list of names. He also says the bus accident in Chesterton High Street took place in 1963 and that the crash that demolished houses opposite the former Royal Oak at Stretham Ferry involved a Premier Travel Coach, number BGV 401. Paul should know as he writes books on buses and is now researching one on the smaller operators. If you have memories of firms like Haddenham and District, Leverett of Ashwell, Long of West Wrating, Reliance of Cottenham or others he, and I, would love to hear from you. Write to me and I'll pass letters on.

Do you recognise yourself – or anybody else – on this photograph of staff from the Cadbury / Fry Depot in Hills Road Cambridge about 1936 which has been lent me by Mrs B. Adams of Cambridge. [SCAN]

Going back even further is this photograph of a group from St Matthew's School, York Street in 1924. Dick Roberts, of Dry Drayton is there, he's now 84 but would love to hear from any surviving schoolmates or any old members of St Matthew's scouts. Write to me and I'll pass letters on. [SCAN]

Memories 26 May 2000, by Mike Petty

Last Sunday was Stretham village feast, always held on the third Sunday in May. We had our decorated floats, Friendly Society banner, a band and a parade, pausing at half time for a service in the church, when the congregation included a variety of characters in colourful costume. There were children – and adults - dressed as people from other lands, people from other centuries, people from other worlds & a variety of naughty nurses who must have been frozen to their stocking tops!

For the May-time weather is no respecter of village traditions. But at least were spared the excesses of 50 years ago when on 21st May 1950 something that, according to meteorologists, never happened in Britain did. The News reported it as a "whirlwind", but it wasn't. It was an unprecedented tornado that cut a path about 70 miles long, starting in Buckinghamshire, sweeping across Bedfordshire and finally assaulting Sutton.

The tornado swept up Sutton High Street, through Pound Lane, Church Lane & Ely Road, damaging chimneys, roofs, walls and fences. One building was shifted from its foundations and Church Lane was completely closed by trees blown down along its entire length. Then in an awesome demonstration of its power it overturned a double-decker Eastern Counties bus onto its side. It was just leaving the village en route to March, carrying 14 passengers, one of whom, Mrs Coutts of Doddington, was injured. Whilst the driver escaped uninjured his conductor was knocked unconscious. [PIC OF SUTTON HIGH STREET?]

Elsewhere in the county many houses were struck by lightning and several cellars flooded rain battered down for an hour. At Papworth Everard the storm was described as one of the worst in living memory. Mr C.A. Benstead recalled how the sky turned completely dark except for incessant flashes of lightning which struck a house in Ermine Street North whilst its owners were in church. Elsewhere torrential rain brought the worst flooding in Alconbury Weston since 1910, with some seven feet of water in the basement of one public house. Emergency services responded to flooding in properties in Huntingdon and Newmarket and Cambridge was drenched.

Judy Wynn (nee Easy) of Histon was a teenager then. She recalls that 1951 was The Festival of Britain Year, with the Skylon and Exhibition in London, bringing colour and hope after the deprivations and greyness of the aftermath of the Second World War. "In Histon we were aware of these momentous happenings, but in the pre-TV days London seemed very far away and our young lives were centred around school and Church.

Along with most of my friends, we attended Methodist Sunday School and Church regularly, entering a full schoolroom on Sunday morning and afternoon to have our 'Star Cards' marked. I have fond memories of such saintly teachers as Miss Lincoln, Elsie Wolfe, Miss Morris and Olive Swannell. We didn't always behave well and must have been somewhat of a challenge to them as we sat on 'Bentwood' chairs behind our brown serge curtained cubicles, wearing our Sunday best clothes.

"The highlight of our mid-week activities, when we were younger, was the Inters' Club led by Reg Frost, ably assisted by the youthful Margaret Easy (Wilson). I remember a programme of games and quizzes with summer outings usually on our bikes. I learned to swim at the Green Plunge Pool in Royston. We had all cycled there in a group and I was obviously so exhausted by my efforts in the pool that everyone had to take it in turns to push me home. We did have memorable trips to London & what stands out most sharply in my memory of those visits to the Capital, is climbing to the top of the Monument, and to my dismay discovering later in the day that I'd left my hard boiled egg and lunch at the top!

"We progressed to Youth Club in due course, and the leader in those days was Charlie Love, who ruled in a kindly, friendly and very human way. He was a real gentleman who engendered great respect and affection from the members. It was a successful and thriving Club and among those who belonged in my hey-day were Brian Chapman, 'Brock' Diver, June Gawthrop, Pam Halls, Terry Howard ('Custard'), Mary Love, Margaret Thomas ('Target'), Mick Waters & Ray Wynn. The Minister of the day was the Reverend Follows, a very precise man who visited regularly to conduct Epilogue, carefully locking his cycle in the Vestry, but when his back was turned the boys could be seen riding it around the schoolroom and car park!

We met on Tuesday evenings for 'ping pong', billiards, darts, music and chat, and every Sunday afternoon and evening we would go for long walks in a group, with many outings and social events in between, again mostly using cycles, although some of the boys had motor bikes. When we ventured further afield, punting and swimming at Orford and Hemingford, Motor Cycle Scrambling at Elsworth etc., we would all pile into Ray's van and sit on forms in the back! One cold gloomy Good Friday, I have to confess, we climbed in through a schoolroom window, girls lifted through by the boys, and had a mini-youth club meeting as we had nowhere else to go.

Concerts and full-length plays were rehearsed and produced, with the highlight of the year for all ages being the Sunday School Anniversary Day, when a new dress was a must. Excitement mounted as we anticipated the summer outings to Hunstanton, when great fun was had on the train journey as well as at the resort. Photos reveal happy beach scenes, some featuring swimwear, some mackintoshes, which conjure up many nostalgic memories of the swimming pool, donkey rides, boating lake - all long since disappeared along with the railway. On the return journey I seem to remember girls being hoisted into the luggage racks, and carriage blinds being pulled down for privacy.

“There were many youth club romances - the boys were so chivalrous - they would make sure that no girl went home alone. Ray came to the Methodist as an interloper from the Baptist upon hearing that there were more girls at the Methodist! My fate was sealed when they tossed up with a double-headed penny to decide who should see me safely home, and Ray called tails.

“These were happy carefree days although we had to grow up fairly quickly - most of us started work at 16, and the chaps went into the Forces at 18 or 21. Ray and I were married in 1958 by the Reverend Alan Creber and settled down with our family, who I am pleased to say followed in our footsteps, enjoying the social life and fun the Church had to offer through-out their young lives”.

These and other memories of Histon life are included in the Millennium Magazine produced by Histon Methodist Church which like all other churches in the village will be open for a major flower festival on Histon feast weekend 1st-3rd July, when hopefully the weather will be kinder!

**

My request for memories of Cambridge Place has bought a response from Monica Smith of Cambridge. She writes: “The houses were owned by Cambridge Borough Council. My grandfather, James Saunders, who was a house demolisher, brought about 20 of the houses from the Council in 1939 on condition he demolished them. The price paid was £5 each house!

Although the houses were unfit to live in & been condemned, it took some while for the council to rehouse some of the tenants. During that time my Grandfather received the rent of two shillings and sixpence per week (12½ p). As it took nearly two years before some tenants were found new homes he got back the money he’d paid for the houses!

Sometimes demolition was done by others, as in June 1940 when German bombs hit a row of houses in Vicarage Terrace. The bricks were salvaged and sold, 800 at a time, by Mr Saunders who trundled them to their new owners in a handcart. But as well as masonry there were mementoes, pillows, bed-linen scattered in the wreckage of the homes. Theses he stored in his garages just around the corner in Gas Lane, carefully cataloguing them in pencil in his notebook, which Mrs Smith still treasures. [PIC OF VICARAGE TERRACE BOMBING RUBBLE] [MONICA SMITH, 22 PEROWNE STREET – 369262 HAS THE NOTE BOOK AND IS ALSO LOOKING FOR A CUTTING OF HER GRANDFATHER DEMOLISHING THE HOUSES IN CAMBRIDGE PLACE]

**

More boating memories have been e-mailed from Basil Bonner of Whittlesford. He writes: “My wife Beryl has reminded me of an occasion in the early 1970s when she had taken Dr John York Moore’s daughters out for a trip in our wooden boat “Mallard”, which had an elderly marinated Ford engine. “Mallard” broke down near Baitsbite lock and the lock keeper kindly told the crew of The Viscountess Bury when she passed through the lock on the way back upstream to Cambridge. As the Viscountess swept past “Mallard” at around seven knots, ropes were exchanged without a moment’s delay and our boat was towed all the way up to Banham’s Boatyard, where the tow rope was released and “Mallard’s” crew were left to get clear of the river Cam and into the mooring with the aid of our boathook”.

June Carter has also written from Cambridge: “Your recollections on the river brought back memories of when as a child I stayed for weekends with my Nana, grandfather and Aunt Ethel & on a Sunday summer evening we would walk down from Bermuda Road to the river and take a trip on the Viscountess Bury up to Clayhithe where we stopped at a public house for drinks. I had lemonade & crisps, then late evening we made our way home. It was pure magic.” June has lent me a picture of another form of travel. It is, she believes one of the first motor cars in Cambridge. The man driving it was her great uncle, Joe Cullup, who worked for the family who owned the car. But what is the car, and who was the family – can you help? [SCAN]

Mrs Clarke of Hundon has also written to say that the article sparked memories for her mother who used to live in Walnut Tree Avenue, off Newmarket Road which was demolished for Elizabeth Bridge. [PIC OF WALNUT TREE AVENUE]

**

Mr A. Bates of Cambridge has been racking his brain for the names of more 1970’s cafes. They include Cam Snax at 100 Regent Street run by Mr Loubell, Thurstons in St Andrew’s street, the Milk Bar, Market Hill, El Patio in Sidney Street and the Eros in Petty Cury. There was also a café in St Andrew’s street which was entered by a staircase between Roe’s antique shop and a toy shop run by Mr & Mrs Flesch. They did very good lunches – but he cannot remember the name. He also recalls that there was also a large coffee house on the first floor of Alexandra House, Petty Cury – before it became the Hang Chow - which used to feature a pen of live chickens!

Louis Garvey has written all the way from County Galway in Ireland. He is a circus fanatic with his own collection of circus memorabilia that he has been amassing for 40 years. He even joined Tommy Duffy’s circus for a fortnight, living the life of the showpeople, hearing their stories and witnessing their dedication. If you share his fascination for the big top he’d love to hear from you at Ross Lodge, Headford, County Galway, Ireland.

**

Do you recognise yourself – or anybody else – on this photograph of staff from the Cadbury / Fry Depot in Hills Road Cambridge about 1936 which has been lent me by Mrs B. Adams of Cambridge. [SCAN]

Memories 2nd June 2000, By Mike Petty

Whilst speaking to a meeting of the Cambridge Antique Society recently memories were stirred of some of the personalities who used to be prominent in the Alexandra Street area of the city, not so long ago.

Alexandra Street was the grand name for a lane which ran from the south side of Petty Cury through to Post Office Terrace before emerging opposite Bradwell’s Court. It had been formed in 1870 from the Red Hart & Antelope Yard where farmers used to leave their horses on market day. The area was redeveloped by Corpus Christi college & two and three storey houses with shops and offices replaced the inn stables and barns

For Joan Summers it will always be associated with her father, Eric Stanley Summers. He was a heraldic artist who occupied a one-room office-cum-studio in the Street for some 40 years. Over that period he painted coats-of-arms and shields for many famous people and organisations, for Prince Philip, Churchill College and Sir Barnes Wallis of the bouncing-bomb fame. It would take him a fortnight to do a shield, which had to be gilded, lined in & coloured using the finest of sable brushes. But he also had his own silkscreen printing press on which he would produce posters for May Balls. One item used to dominate his workshop: a cut-out of a naked girl, one arm upraised, her hair flowing in the breeze, her feet in the clouds. He had designed it for the Cambridge Health Spa many years before, one of his daughters being the model for it. Eric Summers died in September 1986 [PIC – THE LAST OF ALEXANDRA STREET, DEMOLISHED 1972, OTHER ENCLOSED FROM CEN LIBRARY]

One of his near-neighbours was also an artist, in her way, in the ramshackled premises which surrounded a hidden courtyard which were the home of generations of Cambridge photographers for over 100 years. The names of Nicholls, Bliss, Blanchard, Lunn, Lee and Lofts were amongst those who traded from Post Office Terrace. Usually their businesses were established, flourished and declined in a relatively short space of time. Two firms became particularly well known: J. Palmer Clarke and Ramsey & Muspratt.

Helen Muspratt was the young lady with the technical knowledge, Lettice Ramsey brought the contacts when they set up business together in 1932.

Miss Muspratt had studied photography at the Regent Street Polytechnic in London and had already attracted critical acclaim for her work at a successful studio in Swanage. After five years she left to set up her own studio in Oxford in 1937, and left the Cambridge side of the business to her partner.

Lettice Ramsey was born in County Sligo in August 1898 and studied at Newnham college where she read moral sciences, captained the 'Varsity lacrosse team and spent much time in trying to get the strict rules of the college relaxed. After graduating she took a job as an industrial psychologist in London until she became bored and moved to Cambridge. Here she met and married Frank Ramsey, a brilliant mathematician and philosopher, who died just five years later leaving her a widow with two young children and in need of a job.

She was introduced to Helen Muspratt, liked what she did and after just one term studying photography, invested £250 in apparatus and a darkroom in St Andrew's street. They made a profit of £600 the first year - much to the chagrin of the man who ran the nearby firm of Palmer Clarke who'd predicted that they wouldn't last for six months only to find them taking over his business in Post Office Terrace within the year.

In 1937 "L'avantgarde" Ramsey & Muspratt were the subject of an article in The Granta that felt Lettice belonged "to that class which gave the England of yesterday its scientists and that of today its artists and left-wing writers and higher Civil Servants". Certainly this class of people flocked to have their portraits taken in her studios. Vanessa Bell, Alistair Cook, Magnus Magnusson, C.P. Snow and Lord Rothschild placed themselves in front of her lens at one time or another.

The studio then was unlike the traditional old-fashioned curtained room with heavy arc-lamps and elaborate cameras. Granta described its "whitewashed walls, a glass roof; bare floor, light-coloured seats and divans and a tubular steel chair". The room was sunny and hot and "Mrs Ramsey sits in a tyrolean peasant dress, blue with red cornflowers; she is tanned because she has been abroad, she looks competent and strong and slightly flamboyant"

In 1970, aged 71, Lettice Ramsey decided to visit Cambodia but found herself banned because of her profession as photographer. She applied for another passport, describing herself as housewife and was successful and returned with hundreds of photographs. Her first foreign trip had been to Stalin's Russia in 1933, at about the time when young men such as Guy Burgess, Donald Maclean and Anthony Blunt - later to be exposed as Russian spies - were being captured by her camera in Cambridge.

Many thousands of people who booked an appointment for a portrait between 1932 and her retirement in 1978 have gone on to distinction in other fields; some of the American servicemen who arrived to fight during the Second World War had their pictures taken in the famous studio.

Many thousand of these negatives are now deposited and available in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library, from where prints can still be ordered.

But Ramsey and Muspratt were much more than just portrait takers. They offered a complete commercial service, recording window displays, building projects such as Addenbrooke's Hospital and Lion Yard and much more. Many hundreds of these are also lodged in the Collection.

Lettice Ramsey died in July 1985 and Muriel Morley another of the Cambridge Antique Society audience had the task of clearing her flat.

It cannot have been quite as exciting as discovering the thousands of glass negatives taken by each of the photographers who had once called Post Office Terrace their base that were packed into every nook and cranny of the outhouse. These too were sorted in the Teaching Area of the Cambridgeshire Collection when it was still housed on the third floor of the library and where some of Edward Summers heraldic shields were used to prop open the books I read over docky-time in those now-disappeared days. [PICS FROM CEN LIBRARY, ENCLOSED]

**

Another piece of artwork has been puzzling Richard Herbert of Ickleton. It is a board that he found forming part of the attic floor of his house. It is headed "H.G. Harford, Job Master & Dealer in Horses; Station and Market Work. Manager B. Day". I've checked some of the Kelly's County Directories for Cambridgeshire between 1864 and 1916 without result, and also tried those for Norfolk & Suffolk in 1883 & 1916 without result. One of Richard's neighbours remembers a family called Day who were in Sawston in the same type of business, but can you help? [ENCLOSED, SCANNED ON DISK]

**

Sheila Proctor, (nee Crisp) from Girton has been rummaging in her scrapbooks to unearth a faded cutting from the News of 19th March 1955 when Coleridge Girls School held their annual gymnastic display in front of parents and friends. Eight classes took part under the eagle eye of PT teachers Mrs Rogers, Miss Dobson & Miss Watts and Wendy Woollard received the trophy as captain of the winning form, 3A. Sheila is standing centre right – but are you amongst the others? [SCAN ON DISK]

**

Jean Clements of Campkin Road, Cambridge has recognised her uncle, Reginald Summerfield in the picture of St Matthew's school (Memories 19th May). He joined up in April 1939 and went into the Tank Corps, fighting in the tank battle of Abbeville and later in the North African desert. He was killed in the retreat from Tobruk in November 1941, aged just 21 years.

**

Mr S.A. Hunt of Bar Hill has sent me colour some snaps taken by his son in the 1970s. Like memories they have started to fade but one remains bright. It shows another Cambridge character, Trevor Hughes, in his accustomed spot near the Cambridge Market Hill fountain in February 1978. Does it jog memories for you? [COLOUR PIC ENCLOSED, SCANNED ON DISK]

Memories 9th June 2000, by Mike Petty

May Week is upon us, that celebration of the end of the Academic exams with all its thrills and flounces and the glittering spectacle of the May Balls – surely an unchanging aspect of Cambridge life.

Back in 1950 H.G. Hodder recalled that how in the early years of the 1900s the real impact and excitement was the descent of bevvies of charming and demure sisters and cousins, fully chaperoned by mothers and aunts), on what was then in effect an all-male world of almost monastic exclusiveness. Until 1914 the rare women students of Girton and Newnham were almost completely segregated from members of the male colleges, they were not only chaperoned to and from lectures but their guardians sat with them to ensure they did not engage in frivolous conversation during class.

When in the first week of June large numbers of tight-laced, elegantly-gowned, blushing young damsels stepped elegantly out of the Great Eastern Railway Station to be escorted in hansom cabs into the flower-bedecked town, the undergraduate population gave way to a spirit of coy abandon. But in those days the main activities revolved around the river with its bumping races, to be watched from punts moored beside the bank with picnics of cucumber sandwiches, cherries and ice-cream.

By 1925 the highlight of the May Week season was the First and Third Trinity Boat Club's Ball, attended by over 1,400 revellers. It was a dazzling and imposing spectacle with a marquee erected on the riverside lawns, lit with clusters of electric lights with yellow shades and decorated with crossed oars around the walls. The Clifford Essex Band provided the music. This ball remained the premier event but by 1949 it was the only one that was still purely a rowing function. It differed from all the others, too, in that it formed part of the London season. Dancing went on until six in the morning in a large marquee on Brewhouse Lane and there was an open-air floor on the other side of the river. The gaiety and music attracted the usual sight-seeing parties, and there was a crowd outside the main gate to see the guests - they numbered about 900 – arriving.

In 1950 the Cambridge Daily News reporters captured the spirit of the time as the dusk to daylight part of the May Week festival began. Downing College was that year celebrating the 150th anniversary of its foundation and made an especial effort to make it an occasion to remember. Fireworks were a major feature; "scintillating fountains spraying sparks, gorgeous aerial cascades of magnificent colour", night was turned to day by brilliant red light which brought a fresh beauty to the classical dignity of the college buildings, while a frost-like effect of artificial moonlight added to the charms. It was all marred slightly by rain.

In a marquee with a specially-laid floor there played in turns Cryil Stapleton and his orchestra and Paul Helman and his band. From ten until six dancing continued, the fox-trots, quicksteps, waltzes and old-time dances alternating with South-American rhythms.

"The flow of dance melody rarely ceased, the energy of the bands never flagged. In fact it seemed to gain in vigour as the sun rose and to impart that vigour to the guests for energetic dances like the Gay Gordons, the palais glide and the hokey-cokey filled the marquee". There was a second venue for dancers with the Junior Combination Room, designated "Salon Intime" for the occasion where Derek Tozer and his band dispensed music of a slower beat for those who wanted an excuse for a more intimate atmosphere. It was, said the News, the outstanding ball of the year, but one typical of those being offered by other colleges.

Michelle Spring in her novel "Nights in White Satin" (Orion books, 1999) records the May Ball atmosphere of more recent times with its champagne and oysters, full-length gowns and high-heeled sandals, bow ties, pulsating pop music – and fireworks. But there is, she claims, another side to Cambridge student life. For in Cambridge there are two universities, that of the East Road as well as the West Road, and the students of the one do not always enjoy the privileges of the other, as her real-life researches have revealed and her fictional detective discovers.

All of this was then, as it is now, largely hidden from the prying eyes of those not privileged, or rich enough, to obtain tickets, but then, as now ordinary folk could glimpse the fashions. Outside the great gate of Trinity in 1925 a crowd assembled to watch the arrival of the guests. They noticed many fashionable peculiarities in the ladies' attire, and one fair guest was wearing one silk stocking of white and the other of a deep shade of blue. By morning as business folk hurried to work they met occasional stragglers in evening dress returning home after the ball. Most of them wore the traditional "morning after" look and seemed quite spent as the result of their all-night activity. Those people walking into work over the next week or so may glimpse their modern equivalents

Some of the revellers, having danced the night away will still, like generations before them, make their way to the river for a punt ride to Grantchester and breakfast, though in 1974 May Ballers sought another venue – Waffles Restaurant in Fitzroy Street, an unlikely place to witness queues of the smart set. [NEG REF 1487/74/24]

But did you ever go to a May Ball – either as guest or caterer and will you share those memories with me?

[ILLUS – POSTERS DESIGNED BY E.S. SUMMERS OF ALEXANDRA STREET FOR MAY BALLS IN THE EARLY 1950S

**

Ann Hood, (nee Painter) writes from Whittlesford with her personal memories of the Sutton tornado of May 1950. She lived at 14 High Street and remembers the damage the storm caused in High Street, Pound Lane & Church Lane.. "Our garden stretched from High Street to The Brook, We had two beautiful mature Walnut trees growing in the Orchard garden. One of these was lifted and dropped by the hurricane, so that it lay across the fence between us and our neighbour's field. One of the smaller neighbouring apple trees was also lifted and dropped back almost in the same hole. Most of the damage in the village was to the Elm trees in Church Lane where branches fell causing some traffic problems until they were cleared. Our own trees, apart from a few branches, all survived, even though they were now at very odd angles and so provided easier shapes to climb. What fun we children had after the storm. The double-decker bus on its side caused some childish smiles as we girls had just been taught in science that Double-deckers were more stable than single!"

**

The story of the bombing raid on Vicarage Terrace in June 1940 has been told several times, but not before by Mr G. Murfett of Cambridge. He writes that the article brought back a lot of memories for him.

He recalls: "I was about 18 years old and never went down the air raid shelters that night. We lived in a three storey house, I was on the first floor, my twin brother was on the top floor, my mother upstairs. 'Get up, a bomb has dropped beside the house', she called. I called back that it had dropped at Marshall's, then we both went back to sleep.

The next morning I went to work at P.H. Allins in Bridge Street. Fred Turkentine stood in the garage, he was always a joker. He said 'you had a close one last night'. When I got to the workshop Arthur Oliver who lived in Sleaford Street said the same thing. I didn't believe him, so he said 'When you go home, cycle down Norfolk Street'. I found St Matthew's Street roped off, police, firemen, ambulance, wardens, sorting through rubble. The bomb did not stop St Matthew's church clock.

“The plane that dropped the bomb was shot down over Fulbourn. It passed over my sister’s cottage and crashed one side of Balsham Road, then bounced to the opposite side. On the Saturday we cycled out to collect bits.

“A few days later I met up with my pal John Hammence, he had been firewatching at a factory on East Road, so he had to help clear up the mess & parts of bodies.”

I WILL ALWAYS BE GLAD TO RECEIVE YOUR PERSONAL ACCOUNTS OF WARTIME OR OTHER MORE RECENT LOCAL EVENTS, PLEASE WRITE

* *

Gwen Norman from Impington has been inspired to send me some most interesting reminiscences of her own childhood, with picnics and cycle rides, of tea made with condensed milk enjoyed in the confines of Anderson shelters in deepest Kent. For her a trip to the local Officer Cadet Training Unit camp for Saturday night dances was an exciting way to spend her time. “My grandfather said I was ‘soldier chasing’, but I considered it ‘entertaining the troops’, she writes.

**

Anthony Bevan of the Cambridge Olympic Appeal has written to identify three of the Cambridge “It’s a Knockout” team featured on 19th May. Those with the giant ball include Chris Heron on the right, Charlie Tennant and Anthony himself, all members of the Cambridge Rugby Team

**

Sheila Proctor, (nee Crisp) from Girton has been rummaging in her scrapbooks to unearth a faded cutting from the News of 19th March 1955 when Coleridge Girls School held their annual gymnastic display in front of parents and friends. Eight classes took part under the eagle eye of PT teachers Mrs Rogers, Miss Dobson & Miss Watts and Wendy Woollard received the trophy as captain of the winning form, 3A. Sheila is standing centre right – but are you amongst the others? [SCAN ON DISK]

Memories 16 June 2000

Brenda Theobald from Ely was somewhat surprised the other week to open the News and find a picture of herself and her bridesmaids, taken just a week or so before her wedding back in June 1936. She’s lent me another snap, this time of the entire group – you can tell it’s the same time because they’re wearing the same clothes. [SCAN OF OUTING]

They were all part of a group snapped on an outing from the Cadbury-Fry depot in Cambridge, a firm she’d joined in 1930 when aged 19. This was based beside the Hills Road railway bridge and Brenda was in charge of the Fry showroom with Mr Charlie Sunday, ensuring the right number of bars of Fry’s Chocolate Cream, Bournville chocolate and other delicacies were delivered to the shops that had ordered them.

It was a job sure to appeal to a girl with a sweet tooth, but she was soon cured of a love of excess chocolate when she was sent to the Bournville factory to be trained. As she was shown round the works she was encouraged to taste the products at the various stages of production. They had a recreation ground and in dinner time she went on the swings and was soon sick as a dog.

She retained her fitness participating in productions organised by the McKenzie School of Music and Drama at the Festival Theatre, swam in the Cam at the ladies bathing place, played tennis and hockey for Cambridge & when she first started work at Eaden Lilley's rowed for a ladies boat club on the river, getting up at 6am so she could row and be back at work by 8 am.

The family home was in Union Road, off Hills Road. She used to run errands for a neighbour who repaid her with a drive in his new motor car, whisking her off to the seaside at Hunstanton – a tremendous journey in the early 1920s. After her marriage they moved to houses newly built by her father, Harry Bicheno in Roseford Road, among the open fields off Histon Road. A stream ran across the back of the garden, there were fields on either side and at the back where horses roamed, and the children could walk through cornfields and pick greengages to take to Chivers factory. The countryside is now swamped under the Arbury Estate. [SCAN OF ROSEFORD ROAD WHEN NEWLY BUILT]

The family moved on to Ely where her husband set up the fabric shop that is still remembered by generations of dressmakers, and enjoyed a spell as Mayor. A photograph of Ely High Street in the 1960s shows cars lining each side of the road – soon to be banished altogether when the street becomes pedestrianised for part of the week. [SCAN OF ELY HIGH STREET 1960s]

Amongst the treasures in her photo album is one of an Eaden Lilley Christmas party in December 1952. Her daughter Valerie is the very smart young lady in glasses beside Santa Claus – do you recognise others? [SCAN OF EADEN LILLEY PARTY 1952]

Ted Mudd of Cambridge has also been sorting out pictures of beautiful ladies. Do you recognise the starlet causing excitement at the Tivoli Cinema, Chesterton Road in the 1950s, or did you even get to see Diana Dors yourself? [SCAN OF DIANA DORS AT THE TIVOLI CINEMA]

Any souvenirs of her visit would by now be collectors' items, eagerly sought for by people who browse in antique shops. But there were none on show at John Beazor's shop in Cambridge the other week when the firm celebrated both the 125th anniversary of the firm and their 60th anniversary in Regent Street. Amongst the works of art & very fine furniture memories turned to when the street was less dominated by yellow lines and estate agents.

When the News surveyed the street in the mid 1960s they found a tremendous mixture of trades and shops. The Singer Home Appliance Centre were stocking records, tape recorders and radios as well as selling sewing machines. Nearby G.G. Woodward were selling and servicing typewriters but finding that times were changing; undergraduates could no longer afford to buy them and were instead having to rely on their own handwriting for writing out their lecture notes! If essays had to be churned out wholesale students could turn to the Roneo duplicating machine company which had the newly developing photocopying machines while Regent Photo Print.

Books could be read at the Christian Science Reading Room or borrowed from Regent Street post office, until 1959 known as Eastern Counties Libraries supplying local shops with the books they needed for their own individual libraries and running their own mobile library around the countryside. If you were into philately then Mr J. Filby specialised in stamps of the British Colonies, Western Europe and the United States. It was a growing hobby and "even the British Post Office is waking up to the fact and bringing out more interesting stamps than in the past" he commented.

Fashion needs were catered for by Stylebeat, then the Mecca of Mods, Rockers and other other young men who liked their clothing to be in the modern vogue. Pointed cowboy boots, tartan jerkins, brightly coloured shirts and sweaters, slim-fitting pants were sure to attract the fashionable. Nearby Milletts stocked army and navy surplus clothes with great coats and khaki trousers always available, just a few doors from the Refuge Aid Shop selling goods in aid of world refugees. Charity shops are one aspect of the street that have flourished in the last 35 years.

John Howes, the long established cycle dealers were one of the few companies in Regent Street not concerned about the arrival of parking meters which others saw as marking a dramatic decline in business. One firm was offering to pay the meter charge while customers were in his shop and Keith Beazor tells me this is something that his firm will still do, at least for customers who actually purchase one of their fine antiques!

One of the oldest things in the street are the doors through which customer enter their shop. They date back to the reign of George III and were brought to Cambridge when the shop opened here 60 years ago. Embedded in the wood were numerous pieces of shrapnel, souvenirs of wartime bombardment of the seaside town. [REGENT STREET PIX FROM FILES]

Cambridge too has suffered from airborne attack, with fears of Zeppelin raids in the First war and German bombs in the Second. But in October 1965 some 150 students had to be evacuated from Magdalene College when an R.A.F. barrage balloon broke away from its base at Cardington and drifted over the county trailing its 2,000 feet steel tethering cable beneath it. The college porter rang police to say "Something is drifting in the sky and there is something swishing about in the college grounds. The fire brigade trained searchlights into the sky to locate the balloon which was found stationary, its cable wrapped around scaffolding on a building site in St John's college.

The job of winching the balloon down took some nine hours and fears mounted that the hydrogen gas inside might explode if its envelope were pierced as it neared the rooftops. The balloon bucked and reared as the wind became stronger, crashing into the tops of two tall trees, but finally it was brought to land, the gas vented and all made safe.

Students could return to their studies, including Prince Richard, son of the Duke of Gloucester whose rooms were within a few yards from where the giant balloon finally flopped. They had a true tale to tell of when something went bump in the night. [BALLOON PIX FROM FILES]

Memories 23 June 2000 by Mike Petty

This has been the week of the Cambridge Festival of Cycling with free cycle health checks, exhibitions, a free cyclists' breakfast and various organised bike rides. One feature was a seminar on Cycling in Cambridge, past present & future at APU, which set me thinking about the relationship between Cambridge and the bike

That cycles dominate Cambridge traffic was proven in August 1986 when streets in the centre of the city were narrowed. With no room for motor vehicles to overtake them bicycles would regulate the speed of progress. The amount of traffic using the central roads dropped. It reduced still further when the centre became pedestrianised and cycles themselves banned from certain streets at certain time. However when the first one way restrictions were introduced in Market Street and Petty Cury in 1925 there was one category of traffic that could go against the flow as they have done legally or illegally ever since.

Various rules have been made to govern the machines. In May 1819 the Cambridge Improvement Commissioners issued a notice "that any person riding a Machine entitled a Velocipede upon the foot-pavement ... is liable to the penalty of twenty shillings". In the Cambridge Chronicle of August 1857 there was a letter of complaint about two undergraduates on a double velocipede running down a child watching a Punch and Judy show in Barnwell. The attack on "this dangerous and ever-growing evil" prompted another correspondent to describe the machines as ridiculous and immoral - whenever he met one he went "as close to upsetting it as possible ... I long to send it and its lunatic piped propeller to immortal smash"

The velocipede was defended by John Howes: one might imagine they were "miniature cars or Juggernauts and that broken arms and legs were of frequent occurrence". However he had had the management of them for 14 or 15 years and could positively state that no accident had occurred except such slight ones "as the clothes-brush, soap and court plaister" could remedy.

The machines were already popular in 1843 for when Queen Victoria visited Cambridge in October her progress was greeted by crowds in carriages, "spring van, tumbril gig, and even the eccentric velocipede for which these parts are famous".

Proper bicycling increased in popularity with the invention of pneumatic tyres but these suffered problems. In 1906 one particular cat was reported to be adept at puncturing them as people biked past and in 1910 the flints put on the road to provide footholds for horses during snow were also complained of for similar reasons. Cyclists petitioned for their own cyclways as early as 1913 but the campaign reached a crescendo in the 1970s with mass rallies resulting in dedicated routes, and even a cycle bridge across the railway, the longest of its type in Western Europe, which was opened in 1989

Cycling was a popular pastime in Edwardian times and various Societies were established whose members would enjoy communal rides in the countryside, similar to those that have been in operation this week. Others achieved fame for their long-distance speed riding. One such was Arthur Markham who in 1907 held the world endurance tricycle record of 307 miles in 24 hours. He is commemorated in Markham Close on the Arbury estate.

But the speed of other cyclists were the source of concern in 1904: "A few years ago the bicycle was looked upon by pedestrians as a real terror and accidents were frequent. Those that grew up with the machine now simply regard it as one of the ordinary dangers but still watch out for the "wheeler" who comes scorching by at the phenomenal speed of 20mph".

Machines then were expensive; a second-hand machine sold for 35/- (£1.75) in 1910 when a professional gang of bicycle thieves were detected shipping stolen bikes to London by train. Those who could not afford their own bikes could hire one. W.J.Taylor recalled in 1931 that he had hired a machine from Messrs Dean Bros of East Road at the rate of 1d an hour in the early 1870s. Since then various firms have followed suit. One such was Herbert Robinson who by 1911 were doing good business hiring to undergraduates, and demonstrated good business sense or good luck when in 1938 they took delivery of 500 machines just before a bus strike. More recently you may recall how in 1979 4-wheel 'cyclomobiles' were hired out to visitors, and more recently still we had the cycle-rickshaw experiment.

The livelihood of bike hirers seemed to be threatened when the City Council conceived the idea of refurbishing the large numbers of abandoned machines, painting them green, and parking them in various parts of the city. The idea was simple. You could merely borrow a bike from one rack and return it to another when finished. Like most ideas it half worked. People did borrow them ... Within a few weeks however the sight of a green bike in Cambridge streets was as rare as sightings of Nessie!

But why has Cambridge gained its reputation as cycle city. Without doubt the University regulations of the 1920s that prevent undergraduates using motor cars is one big factor. But there is another. The News of 90 years ago was adamant, there were so many bikes because house prices were so high that ordinary folk had to live far from the centre and needed the machines to get to work. [VARIOUS BIKE PIX]

**

Mr T.W. Skeels (a famous name in Cambridge cycling) has discovered an old photograph of Cox's Garage and staff in the late 1920s or early 1930s. The garage stood on Quayside. His uncle, Alfred Crisp is second from the left but who are the others – and what is the car? [SCAN ON DISK]

On a slightly different theme I have had a letter from Colin Nunn, secretary of the Cambridge Matchless Motor Cycle Club who are soon to celebrate their 50th anniversary. They were formed as predominately a "scrambles" club and until recently were involved in Moto Cross at both national and local level, as well as being active on the trials scene. To celebrate their half-century they are holding a sporting and social day at Elsworth Moto Parc on Saturday 8th July kicking off with a demonstration ride at 3pm and ending up with a pig roast. So if you are or were interested in scrambling and would like to go along contact Colin on Cambridge 860829 or Dave Simons on Cambridge 23220. And if you were a scrambler, or have any snaps why not drop me a line and tell me about it?

How often do we all take photographs and forget to write the date on the back? Well, even the professionals can slip up sometimes. Peter Dumbleton has found some photographs he took of two local schools in the late 1960's. The question is – which school, when – and are you on them. [PICS ENCLOSED]

Percy Seeby of Trumpington has responded to my request for May Ball memories. He writes: "As a musician (tenor sax) I once played at Trinity and had to walk through the line of people waiting to see the guests arrive, carrying my sax case, to cries of "Here comes the band" (guffaw, guffaw). I think the Ted Heath band was the main act that night. In 1950 I played at Selwyn with the Chic Applin band and wore a red bow tie instead of the usual black, which caused quite a few comments. They gave us bacon and eggs and Champagne for breakfast, and I rode home with my sax case balanced on my bike. I wouldn't like to do it now! In the late 60's I played with a small jazz group at Pembroke and the pianist, a somewhat extrovert character, played the Whole evening with a flap hanging down at the knee of his dress suit where he had somehow torn it. No one seemed to notice, how times had changed!

My pictures of staff on the Cadbury/Fry outing have prompted memories for Ernie & Vera Ostler of Cambridge who feature on the snap; Vera (nee Kefford) used to be secretary to Mr Sunday. Doris Maltby of Chesterton remembers them along with Nancy Long & Molly Mott who she says also used to work there.

Memories, 30th June 2000, by Mike Petty

Last week I was entertained to a lunch by members of my WEA class at the Mitchell Centre off Mill Road, Cambridge, where for the last few months we have been exploring various aspects of Cambridgeshire's past. They choose the topics, I supply the slides and together we do the commentary. We've covered aviation, pubs, floods and architecture and I've learnt from them as much as they've got from me. Lots of people provide similar activities – but I was the first lecturer to be invited to lunch!

The company was great, John and Brian entertained me with their conversation – and I even beat Dave at a game of pool (though I suspect he was not really trying!). Afterwards there would have been music, although the grand piano so well played by those attending the Centre is now needing replacement and if you happen to have a better one they would love to hear from you.

The dining room was decorated with murals from the art class, the menu was sausages, potatoes and peas, followed by banana cream and washed down with a glass of lemon squash. It was a feast, though some will recall how vegetables tasted better when grown in the hospital grounds at Fulbourn.

It may not quite be the sort of feast that Stanley Chown would have prepared, though at times he would have been proud to have been able to serve it. He too cherishes his memories of menus – and for 50 years he assisted in preparing some of the best food Cambridge has to offer. Indeed when Prince Charles was at Trinity College, and wanted a good meal, he went to Pembroke, for Consomme Celestine, le Homard Americaine (lobster soup), le Grouse a la Pembrokia and le soufflé a la Whibley, just one of many dishes named after college Fellows. A copy of the menu signed by Prince Charles is amongst Stanley's treasures. It made such an impression that when the two met at Buckingham Palace the conversation ranged about the history of crème brulee and other recipients of the MBE had to wait longer than usual whilst reminiscences were aired.

Stanley was born in Cambridge in 1912. His father was a soldier, badly wounded during the Great War, who dissuaded his son from embracing a military career. Instead he went to college. Of the three colleges open to him he rejected St Johns & St Catharine's and opted for Pembroke where turtle shells decorated the walls – for of course they had live turtles to make turtle soup. The tears which welled up on his first day were understandable – he was given the job of peeling onions, but he knew this was the life for him and for the next 50 years Pembroke became one of the three loves of his life. The others were his wife Dora, who he kept waiting 15 years as colleges did not pay enough to get married (though having seen the scars of war he put off any thought of marriage not knowing whether when his war came he would come back an invalid & a nuisance). The third love, the one that has been his life and may have saved his life, was food.

The young Chown (“like ‘Clown’ but with an ‘h’”) served his apprenticeship in the college kitchens in the days when there were no fridges and the college got two big lumps of ice from McFisherries morning and afternoon to keep food fresh. Some food was not served fresh for during the shooting season several undergraduates supplied their own pheasants to supplement the loaf of bread each student was entitled to every day. The experience of dining well was part of their Cambridge education. Dinner was compulsory five nights a week, they had to sit in the same seats and porter John Cronk was responsible for marking them in.

During college vacations Stanley worked in grand hotels where the pay was infinitely better, but the quality and ambience far worse. Throughout the hardships of the depression he was part of the team keeping the college fed.

But then came the war. Stanley volunteered for hospital cooking. Wherever he went he found himself in demand. He was offered a job as cook on an American ship transporting soldiers to the war but kept with his hospital unit. They found their way eventually to Singapore in time for the final abortive attempt to repel the invading Japanese Army. Such were the casualties that Stanley was responsible for feeding some 2,000 wounded in a large hospital. News came that the Japanese were forming new convalescent hospitals up-country to which his companions were to be moved. Stanley however was to remain in Singapore. This did not appeal, he got his name on the list and for the next 6 days they travelled in cattle trucks deep into the jungle. Then it was forced marches, cholera, dysentery, repeated bouts of malaria and all the horrors of forced labour. Somehow he survived, despite playing his part in an escape attempt by raiding the Japanese cookhouse for supplies for the escapers and lying like mad when called to account.

When the shattered remnants of his group returned to Singapore Stanley's expertise was needed in three places. He elected to cook in a new hospital for allied officers at Karanji keeping up morale through creative catering with whatever ingredients he had to hand, producing his own substitute wines from colourings found in the pharmacy and writing imaginative menus to describe the fare.

Though supplies were few he contrived a Christmas dinner in 1944 and was summoned before the Colonel of the Australian contingent. There he was presented with a scroll, painted with colours made from the surrounding soil with brushes made from human hair and signed by the officers. It was a magnificent testimonial to his skills, it was also one that could cost him his life. For his Japanese captors would see it as part of yet another escape attempt, and he had been lucky to survive last time. He was ordered to destroy it. Stanley disobeyed the order. It was buried in a piece of bamboo beneath the floor of his hut together with another token of appreciation – a pencil sketch of Dora, copied from a treasured snapshot by a badly wounded artist he had helped regain his confidence by assisting in the kitchen.

The framed testimonial decorated the kitchens at Pembroke to which he returned once liberation came. He went back to his old job as second chef and rose to the very top, cooking regularly for lords, ladies and royalty, as well as changing generations of undergraduates. Many of them remember him with great affection and return to the college kitchens in the hope that he might be there.

But Stanley can get down to Pembroke less often now, for sadly his wife Dora has lost her sight and his place is at her side, his cooking skills now required at home.

His photo albums and scrapbooks are full of snaps and menus, his memories are of fantastic feasts, of swans made in icing sugar, a bust of Thomas Gray and the undergraduate whose head went wrong. Well how do you make a head in icing sugar? Stanley's recipe is to take one balloon inflated to the appropriate size. Cover it in icing sugar and allow to set. Then prick the balloon. But no matter how hard he tried he could not just get the features right, at least not to his perfectionist's eyes.

Dora recalls that a chef's working day often extended far beyond the hours for which he was paid. She too served Pembroke as landlady of one of their hostels in Panton Street which, like all the others used to be supplied with breakfasts from the college kitchens, delivered by porters on wooden trays carried on their heads. But often by midnight there would be no sign of her husband and she would find him engrossed in his kitchen putting more final touches to a special cake – perhaps one of the giant wedding cakes which were another of his specialities.

When the time came for him to retire after 50 years service in 1976 the college raided its treasures for a very special presentation and have chivvied him into writing his own "Memories of Pembroke College 1926-1976" which he has just finished. Now the man who ensured the college's culinary reputation at numerous grand receptions is often a guest of honour. But the greatest accolade he has received, is the one he got so used to: "just seeing them all enjoying my meals was enough for me"

PIXS SCANNED OF STANLEY CHOWN WITH ICING SUGAR BUST OF UNDERGRADUATE & AT A MAY BALL WITH ICING SUGAR SWAN AND STAFF WHO INCLUDE CHEF JOHN GRIGGS, GEORGE DUNN & MRS CLARKE; KEITH HAS TAKEN OTHER PICS OF CHOWN WITH HIS SIGNED TESTIMONIAL FROM THE JAP HOSPITAL CAMP AND A MENU SIGNED BY PRINCE CHARLES & OTHERS

We may not all be privileged to dine at Top Table (or at the Mitchell). But another grand event is open to all. Trumpington has two great houses, Trumpington Hall, home to the Pemberton family since 1675 and Anstey Hall, once home to the Foster family.

Early last century both played a major part in village life with village fetes being hosted as well as private parties. During the war the first was a Red Cross Hospital, the other a base for the auxiliary fire service and soldiers lived in Nissen huts in the grounds. Later Anstey Hall was taken over by the Bata Shoe Company and the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service. Now it is being restored to its former glory as a private house. As part of the Trumpington Parish Church's Millennium Weekend there will be a cheese and wine party at Anstey Hall on Friday 7th July, tickets for which are available from David George, on Cambridge 840191 at £5. Next day, Saturday 8th July there will be a garden party in the grounds when visitors will be able to retrace the steps of the high society ladies who took their ease in the summer house – and witness the progress of the new supermarket now being built in the old pleasure gardens.

One of last week's mystery school pictures has been identified. Margaret Hobbs from Caldecote saw her daughter Jo with her classmates at Dry Drayton school about 1967 – but we need other names and details please.

Memories 7th July 2000 by Mike Petty

George Blows of Queen Edith's Way, Cambridge has responded for my appeal for material on motor cycle scrambling with a photograph taken of a Centaur Motor Cycle Club meeting at the chalk pits, Lime Kiln Road, Cherry Hinton about 1952. He recalls there were several German prisoners there from the camp at Trumpington.

Information on the sport seems scarce though I have a cutting of when the first inter-club team championship scramble was held at Hill Farm, Buckland, near Royston. The course of about 1½ miles had been marked out chiefly on a long hill-side field, but a steep gully at the end of the straight and another near the crest of the hill were severe obstacles. The names of some of the riders were given as Brian Stonebridge, J. Hubbard, H.D. Halsey, M. McNally & A.S. Cox. It seems that in those days the sport was highly popular with events most weekends.

By 1977 schoolboy scrambling was described as one of Britain's boom sports and Cambridge had its one Junior Scramble Club with about 75 members. Its meetings were held in Fen Road, Chesterton. Twelve-year old Kelvin was one of the founder members who described the buzz: "I like going fast and doing jumps" he told a reporter. His bike could do 70 mph (though not on the scramble track). The Suzuki had cost £450 and there was the protective clothing, transport to and from meetings and other expenses which forced youngsters to save every penny of their pocket money and do odd jobs to keep them going. All that of course is nearly 25 years ago. Did you used to take part, then or earlier. Somebody must have memories, please share them.

The prison camp George Blows refers to was established in 1941 to house Italian prisoners of war. It was set up in fields to the west of Hauxton Road, Trumpington & comprised a single-storey buildings surrounded by a high wire fence topped with barbed wire. Towards the end of the war the camp was used for German prisoners who were only allowed out to work on local farms when escorted. By 1948 they were allowed to use the village shops, though they were still easily identifiable by their armbands. These details are included in a new book on 20th-century Trumpington, just compiled by Shirley Brown. It is full of memories of the Royal Shows held in the 1950s and 60s, of Ted Peacock opening his council house gardens and attracting thousands of people to see his wonderful displays of dahlias. Perhaps you remember Kitty Willers, the supreme toy maker. Every year she would hang some new design of toy in the bedroom window of her High Street home and children going past to school would chose the one they wanted. Then their mothers would have to join the queue at the Church Missionary Society sale well before it opened, in the hope of being successful. There were never any toys left.

Other older members of the community played their part in different ways. Trumpington Elderly Action Group was set up to discuss how to improve life for the over-sixties and carried their campaign to Cambridge itself when the city centre was pedestrianised – how could older people do their shopping without some form of transport. They picketed the newly-installed gates, organised petitions and were rewarded with the introduction of the free green shopper bus that now trundles between the Grafton Centre to King's Parade

Amongst the hundred of people mentioned in the name of Jack Overhill, the well-known local author and broadcaster whose journals of back-street life in Cambridge are preserved for all to read in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library. Jack had a remarkable memory and a remarkable way of recalling and bringing to life events of the past. He had a tale of a disturbance in the dining hall at the Leys School which got so bad that police had to be called and the Riot Act read, but he claimed the event had been hushed up.

When I received a copy of the newly-published history of the Leys school I turned immediately to the chapter 'Boys will be boys'. There they document the occasion in 1923 when every pupil was served two mackerel for breakfast. Without any visible conferring the Top Table got up and filed out, carrying their mackerel. They were immediately followed by boys from other tables. In perfect order they marched to the Bursar's office, deposited their stinking fish on his desk and marched back to the Dining Hall where Grace was said, and they were dismissed. The Bursar found 520 fish on his desk when he arrived for work. No comment was ever made and no disciplinary action was ever taken, but there was a noticeable improvement in the food from that time. Then there was the cockroach-eating incident when during a biology practical in the late 1950s boys were given the task of removing the mouthparts of a cockroach and mounting them on a microscope slide. The Master in charge was not surprised when one pupil came to ask for a fresh specimen. He was surprised when the lad promptly swallowed it and held out his hand for the payment of a 2/6 bet he had made with his classmate! But of the Riot Act there is no proof, though they have tracked down a note from the Headmaster of the time which claims no such incident ever happened. Unless you know better?

There is also a fascinating insight into the visit paid to The Leys by Queen Elizabeth, the Queen Mother in 1961 to open a major rebuilding project. The occasion went like clockwork but after Her Majesty had gone it was discovered she had left her bouquet behind. The Headmaster's wife, Jean Barker carefully undid it and presented a flower to every boy who had met the Queen. Hardly had she finished when the telephone rang. It was Clarence House: "Her Majesty is most upset – she left her flowers behind – please could you send them on to her". Jean Barker replied "Of Course" and then had the job of regathering each bloom, reassembling the bouquet as best she could and taking it down to London with an accompanying letter. She received a charming letter saying that the Queen Mother apologised because she had guessed what had happened, "but goodness – she had enjoyed the strawberries and cream!"

For anybody connected with the Leys this account of "Well-regulated minds and improper moments", so well put together by Geoff and Pat Houghton, is essential reading. But it has far from just a parochial interest. During both the World Wars The Leys was in the front line in treating casualties when its buildings were requisitioned as hospitals, including maternity cases as both military and civilian personnel were treated. Very recent research has however discovered another role earmarked for the school. Secret Government papers show how in 1963 the school had been earmarked to play a supporting role in the government of the Eastern Region should a nuclear strike have been mounted on Britain which caused the collapse of Central Government.

Such secrets of wartime are still being puzzled over. How often have you spotted a wartime pillbox in the corner of a field, or along some river bank and wondered why it was placed there. Some of the answers are to be found in a new "Atlas of Cambridgeshire and Huntingdonshire History" just issued by the Regional Studies Centre at Anglia Polytechnic University. According to the text Cambridge itself was designated a Defended Place capable of being held by its own garrison consisting for the most part of Home Guards. Roads & railway would have been blocked by steel rails dropped into prepared sockets, vehicles immobilised and stocks of fuel destroyed. The city was surrounded by an anti-tank ditch, pillboxes and fieldworks whilst the Shire Hall complex was fortified as the focus of last ditch resistance. The Castle Hill site has had a history of fortifications but in other places military preparations were constructed, as at Godmanchester in Roman times, and Linton during the Civil War when in June 1648 Royalist and Roundhead forces clashed. Other maps show the development of fen drainage, road transport & railways whilst Margaret Spufford has plotted the schools and schoolmasters in old Cambridgeshire between 1574 & 1628.

One of the places to have schools in those far off days was Dry Drayton whose pupils in about 1967 featured in these columns a couple of weeks ago. Mrs Elsome, now of Somersham, was shocked when she opened her paper to see the faces of her children looking out at her. Graham Bilton who now lives in Stretham named two of the teachers as Mrs Jordan (centre) and Mrs Mascrow (left) together with various children including Philip Parfitt, Mandy Bilton (now Carter) and Linda Searle who he believes is now in the USA. Mrs Ruth Searle from Dry Drayton has also written to confirm the location. So thank you, problem solved.

I have selected another school picture to test your powers of observation and memory, this one from the files of the News. So where, when and who?

Two readers are appealing for your help. Mrs Joyce Pryke of Willingham is searching for a photo of her late father, Frank Lawrence who used to work for Eaden Lilley and rowed for them in the late 1920s or early 1930s. She's tried the Cambridgeshire Collection, Folk Museum and County Record Office for a team photo, can you help?

Mrs J. Potts from Histon asks whether anybody can enlighten her as to the whereabouts in Cambridge of "Nazareth House Homes" which were run by nuns for children in care. If so write to me and I'll pass letters on.

PIC SCANNED OF SCRAMBLING AT CHERRY HINTON CHALK PITS c1952 TAKEN BY GEORGE BLOWS
OTHERS SELECTED FROM NEWS LIBRARY

Memories 14th July 2000, by Mike Petty

Sometimes it seems that things just go round and round. The Saturday shoppers in Cambridge's Lion Yard pick their way through the debris of a building site wondering just what new delights will be revealed once the scaffolding has gone and the new development is revealed in all its wonder.

Exactly that question was being asked this week 25 years ago when in mid July 1975 the first shops were starting to move into the brand new development. In those days the rent for a prime shop on Petty Cury would be some £16,000 a year, in the centre of the Yard prices would be down to between £7-£10,000, whilst individual small boutique units could be snapped up for about £5,000.

But then, as now, the question was who could afford them. Businesses must have a high turnover and high profit margins – selling goods such as clothes, jewellery and electrical goods. They would probably be wealthy national companies who could afford to speculate for a few years. Certainly few local traders were expressing any hopes of moving into Lion Yard.

The design for the new area dated back to 1950 when the Holford & Wright planning report proposed two large shopping streets in the Lion Yard area. This was rejected, so too was another proposal in 1959 and it was 1968 that the basic outline of the present scheme was accepted and Arup Associates were commissioned to prepare it. The design was approved in January 1970 and work started by the end of the year. First to open was the car park in July 1972 to be followed by a new Central Library on three floors, three floors of office accommodation and 40 shops of varying sizes. It was all officially opened by Princess Anne in December 1975.

But in July 1975 the burning question was who was to occupy them. Not Millers Music, Ken Stevens or Remu Television. The first two found the rents too steep, the third was unsuccessful in his bid. Manager Alan Umer was quoted as saying: "I am disappointed that local traders did not get a much more lenient hearing, and a bit more consideration". But in spite of the austere economic conditions then applying Cambridge's allure as a shopping centre was overcoming any reluctance to rent. Harry Fenton menswear were already open by July 1975 & Mike Barry menswear, Chelsea Girl, Etam, and Plumbs fabric cover furnishers were likely to be open soon. As were Rumbelows the electricians, Dixons photographic, Ernest Jones jewellers, Peter Lord footwear and Salisbury handbags.

Within the precinct itself fashion-conscious ladies could look forward to Alley Boutique, Hammells, Van Allan, Evans Outsize & Mothercare – with Miss Selfridge due later. If shopping made you hungry there was refreshment to be had at the Golden Egg where you could scan the latest fashion magazines bought from W.H. Smith.

Outside there would be entertainment, a chamber group in dinner jackets, a solitary flautist or a washed-up busker offering Scottish ballads on his accordion depending on the day. There would always be something on offer to delight the shopper, as Cambridge roared into the new retail age.

Were you amongst those who pioneered this exciting expansion of the Cambridge shopping scene & do you look back with nostalgia on the Old Lion Yard.

When you talk shops to Tom Caldecoat it is the Cambridge Co-op that he remembers, the shop he joined as a driver before he could drive – though he had practised on a hired motorbike. But in those inter-war days transport was in its infancy, his Vulcan truck had a petrol tank under the seat and he pumped the petrol by hand whenever the engine faltered.

Talking with Tom is like leafing through a picture history of Cambridge last century. His boyhood memories are of the East Road – Mill Road area. He describes fetching coke in a pram from the Gas Works, of queuing for potatoes down Mill Road and for margarine from the Maypole in the days of wartime rationing, though it is the Great War he remembers. He played football for Cambridge Town and was poached to play for the great London club Walthamstowe Avenue claiming £8 a match for his train and taxi fares, though he moved to live near the ground – well Town only gave him socks and a shirt and in those days of depression times were very hard. It was here he met his late wife.

But Tom could not stand London and came home to Cambridge and a job at the Co-op. By the time he enlisted in the Second War he was an experienced transport engineer & went to fight with the Cambridge-based 30th Light Anti-Aircraft Regiment, finding himself based at Sawston Hall & trundling the guns into Fowlmere & Bassingbourn to guard the airfields. He was in charge of the transport that saw those guns through the African deserts and up into Italy and witnessed the body of Mussolini suspended upside down over a garage forecourt. He returned to repair and return vehicles that had been commandeered from buildings at Quy Hall and then it was back to the Co-op where from its base at Sleaford Street he was responsible for vehicles of all types, from milk floats to lorries, which kept the branches supplied.

If anybody has seen the changes in transport then it is Tom. The nightmare of traffic, the disruption of the 1963 winter when vehicles were snowed in, & always the never knowing when he would be called out to keep the wheels rolling. But when every morning the Co-op pinta arrived on the doorstep it was proof that the system worked.

Tom Caldecoat retired in 1973 but remains as alert and bright as ever, making the regular journey to Sturton Street for meetings with his old colleagues in the Co-op Pensioners Fellowship. These include comparative youngsters like Doug Williams who has a picture of himself as an errand boy outside the shop in High Street Chesterton in 1936, with his first manager, Mr Ives, Charlie Haynes, provision hand Charles Dimock, Maurice Curwain and Jack Bateman. The Co-op staff parties at the old Dorothy were the highlight of the social year, the entire complex being booked for two nights to accommodate the large numbers wishing to attend. Now they live on in the memory, and in the occasional snap, such as this from the News files of a party about 1967. Do you recognise yourself, or anybody else? [SCAN OF CHESTERTON CO-OP 1936, & CO-OP STAFF PARTY 1967]

My appeal for scrambling memories has brought a response from Dave Dunn of Chesterton, one of the four families whose sons were founder members of the Cambridge Junior Scrambling Club. Their first track was in Fen Road, Chesterton where they were not entirely welcomed by neighbours; they moved to Chippenham and then Elsworth and saw their youngsters go on to achieve British Championship success. It was hard work, but very rewarding. Dave still attends motor-cross events, though now just a face in the crowd, his memories are of his own scrambling in the great days of the 1950s and of names like Andy Lee. Jonathan Wright from Swaffham Bulbeck contacts me to say he saw his late brother, Gerald, in the picture of the finals at Chippenham in 1980. Gerald went on to Expert class but has sadly since died. There must have been videos or amateur film footage taken at the time, or perhaps other snaps that might show Gerald wearing his distinctive number 5. If you have any Jonathan would love to have a chance to take copies for his family's archives. Write to me and I'll pass letters on.

Other sporting memories were sparked last week for Mrs Margaret Barker of Cambridge. She writes: "I was delighted to see a very familiar photo. It was of a coaching session by one of Britain's top coaches, Charlie Watson from Bedford. Swimmers were drawn from the Cambridge area and spent half-term at Chesterton School being put through their paces. My daughter, Alison, is the girl nearest the front. She went on to become one of the country's best Butterfly swimmers (still holds the county record for 100m Butterfly) and won a swimming scholarship to Nebraska in the USA. She now lives in Greece. Some of the others are Shaun Levitt, Tom Blackburn-Maze (son of Peter the News gardening correspondent), Joanne Turner, Rodney Badcock, Amanda Christy, Simon & Mark Pauley & Louise Chambers. Robert Warner of Histon is also there, right in the foreground.

I have selected another old school picture from the News files to tease the memories [DETAILS ON SHEET]

Mrs Margaret Mason of Cambridge has been clearing out a house and has come across some pictures of St Luke's school so far back that even Tom Caldecoat would have problems remembering. There's also an advertising card for a production of "The Arcadians" at the New Theatre in about 1926. I will pass them on to the Cambridgeshire Collection

Eric Algar of Cambridge has kindly sent me his memories of flying as a Flight Engineer with Stirling bombers. He has encyclopaedic knowledge of the conversion work that saw the planes undertake work for the Special Operations Executive, dropping containers for the French Resistance and despatching spies behind enemy lines in Norway, Denmark and other European countries.

Jean Pope writes from Comberton to say the picture of Ted Peacock in his garden brought back happy memories to her, as her husband Richard used to grown and show dahlias as well.

Mrs Ginn from Cambridge spotted a snippet in my "Looking Back" column for 1925 about the swim through Cambridge that used to be held. Her late mother, Gwen Snelson was a member of the Cambridge Amateur Swimming Club who used to take part in the race and she still treasures the certificates that were awarded. I have found a picture of the start of the swim through Cambridge race in the 1950s – do you recognise anybody? PICTURE SCANNED

Continuing with the transport theme it is just 25 years since Britain's first & only tracked hovercraft made its last journey – by road. The 21 ton machine, code number RTV31, was trundled at a maximum 25 mph the 40 miles from its hangar at Earith to the College of Technology, Cranfield where it was to join other transport "has-beens", including the remaining TSR2 aircraft, that suffered the same fate – axed by the Government as an economy measure when still in its early prototype days. The development and testing of the hovercraft took place out at Earith, where a special track was constructed between the Bedford Rivers. Did you have any connection with it, or make a trip out to see it in action. Do you have any snaps – if so drop me a line.

SCHOOL PHOTOS & OTHER PIX AS LISTED ON SHEETS

Memories 21st July 2000, by Mike Petty

My mention of scrambling has kick-started memories for many people throughout the area. Lloyd Rolph of Reach shares his motorcycling memories of when he, aged 3 and his big brother (4) would spend hours charging up and down the disused airfield at Wilbraham on an ex army 'parachute' 50cc Corgi motorcycle attached to a platform sidecar that his father had assembled for them. Later they progressed to riding solo scramblers either on the airfield or at Quy park. In the mid-sixties they took part in organised schoolboy events with their first scramble at Iwade in Kent.

He recalls: "We didn't have the machinery of today, my machine was a 125cc BSA bantam engine in a Greeves frame and as for clothing it was a helmet, ACU (auto-cycle-union) approved shirt, two pairs of jeans (unless you could afford leather trousers!), any form of gloves and finished off with a pair of army-surplus dispatch rider boots". Nor was it just the racing – there was all the engine tuning to be done at home, usually in the kitchen.

Later came purpose built machines and in about 1967 his father took him to a schoolboy 'grass track' meeting, which became his chosen sport. In 1973 Lloyd left the schoolboy ranks and progressed to adult grass track racing until after 12 years of competing the finances finally said 'give up'. "Looking back I realise how much my parents must have 'given up' to enable my brother any myself to take part", he adds.

This feeling of involvement of the whole family was reinforced when I talked to Dave Dunn who told me of the start of the Cambridge Junior Scrambling Club. Pictures of his son's prowess dominate their Chesterton living room, though the cuttings which chart Mark's progress are no longer in this country – he's taken them with him to his new home in Italy. Yet such is the interest that he'd faxed back copies showing himself powering to take first prize in the intermediate section of the Cambridge schoolboy scrambling club's opening meeting in January 1980. There is also one of the time back in 1977 when the eight-year old Mark learned of the danger of playing with matches when he set fire to the family's garage which contained his dad's practice scrambling bike. Fortunately Mark's own bike, with those of his friends were not in the garage at the time!

Dave Dunn, together with Doug Jilks, Len Laker, the late Paul Butcher & their wives were the parents who first gave up their time and money to encourage the schoolboy scramblers. They soon had over 300 lads on the books & top-name stars like Andy Lee came to support the youngsters and award the trophies at the annual presentation nights in the Guildhall or University Arms.

Mrs D. Belcher from Sawston has memories of Andy Lee "who always seemed to be riding a machine made up of parts which regularly broke down". This was in the 1950s when she and her late husband attended many cold, wet but exciting meetings organised by the Matchless Motorcycle Club. She treasures a programme of a scramble meeting at Hawkstone Park, near Shrewsbury in March 1960 dedicated to the memory of Brian Stonebridge. Riders from around the country, and from the Continent gathered to pay their own tribute to Brian, a Cambridgeshire man "with a shy, slow smile, a mop of fair hair and legs that seemed at times to have no connection with his body" whose exploits on his 250cc Greeves bikes made him the hero for thousands, young and old. He became one of the most celebrated riders in scrambles, representing Great Britain in many international moto-cross events. Beryl Ginn from Cambridge tells me her father, Gus King, who managed the Motor Cycle Department of King & Harper took a keen professional interest in the young Brian Stonebridge's career, which ended suddenly when Brian was killed in a car crash in October 1959.

Mr P.J. Collins of Woodhurst has recollections that go back to this time. He has sent me some negatives he took at a scramble meeting at Arrington in 1953, now somewhat fading like the memories themselves. I HOPE WE CAN GET PRINTS FROM THESE – ASK KEITH]

Alan Saunders of Sawston was a lad in those days and he saw himself in last week's "Memories" at the start of a "Swim through Cambridge" race on 22nd July 1955. He had gone to the race with his cousin and his uncle Eddie Anstey, who now lives in Cambridge. Uncle Eddie had taken the lads for a practice swim at Baitsbite Lock to ensure they had the stamina for the race, which started at Mill Pool and continued under all the bridges of the Backs till the finishing post at Jesus Green. The training worked; Alan has photographs of himself at the end of the race, and treasures the certificate he was awarded – in fact he found them again them just the other week and has now got them framed. There is another memory of that event for his uncle had advised him to grease himself all over before the swim, which he did – except for that part of his body covered by his swimming costume. That night he joined a school trip to Jersey with a very painful reminder of just how cold the Cam can be in July! Mike Richardson of Cambridge recalls another problem with that race – bleeding finger-tips from the sandy bottom of the river. But it was a small price to pay for the greatest achievement of his swimming career – coming first in the race. The top two amateur swimmers of the day were Brian Stearn and David Barker who were so intent on battling against each other that they failed to notice the youngster slip past them to win.

The race no longer takes place, but any memories you have would be welcome. It was stopped in the mid 1970s, a victim of river pollution.

It seems hard to think of the Backs as being polluted, though of course the colleges used to discharge all their sewage into the river. If one area has remained unchanged over the centuries it is surely the stretch from Queens' SUBS NB "S" college to St John's? Not so. Just 25 years ago the area along Queen's [NB "S" Road was a disaster area, the famous trees struck down by Dutch elm disease. Chainsaws were ripping through branches and trunks and the area resembled a battlefield. Replanting took place and now it is tree-lined once more. But were you involved in the fight for the elms, or did you plant a replacement tree? Your memories please.

Giles Edkins is at Parkside College doing a history project for his GCSE and would like further memories of student behaviour during bonfire nights in the past, or other information on town/gown disturbances. I've sent a copy of my Memories article and one or two other ideas, but can you help with your recollections too.

Mrs Paddy James from Bottisham is concerned about changes to bus timetables and routes which have removed traditional transport links between villages and smaller towns. Have you any memories of how and why certain bus routes were established – I recall something about how a driver was courting a girl in a certain village and used his bus to get there – so the boss said he might as well take passengers while he was about it. Details please.

John Wallage of Trumpington writes to tell me that the old gentleman watching re-thatching at Trumpington, featured in Memories of 7th July, was his late father, Frederick Charles Wallage. He worked on farms in Grantchester and Trumpington for 40 years for Sir Francis Pemberton and in his latter life was responsible for the upkeep of Trumpington parish churchyard.

PICTURES

Brian Stonebridge in action – cover of programme for a memorial meeting 1960 – scan on disk

Andy Lee with Cambridgeshire youngsters, 1981
Cambridgeshire Junior Scramblers, 1981

Hopefully pictures of scrambling at Arrington in 1953 taken by News reader P.J. Collins – see Keith

Picture of Alan Saunders, 5 High St Sawston – 833162 – with certificate for Swim through Cambridge 1955 and himself at end of the race – see Keith

Dutch elm disease – felling trees on Backs, July 1974

Memories 28th July 2000 by Mike Petty

News that The Beatles' Sergeant Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band album is now worth more than £100 has left me wondering where my old copy is.

A couple of the tracks formed the opening numbers of the gigs performed at that time by Forever Amber, one of the leading groups to originate in Cambridge in the mid to late 60s. They played alongside bands such as The Toby Jug and Washboard Band and The Swinging Blue Jeans, with one of their ardent fans being a young man called Dave Gilmour - who later achieved fame with Pink Floyd.

Forever Amber was formed from the remnants of a local band called the Country Cousins. A close harmony group, they specialised in the American West Coast sound and soul music. The line-up was Mick Richardson, lead singer, with Chris Parren on organ, Dick Lane, lead, Tony Mumford, bass, and Chris Jones on rhythm guitars. The drummer was Barry Broad, who took over from the late Graham Jenkinson.

They were all local lads in their 20s, most holding down jobs during the day and turning out three or four times a week to play gigs at venues such as Hiams' Social Club, and the Dorothy. Their publicity photos show a group on their way to the top, except they were friends first and pop stars second.

At the end of 1968 they made a demo tape and sent it out to record companies. Philips Records liked what it heard and wanted more. Their manager Derek Buxton introduced them to songwriter John Hudson, who had an idea for an album. They travelled to the recording studio in Hitchin to cut the disc and eventually they had their 100 copies of the recording, The Love Cycle. It had cost £200. Somehow the album was never sent to the record company, the copies were sold off at gigs. Soon after the band started to fall apart, its members pulling in different directions.

Mark still sings, Tony still plays and Dick only hung up his guitar last year after playing with many local bands. Chris Jones runs a video production company and Barry is a finance firm's manager. Chris Parren is a session musician, playing on records made by the likes of George Michael, and appearing on Top of the Pops.

Forever Amber became a band that faded away. But then came the approaches from international record collectors. The Love Cycle, described as "A cross between early Pink Floyd and the Zombies" was now sought-after and became the second rarest album in the country, with copies changing hands for £1,200 each. Today it features on a web site of the rarest of record covers. Then, years after it was cut, it was reissued on a CD, itself a collectors' item.

Last week some of the band met up to swap memories and pose for the camera. One brought a copy of the LP. Somewhere there are another 99 copies of The Love Cycle. If you have one, perhaps you might like to deposit it in the bank against a rainy day - or you could make an almost-famous pop star very happy!

You can write to Mike Petty -
Memories, Cambridge Newspapers Ltd,
Winship Road, Milton,
Cambridge CB4 6PP

Forever young . . . Forever Amber's original line-up pictured in Beech woods 1969, from left, Dick Lane (lead guitar), Graham Jenkinson (deceased), Mick Richardson (singer), Chris Jones (rhythm guitar), Chris Parren (organist), and Tony Mumford (bass guitar).

Reminiscing . . . Forever Amber pictured at Stretham Red Lion, 2000, clockwise from left, Chris Jones, Barry Broad, Dick Lane and Mick Richardson. Picture: Matthew Power 6161M9

Memories 4th August 2000, by Mike Petty

News that the Scout movement is to adopt new uniforms set me wondering about the earlier days of scouting.

The Boy Scout movement in Cambridge started at a meeting in the YMCA addressed by General Baden-Powell on 21st February 1908. It was followed by a public meeting at the Perse school the next month following which "monkey patrols" of boys were formed, playing at scouting without being under any proper control. These were soon formed into Troops in Cambridge, Cherry Hinton, Chesterton and at the Higher Grade and Perse schools.

In May 1910 200 scouts were inspected in the grounds of the Perse school and a meeting inaugurated the Cambridge Boy Scout Association. Later 125 members of the local troops made their way to Windsor park for a Coronation Rally where they were inspected by the new King, George V. The excitement of meeting the King could surely only be equated with that of seeing the hero of the defence of Mafeking - Robert Baden-Powell himself.

Yet in 1911 Baden-Powell was at Cambridge. It was a bitterly cold day and the wind howled across Parker's Piece where 400 scouts assembled before marching off - with cyclists and mounted scouts in the rear - to the University O.T.C. ground where the great man inspected them. At the sound of a bugle call the apparently empty field became filled with scouts, saluting their Chief with their staves, Zulu fashion, and shouting their patrol calls. Further rallies followed in 1912 and 1913, but then came war.

In July 1914 a mixed group of scouts left Cambridge for camp at Lt Downham. They camped on a splendid site on a hill overlooking the rich Fenland. They explored the great Cathedral, gave a display at the village fete, were inspected by the Principal of the Ely Theological College, and listened to the rumours of War. As soon as it was declared they started keeping a night watch, sent messages in Morse code to Littleport, 4 miles away, and gave a concert for the local troops. Then came the telegram from General Baden-Powell, ordering them back home. Next day they struck camp and marched to Ely station, arriving just behind the Ely territorials then leaving for Ipswich. Anxious women, standing at cottage doors were heard to ask : "What are they going to send those little chaps to the front too?"

Whilst they did not leave for France they did play their part, guarding bridges during the passage of troop trains and guarding the water tower and pumping station at Isleham - though what, some asked, could they do against German spies trying to blow them up. In June 1915 the Perse troop joined the Volunteer Training Corps in a military field exercise between Cherry Hinton and Gt Shelford, attempting to penetrate a defensive cordon thrown around Cambridge.

Next year "Wolf cub" packs were formed and in June 1922 they succeeded in ambushing the Chief Scout himself at Queens' college. B-P was en route to present Kings Badges to a number of senior scouts when a large group of cub scouts leapt over the wall of Cloister Court to surround him and reaffirm their pledge "Achela we will do our best". Then in 1931 the Chief Scout was awarded an Honorary Degree by Cambridge University.

All that is a long while ago, but what are your memories of Scouting? Write to Mike Petty at the News [PIX OF SOME OF THE FIRST SCOUTS IN CORN EXCHANGE, BADEN-POWELL RECEIVES HON DEGREE AT SENATE HOUSE, 1931

Memories of the Swim through Cambridge continue to flood in.

Ken Drake from Cambridge says his father, Oliver B. Drake, taught many boys to swim at Coleridge School in the 1940s & 1950s. He was keen to see them progress, encouraged them to enter for the Swim through Cambridge, & would stand on one of the college bridges and cheer on his youngsters as they swam beneath him. All his pupils could be assured of his support, except one. In 1950 Ken decided that he would take part in the race, without telling his father. He tried to imagine the look on his dad's face as he passed beneath him. It didn't quite work out as planned, for in the crush of competitors Ken passed unnoticed and he needed to produce his certificate to prove he had actually done it!

Trevor Gill from Burwell has proof of his participation in the race in July 1949, for his scrapbook includes a photograph taken by the C.D.N. in July 1949 that shows him, aged 13, half behind the large lad with the badge on his trunks in the front row. Do you recognise yourself, or others? [PICTURE SCANNED ON DISK]

Ted Austin from Over tells me that his son, Richard, has another tangible reminder of participating in the race – a lifetime hatred of chicken soup. Ted says that by the end of the race competitors were so cold they shook violently for some 20 minutes, but the soup supplied to warm them up was just too unpalatable to stomach.

Alex Cook used to train for the race at Sheeps Green with the president of the Granta Swimming Club, Dr H.A. Webb. The late Ray Barker, a former RAF officer in the war and for years the top Cambridge swimmer was their role model. Alex won the Swim through Cambridge most years during the 1950s and also participated in an annual swim from level with the Red Lion in Grantchester to the rollers opposite the Garden House Hotel. Fellow swimmers of the period included Chris Fowler, (later to add a hyphenated Brocklebank to his surname and become a Norfolk MP) and Dave Miller who was later Mayor of Saffron Walden.

Derek Ashman of Cambridge recalls how during the war a substitute course was used, swimming from the Ladies Bathing Sheds on Lammas Land to the Garden House Hotel and back again. It must have led to the river being somewhat congested. Sharyn Bord, Shirley Emerson & Patrick Schicker from Cambridge, Peter Oakman from St Ives & Alan Moore from Bar Hill are amongst others who have written, thank you all.

As many recall there was a separate race for ladies. Betty Rayner (nee Dewey) of Norwich took part when she was a girl (she's now 86!) and Brenda Kelk of Rampton swam more than 20 times, "much to the disgust of my mother as I always came out of the river with green slime all round my mouth". Eventually the races were stopped due to river pollution. [PICTURE OF LADIES RACE 1962 SCANNED ON DISK]

It seems hard to think of the Backs as being polluted, though until the 1890s the colleges used to discharge all their sewage into the river. If one area has remained unchanged over the centuries it is surely the stretch from Queens' SUBS NB "S" college to St John's? Not so. Just 25 years ago the area along Queen's NB "S" Road was a disaster area, the famous trees struck down by Dutch elm disease. Chainsaws were ripping through branches and trunks and the area resembled a battlefield. Throughout the county 25 elm trees a day were being lost, the situation being worsened by hot dry weather. Replanting took place and now the Backs are tree-lined once more. But were you involved in the fight for the elms, or did you plant a replacement tree? Your memories please. [PIX OF DEVASTATION ON BACKS]

Rosemary Fisher e-mails from Ellicott City, USA to say she's sure one of the people featured in a picture of a Co-op Party (Memories July 14th) was her mother. But she cannot think what her mum would be doing at a Co-op staff party & asks if I have any names of the people, but as yet they are all a mystery. Rosemary goes on: "Even though I have lived in Maryland USA for over 30 years the Internet is what keeps me current on what is going on in town. I really enjoy reading the Cambridge News websight. Keep up the good work of jogging our memories!"

Mrs Paddy James from Bottisham is concerned about changes to bus timetables and routes which have removed traditional transport links between villages and smaller towns. Have you any memories of how and why certain bus routes were established – I recall something about how a driver was courting a girl in a certain village and used his bus to get there – so the boss said he might as well take passengers while he was about it. Details please.

One bus mystery has been solved. Thanks to the News' photo archives I have now tracked down just that it was 19th December 1962 when a Premier Travel Coach skidded on a bend near the Royal Oak (now Lazy Otter) at Stretham Ferry and crashed into the home of Mr C.H. Brown. Nobody was hurt but, he said, "The cottage is in a terrible mess and the annoying part is that I had just finished decorating the room last night". [SCAN OF BUS CRASH ON DISK]

Ted Tyndall recalls a more advanced system of transportation. He was employed as mechanical systems engineer on the Tracked Hovercraft project from April 1970 to its demise in February 1973 and then carried on working at the test track at Earith till June 1974. One of his last duties was assisting to load the vehicle on the last remaining track beam ready for transport to Cranfield. But, he tells me, the story does not end there. During 1994 he was contacted by "Railworld" at Peterborough who wanted the Hovertrain for display there, where it can still be seen [PIX OF HOVER-TRAIN]

John Wallage of Trumpington writes to tell me that the old gentleman watching re-thatching at Trumpington, featured in Memories of 7th July, was his late father, Frederick Charles Wallage. He worked on farms in Grantchester and Trumpington for 40 years for Sir Francis Pemberton and in his latter life was responsible for the upkeep of Trumpington parish churchyard.

Memories 16th August 2000 by Mike Petty

The first time Shirley Hoffman saw Stretham it was through a veil of tears. She didn't want to be there, she wanted to be at home in London with her mum and dad. He hadn't wanted her to come, but her mum and her gran had lied. They said she was five, she was only four, she was really too young to be evacuated.

They'd also lied to her. They said she would only be away for a day, but it was going to be years before she went back home to live.

It had been a long train journey with her schoolmates from the Robert Montefiore school & their teachers Miss Cicely Barnett and Miss Frances Levi. Now she was standing in a field miles from home and staring at a pair of boots. Unbeknown to her at the time they belonged to Jack Reeve. He had been sent to pick the evacuee they were to have at the old Crown inn, by then de-licensed and the home of sisters Cis and Ethel Reeve.

When Shirley arrived at her new home the first words she heard were: "I thought we wanted a boy". But she was a girl, a girl on her own. Being just the one she was easier to farm out.

Inside there was the old tap room and big room and 'this room where I used to dry dishes' and then front room & a cellar down a few steps. The ceiling was falling down in one room. There was no electricity, just gas lamps.

She was given a bed at the front of the house. Out of the window she could look across to a field and see sheep. "I saw the sheep in the fields and was a little won over", she recalls. "Next day was Sunday and I said 'I want to go home today' and they said 'trains don't run on Sundays'".

But like many of her fellow young Jewish evacuees Shirley was made to feel welcome; "they adopted me, treated me as if I belonged to them". They took her to the Post Office shopping with them, she fetched the milk from a dairy at a little farm just around the corner, played ball in the yard where there were fruit trees – truly a world away from her East London home. And she was close to her new schoolroom, in the Methodist chapel, the village school being too small for both local and evacuated children.

The Methodist chapel was used for their Jewish services on Saturday, but on Sunday Shirley went to the Baptist Chapel. "I went to the Baptists because Ethel took me – that was her church – every Sunday. Ethel always had a grey coat on when we went to church & gave me a piece of candy for the sermon.

"They always made food for when we came home from chapel – every week cooked a big dinner, Ethel came out and stood in front of the chapel and only Ethel & I knew the importance of that chapel, no-one else cared"

Sometimes her parents visited: "I used to cry – I thought they were going to take me back, I didn't want to go – I tried to hide it but I was crying and Cis came into other room and said 'she's crying'. I was crying into my porridge and it was getting bigger and bigger" Once she did go back; "I went home one weekend and had to sit under the table because of the bombing, it was scary; but I was safe in Stretham"

When the time finally came for her to go home "I remember thinking my heart would stay in Stretham; I was crying – crying when I came and when I went home; I said goodbye to those people – they couldn't cry but they wanted to"

"My father hated them, me as a Jew going to live in Gentile family, they had influenced me. When I came back to London I went to a Temple, but my heart wasn't in it. It took me years to decide what I wanted; I drove past churches but couldn't have it as I was married to a Jew; I never taught the children anything as my heart never in it – he was right, they changed me"

Shirley went off to America to start a new life, but decided to return for a visit. Now Mrs Hersh she wandered the village streets and recognised the outside of the house that had once been her home. But there was nobody there. So she waited outside till the present owner returned and welcomed her inside. But it was virtually all unrecognisable, a new home created inside an old building, though there was still one room as she remembered it. Part of her pilgrimage had been realised.

But there was another goal. She had told her Minister back in California of the village chapel where she had worshipped. Would that still be there? Indeed it was. But the congregation that had once been so numerous had now largely dwindled away. Nevertheless there was to be a service and Shirley's presence would nearly double the numbers attending. At first she chose a seat at the front, then moved to the back, where she had always sat. And she cried. The other two ladies there had also attended the chapel during the war, they remembered that the Miss Reeves had welcomed a young girl and treated her as a daughter. They made her welcome and gave her tea after the service.

And then somebody dredged up an old newspaper cutting of the Baptist Sunday School class of 1941. Shirley was not amongst them but she recognised some who were. And there were snaps too of the home in Read's Street and even of a young fair-haired girl on a tricycle outside.

Now Shirley has gone away from the village once more, her memories of a small fenland community refreshed, with something more to tell her grandchildren.

Have you ever returned to a former home and been welcomed, or found it changed beyond recognition – your memories please

[SCAN OF STRETHAM BAPTIST SUNDAY SCHOOL CUTTING AUGUST 1941& THE HOUSE AS IT WAS, WITH CIS]

Cambridge's Bridge Street is one that has changed over the last 70 years. The West side was redeveloped in the 1930s when old properties were ripped down to be replaced by St John's college music school, and to widen the street by a few extra feet to cope with the increasing traffic flow.

By contrast the buildings on the corner of Round Church Street seem to be as they always were, fine examples of 16th-century architecture, now well preserved. But by the mid 1960s they were just a decayed shell & in 1967 there were plans to replace them with a supermarket. Although these were rejected, so too were recommendations from the City Planning Committee that the structure be preserved. "The sooner we get the bulldozers in, the better" said one councillor.

Various plans were put forward for the crumbling buildings to be pulled down for a shopping, parking and residential complex but these brought protests from the Cambridge Preservation Society. Finally they were declared of Historic Interest and not to be demolished. It was agreed that there could be redevelopment, but it must retain the historic frontage.

In August 1975 scaffolding went up around the surviving facades as behind mechanical diggers began excavating foundations for an office complex that would be built, almost unseen, at the back. Today it is hailed as one of the successes of modern architecture, and has won a Civic Trust award. Yet the pictures in the News files reveal just how run-down they had become and how nearly the city lost one of its architectural gems. [PIX FROM NEWS LIBRARY ENCLOSED]

Mrs E.G. Wilkin of Cambridge is trying to help a friend researching the Swynford family. It appears that Catherine Beaufort was the second wife of John of Gaunt. Her first husband was Hugh Swynford of Kettlethorpe, a knight in Gaunt's retinue. There is a tomb to a John Swynford in the cemetery in Spratton, Northants, but is there any connection. Its all a bit complicated & a very long way back, but its amazing what News readers can come up with. If you can help drop me a line and I'll pass it on.

Ron Griggs of Cambridge recalls how after an early Sunday morning's swim some of the lads used to swim up river holding their clothes above their heads. They landed at the Perse Girls' bathing place & proceeded towards Grantchester where they were treated to a hearty breakfast in the garden of the Red Lion by the President of the Granta Swimming Club, Mr Webb, a University professor. After breakfast they went in search of punts that had been abandoned by undergraduates the night before. These they returned to Scudamores where they were thanked for their trouble. As well as swimming the lads became expert punters.

Mike Dawson from Chesterton writes following a recent article about Fulbourn Hospital. His father was salaries officer there from just after the war until December 1978, during which time he met hundreds of people, many of whom remember his nick-name 'Sefton'. Mike has a photograph showing the children of members of staff of the Hospital that was taken at a Christmas party in December 1954. He's there in the middle of the picture, were you? [SCAN ON DISK]

Memories 23rd August 2000, by Mike Petty

I have been privileged to spend more than 30 years working with old newspapers. When I first started the Cambridge Central Library was at the back of the Guildhall, the building now used for the Tourist Information Centre. In those days the library workroom had a balcony running around three sides. Underneath the upper walkway – where some said the first librarian, John Pink, used to patrol (he'd died in 1905) – were volume after volume of old files of the Cambridge Chronicle, Cambridge Independent Press & Cambridge Daily News, standing to attention in their leather bindings. In a small room just behind the Reference Library other volumes lay stacked one on top of the other on shelves that reached high to the ceiling. When readers wanted back files of the Cambridge Weekly News it involved extensive manipulation, lifting heavy volumes from above head height whilst precariously perched on the upper rungs of a rickety ladder.

All that changed 25 years ago with the opening of the new Lion Yard when all volumes could lay flat in much less cramped conditions, and at a much lower level. Now they are cocooned in humidity-controlled luxury, crumbling to dust somewhat more slowly than they did previously. Elsewhere researchers can peruse old files of the Cambridge press in the major research institutions such as the British Library Newspaper Depository in North London, or in the academic calm of the Cambridge University Library.

But newspapers continue to come out, day by day and week by week filling up shelves with amazing rapidity. These days most libraries rely on microfilm or increasingly CDs to preserve the stories that the papers cover. But the Cambridgeshire Collection continues to collect and bind the current issues. If they did not, who on earth would?

The answer amazingly is Keith Mann of Girton. For more than 30 years he has been reading his copies of the News each evening and like many other people he has been keeping stories that have interested him. His home is awash with files and folders showing how Cambridge has developed, and how it used to be. It is a wonderful record. But that is not the half of it.

For as well as taking cuttings Keith takes whole pages. He keeps them flat and he keeps them dark. And when he has accumulated enough he binds them into volumes, just like the professionals – but better!

True he does not take every page, but what he has amassed is the essential essence of the Cambridge Evening News – the local stories, the headlines and bylines since 1966. He can just open a large volume and be transported back to the pre-decimal days, the days before Lion Yard, before Elizabeth Way and when Bar Hill was just an infant.

Keith has lent me some of his cuttings volumes from which the following stories caught my eye, not all are dated. Perhaps you remember November 1967 when four babies were baptised in a builder's hut that was being used as worship while the church at Bar Hill was being constructed (perhaps you were one!)

“Bricklayers return to normal work” reads the headline over an undated story about a work-to-rule at the new Addenbrooke's Hospital. It is illustrated by a picture of Bill Clark talking to the bricklayers on the site – but when was it? When Burwell brickworks closed the News ran an article summarising its history and how a shrinking order book, old plant and the high cost of production had led to its demise. 50 men were to be made redundant – were you one? Once more there is no date but whenever it was you could buy a spacious three bedroomed semi-detached house at Sawston for £6,250, or at Bar Hill for £4,950. And perhaps you could help Mr R.B. of London who was seeking a 2/3 bedroomed house in Cambridge, close to the station. Finance was no problem – he had £9,000 to spend!

Did you queue to see the moon rocks at the Senate House in November 1969, or wait at the gates of Trinity College to see Prince Charles arrive in his mini-car to start his academic career in October 1967. If so you may be in Keith's private albums – but remember that the Cambridgeshire Collection has similar newspaper cuttings to these that you may browse through on request in Lion Yard.

PHOTOGRAPHIC TOOK PICTURES OF KEITH MANN AT HIS HOME WITH HIS BOUND FILES; IF THIS IS NOT BEING USED AS A NEWS STORY – OR IF THERE IS A VARIANT – PLEASE INCLUDE IT. OTHERWISE I ENCLOSE COPIES OF CUTTINGS THAT MIGHT BE USED AS A MONTAGE

Whenever we think back on the Cambridge of not-so-long-ago we will recall the shops that were and are no more. Macintosh's, Pigotts, Lauries, Joshua Taylor and – of course Eaden Lilley, except that they are still with us. But the closure of their prestigious store in Market Street in June 1999 brought to an end their first 250 years of trading. No longer would blazers, sweaters, trousers, wraps and ties be sold as they had in 1939; you would have to look elsewhere for the comfortable 3-piece suite upholstered in Moquette which would have cost you all of £21.10.0 once upon-a-time. Even Father Christmas would need to seek another retailer of the fairycycles (29/6 to 59/6), trotalong pets – horses, donkeys and dogs from 10/6 - and the dolls prams with their upholstered laced hood, apron and mudguards on which he could spend up to 63/-.

But shops are more than commodities, they are workplaces for hundreds of staff over the years. Now the memories of some of those staff have been included in a celebration of 250 years of retailing. People like Pauline Rutterford (nee Impey) who started straight from school in August 1954 and stayed to the bitter end, making her the longest serving staff member, recalls how life was very formal. When customers were around assistants were referred to by their surnames, they were not allowed to rush – all must be conducted at a proper pace.

Such memories bring the past to life, & although author Ian Ormes cannot rely on such accounts for the early period of the shop's establishment he still manages to describe how John Purchas pulled his short waistcoat over his rounded stomach, adjusted his white stockings, donned his dark blue frock coat, checked his fob watch outside The Globe, and stepped aside to allow a lady to pass – all based on the evidence of a single billhead of 1750!

The final chapters of both the book and the company describe the battle for survival from the 1980s of a family firm dominated by a major shareholder who would insist on reopening past discussions, ensuring any decisions took a great deal of debate. It records the background to the changes its customers will recall, the opening of 'The Greenhouse' restaurant and the attempts to redress the perception of a 'fuddy-duddy' store, the 'place for granny to buy her frocks'. It all led to the massive redevelopment of the 1990s, when the magnificent grand staircase was ripped out – and mourned by William Baker, one of the carpenters from Kerridge's who had installed it 60 years earlier. Betty Boothroyd heralded the redesigned store in 1993 as 'The re-birth of Eaden Lilley – a fresh new chapter in the history of this very famous business'. Sadly it was to be a short chapter as commercial pressures, and an offer the board could not refuse, led to the announcement to Pauline and her colleagues in March 1999 of its imminent closure. Many staff burst into tears and could not believe what was happening. It was, in the words of the Chairman 'a major tragedy for some and an unexpected and traumatic experience for everyone'.

However the store continues with branches at Saffron Walden and Douglas of Shelford, as well as its photography department in Green Street and a new food hall in Sussex Street, Cambridge. But the days of the great department store founded in 1750 are gone for good and Cambridge will not be the same without it.

Did you work for Eaden Lilley and have memories to share. Write to Mike Petty. 'Eaden Lilley: 250 years of retailing' by Ian Ormes is available from their shops at £13.50

[PICTURES OF EADEN LILLEYS FROM NEWS FILES]

Last week's picture of the Fulbourn Hospital staff party has brought memories for Mrs Puddick of Cambridge who saw herself, her sister and brother, and for Bob Raines who worked at the Hospital for 50 years, ending up a chief administrator. The picture shows his daughter who has just returned home to Canada – but can read about it on the News websight. Bob recalls how the Hospital used to be self-sufficient in most things with their own cows, pigs, poultry & vegetables; they even pumped their own water and disposed of their own sewage – but the gas came from the Cambridge University & Town Gas Light Company (at least in his early days).

Trevor Gill has added more details to my story of the coach crash at Stretham Ferry in December 1962. He writes: 'Charlie Brown and myself were working on the same building site at the time of the accident. We received a telephone call from head office explaining what had happened and asking me to get Charlie home. When we arrived the fire brigade was there. The coach had knocked out the ground floor window and the brickwork above & below it. The bedroom joists had dropped and were resting on the coach.

'The landlord of the Royal Oak was looking after Charlie's family. He had a great sense of humour; yes he did comment about the decorating, but also added how much drinking time he had lost doing it'

PICTURE OF BUS CRASHED INTO FRONT OF THE HOUSE SCANNED – THESE ARE DIFFERENT FROM THE ONE FIRST USED

All of this is nicely shown by another picture taken by the News at the time. Trevor goes on to say how much he enjoys the Memories articles as they bring back so many memories to him. But I can only write what people will share with me so please keep writing.

Kathleen Skin from the Arbury writes with her memories of the scout movement. "In 1933 scout troops were started in the villages of Whittlesford, Harston, Haslingfield & Sawston by Cambridge University graduates and undergraduates, aided by local headmasters & others. My brother joined the Haslingfield troop. The headmaster, Mr Eric Cole, was enthusiastic and they met in the school hall. At the same time in Harston a Guide company was formed and I left the 1st Orwell Guide Company to join the 1st Harston whose captain was Bunty Bisseker. Together the Harston scouts and guides put on a Ralph Reader Concert or two."

Memories 30th August 2000, by Mike Petty

A letter appeared in the News last week from former Cambridge councillor John Hughes, now in Victoria Australia

He had been browsing through Sara Payne's 'Down Your Street' volume on Central Cambridge and noted her comments on the Lion Yard: "You either love it or hate it".

John was at one time chairman of the Central Area Development Committee that oversaw the building of the new Lion Yard development. He makes the point that by the 1960s the Lion Hotel had already slipped into a state of dilapidation and the area behind it was mostly a slum, apart from a lovely old solicitors' office. He was convinced that the new design was superb and that future generations would think the centre worthy of Cambridge.

The old Petty Cury has featured often in these columns – and this is too good an excuse to miss, as the selection of pictures from the News files testifies.

But there was another point he makes. The Lion Yard rebuilding was “by far the best of any contemporary development in historical city centres”.

So what other changes had Cambridge seen since the war and what has happened to them?

The first post-war office development was the Prudential building on the corner of Emmanuel Street, thought at the time to be a rather dull building. Then redevelopment spread north along St Andrews Street with the demolition of Rance’s Folly, a Hollywood style mansion in St Andrew’s Street. It had been built in the 1850s by Henry Rance, one-time Mayor of Cambridge. His reputation for hospitality was lavish and he spent many thousand pounds a year entertaining his friends in his magnificent dining room – so grand that council meetings were held there in 1882. There was a superb ballroom and a magnificent collection of paintings. After Rance moved away it was used for a while by the Liberal Club until ripped down in May 1957. In 1960 Bradwell’s Court, Cambridge’s first new shopping arcade opened, providing a connection with Drummer Street bus station & completing the transformation of the street.

Other changes in the late 1950s saw the construction of Highsett on Hills Road – whose original design was described in 1956 as ‘the highest private residence block yet proposed in England’, and was rejected. In Station Road the opening of Great Eastern House was followed shortly afterwards with the construction of a new Kett House in place of the old works of Rattee & Kett near the corner with Hills Road.

There was controversy in the city centre when plans were announced for the demolition of the Central Hotel in Peas Hill in 1958, but despite objections the scheme went through. Across Market Hill Macintosh’s was demolished and a new ultra-modern block of shops and flats built in its place. Heffer’s bookshop relocated from Petty Cury to new premises in Trinity Street, formerly the site of Matthew’s grocers, part of a programme of wholesale redevelopment which kept the old frontages largely unchanged. Across the street the Queen Mother opened Trinity College Angel Court in 1960 and she was back again in 1961 for Queens’ college Erasmus building

It was the University & colleges that were leading the modern architectural trend. A brand new college, Churchill, started to emerge off Madingley Road & the University Centre was built on Granta Place. There was more modern architecture at Gonville & Caius’ Harvey Court and St John’s college Cripps Building, while King’s & St Catharine’s colleges combined to rebuild on King’s Lane. New blocks of faculty buildings were constructed in Sidgwick Avenue including the most controversial History Faculty Building which won awards for its architecture but soon revealed design faults, its glass structure being too hot in summer, too cold in winter. There was great debate on whether to demolish it completely and start again, but it was decided instead to initiate a programme of repairs instead. To the west of Corn Exchange Street the University was undertaking massive rebuilding on its New Museums Site.

But by now demolition was starting in earnest on the other side of Corn Exchange Street for the new shopping precinct and car park. The Masonic Hall disappeared in 1968, the Bun Shop on St Andrew’s Hill followed in 1975 & shortly afterwards and the new Lion Yard was a reality.

“We did have doubts about the multi-deck car park” confessed John Hughes, but this is now scheduled for redevelopment once more as another massive shopping scheme gathers pace. This is in addition to all the new work in the ‘old’ Lion Yard, just 25 years after the ‘superb’ design was completed. When next John returns to Cambridge will he, I wonder, recognise what is left of the vision he helped to shape?

**

Anne Anderson from Surrey has been told that her father's photograph appeared recently in some publication about the history of Cambridge. In fact the picture of Mayor Horace Ives on the Guildhall balcony with Petty Cury & its line of parked cars beyond appears in my 'Memory Lane, Cambridge'. He was shown entertaining a party of athletes from Heidelberg in June 1965 – perhaps it is not inappropriate to remember that Lion Yard redevelopment was described in 1959 as 'the biggest redevelopment scheme yet in England is we omit the blitzed cities'.

**

My appeal on behalf of Mrs Wilkins for information on the Swynford family & Catherine Beaufort has brought a significant response. Suzanne Langford from West Wrating is amongst readers who recommend a book entitled 'Katherine' by Anya Seaton published in 1954 which is based at Kettlethorpe in Lincolnshire whilst Ron Shaw of Waterbeach has sent great details selected from his notes on his own family tree. I will forward them to Mrs Wilkins and also to Mr C. Barker of Saffron Walden who is also interested in Catherine Beaufort.

Ted Austin from Over reappears in my letterbox with his memories of the earlier days of scouting. In the 1920s he was a member of the Perse School 5th Cambridge troop under scoutmaster Gavin M. Macfarland-Grieve, universally known as 'Mac'.

"Once a term we had a field day at some suitable wooded site. The highlight was always the fire-lighting competition. Scouts worked in pairs and had 30 minutes to collect brushwood. I always worked with my pal 'M.O.' Gardner & we invariably won this competition since as good scouts we were always 'well-prepared!' Hidden in my shirt was a miniature whiskey bottle of paraffin & 'M.O.' had Swan vestas in his. We were nearly caught one day however as it rained cats and dogs just before the exercise and everything was soaking wet. When the weather cleared our fire was blazing away – everyone else's was non-existent or a wisp of smoke! 'Mac' looked very suspiciously at our fire – 'M.O.' like lightning said 'We were very fortunate Sir to find a completely dry wooden box under an old sheet of zinc!'

Ted has a host of other scouting memories of the annual camp at West Runton where the girl guides were based just two fields away – 'a dare after lights out'. He also recalls how the toilets consisted of a smooth telegraph pole fixed about two feet off the ground on which you balanced over a trench dug in the grass. Ted also remembers how on train journeys they would unwind the toilet rolls out of the windows and the train became festooned with paper. Presumably, being prepared, this would have been on the way home!

Memories 6th September 2000, by Mike Petty

Throughout the county Millennium projects are drawing to a conclusion and the results are being displayed. So it was at Madingley the other weekend when the village hall was packed with residents and visitors for an exhibition looking back at life in that community.

On the opening evening old residents mingled with new to view photographs and maps, videos and artefacts and read snatches of the many pages of reminiscences compiled as part of the Madingley 2000 project. This will see the production of village maps showing the change over the last 100 years and the compilation of a parish archive to be copied onto CD.

While across the road the village pub echoed to the music of a smart jazz band and the dining room wine glasses glinted on the tables, in the hall talk turned to the times when life in Madingley was not all good living and fine china.

Frances Ison was born in the village just after the Great War; her memories are of a community very different from the one in which she still lives. .

“When I was a little girl, before the Autumn mists rose, the farm horses clopped and clattered past with their horse-keepers and lads, who had risen at 4 am to get ready for the day’s work. The carts creaked and the voices echoed – there were not many cars then in the early 1930s. So it had been when my great-grandfather, Barnett Barlow was a horsekeeper and farmhand. Then the golden fields fell to scythes and not reapers and the women followed to ‘tie up’. The scythemen in a long, diagonal row, swept across the fields, each man slightly behind and to the right of his neighbour ahead in the line. Grandfather used to say the farmer always chose the fastest scytheman to lead the line, hoping he would ‘drive’ his followers to work more quickly.

I watched Grandfather many a time; short step, swing of scythe, short step, a lovely smooth, forward rhythm, which soon covered a stretch of grass or corn – but to imagine doing that all day, almost from dawn to dusk – it must have been a Herculean task.

The women twisted bands of corn straw to tie up the sheaves of grain, working behind their men. The children helped too, standing the sheaves in ‘shocks’ – the local name for them, just as ‘gotch’ was the name for the jug the beer was in. Then came carting with the trolley-cart and stacking in the back garden until the ‘threshing tackle’ came round to the nearest farm, where Grandfather could get it threshed. Later by trolley drawn by ‘Tommy’ he would take his little harvest of sacked corn to French’s Mill where apart from wheat kept back for poultry feeding, it was ground into flour

When the sacks of flour were brought home, they were stacked in the corner of my Grandmother’s big kitchen to keep them dry and mouse and rat free.

My friend and I used to spend almost every weekday leading the carthorse in the harvest field. When the binder was actually cutting the corn we would stand round the edge of the cut area, chasing the rabbits that ran out as the corn was cut, holding sticks as long as we were tall.

But the best part was always leading with a short rope the big ‘shire’ horse from shock to shock while the farm men loaded sheaves on the cart. There used to be a steady procession of carts back and forth to the rickyard. Once we had steered horse and cart safely between two gateposts we were deemed to have passed our ‘leading’ test and we were allowed on the short stretch of road between farm and field. With a full load we walked, unless a farmhand was ‘leading’, in which event we were heaved unceremoniously onto the top of the corn load – an enormous height to us.

Going back to the field empty, we sat on the front of the cart, with the long reins in full control of cart and horse, a most important position! But there were problems. A cart that has been loaded with barley or ‘Rivet’ wheat – the latter seldom heard of now – is usually somewhat prickly to sit in; my socks used to be full of small, sharp ‘ails’ – and jeans still hadn’t come in so there were many other, more painful discomforts.”

Now, Frances muses, it has all changed and one who knows all about that, from the farming side, is Alan Clarke who with John Wiseman had contributed material to the display’s farming tent. Wartime regulations about what to do with livestock casualties caused by bombing, and application forms for the purchase of rubber boots - which had to be endorsed by the repair agent confirming the old ones were beyond repair – painted a graphic picture of farming difficulties in the 1940s.

Post-war Alan Clarke recalls how the old-fashioned harvest practices were replaced with more modern machinery. He first purchased a second hand Grain Marshall combine which was very heavy and slow before in 1956 buying his first self-propelled Massey Harris 780 Special combine in 1956. Before this the sheaves had to be stacked, the stacks had to be thatched to keep out the weather until they had time to thresh the corn. This was a very labour intensive operation, entailing up to a dozen men and neighbouring farmers used to help each other. Such stacks used to be commonplace throughout the area, now like the horse-drawn carts they have disappeared, but live on in the News picture files.

The men who worked the land have also largely gone – Alan comments: ‘it has been an eye opener for me to observe that many of the old farm cottages are now inhabited by professional people with families’. But they are the villagers now and projects such as that at Madingley gives them the opportunity to discover something of the people who formerly lived in their cottages when the front garden was devoted to vegetables, not lawn.

If you would like further information on the Madingley 2000 project then contact Sue Baldwin at The Old Wood Mill, Church Lane, Madingley CB3 8AF.

[PICTURES FROM NEWS LIBRARY]

**

Villages did not grow up where they are without a reason. One of the essentials for life is a supply of water and early maps reveal a myriad of rivers and streams meandering here and there throughout the landscape. But as the centuries progress so progress changes the landscape. Ditches are straightened and improved, rivers are recut to supply watermills and more and more houses are built. More houses need more water. Boreholes are constructed to draw water from underground sources, these in turn dry up rivers.

Wilbraham River is one of a number of streams rising from the low chalk hills to the east of Cambridge. It has two sources: springs in the grounds of Wilbraham Temple and those that original below Shardelows Well in Fulbourn. Within living memory it was a significant feature of the landscape but within the last 25 years its flow has become intermittent and it no longer provides the conditions necessary to sustain aquatic life. As the river dries so its banks crack, when the flow returns the water leaks away.

While many villages have a Preservation Society, so has the Wilbraham River. Its co-ordinator is Dr Desmond Hawkins of Greyfriars, Church Green Little Wilbraham CB1 5LE. Dr Hawkins has researched the story of his river and published a detailed assessment entitled ‘The drainage of Wilbraham, Fulbourn and Teversham fens’, a wonderful insight into the mysterious land of ditches and reed beds that will form a model for other conservation groups concerned about their natural environment. Copies cost £6.80 including postage from Dr Hawkins. [SCAN OF THE RIVER ABOUT 1930, EVEN THEN FLOW WAS MUCH REDUCED.]

**

My story of Shirley Hersh, the evacuee who returned to Stretham in search of her wartime memories has brought a response from Jane Freeman of Cambridge. She also used to visit Cis & Ethel Reeve in their former pub when it still had oil lamps – but then they never did get around to putting in electricity! Mrs P. Darling from Papworth Everard was most surprised to read the story for she is related to the Reeves and has a number of family photographs, including one of Shirley herself with the two ladies.

**

Bob Raines of Cambridge has lent me a picture of a Married versus Single cricket match played at Fulbourn Hospital in 1929. He can name every player in the teams, which included both staff and patients. They include W. Dewey (carpenter), E. Hancock (plumber), Jack Wheatley now aged 92 and living in Linton & Bob himself. I have the complete list if you think you recognise someone. [SCANNED – IS THIS TOO OLD?]

Memories 13th September 2000 by Mike Petty

Throughout the county at present it appears that coping with cars is making the headlines once more.

In Ely the council has implemented restrictions on shoppers cars in order to enhance the shopping experience, with traffic banned in the High Street on the Thursday and Saturday market days. A glance back into the News photo files reveals just how congested the street used to be back in the 1960s when cars and shoppers mixed. But look at the names above the mixture of shops – how many of them are still there, and which do you remember.

In those days Ely Market Square was full of vehicles each day, apart from the Thursday market day when stalls took over. Except of course for the period when the market stalls were banished by the arrival of the fair, and then took up residence in High Street, replacing cars for a while. Now neither cars nor fairground rides disturb the refurbished market place and the stalls have it to themselves. Nearby what used to be the Cattle Market has now become the new Cloisters development, with larger shops and its own car park.

In St Ives too consideration is being given to banning traffic in Bridge Street and to the erection of models of sheep as a reminder of that town's past, though some may wish to forget the bustle, noise and smell that used to characterise a market town.

Newmarket's streets echo to the sound not of sheep but hooves, but this can be drowned out by the roar of motor engines. Except on occasions such as that in July 1950 when an accident on Bury Road brought traffic to a standstill. High Street was lined for its entire length with stationery vehicles on one of the busiest days of the year after an army convoy was brought to a stop just past the war memorial when a string of racehorses crossing the road caused the leading driver to pull up. The rear lorry was hit by a following taxi and this in turn was struck by a third vehicle.

Then twenty-five years ago all that changed and the town relapsed into a stunned bemused silence. Weekend shoppers faltered in midstride, uncertain, while the significance of the insistent silence gradually dawned. Pedestrians hovered at Pelican crossings, unwilling to break the habits of a lifetime, despite the fact that their way lay clear for as far as they could see in either direction.

It was as if no one could believe the impossible had finally happened - the £9.5 million 15-mile Newmarket bypass had been officially and unceremoniously opened by the last of the Wimpey men who had been working on it for two years. The long-awaited bypass immediately took 75% of the traffic out of the town. But would it take the prosperity too.

The manager of Laings sad the bypass would help shopkeepers as people wouldn't be so scared to come out and shop on both sides of the road. It would, he thought also encourage holiday traffic to stop and shop – the people who could now drive past would choose to come in to shop – because there was less traffic, it would be easier to park.

When Cambridge started seriously to cope with its parking problems in the early 1960s it was the parking meter that would be its salvation. In 1963 it was announced that charges would be 1s (5p) for one hour in the inner zone or two hours further out. They would make a profit of £10,000 a year and pay for themselves within three. Their arrival the next year emptied the streets as motorists queued for car parks, which were soon full. Conditions became frightful as shoppers drove round and round looking for somewhere to stop. Some traders in the centre said their takings dipped by 78%. Yellow lines followed, meter charges were doubled, parking was banned on Market Hill as the new Lion Yard car park opened. In December 1969 it was gridlock and police invoked emergency powers to deal with the chaos.

But if people could not park in the Cambridge city centre, there was always Fitzroy Street and Burleigh Street where parking was easy – until restrictions were imposed there too. So people chose to shop elsewhere, where parking was easy – like Ely.

[PICTURES SCANNED OF ELY & SELECTION FROM NEWS FILES]

Dr Eddie Whittley writes from Cleethorpes with an account of childhood memories recently brought vividly to life. “During the war I lived as a small boy in Ditton Lane, Cambridge. At that time Marshall’s Aerodrome was used by the RAF to train the pilots desperately needed for the Battle of Britain. The pilots were trained in Tiger Moths, or as we called them Marshcallschmitts, and their flight path took them directly over Ditton Lane.

As they passed over the pilots were often required to practice ‘Engine failure on take off. I and my school pals John Mayle and Geoffrey Kitchen, thought that the engines had really failed and used to dash into the back gardens to see the planes come down in the fields between Ditton Lane and Ditton Fields. They never did of course.

Although since that time I had some flying experience in Cessnas it has remained my life long ambition to have a trip in a Tiger Moth emulating my wartime heroes. Unfortunately I have recently been diagnosed as having cancer and so it seemed that my wish would not be granted. However during a brief holiday I recently spent with my sister at Cherry Hinton I noticed the Tiger Moths flying over and mention my ambition to my nephew Bryan Cantle who himself learned to fly at Cambridge Airport.

The Cambridge Flying Group based at the airport, which still trains pilots in Tiger Moths, is naturally booked up well in advance but when informed of my situation they kindly agreed to help. They kept the flying school open two hours after normal closing time and arranged for a pilot to come in specially to give me a pleasure trip. It was a warm summer’s day, just like those of the 1940’s so you can imagine how delighted I was not only for the flight but for the kind and friendly way the staff treated me. It was lovely to find that in this materialistic world there are still some people who go out of their way to be really helpful to an elderly person. [PICTURE SCANNED OF DR WHITTLEY WITH THE TIGER MOTH]

Do you have memories of flying in a small plane from a local airstrip – write to Mike Petty

**

Ian Hinton of the Whittlesford and Duxford Scout Group. has e-mailed some notes following a recent “Memories” piece on the early days of scouting.

“In Whittlesford we have a photo of the Victory celebrations after the first world war showing scouts in the crowd. Later details are hazy but Whittlesford Sea Scout Troop was very active in the years before World War II. Led by Geoffrey Cockell of The Lodge (now known as The Manor) and supported by his uncle Mr Richards, the District Commissioner, they met in the coach house.

In 1937 the Scouts sailed across to Holland at the time of the World Scout Jamboree and even took Baden Powell for a trip in the boat. The Cubs were also very keen: Mrs Cockell with Edna Merry (now Wight), Joan Sergeant (now Scotcher), and Phyllis Smith were the leaders.

Mr Sherwood was Vicar during these years and he did a lot to help the Scouts. Mr Proctor was Tutor of the Whittlesford Theological College, and it was he who asked Norman Touborg, Wally Awkit, Bill Matthews and Mr Mason in 1938 to form a Rover Crew which met in a hut in the garden of the Mason's house "Hawthorns". Arthur Sanderson and Norman Touborg were now helping Mr Cockell to run the Sea Scouts. A photograph shows some of the boys on RRS Discovery for a weekend in London. Other activities included canoeing on the Cam, kayak building, sailing on the Broad, Whitsun camps at Hinxtun Hall (where the "Battle for the Island" was a feature of the last day) and helping with the harvest while all the men were away at the War. They also had joint activities with the Guides led in those days by Mrs Rita Arbon.

The fortunes of the Troop fluctuated during the War. The Cockells moved away, Arthur Sanderson joined the Navy with the Russian Convoys. George Rookes and others were in the Fire Service. The boys now included John and Neville Pedley, Charlie Herbert and some of the boys evacuated to Whittlesford from the London bombing.

Norman Touborg started Air-Scouts who met in the loft of a barn behind his nursery garden at 22 Duxford Rd up until 1954, and Geoffrey Lloyd and Neville Pedley revived the Scouts again in a hut they built on the old recreation ground at the end of Vicarage lane."

93-year-old Hubert Wilkins from Gt Shelford was a member of the 17th Cambridge Catholic Scout Troop before the First World War. He joined the troop when 11 years old and recalls how in about 1921 they ambushed General Baden Powell, as he visited Cambridge, springing out of undergrowth chanting an African war cry. "After that I was dressed up as a witch, thrown into the river by the Mathematical Bridge to demonstrate life-saving. I remember rather overdoing the act, shooting down to the bed of the river and swallowing rather more river water than intended. After reaching the surface again my rescuer, a fellow scout and an expert swimmer, pretended to disable me with his knee, turned me over and pulled me to the bank, although I must admit to giving him certain assistance in the process". As Mr Wilkins says his memory of events so long ago is remarkably clear.

Patrick Mills from Cambridge also has memories of the 5th Cambridge Scouts, though much later than those of Ted Austin I featured the other week. He recalls: "Mr Macfarlane-Grieve was very active in many fields. He had purchased a field at West Runton as a permanent campsite and it had a big hut, and even an outdoor oven for Sunday roasts. I went to the first camp that was possible when some wartime mines were cleared on the beach, and the hedge had to be cut back six or seven feet where it had grown unchecked during the war".

Patrick also has clear memories of Rance's Folly and the other shops along St Andrew's Street which were demolished, including a toy shops and a ladies; dress shop called Anne's. Helen O'Donovan from Comberton has also written that the article interested her very much. "I grew up in Duxford before and during the war and remember the 'new' Drummer Street being built with its central island shelter. Since 1949 I have lived in or near Cambridge so your photographs revived many memories". Thank you Helen – here's another view from the News files – can anybody recognise the people waiting in the shelter?

Memories 20th September 2000, by Mike Petty

During the 1920s Cambridge undergraduates indulged in some very odd activities, elaborate stunts, hoaxes & escapades; they played marbles on the steps of the Senate House, organized football matches with teams of 'Victorian' gents, & started touring the town in various guises to raise funds for the Poppy Day funds.

On 7th June 1927 one daring young man dressed up in running shorts to attempt a feat that was later to achieve world-wide fame for somebody else. He ran around the Great Court of Trinity College at noon, while the clock struck 24, (it chimes twice, once for Trinity and once for its neighbour St Johns). He beat the clock by a stroke and a half, recording a time of 42½ seconds. The young man was Lord Burghley, later Marquess of Exeter. It was by all accounts not the first time this had happened and was hardly a world-shattering event, just one of those quirky things that happens in Cambridge from time to time.

It only achieved great prominence when filmmakers decided to include their version of the event, substituting another runner, the Olympic athlete Harold Abrahams, and filming at Eton, not Cambridge. Their phenomenally successful picture was entitled “Chariots of Fire”. It should perhaps have been called “The Caucus Race”

In August 1967 Trinity Great Court was the venue for a similar race – though the rules were slightly different. For a start the clock would only be striking four times – yes the race was at 2pm. Fifteen competitors were dressed appropriately for the race, two were not – for they were girls and while the men wore gowns, they chose not to, claiming to be citizens of the King of the Swedes and thus exempt. When the chimes started so did the race and each competitor set off to weave around the 18 rectangles formed out of the courts six grassed areas – apart from the women who, holding their skirts in a most ladylike manner, competed only half the course. In case there should be any misunderstanding of the rules the whole thing was supervised by the college’s Master, Lord Butler, perched in cap and gown on the Trinity college fountain.

It was billed as the 397th annual running of the Caucus race, first described in “Alice in Wonderland” as a means of getting Alice dry after she had been swimming in a pool of her own tears - which may give some excuse for the bizarre rules and confusion. But it seems to have been run for the first time earlier that decade – the News was there to report it in August 1964. [PIX OF THE 1967 RACE ENCLOSED WITH CUTTING TO GIVE CAPTIONS – IF ITS NOT USED I WILL RUN IT NEXT WEEK AS A FOLLOW-UP]

Then in 1988 two of the country’s most famous runners, Steve Cram and Seb Coe staged a re-run of the fictitious ‘Chariots of Fire’ race in a bid to raise funds for Great Ormond Street Children’s Hospital. It attracted world-wide attention and was supervised by Norris McWhirter, the keeper of fascinating records. But despite all the benefits of digital timing and freeze-frame reruns nobody is really sure whether Coe actually achieved the feat before the final chime had died away. The real result was that the Hospital and Cambridge Children’s Hospice shared some £50,000 in donations [PIX ENCLOSED & SCANNED]

One further mystery remains – what was a ‘Chariot of Fire’?

It was a Cambridge hansom cab, commandeered by undergraduates as part of their bonfire night celebrations in 1920 and 1921. The vehicle was then set on fire – and then sent careering round and round Market Hill, being pulled of course by a most frightened horse!

The cabman was handsomely compensated for the loss of his vehicle – in fact some say that they jostled to get their most decrepit conveyance taken off their hands – but I’m not aware anybody asked the horse’s opinion! [PIC – CABS AT CAMBRIDGE RAILWAY STATION SCANNED]

**

Memories 26th September 2000 by Mike Petty

Can you help solve a Catherine Cookson mystery?

When Mrs Elaine Barron from Cambridge found time to sit down to read the Catherine Cookson story she’d picked up in a Charity Shop she found she had more of a bargain than she realised. For tucked amongst the pages of ‘The Parson’s Daughter’ were four old photographs. Now the search is on to find out something – anything - about them, and possibly even who they belonged to.

One was taken by the Cambridge Daily News and its negative reference seems to indicate it would have been taken about 1953. It shows a procession of children dressed up in Elizabethan costume with two heralds escorting what may be a Queen. Pencilled on the back is the cryptic message 'Anne, Queen Elizabeth. Aged 11'.

Now I know the real Queen Elizabeth I visited Cambridge in August 1564. Students had been recalled early from vacation, so they could line the streets as she passed, and various colleges made arrangements to cope with her extensive retinue. The Queen herself stayed at King's college and took the opportunity to visit the college chapel to attend services and watch a play. She enjoyed her visit and decided to extend the stay by a day and 'if provision of beer and ale could have been made' would have stayed longer still. Before she left she toured the various colleges – apart from Jesus which was too far out of the way - before addressing the University in Latin. After many of the courtiers had received honorary degrees she set off again on the next stage of her journey en route to Longstanton where she was to dine with the Bishop of Ely and then on to Hinchbrook House to stay with members of the Cromwell family.

Sadly the News was not there to record the scene, so the event in Mrs Barron's photograph was obviously a reconstruction. Do you know when, and by whom?

Two other of the photographs were taken by Edward C. Weller of Marshall Road, Cambridge. One shows a children's tea party inside what might be a Nissen Hut. The Union Flag and the Stars and Stripes are displayed at the end of the room, one lad has his face painted red white & blue. Halfway along the hall on the right-hand side there is a notice, but it is not readable. Could it be a Coronation party, or end-of war celebration; were you there or do you recognise the venue?

Mr Weller also photographed, probably at the same time, another group of children. These are dressed up in fancy dress. There is a pirate, a cowboy, a nurse, a witch and a fairy, together with a lad dressed in academic costume, a gypsy dancer and – the best clue a lady appropriately attired with a bicycle labelled 'G. Holt, Chimney Sweep'. One clue as to the event is that one girl is wearing a sash labelled 'Peace'.

The fourth picture is another group of children, this time lined up in the street. They range from tiny tots to quite mature young ladies. They are posed beside two shops whose names above the door seem to read 'D. Whithouse' and '208 Hosiery B. Be...' – the rest is off the picture. Could it be taken in Cherry Hinton road where Miss B. Bennett still had a draper's shop at no.208 in 1974?

Presumably there is some common theme, perhaps one person who features in each picture. Is it you? Your help please

**

More photographs have come in courtesy of Martin Howlett who has lent an autographed album produced by Cambridge City Football Club for their 1965-66 season. It contains photographs taken by Mr L.E. Fernandez of each member of the squad, including manager Tony Marchi and captain Brendan McNally. There's Scottish International Jackie McGugan, ex-Arsenal player Gerry Ward and top goalscorer Eddie Bailham who had hit 42 goals the previous season. There also snaps of trainer Tommy Dawson and groundsman Claude Archer, then in his 14th year with the club. How many others can you recognise from the squad picture? [PIX SCANNED ON DISK]

**

The mystery lady in the bus shelter featured a recent Memories has been identified. She was Mrs Agnes 'Aggie' Banyard who lived for years in the gatehouse of Fulbourn Hospital where her husband was head gardener.

**

Mrs M. Merry (nee Ayres) from Teversham has written with her memories of working at Eaden Lilley: "I was employed there in 1937 as a cashier for the sum of 10/- (50p) a week. I started work in the Millinery Cash Desk (this being the less busy one) and eventually finished up in haberdashery (one of the busiest, especially at sale time). At Christmas time I was in the desk in the toy department on the top floor which dealt with the Father Christmas ride and the money for the toys. I worked from 8.45 am to 6pm (7pm on Saturday), with half-day on Thursday.

The promotion from the cash desks was into an office where I worked with a Mr Gadsby until I left in 1939 to go to Freeman Hardy & Willis (opposite) for a rise of 5/- - a lot in those days. I enjoyed working there and when the war started all the shop staff had to do fire watching – the centre for that was Eaden Lilley. I was on duty the night a bomb fell at the top of Jesus Lane. Marks can still be seen in the college walls opposite the Lane"

**

Some headlines just seem to come around and around. Take this story: "Cambridge is desperately short of rented accommodation and as students join those already searching in vain for somewhere to live, the situation is likely to deteriorate. Already landlords advertising property to let are embarrassed and often upset by the number of applicants who plead for a room. One ran an advertisement in this paper earlier this week and in three days received around 100 applications for the flat. Another advertised a flat to let and in three days received 60 replies".

So desperate was the housing crisis that people were taking out small-ads to plead for homes. Their messages are poignant: 'Extremely depressed bachelor looks for flat ...' 'Getting Desperate. Council employee seeks house / flat for two or more people ...' Professional couples were willing to pay three or even six months rent in advance while a Haverhill couple, with a child, were willing to pay up to £75 for a 2-bedroomed flat. But there were numerous empty properties as later surveys in 1977 and 1979 showed, largely in the Kite area when planning indecision over proposed redevelopment led to people being unwilling to invest in property that might be demolished. Squatters moved in.

Only the rents being asked shows that the story is not one from a recent paper. In fact it was published on 1st October 1975 – 25 years ago.

**

Memories 4th October 2000, by Mike Petty

"In the evening of Thursday the 2nd of July, the lofty wooden bridge over the Cam ... frequently called the Mathematical Bridge broke down. It had been in a decayed state for a considerable time, and boards had been put up several days previous to its falling in, to prevent persons going over. The bridge was erected in the year 1768, from a design by the late Mr James Essex, an eminent architect"

In these words the Cambridge Chronicle of 12th July 1810 records one incident in the story of the bridge at Garret Hostel Lane. The same issue contains a notice of proposals for a cast-iron bridge proposed near Queens' College in place of the 'New bridge'. It would be adjacent to the other Essex bridge, the wooden structure he had erected to designs by Etheridge some 20 years previously. This was later rebuilt in 1902 and is itself now known as the "Mathematical Bridge"

The collapse of Garret Hostel caused a problem for travellers, for whereas the college bridges are principally for college people, Garret Hostel was for everybody. The lane had been given to the town by King Henry VI so that its citizens might have access to the river – for he had closed many of the other lanes that used to lead to the riverside wharves when he commandeered the land needed for his new King's college.

Time after time the bridge needed repair and the bills were shared jointly between Trinity Hall and the town of Cambridge. Finally the college had contributed their half of the expense of building Essex's 'Mathematical Bridge' on the understanding that they would be free from all future claims. So the town paid for it to be patched up. It was soon in trouble again – a wooden bridge just did not have the permanence required.

In 1835 tenders were sought for a cast-iron bridge. The contract was awarded to the Butterley Iron Company and the work undertaken by Finch's iron foundry, a local company famous for such work. The result was a fine bridge in the Gothic style which featured on as many postcard views as some of its older college neighbours. Despite their earlier agreement Trinity Hall contributed over a quarter of the cost of £960 19s 6d with other colleges joining in.

But by 1959 the bridge was in the news again, settlement having caused the cast iron to fracture, making repairs essential but uneconomic. This time it was not the college but one of its students who picked up the bill. The Trusted Family had been associated with Trinity Hall for 50 years and Sir Harry Trusted, Q.C., decided that a tangible way of recognising the link would be to build the new bridge.

His intention was a bridge that would be an honest example of twentieth century craftsmanship, aiming to please present and future generations. The result was unveiled in October 1960. It won praise for its design, but not from cyclists – some felt the gradient was so steep that only the fittest could bike over it, another that it was an ideal training ground for mountaineers. 40 years on it still taxes the muscles of all who cross it.

SCANS OF VIEWS OF THE ORIGINAL MATHEMATICAL BRIDGE AT GARRET HOSTEL LANE AND ITS 1835 REPLACEMENT; PIX FROM FILE OF PRESENT BRIDGE

**

Mrs J.A. Rowell of Sutton writes with her memories of flying in a small plane.

"Over 70 years ago, about 1929 or 1930 a man named Sir Alan Cobham did a display at Ely; they did flying stunts and anyone could have a flight. It cost 5/- (25p) so 'I went up'

"I don't think there was an air strip in Ely and as far as I can remember it was a football or playing field they flew from. I can remember there was an awful lot of people there, because we had to queue up to get a ride

"I'll never forget it. We flew over the Water Tower, the Cathedral, the railway station, then followed the River Ouse and over the sugar beet factory. I can't remember if there were windows along the side that we looked through, or if we just looked down over the sides. The plane held about 12 or 14 passengers; we were seated along the sides of the plane and there was a passage down the centre.

"I was about 15 or 16 at the time, it was a wonderful experience – in fact I'd quite like to do it again!"

Mrs Rowell mentions the Ely Sugar Beet Factory, which was opened just 75 years ago. It provided farmers with an opportunity to grow a new crop and also provided a large amount of employment during the season. But it has now disappeared and there seems little written about it. The News photo files have several pictures taken about 30 years ago. Did you use to work there and can you identify any of the people or processes depicted?

[PIX FROM FILE]

**

Memories have been flooding in following last week's mystery pictures, found in a Catherine Cookson novel

First to the phone was Mrs Jenny Parks of Cambridge who can claim a connection with each of the four pictures —in fact as her mother, who died seven years ago, was a great Catherine Cookson reader she wonders whether the pictures may have once belonged to her. If so where were the pictures in the meantime.

She tells me that two of the snaps were taken at St John's Church Hall in Blinco Grove at a VE Party in 1945. Her brother Charles Wisbey is in the second row in his sailor's suit, her sister Thelma (now Hill) is there under the flag, When the cameraman moved indoors he caught Jenny herself, cradled in her mother's arms on the extreme right. She confirms that the bottom picture was taken in Cherry Hinton Road where the family ran the shops shown and to complete the set it is her dad, Charles Henry Wisbey on the left in the background of the 'Queen Elizabeth' picture

Mike Gates has added other names to the line-up in the street, taken he is sure as part of the VJ Celebrations. He is there, (third left, back row), his sister is right in the front. Mary Chapman of Oakington saw her bridesmaid Janet Blows (five from right, top row). Greta Forsdyke (nee Ridgeon) thinks she may be the girl with the pigtails and can certainly name others, whilst Roger Cork of Stretham and John Cook of Cherry Hinton have also come forward with many of the names. John also has a companion picture, this one showing the parents, taken at the same time.

PIC EITHER SCANNED OR WILL BE DELIVERED ON MONDAY AM

Mary Jones (nee Fox) of Impington knows all about the 'Queen Elizabeth' picture, for she is shown on it, just behind Anne Walker who is playing the Queen. Jane Becket is the right-hand herald. It was probably taken in 1952 and was certainly organised by the Morley Memorial School

Gill Wordingham from Fulbourn can put names to virtually every one of the 1965-6 Cambridge City Football team – but then her father, Len Wordingham was a Director of the club for which he had played in his younger days. In fact she believes that he scored the first ever goal at the new Milton Road ground way back in the early 1920s. Doubtless some enthusiast will be able to confirm or challenge the claim.

Memories 11th October 2000, by Mike Petty

This Saturday it is our village's turn to be the subject of the News' weekly Community Spotlight feature. Later this morning we are all invited to assemble around the cross and be photographed. But the day is dull and overcast and I wonder how many will actually turn out to be snapped. You will have to wait for Monday's paper to find out.

By absolute co-incidence the feature coincides with the publication of our village's Millennium history for, like many other communities, people have been struggling to condense a thousand years or more of history into a few dozen pages. Now the fruits of their labours are coming to fruition.

Hinxton is one small village who have produced a big contribution to scholarship with their 150-page illustrated commemoration book. History and homes, trades and industries, church and charities, those who died for freedom and those who now learn of their sacrifice all come together in a publication that is essential for anybody with any connection in that part of Cambridgeshire. Virginia Walker of William House, 66 High St, Hinxton, CB10 1QY can supply copies of 'The life and times of Hinxton' for your shelves for just £10.

My eye was particularly caught by reminiscences of when the village had its own butcher, baker, grocer, shoe repairers – indeed the range of resources to sustain the community. Miss Moule had a grocery and general store just opposite the butchers, which had a slaughterhouse at the back. In earlier times the general stores had been a laundry with a copper and ironing boards. If you wanted your washing mangled then Alice Hardwick would provide the service for 2d. Miss Moule stocked a wide range of goods and one day Susan Morgan came in and requested a halfpenny candle – and then asked ‘how much is it?’ Mr & Mrs Clifton ran a bakery and grocer’s and Dennis Jaggard, known as Stan, would ask at the grocery if there were any broken biscuits. If the reply was positive he would quip: ‘Well mend the bloody things then’. Mrs Gee who lived in a cottage in High Street kept an unofficial sweet shop, selling sweets to the children which were kept in a kitchen drawer. When the children were asked where they had obtained their sweets they would at once reply, ‘from Mrs Gee’s drawers!’

Its all good gentle humour, typical of the banter that used to prevail when villages used to have plenty of shops. If it rings a bell with you then drop me a line.

Talking of forgotten traders I spoke at a meeting in Lode the other night when one lady in the audience recalled how her mother used to buy peat from a man who came around the village. It was not for putting on the garden, it was for burning on the fire – just like families had done for generations before. Does anybody else recall the peat-man, or any of the other vendors who used to come around the streets.

It is not just shops that have now deserted the village; all too often the school has closed as well. Yet the school will always be etched in the memory, as Sarah Holmes recalls of her time at Quy: “I can still picture every room, every nook and cranny, every tree in the small waste area of the playground, even down to the outside toilets which in winter meant a very quick dash. I remember the winter most, the pushed-up bottle tops of the small bottles of milk that had been left out in the freezing cold – much better than the hot horrid milk we had in the summer days. I remember the large oil burners, one in each classroom, with the big fire guards around them, good for drying paintings on. I’d love to turn the clock back and revisit it with my daughter Alice, point out my peg and where I used to sit and show her just how special our small village school was and why my memories will live with me forever”. Sarah’s recollections – of the 1970s – form part of a booklet of “Memories of Quy school” compiled and sold by Peggy Day, 8 Orchard Street, Quy, CB5 9AE for the huge price of £1.50 including postage.

**

But to go to school you need a home in the locality. Allan Brigham recognised part of an advert he had published in the News in October 1975 that I featured in Memories two weeks ago. “Getting desperate: council employee seeks house” he had written. It had, he tells me, no effect. So he tried again, this time signing it ‘A graduate’ and received a better response. “I was lucky. I found a room in the blighted Kite area, and eventually could afford to buy a house in a Romsey town that few then wanted to live in – ‘over the bridge’ and with an outside toilet. Married friends qualified for council housing”, he writes.

Since then Allan’s wages as a road sweeper have risen four fold, and the price of his house is ten times what it was when he bought it. “It was possible to find accommodation in 1975”, he writes. But: “I know from the experience of colleagues that it is impossible today. The cheapest former council house costs £100,000 and bus drivers are expected to live on £6 an hour”.

**

The photographs of the VE and VJ celebrations in the Cherry Hinton Road area of Cambridge, which I published a couple of weeks ago have continued to attract letters. It seems as if almost everybody on the picture has now come forward!

Trevor Johnson who still lives in the area saw himself in fancy dress and can put names to several of the others. Mary Hicks (nee Clark) recalls how houses were decorated for VE day with a competition for the best house – some people even planted red, white & blue flowers to make a display – does anyone have a snap of their street or village so decorated? Patrick Mills was there as well, as was Janet Blows (now Chapman), of Houghton who had already been identified by an earlier reader. Janet recalls that the proceedings were not entirely incident-free: “For several days leading up to the party we had worked tirelessly building a very big bonfire on a spare piece of land at the bottom of Coniston Road which was to have been lit on the night of the party. But whilst we were having tea in the St John’s Church hall some older boys from a neighbouring district lit it – and we were left with just ashes on our return!”

Many correspondents remember the Wisbey family who later took over Doug Whitehouse’s greengrocers shop outside which both children and their parents posed and Charles Wisbey has also written in. He himself ran the business from 1966 until earlier this year

Mrs M. Morton took part in the ‘Queen Elizabeth’ pageant, but is not on the snap. Incidentally Marion Colthorpe, whose excellent book on ‘Royal Cambridge’ gave me the background to the original Royal visit of 1564 tells me that her continuing research has shown that the Queen dined at Fenstanston and not Long Stanton as was previously believed.

But can you help with details of another Royal visit, that has puzzled even Clarence House?

George Snelson from Dewsbury, West Yorkshire writes: “I am seeking information about a visit of King George VI and Queen Mary (presumably he means Queen Elizabeth) in the period May-June 1943. My wife Muriel was a nurse at Huddersfield Royal Infirmary and came to Cambridge to stay with the family of a soldier she had nursed in 1943.

The soldier’s father worked in an office in Cambridge and took Muriel to see the King and Queen drive past. There must have been hundreds of people who watched them drive by, some may have recorded the event in their diary.”

George has written to Clarence House but they are baffled: “Unfortunately all war-time records are somewhat inadequate as very little paper was used and stored. There is, I fear, no visit of a visit by The King and Queen to Cambridge during 1943. Their Majesties visited airfields in the area around Cambridge at the end of May that year and it is possible that a brief time was spent in Cambridge, although we have no details about such a visit” the Royal information officer has replied. So can you add to the royal records?

There’s less doubts about the way the country celebrated the Coronation of the new Queen in 1953 and Herbert Ayres can quote chapter and verse for the celebrations in the Cherry Hinton Road area that built upon the now-famous VE & VJ celebrations. For he has a set of the minutes of the organising committee, on which he served, together with some letters on headed notepaper from some of the shops and businesses who supported their celebrations.

Herbert has also lent me a couple of other snaps to tease. This time we are in the early 1950s and once more in the Morley School catchment area. There is one face that might be familiar to pop fans for hiding under the red-indian head-dress and carrying a bow is a young Roger Walters, later to achieve fame with Pink Floyd.

Achieving fame with Cambridge City Football Club in the 1965-66 season were the fine body of lads who also featured two weeks back. Phil Moore from March, Terry Dunn from Cambridge and Alan Barker, the builder, from Hardwick have all come up with names. In Alan's case it is quite easy, for he is one of the squad.

Sadly Mrs J. Pryke of Willingham is having less success in trying to track down a picture of her late father Frank Lawrence who used to work for Eaden Lilley way back in the 1920s. She knows he is shown on a view of their rowing club but nobody can come up with one. Can you?

Memories 18th October 2000 by Mike Petty

As we advance further into the computer age more and more information becomes available. All you need it a computer connected to the Internet and the world is, apparently, at your fingertips. Today libraries are full of computer screens like some intellectual games arcade. Merely type in whatever you seek and the information will appear in front of you.

But what happens if you don't type? But surely everybody can now type, is this not a skill with which everybody is endowed at birth, taught at the cradle, or at least in primary school. But I never had a typewriter while I was at school. When I started work in the 1960s at the Central Library in Wheeler Street the Librarian's secretary had a typewriter, and there were other in the Administration Department. But they were always busy. I needed to type catalogue cards, so I 'borrowed' the Assistant Librarian's typewriter and after I had 'forgotten' to return it on a number of occasions I was finally found a second-hand machine on which to work. Nobody taught me where to find the 'c' on the keyboard, I had to muddle through myself. When eventually the typewriter was succeeded by an 'Amstrad' word processor I never had the heart to throw it away. It stayed on a table out the back as a memento of an earlier world.

Miss Minnie Pate also kept an old typewriter in her office, but her's was far more important. For it was the very first typewriter in Cambridge and had belonged to Oscar Browning. It just one of many such writing machines she acquired as her typewriting business boomed. The service had been founded in 1892 by Mrs Marion Marshall & under Miss Pate built up close links with the University and its students. But there were careful matters of etiquette to be observed if one of her girls was sent to a don to take dictation in the 1930s. She would be expected to stand while taking dictation, and what is more she was expected to have her back to the gentleman concerned.

In October 1950 Miss Pate herself made history when she became the first local woman to be awarded an honorary degree by Cambridge University. She was receiving recognition for her typing and secretarial skills, having been for more than 50 years director of the University Typewriting Service whose staff had typed for Vice Chancellors, heads of colleges, tutors, dons and undergraduates – who of course did not type themselves.

Miss Pate was a local girl, born and raised in Cambridge and it was seen as significant that amongst all the worthy candidates the University had chosen to honour first somebody who had served them in an ordinary, everyday working capacity. Numerous friends and clients gathered in the Senate House as her achievements were summarised by the Orator; she had presided over the "difficult task of recording our words by shorthand, however badly enunciated, or by typewriter, however badly written. She herself attended to every detail, corrected the spelling and altogether took the greatest pains that our work should emerge perfect on every county. In short, for many of us, the door to academic preferment was, so to say, opened by her". And all this in the days before automatic spellcheckers!

Since then the world has moved on rapidly, the manual machine on which adult students at Impington Village College were being taught in the 1970s, has been replaced by the electric, as demonstrated by the picture of students at the Studio Secretarial School way back in 1980. But nothing moves faster than the computer, as a picture in the News files of a modern office shows – taken in 1986!

Do you have memories of your earlier days in an office environment, before photocopiers and modern gadgetry?

[PICS MANUAL TYPEWRITER, PHOTO'D AT IMPINGTON VILLAGE COLLEGE, THE STUDIO SECRETARIAL SCHOOL 1980 & A MODERN OFFICE – MICROLOGIE SOLUTIONS LTD, 1986]

revised Minnie Pate article – unused 2 June 2013

IN June 1963 – 50 years ago – the News paid tribute to a remarkable lady who had influenced the careers of generations of undergraduates through the applications of skills which are virtually universal today – the art of using a typewriter keyboard.

Miss Minnie Pate had developed the ‘Cambridge and University Typewriting Office’.

In the 1870s there was little work for young women and the opportunities for earning a living were limited. A number of schools for teaching typewriting and shorthand were being started in London but while the commercial world had started to recognise their value, the University regarded them purely as something for businesses. Miss Pate and a few other girls taught themselves Pitman’s shorthand, but the typewriter was unknown to most people.

One evening the News carried an advertisement from Doctor Courtney Kenney, Fellow of Downing College and Lecturer in Law who was seeking an amanuensis for copying manuscripts. Minnie applied and got the job, becoming one of the first women to be employed on secretarial work in a college.

One day Dr Kenney asked if she would like to try his ‘typewriter’ – one of the first to be brought into the country. It was a tall black object looking decorated with coloured and gilded designs, something like a Victorian sewing machine but it was capable of producing (with great noise) a very readable copy, all in small capitals. It had once been owned by Oscar Browning and carried on the lid a handwritten note saying it was "seen with much interest and tried by George Eliot" when visiting him .

In 1892 Mrs Marian Marshall opened an office for typewriting and shorthand in Trinity Street and Miss Pate became a member of staff whose numbers slowly increased as new machines such as duplicators and Dictaphones appeared on the market. Minnie acquired the business in 1900 when it had a staff of two ladies; by the time she in turn retired, more than 40 women were employed.

But there were careful matters of etiquette to be observed if one of her girls was sent to a don to take dictation in the 1930s. She would be expected to stand while taking dictation, and what is more she was expected to have her back to the gentleman concerned.

Miss Pate and her team compiled a monumental album of testimonials from many Cambridge academics including Sir Horace Darwin, Lord Keynes and A.E. Housman. Fellowship dissertations were a great part of her work and often involved all-night sittings to complete; so much might depend on the accuracy of the typing, even if the text was literally all Greek to the typist.

Then the Master of Trinity, when Vice Chancellor, started using Miss Pate as ‘secretary’; the idea spread as other colleges followed suit.

There was soon a rush for lessons in shorthand and typing and a separate school for teaching was established to teach students to examination standard. It continued until the end of the Second World War when it had to close through lack of help.

In 1950 the University conferred upon Miss Pate the honorary degree of Master of Arts in recognition of her services over a period of more than 50 years. She was the first woman to be so honoured. Numerous friends and clients gathered in the Senate House as her achievements were summarised by the Orator; she had presided over the “difficult task of recording our words by shorthand, however badly enunciated, or by typewriter, however badly written. She herself attended to every detail, corrected the spelling and altogether took the greatest pains that our work should emerge perfect on every county. In short, for many of us, the door to academic preferment was, so to say, opened by her”. And all this in the days before automatic spellcheckers!

Even after her retirement she kept in constant touch with all ‘her girls’ and thousands of former clients were saddened at her death.

A scrapbook full of cuttings and letters relating to Minnie and the Typewriting Office she established is housed in Cambridge University Library

Since then the world has moved on rapidly, the manual machine on which adult students at Impington Village College were being taught in the 1970s, has been replaced by the electric, as demonstrated by the picture of students at the Studio Secretarial School way back in 1980. But nothing moves faster than the computer, as a picture in the News files of a modern office shows – taken in 1986!

**

What was the Dug Out in Guildhall Street, Cambridge, I asked. In have come the replies

Pearl Reed from Cambridge writes: “When I started work in 1943 at Barrett & Son Ltd, the china & hardware shop in St Andrew’s Street, their back entrance was on St Andrew’s Hill. The ‘Bun Shop’ public house was further down towards Downing Street and just by the pub was a flight of steps going down to ‘The Dug Out’, where would could get a nice cup of coffee or tea, which was useful to men coming in from Hildersham to work on the bus as it used to be cold in the winter months”. Later the Dug Out moved nearer to the Guildhall, which meant it wasn’t so handy for her.

Mr E. Shrimpton from Bar Hill knew of it when he was a policeman in the early 1950s, though he never had occasion to visit it, either on or off duty. Its attraction he recalls were its snooker tables

Malcolm Pratt of Lode remembers it as a friendly place where you could enjoy a cup of coffee and sandwich, cake or light snack without feeling there was pressure on you to eat up and go. He also recalls a milk bar next to Weatherheads on Market Hill – do you?

Tony Challis from Gt Shelford recalls that it was a coffee bar or Espresso bar which formed a mecca for racing cyclists. He writes: “Around that time a rebel organisation had been formed in the country called the British League of Racing Cyclists (BLRC) which opposed the National Cyclists Union (NCU). A club was formed in Cambridge, Cambridge Olympic R.C. under the leadership of Ike Saul, a name well known in local cycling at that time and also up to his tragic death a few years ago. The object of the ‘League’ was to promote road racing on open roads as opposed to the ‘Union’ who raced on closed circuits.

“Most weekday evenings, after a training run to Bury or Bishop’s Stortford, the club would end the evening with a coffee in the Dugout (which he recalls as one word), the ‘fast’ men getting there first and then waiting for the stragglers. At any given time there could be some 30 racing bikes leaning against the wall, and not one of them locked – try that today

“I can remember the Dugout well, down a few steps and you were confronted by those great chromium coffee machines, steaming and gurgling away. Those really were the days and anyone that can recall them will remember the call, ‘Up the League!!’ as rival clubs met, and if you were an ‘Union’ member back would come the cry – ‘Yeah, right up’. [PICTURE LOOKING ACROSS LION YARD CAR PARK TOWARDS GUILDHALL STREET 1969, SCAN OF GUILDHALL STREET 1937]

**

While we are in that area does anybody have a picture of Pilbeam’s hairdressers shop in Corn Exchange Street, Cambridge. They were there from the First War to the 1950s.

**

Even more names have come in for the Cherry Hinton Road VJ party, thanks to Janet Chapman of Houghton and Gerard Holt – the ‘chimney-sweep’ boy - while another picture of the event has surfaced that Mrs Jean Pettengell (nee Shadbolt) of Cambridge has treasured amongst her snaps. She saw herself, her brother and “we have been surprised at the number of children we have been able to name on the main group”.

**

Sometimes stories seem to come round and round. Take this report on reaction to the closure of a street in Ely on Thursday market day which was greeted by a storm of protest by traders.

Councillors said it would be of advantage to the public if the road were closed to traffic as it would enable pedestrians to walk without crossing the traffic stream. Market stalls could be resited in the roadway.

Traders described it as ridiculous, pointless and impossible. Mr France Kempton, fruiterer said: “We have people making regular deliveries every day. There are enough restrictions in this town anyway and the council are just chasing trade away”

Bowgens, the bakers, would certainly come to a standstill because they relied on seven van deliveries a day from the bakery, said the manageress, Mrs J. Brown. Next door Mr Percy Newstead, the fishmonger, said a closure was likely to cause a loss of trade because people would not be able to park outside the shop. The manager of Green and White, the off-licence, Mr E.G. Chapman said: “This is impossible. I have two drays and about 10 other deliveries on Thursdays. I shall fight this and I shall have some of the big companies behind me”

Shops in the partly-empty Market Place block, whose communal service area has its only access from the road on the west side of the Market Place would also be affected. A spokesman for Radio Relay, the television rental firm said access to the front of their shop was already closed to traffic on Thursdays because of the market. Now it looked as if the service area might be cut off as well depriving them of their vans: “We will have to carry the television sets all over town to get to them”, he said.

The date road concerned was Dolphin Lane, the date 6th November 1968. [PIC OF DOLPHIN LANE NOV 1968]

Memories 25th October 2000, by Mike Petty

Last week my projector seemed to have been constantly switched on. From the Cambridge Folk Museum to Royston, Comberton to Stretham, Barrington to Earith and finally Stuntney the slides churned through.

At Earith Women's Institute the theme was ghosts and witches and the usual contingent of ladies were supplemented by somewhat burlier and beardier members of the community – they had opened it up to men too. That in itself is not unusual, but it was the first time I had been introduced by a witch – complete with black pointed hat, long scratchy fingernails and a broomstick. Afterwards a number of the audience confided their memories of encounters with things that went bump in the night. Robert Halliday and Alan Murdie have compiled a Cambridge Ghost Book (Fern House £6.50) but most of their accounts go back into history. Do you have any more recent experiences to share?

Then at Stuntney things that went bump in the night were on the menu again, only this time it was the crump of wartime bombs and the crash of both British and German planes making forced landings in local fields and drains. What little I could tell was overshadowed by the experiences of those listening, for the audience comprised folk who had actually been there at the time and witnessed the events for themselves. They had first-hand accounts of how the crew from a crashed German plane had emerged from the wreckage and made their way, pistols drawn, on Mrs Ashman who stood watching some alarm – and then promptly surrendered to her. They had chatted for a bit until the Soham policeman arrived to take them into custody.

But given the hardships of country life wartime was just another inconvenience. Amongst those who had braved the rainy evening were members of the Benton family who have recorded their memories of life in one of three isolated cottages that comprised the hamlet of Dunstalls.

There were eight children in their family. Their father was head pig man on the Cole Ambrose estate in charge of one hundred and fifty pigs. Trevor remembers taking them up on the hill. "It was like a rodeo bringing them home". Sometimes one hundred and fifty pigs would be turned out onto the stubble or they would be put in the orchard to eat the rotten apples. But the pigs went very thin and had to be killed by their father, he remembers seeing a pile of dead pigs as high as a house

Water was fetched to their bungalow using a horse and cart. A big galvanised two hundred-gallon tank was filled from a tap on Stuntney village green. It was then taken across two fields, splashing out of the sides as it went over the ruts, even though it was covered. This would probably last the family from ten days to a fortnight.

Their toilet was a big hole in the garden and a shed would be moved over it. Mum used to get onto dad about the toilet. "If you don't move it soon we'll get it in our shoes". But he could rarely see the urgency.

The dykes and drains were the children's' playgrounds. They used to go 'tiddling' in the dykes with a jar tied round with a piece of string which they dipped in the water. Once Audrey fell in. She had a wool dress on. It was normal length before she went in but when she came out it was really long and full of chickweed. When she came home she walked the long way round her dad's pigsties, as she knew she'd get a hiding. Another sister, Doll, fell in a dyke carrying matches on her way to school but she knew she had to keep those dry, so she held them up

In winter when the ice was thick enough they played ice hockey at the Old Hall & went skating. If not quite sure about the thickness they played a 'dare game' - who could walk on the ice under the bridge where it never froze. Ron Peacock drew the short straw and as he walked along he slowly sank under the water.

Life was terribly hard & their father was ill for twenty years. One day their dad was missing from the old dog box where he used to sit outside for hours. Trevor and Ken went down the drain and found him with his pockets full of stones and they were sure he was going to drown himself. He had an illness caught from the pigs & it meant he could no longer work with them.

Despite it all they all agreed that it was a hard but good life and their mum looked after them really well.

The Benton family's reminiscences have been collected as part of a project to record life in Stuntney as it used to be. If you have memories or snaps to share please contact Wendy Fox at The Keyes, Soham Road, Stuntney, near Ely, CB7 5TL, or phone 01353 664676 [PICTURES SCANNED]

**

Is there a Green Man lurking in your church? One of those images of a human face intertwined with vegetation. There are thousands of churches across Europe in which carvings of the Green Man outnumber images of Christ by up to a dozen to one. But what do they represent, who carved them and where are they? Clive Hicks has just produced a field guide to the faces. He's found them in Balsham, Bluntisham, Buckden and Burwell. They're in Kings college chapel and at least four other colleges. You can find them in Ely cathedral, in the porch at Gt Shelford, on the roof at Landbeach, in St Mary's churches at Huntingdon and Over, St Andrews' at Sutton and Swavesey as well as the chancel at Trumpington. But there must be more, tucked away just waiting to be discovered. He found one in a Lincolnshire church to the absolute amazement of an elderly man who was doing chore in the church. He had known the building all his life, having been a choir boy there but had never spotted it. Another was found in Ely cathedral's Alcock chapel a short while ago. Clive Hicks' book "The Green Man: a field guide" is published by Compass books at £8.99. Can you help in his search and make the next edition even fuller? [PICTURE SCANNED]

**

Miss Daphne Foreman has written from the Barnwell area of Cambridge with her own account of the problems of finding a home in the 1960s. She recalls: "Having lived in rooms in other people's houses since the mid 1950's I longed for a home of my own. I applied to the council for a flat, only to be told they were only for married people. So I wrote a long article in the News entitled 'A plea for the single businesswoman' and was offered by the council a flat in a house. But at the same time I was offered one of the Probus (Professional and business women's) flats. I accepted this and lived there happily for nine years. But it was rather like renting a 'tied' cottage, in that one of the conditions of tenancy was attendance at the Probus Club meetings and the flats were not big enough to 'put up' a guest. So while I still had twenty working years I decided to buy a house.

"After paying room and flat rents for many years I had very little savings, so I found myself going down the lists of properties until I found one which I could afford. But none of the Building Societies would give me a mortgage. In the words of one, 'I wouldn't touch it with a barge pole!' But I applied for a loan and it was almost agreed when I had a telephone call asking when I was getting married. When I said that I was not getting married I was told that mortgages could only be granted to married people. I replied that if I were getting married I thought that my husband would be buying the home and would provide something better than this! But I was trying to do the best I could for myself.

"Later in the day I had a call to say that some money had been found which would allow one single person to have a mortgage. I think that the agents were so anxious to get rid of the house that they begged for a mortgage to be granted!

“After much more struggling with red tape, and paying off the mortgage I am delighted to say that after 30 years and several thousand pounds I now am repeatedly receiving letters from agents begging to buy my home! Over my dead body!” [PICTURE FROM NEWS FILE]

**

Did anybody see the King and Queen in the area in 1943 asked George Snelson from Dewsbury. Yes, writes a regular reader: “With my classmates from Ely High School, Bedford House, Ely, we were on our way to the outdoor swimming pool, close to Ely station and had to walk down Back Hill. On this particular day somehow word had leaked out and our teacher told us that is we liked to forgo our swimming lesson we could line the path and see the King and Queen being driven on their way to Witchford airfield to present some medals to the air crews”

Mrs P. J. Anderson from Cherry Hinton Road saw them a bit later when they came to Cambridge in 1947 to attend the 400th anniversary celebrations at Trinity College. She writes: “I was working in a Government Office in Station Road at the time and as they came by train we all trooped into the road to cheer them on. To make it seem more impressive our departmental flag was flown along with the Union Jack and it wasn’t until the royal couple had passed that we realised it had been flying upside down”. The Queen returned the following year to celebrate the 500th anniversary of the foundation of Queens’ college and again to receive an honorary degree. Then in 1951 King George VI made his final visit to Cambridge when with Queen Elizabeth and Princess Margaret they drove up the avenue at King’s College and over the bridge to the very door of the college chapel. They were there to celebrate the completion of the project to return the great stained glass windows that had been removed at the start of the war for fear of German bombing.

**

Harry Bye from Ely can add to Mrs Rowell’s memory of her flight from Ely with Alan Cobham’s air show. His extensive diaries record that visits took place in September 1932 and September 1933. He went up in a Tiger Moth to watch a parachute descent from the air, which proved a bargain as they were airborne for ten minutes before the parachutist even left the ground. Harry also spent 4/- (20p) to fly in an open cockpit Avro 504K. He recalls that there were other larger aeroplanes there, including a former Imperial Airways passenger plane which was probably the one Mrs Rowell flew in. The event took place on a field in Downham Road, where the Community college now stands.

Memories 1st November 2000, by Mike Petty

This morning the rain is sleeting down and the poor postman who makes his way up to our door is drenched – and all to bring us a circular and a bill. At least he is being well recompensed for his efforts – or at least compared to the wages being offered in Chatteris in 1814!

For then the assistant postmaster, William Brooks – who combined the job with that of grocer and draper – was finding it difficult to get anybody to do the job of letter deliverer. He wrote (by letter) to the Postmaster General: “I beg to observe that I have not at present engaged a letter carrier, but deliver them myself. I have asked three persons who I thought to offer and one wanted 10/- a week and neither of the others would do it under 9/- but I think it is probable I may get one for 7/- but not under which sum I hope will be allowed me. You are mistaken in thinking this is a small town, the street is near two miles long and certainly is not half the town and a letter carrier must take all weathers”. But his masters were adamant – 5/- was top rate for the job.

Then in 1824 he had further problems when he received a complaint from William Hurstwait that a letter delivered to him had been opened. A full investigation was put in train when it was decided that the most likely explanation was that the seal had been broken accidentally when another letter had got caught up with it. Hurstwait was not placated, for he too was a draper and, he claimed: "there are many respectable gentlemen in Chatteris ... of the same trade, they know I had been in town, and I believe they were envious of my goods; ... I think their motives were to see what they cost". And, not to put a fine point on it, he was convinced that the postmaster himself was responsible for "violating the seals of his invoices to counteract him in business".

All this forms but a small part of the information discovered by Martin Evans in his researches into the postal history of the area around Doddington, Benwick, Manea and March. He has discovered letters sent on the first day of the Universal Penny Post, he has located and illustrated postmarks, delved into postal archives and personal collections, museums and libraries to compile a 170-page book.

But there are significant gaps which no official record can fill. For though Martin knows the names of the postmasters of Manea from 1850 to 1937 he has no names between then and 1998! The same applies to the other villages, including Benwick where Wilfrid Morris was sub-postmaster in 1937 and he knows C.E. Fisher was appointed in 1983, but not those in between.

If you can help Martin Evans in his researches please contact him at 75 Fox Road, Exeter, EX4 8NB. His book, 'The postal history of the March and Chatteris areas of Cambridgeshire', with its cover picture of a letter sent in June 1840 from March to C. Pemberton Esq., Cambridge - (no other address or postcodes needed in those days) - can be obtained from the marvellous March Museum at £15 or from Martin himself (though you will need to add £2 for postage!) [PHOTOGRAPHIC HAVE TAKEN PICTURE OF EVANS & HIS BOOK, SCAN OF LAST-DAY COVER ON DISK, OTHER PIX FROM FILES]

And if you have tales to tell of experiences as a letter-deliverer in more recent times I should be pleased to hear from you.

One person who knows all about answering letters has E-mailed me with her memories of office work. Jennifer O'Dell from Bar Hill says she worked in an office environment on and off since 1955 and has seen the development of office work from the manual typewriter to the word processor.

"I learnt shorthand and typing, as I am sure many more of your readers did, at the Central School (now Parkside Community College). One of my memories from my very early years is walking down Melbourn Place and hearing the rhythmic tap of typewriters from the typing room. Once we had learnt the fingering we had to type rhythmically to music, slow music at first getting faster as we progressed and we had a board over our fingers so we could not see the keys. It really worked, to this day I cannot type accurately if I look at the keys!

"My first job was at Catling & Son Estate Agents. Their office in 1955 was in St Andrew's Street opposite where Bradwells Court now stands. The office was really old fashioned even for then, we had an open fire which was lit by the cleaner in the morning and I had to work on a manual typewriter in a corner of the office after I had been given dictation by one of the senior estate agents. I remember the names of Mr. Brady and Mr. Brittain. The 'telephone exchange' was a box with buttons on it, when a call had to be transferred to another number the button was pushed down and a handle at the side was turned to make the extension phone ring. In another corner of the room was a big press, this was used to copy letters into a book. A special type of carbon paper was used and every night it was my job to put the copy of the letter into a book which consisted of sheets of tissue-like paper. Each page was inter-leafed with a damp cloth, the book was put in the press and a big wheel-like handle on the top was used to clamp the book tight. When it was removed in the morning the pages were dry and a copy was imprinted into the book. I can't remember (even if I ever knew) how it actually worked but it did.

“The other job most people in an office used at this time was the Gestetner machine. It was a really dirty job; a 'skin' had to be typed up. This was done by using a typewriter but with the ribbon removed, the letters were cut into the 'skin' rather like a stencil. This skin was then attached to a drum on a machine, this had to be done very carefully because if you got creases in the 'skin' they printed out on all the copies made from the machine. Ink was put into the machine, a handle at the side was turned and as the paper fed through the machine the ink printed onto it through the stencil. The ink was very black and sticky and seemed to get everywhere.”

After a few years Jennifer found herself adapting to electric “but I found these quite difficult to use as first because the keys did not have to be manually pressed and it would type a letter several times instead of just once. Eventually it was all word processing and photocopying. Word processing is much easier to use than the old manual typewriters but because of this, and knowing how easy it is to correct something, accuracy seems to have gone downhill”. [SCAN OF ST ANDREW’S STREET IN 1964]

Ruth Thompson from Cambridge was trained up on another piece of advanced office equipment. In the early 1950s, she writes, “I was sent to the Sumlock Comptometer School in London for one month by my firm, it was my first time staying away from home – aged 17. The comptometer was the forerunner of calculators and after seven years with the Danish Bacon Company and four years with Sindalls (both at that time on Cherry Hinton Road, I left to have my family. Comptometers were being replaced with calculators by the time I was ready to return to work, so I had to adapt. However I still have all my charts and can still remember many decimal equivalents of fractions which we had to learn by heart at training school”

Not everybody learnt typing at an early age. Molly Jones, from March, writes to identify her husband, Evan, as the lone male amongst the ladies pounding the old manual typewriter at Impington village college that I featured the other week. Molly herself was taught at a business-training course at the Cambridgeshire Technical School. She graduated from manual to electric and then to golf ball typewriters. When she retired the research group she worked for had a symbol head gold-leafed for her as a leaving present.

**

Eighty-year-old Robert Stevenson from Cambridge has put his own typing skills to use in compiling a volume of “Thoughts from Home”, being poems he wrote during the war. This took him from his first posting at Kimbolton Castle to France and Dunkirk. He went back with the D-Day invasion forces and then on to India. In those days a letter meant everything to somebody as:

“Through dark troubled days, where seemed no end
Defeat, setbacks, parting of family and friend,
Hearts were lifted when came a new refrain
A voice that sang “We’ll meet again”

Now,
“As the years pass by and one grows old
Pals are remembered and event are re-told.
Ranks get thinner, yet each year is the same
Re-union dinner and “We’ll meet again”.

If you’ve set down your memories, of war or peace, I’d be pleased to receive a copy

**

Can you help find more Green Men, I asked. Yes says the Rev Christine Sindall, who numbers Kirtling amongst her parishes. They have recently had some drawings done of the church and some of the interesting carvings, including one of a roof boss in the north aisle. She has sent a photograph taken with a telephoto lens which reveals details not apparent from ground level of a green man with his tongue sticking out. [SCAN ON DISK]

There are other discoveries too for research work on the forthcoming Victoria County History volume together with restoration work has revealed the foundations of a central tower and other features which have prompted archaeologists to now date the original building to pre-1050, and Saxon in origin.

But not all Green Men are old. Paul Hibbitt from the stonemasons in Victoria Road, Cambridge says his firm is even now carving a new Green Man for a church in Toddington. So they are even now multiplying! [THEIR LETTER ENCLOSED, CAN WE USE THEIR PIC OR GET ONE TAKEN]

Memories, by Mike Petty, 8th November 2000

Last week I had the opportunity to lead two 'field-trips' into the fens around Ely – a grand name for a pleasant potter by coach from Cambridge to Stretham Old Engine, Lt Thetford, the Board Street dig and the old Bishop's Gaol Museum at Ely.

Later everyone was mightily impressed by the still-largely unknown marvellous collection of war-time memorabilia at Witchford airfield, especially when one of the passengers confessed to having been involved in its creation and could bring very personal touches to the very personal items on display.

Then it was on to Sutton Gault, where one can get a unique appreciation of the civil engineering work of the seventeenth century that led to the creation of the Old and New Bedford Rivers, and the wash-land in between.

But there were differences between the two trips. For on Monday, following the ferocious overnight gales, the day was bright and clear, but Thursday dawned wet and windy. The sun broke through however by the time Sutton was reached, but the road across the washes had disappeared under a mass of water. Where we had motored three days before now we had to proceed on foot, taking advantage of the elevated walkway above the waves. When we were halfway across a group of four swans flew towards us, four pairs of wings beating the air. Then one pair stopped and the bird plunged like a stone into the water with a loud splash. Its body was caught by the tide and swept beneath our feet and down towards Denver.

That the road should have disappear came as no surprise, it is intended that the washlands will flood and the people on the other side get used to the fact that periodically their little community will have to look to Chatteris rather than Sutton for their daily bread.

Fenfolk have always been aware that flooding is part of the way of life and that once the water starts to rise there is nothing they can do about it. They wait for the weight of water making its way to the sea from the highlands of Huntingdonshire and Bedfordshire and hope that the tides will be kind, that the water will get away and the banks will hold so that the floods come only where they are supposed to.

But a glance through the News photo files show that flooding can affect communities throughout the region. Sudden storms, a blocked ditch, a broken water main and homes become inundated. Do you recognise yourself or your home – and have you memories to share. [PICTURES FROM NEWS FILES]

Given the frequency of flooding it is perhaps surprising that Robert Simper does not feature more of them in his newly-published photographic survey of the rivers that run through the fens. But his illustrations show boats of all types, from Victorian tugs to modern cruisers and feature some of the characters of the riverside, such as Bill Leach with his steam launch and Harold Sennitt of Wicken, probably the last of the fenland peat-diggers.

Many of the photographs have come from a newly unearthed collection taken by the family of the famous Cambridge photographer F.H. Sanderson, who had a studio in Post Office Terrace. In one of those wonderful discoveries Robert found that the family had amassed a unique photographic record of their fenland trips. From a box in a cupboard they produced old snaps, some damaged by damp, and these have now been published for the first time. 'Rivers to the fens: Rivers Cam, Gt Ouse, Nene and other waterways' is published by Creekside Publishing at £18.95 [PICTURES SCANNED ON DISK]

Great & Little Eversden residents are this week preparing themselves for a unique event in their community's history. For soon each house will be presented with their own copy of a visual archive of the 'Quiet Lanes and Orchard Ends' that comprise their villages. A team of village researchers has been sifting and searching for old photographs in the files of the Cambridgeshire Collection, County Record Office and the News, as well as those of individuals like the late Frank Fossey. The result will be unveiled this Saturday at a grand launch in the village hall.

Their's is a magnificent hard-back volume of over 140 pages, full of pictures and captions, notes and names. It covers schooldays and wartime, football and threshing, industries and church graffiti, and of course the cottages. In one of these in Lt Eversden High Street lived Enid Mary Barraud, a most interesting character who wrote some of my favourite books of rural life in the 1940s, including 'Set My Hand Upon the Plough' and 'Tail Corn'. In the latter she describes her cottage, previously the village shop, and in its day a little gold mine. Its former occupant was described to her:

"Ah, now she were a proper sort. She niver kep' 'er thumb in the scale time she weighed you an ounce of baccy. And 'er' ams – melt in you mouth, they would an' all!" And for children she had a weak spot, never failing to pop in an extra bull's eye for generous measure.

But inevitably places change. Miss Barraud looked forward to progress – to the coming of electricity and clean safe lighting at the turn of a switch, with no danger of a flare up and smoked glass and sooted mantle. "But it would not be all gain when the lamps and stoves are put up on the top shelf and then relegated to the tool-shed against the day when they finally reach the Moat, last resting place of all incombustible rubbish. I shall miss the not unpleasant faint aroma of burning paraffin wafted through the place while the early morning tea kettle boils, and the soft glow of an oil lamp adds warmth as well as light to the scene.

"After electricity, I suppose it will be main water. Again we shall miss something. The pump stands just opposite the cottage and the pump is a focal point of village life.

"We are never short of water here. The stream with its useful dipping holes for washing water may be reduced to a trickle after a long spell of dry weather but the pump reaches down to tap the never-failing supply at the greensand level. There is always plenty of water, but we have to pump it". And sometimes the pump would go hard, and the buckets of water once full had to be carried home, being careful not to splosh precious drops over the path.

Today we are used to turning a tap for limitless supplies of water, but if the village still had to rely on wells just how many of the neatly-tended and most attractive village cottages would now be crumbling shells instead of comfortable homes. For anybody who has ever known the Eversdens the book will reveal a place at once familiar but imaginably remote, when the pace was less hurried, but life much harder. For further details contact Mary Green, the chairperson of the Eversden Millennium Group, at 'Mole End', 40 High St, Lt Eversden CB3 7HE [PICTURES SCANNED ON DISK]

**

Who was Hudson Boileau Cane of Brackenhurst, Kenya and what was his connection with 'Meadowlands', Trumpington Road, Cambridge. Roger Foster, who has now converted the former Red Cross home into a sumptuous hotel tells me that his name is carved into one of the fire surrounds and that there is a plaque in the entrance hall. I can track down a Charles Hudson Boileau Cane who was admitted to Pembroke College in 1886. He was the son and heir of John Brette Cane, Rector of Weston, near Newark, but what he would be doing in such a property. And is there any connection with the Boileau family since a Col Frank Ridley Boileau who served in Central Africa and was Assistant Commissioner after 1896, dying in 1914. And do you have memories of the house. Any information would be gratefully received

M. Gibbs from Ely writes: "It was very interesting to read 'What goes around comes around' referring to pedestrianisation in Ely. None of the shops mentioned in Dolphin Lane are there anymore. True we have one either end turning the corners into High Street and Market Street, the Nationwide Building Society occupies the remainder. Is this the future for Ely High Street in 10-15 years time?"

What shops do you remember in your community – write to Mike Petty at the News

Memories 15th November 2000, by Mike Petty

Throughout the country over the weekend thousands have turned out to honour the memories of those men and women who lost their lives in war. Although they did not grow old, those left behind have & while the memorials remain little changed the faces paying homage have aged. As a tribute to the memories of those who have turned out in all weathers to pay their remembrance I have selected some old pictures from the News photo files. If you recognise yourself or your dad then write to me.

Impressive though these ceremonies were perhaps none matched that at Ely Cathedral in May 1965. "A once-in-a-lifetime event" was how it was described at the time by Mr E.B. Macgregor, secretary of the Eastern Area of the, now Royal, British Legion.

Indeed Ely, scene of many parades in the past, had never seen anything like it. Long before the event was timed to start 160 coaches and cars in their hundreds converged on the city. Out of them spilled nearly 7,000 legionnaires from counties in the eastern area. About 3,750 of them went to assembly points from which, joined by 15 bands, they marched to the cathedral.

Inside the cathedral every available inch was taken. As the congregation sang the opening hymn the Queen's old standard, which was being paraded for the last time, was handed to the Dean of Ely, the very Rev C.P. Hankey, for laying-up in the cathedral. The new standard was unfurled and dedicated by the Bishop of Ely.

Outside hundred who had listened to loudspeakers relaying the service saw the new Legion standard head a long parade, covering three decades of British military history and three generations of ex servicemen. "I shall be surprised if ever there is another parade like this in the area." commented Mr Macgregor. Let us hope that never again will the situation arise where so many will have to respond to the call to arms – but if you did and have memories to share please write to me. [SCAN AND PIX FROM FILE]

**

As a taxi driver to take you to Ram Yard and he may look at you askance. Yet it used to be the base for a taxi firm (whose name escapes me), and was certainly one of their regular stopping places, collecting and delivering passengers to Prziborsky's hairdressing shop (a name that one can never forget) [SCAN & PIX FROM FILE]

Ram Yard was attacked by a correspondent of the News in November 1900. "Sir," he wrote, "Among the many urgent improvements needed in Cambridge stands that of abolishing the old, worn-out buildings and improving the thoroughfares of the town. Disease is prevalent to a large extent and is to be found in districts with narrow thoroughfares and tumble-down houses. In any other towns these buildings would have been demolished long since but here, in the very heart of an important University town, we have a thoroughfare which would be a disgrace to any village, and should not be tolerated even in conservative Cambridge

"I refer to the buildings (?) situated between Round Church street on the one side, and Ram Yard, looking into Park Street on the other. Here a collection of bricks and wood in the shape of miserable cottages, bar the way to what might be a worthy continuation of Trinity and St John's streets to Park Street, bringing into touch one of the busiest parts of the town. It is only a matter of a few hundred pounds to buy these cottages and I am sure that were the owners approached they would have sufficient patriotism to let their property go for a consideration.

"One wonders whether the authorities will rise to the occasions and effect this easy and cheap improvement, or whether they will let yet another golden opportunity pass away and sink again into their dreamy sleep of contentment – leaving things as they are".

"W", as he signed himself was to be disappointed. The buildings continued to provide much-needed homes in the centre of the city until the spring of 1961, although many of them had been condemned. They were finally swept away to widen Round Church Street and provide access to the new Park Street car park, that opened in October 1963. Shortly afterwards an extension saw the demolition of Cambridge's last thatched cottage in nearby Clement Place. [SCAN & PIX FROM FILE]

**

Ram Yard and Clement Place do not feature in a new book of Cambridge street names, produced by Ronald Gray and Derek Stubbings. But Park Street does – it used to be called Garlic Fair Lane till about 1830. Perhaps it was becoming confused with Garlic Row – named after the goods sold at Stourbridge Fair, as was Cheddars Lane and Oyster Row, which commemorates the Oyster House where the mayor and councillors would dine after opening the Fair. Nearby Stanley Road probably commemorates Henry Morton Stanley the explorer, who lectured in the Guildhall in 1878. Football fans however may know it better as the home of Cambridge United, for apparently the club can trace its origins back to a football match played under a street lamp in Stanley Road in 1912. Not all names refer to ancient history. Many commemorate the achievements of politicians, academics or scientists; several are named after the people who built them and one, apparently, after a stapler. For according to a reliable account when Councillors were not able to agree on a name, one of them produced his Velos brand stapler, said 'call it that', and they agreed! Cambridge Street-Names, their origins and associations, has just been published by Cambridge University Press.

**

Mr R. Chiswell from Lt Eversden used to know first-hand about fenland floods. For his father once kept the 'Fish and Duck' pub at the junction of the Rivers Cam and Old West, near Lt Thetford, and he has snaps showing the building surrounded by water. He also treasures an old newspaper cutting from the Daily Herald of March 1937 about fenland flooding. The writer condemns the scandal of repeated floods which sees farmland inundated and women who 'find their way to the village stores once a week along roads knee-deep in mud for three miles at a stretch. The children cannot be sent'.

The villain of the piece, he claims, was not the drainage engineer, but the mole. The riverbanks are the homes of thousands, and possibly millions of moles, as a result they were honeycombed with mole-runs and tunnels. As the rivers rise in the winter months, the flood-waters reach the mole tunnels and every mole-run serves as a streamlet finding an outlet in the lands outside the beneath the river level. To combat this invasion the farmers and water board employed mole catchers, skilled men like my grandfather, who could find a run, set a trap and both destroy a pest and earn a living, for the moleskins provided a useful income. And in those days the price for moleskins had soared, up from 2/6 (12p) to 12/6 (62p) a dozen, as furriers wanted them to make into ladies muffs and hats. But however good the mole-catcher was, some moles still escaped. Of course they did – they had to leave a few for seed, destroy them all and there was no more income! It used to be a common thing to see moleskins strung up beside the riverbank as proof of the catchers prowess – but has this become a thing of the past. And are the banks still honeycombed with tunnels – we will probably only find out when the river levels rise high enough.

A policeman's lot is not always a happy one but Frank Mansfield from Orton Longueville, Peterborough, has only pleasant memories of his time as village bobby at Wicken. He knows something of the story of one of his early predecessors in the past, Richard Peak who originated from Caxton and arrived in the village in the 1850s. On 17th August 1855 he was on duty at the Red Lion inn until the early hours of the morning, then when all was quiet, he set off to walk back to his home in Burwell. He never made it. A search was made of ponds and brick kilns, some brass buttons were found – but Peak had not been wearing any on the night of his disappearance. It seems certain he was set upon and murdered. Wicken's historian, Anthony Day has featured pictures of the policeman, his wife and children in one of his books on the village. But Frank would still like to know more. I did once ask a senior policeman if the murder case was closed. No, he said, we're still looking out for a 180-year-old man to help in our enquiries! If you have any clues – or tales of more recent policing – then let me know.

***^

Anne Langley from Milton Road, Cambridge thinks she may have spotted her father in a photograph of Guildhall street, Cambridge that I featured on 18th October. The picture showed Musk & Company's premises where he used to work as a delivery boy, often taking sausages to the railway station for the Royal family. This would account for the Prince of Wales' feathers above the shop. Her dad never told anyone the recipe for the special Musk sausages, which tasted unlike any others. Anne used to work in the shop, selling the famous bangers – perhaps you remember them?

Memories 22nd November 2000, by Mike Petty

A unique insight into wartime Cambridge has come my way in the shape of a number of snaps taken secretly by Mac Bedworth, when he was manager of H.J. Gray's sports company. They show the inside of their building behind the shops on Milton Road where groups of ladies, and a few gentlemen were engaged in war work. The photographs were found in a family album by Mrs Gill Morgan who lived near Solihull in the West Midlands. She showed them to her friend Isobel Butler of Leeds who in turn passed them to her sister Beryl Ginn of Gilbert Road, Cambridge and they have now been deposited in the Cambridgeshire Collection.

But just what was the company up to, and did you take part? Informed speculation implies that some of the ladies were assembling the components of barrage balloons whilst others were working on armature winding for electric motors. Can anybody put the record straight, before it's too late.

Two other photographs show members of the Home Guard, including one of a column of men that apparently numbers Mr Bedworth amongst them. Is it far too long ago for anybody to fill in more details.

Chris Jakes, librarian at the Collection, also seeks your help on behalf of another researcher who has found letters addressed to members of a Czech Training Centre at Great Shelford in 1945. Does anybody have any information as to where it was, how long it was there – or anything! [SCANS ON DISK]

**

As a taxi driver to take you to Ram Yard and he may look at you askance. Yet it used to be the base for a taxi firm (whose name escapes me), and was certainly one of their regular stopping places, collecting and delivering passengers to Prziborsky's hairdressing shop (a name that one can never forget)

Ram Yard was attacked by a correspondent of the News in November 1900. "Sir," he wrote, "Among the many urgent improvements needed in Cambridge stands that of abolishing the old, worn-out buildings and improving the thoroughfares of the town. Disease is prevalent to a large extent and is to be found in districts with narrow thoroughfares and tumble-down houses. In any other towns these buildings would have been demolished long since but here, in the very heart of an important University town, we have a thoroughfare which would be a disgrace to any village, and should not be tolerated even in conservative Cambridge

"I refer to the buildings (?) situated between Round Church street on the one side, and Ram Yard, looking into Park Street on the other. Here a collection of bricks and wood in the shape of miserable cottages, bar the way to what might be a worthy continuation of Trinity and St John's streets to Park Street, bringing into touch one of the busiest parts of the town. It is only a matter of a few hundred pounds to buy these cottages and I am sure that were the owners approached they would have sufficient patriotism to let their property go for a consideration.

"One wonders whether the authorities will rise to the occasions and effect this easy and cheap improvement, or whether they will let yet another golden opportunity pass away and sink again into their dreamy sleep of contentment – leaving things as they are".

"W", as he signed himself was to be disappointed, despite support from other correspondents. Several of the buildings were unoccupied, one was being used as a shoemaker's workroom and another had been a blacksmith's shop. "But the whole block is uniformly hideous and obstructive. No one has a good word to say for it. The relief of the congested traffic in Park Street is a matter of moment to many residents in the locality".

But despite these criticisms of 100 years ago the buildings continued to provide much-needed homes in the centre of the city until the spring of 1961, although many of them had been condemned. They were finally swept away to widen Round Church Street and provide access to the new Park Street car park that opened in October 1963. Shortly afterwards an extension to the car park saw the demolition of Cambridge's last thatched cottage in nearby Clement Place.

Do you remember Ram Yard, did you perhaps live there. Write to Mike Petty at the News
[SCAN & PIX FROM FILE WITH LAST WEEK'S TEXT]

**

Ram Yard and Clement Place do not feature in a new book of Cambridge street names, produced by Ronald Gray and Derek Stubbings. But Park Street does – it used to be called Garlic Fair Lane till about 1830. Perhaps it was becoming confused with Garlic Row – named after the goods sold at Stourbridge Fair, as was Cheddars Lane and Oyster Row, which commemorates the Oyster House where the mayor and councillors would dine after opening the Fair. Nearby Stanley Road probably commemorates Henry Morton Stanley the explorer, who lectured in the Guildhall in 1878. Football fans however may know it better as the home of Cambridge United, for apparently the club can trace its origins back to a football match played under a street lamp in Stanley Road in 1912. Not all names refer to ancient history. Many commemorate the achievements of politicians, academics or scientists; several are named after the people who built them and one, apparently, after a stapler. For according to a reliable account when Councillors were not able to agree on a name, one of them produced his Velos brand stapler, said 'call it that', and they agreed! Cambridge Street-Names, their origins and associations, has just been published by Cambridge University Press.

**

Ian Seeley of Bottisham has responded to my appeal for flood stories with a picture of horrific floods in Linton in September 1968 – do you recognise anybody. Ron Bidwell has a picture of himself and his mum, Jessie, at the doorway of their house in Annesdale, Ely, during the floods of 1937. [SCAN OF LINTON FLOODS SEPT 1968]

Mr R. Chiswell from Lt Eversden used to know first-hand about fenland floods. For his father once kept the 'Fish and Duck' pub at the junction of the Rivers Cam and Old West, near Lt Thetford, and he has snaps showing the building surrounded by water. He also treasures an old newspaper cutting from the Daily Herald of March 1937 about fenland flooding. The writer condemns the scandal of repeated floods which sees farmland inundated and women who 'find their way to the village stores once a week along roads knee-deep in mud for three miles at a stretch. The children cannot be sent'.

The villain of the piece, he claims, was not the drainage engineer, but the mole. The riverbanks are the homes of thousands, and possibly millions of moles, as a result they were honeycombed with mole-runs and tunnels. As the rivers rise in the winter months, the flood-waters reach the mole tunnels and every mole-run serves as a streamlet finding an outlet in the lands outside the beneath the river level. To combat this invasion the farmers and water board employed mole catchers, skilled men like my grandfather, who could find a run, set a trap and both destroy a pest and earn a living, for the moleskins provided a useful income. And in those days the price for moleskins had soared, up from 2/6 (12p) to 12/6 (62p) a dozen, as furriers wanted them to make into ladies muffs and hats. But however good the mole-catcher was, some moles still escaped. Of course they did – they had to leave a few for seed, destroy them all and there was no more income! It used to be a common thing to see moleskins strung up beside the riverbank as proof of the catchers prowess – but has this become a thing of the past. And are the banks still honeycombed with tunnels – we will probably only find out when the river levels rise high enough. Do you have any snaps of molecatchers at work? [SCAN OF FISH & DUCK PUB JUNE 1965 – CEN]

**^

Anne Langley from Milton Road, Cambridge thinks she may have spotted her father in a photograph of Guildhall street, Cambridge that I featured on 18th October. The picture showed Musk & Company's premises where he used to work as a delivery boy, often taking sausages to the railway station for the Royal family. This would account for the Prince of Wales' feathers above the shop. Her dad never told anyone the recipe for the special Musk sausages, which tasted unlike any others. Anne used to work in the shop, selling the famous bangers – perhaps you remember them?

**

A policeman's lot is not always a happy one but Frank Mansfield from Orton Longueville, Peterborough, has only pleasant memories of his time as village bobby at Wicken. He knows something of the story of one of his early predecessors in the past, Richard Peak who originated from Caxton and arrived in Wicken in the 1850s. On 17th August 1855 he was on duty at the Red Lion inn until the early hours of the morning, then when all was quiet, he set off to walk back to his home in Burwell. He never made it. A search was made of ponds and brick kilns, some brass buttons were found – but Peak had not been wearing any on the night of his disappearance. It seems certain he was set upon and murdered. Wicken's historian, Anthony Day has featured pictures of the policeman, his wife and children in one of his books on the village. But Frank would still like to know more. I did once ask a senior policeman if the murder case was closed. No, he said, we're still looking out for a 180-year-old man to help in our enquiries! If you have any clues – or tales of more recent policing – then let me know.

Another appeal for assistance comes from Christ's College, Cambridge where Richard Barlow-Poole is compiling a list of college employees killed in the Great War. Six of Christ's workers lost their lives, including George Stevens. But which George Stevens was he. There seems to be a choice for three: one was a married man who lived in Suez Road, Cambridge. He joined the 2nd Battalion, of the Suffolk Regiment and fell on 26th August 1914. The second George Stevens was a native of Ramsey, Hunts who became a Lance Corporal in the 7th Battalion, The Queen's (Royal West Surrey) Regiment and died on 23rd November 1916, whilst the third lived in George Street, March. He left a widow, Elizabeth Stevens, when as a Sapper in the 7th Field Company, Royal Engineers, he was killed in October 1918. Can any readers help to solve the mystery?

Memories 29th November 2000, by Mike Petty

The visit of the Queen to Cambridge last week was by no means her first trip to Cambridge. That had taken place in October 1955 when, with Prince Philip, she arrived at the railway station and drove through pouring rain to the Guildhall. Bedraggled spectators, waving wet Union Jacks, were enchanted – “Isn't she super! Isn't she smashing!” they were heard to exclaim. All the stalls on the Market Place had been cleared away and a dense crowd watched the Queen make history, by becoming the first Sovereign ever to visit the Mayor and Corporation in their Guildhall. The royal couple later appeared on the balcony to wave to the people below and were greeted by deafening cheers. Then it was off through the rain to Newnham College, to lunch at Trinity and then to the main event of the day, the opening of the new School of Veterinary Medicine where the Duke wore the scarlet robes of a Doctor of Law, an honorary degree that had been conferred on him in November 1952.

But the day was not yet done. There was another visit, this time to Girton College where the Queen met members of the newly founded third college for women, New Hall. Finally they departed for the London train – that they boarded at Histon station.

Since then the Queen has been a regular visitor, opening many buildings and new developments, including Addenbrooke's Hospital in May 1962 and the Grafton Centre in 1984. [PICS FROM NEWS FILES – PERHAPS INCLUDE ONE FROM LAST WEEK AS CONTRAST]

But it was her daughter, Princess Anne, who was in the local headlines 25 years ago with the official opening on 4th December 1975 of Lion Yard – one of the subjects for next week's Memories – so if you have a story please let me know.

Do you remember Ram Yard, I asked. Yes replied several readers

Jean Potter, now of Golding Road, Cambridge, lived there between 1951 & 1952, in a house just behind Prziborsky's. With her husband, a policeman, she rented a downstairs flat with half-panelled walls whose sitting room, bath and kitchen windows looked out into Ram Yard. They were never short of company, for two police beats passed their walls, one taking in Round Church Street, the other Ram Yard, so the coffee pot was constantly hot to revive passing Bobbies. They stayed until purpose-built police houses were available in Walpole Road, though one of them was set on fire just before they were due to move in.

Mrs P. Pryor of Stapleford was nearly a neighbour, for her mother and father moved into number 12b Ram Yard in 1952. It had a paved yard and her father was a keen gardener he lifted all the slabs and planted flowers, creating a little haven of colour – of which she has sent a snap. It was wonderful to live in the centre of the city, she recalls, although there was one problem: “The yard light went out at midnight and if I was too late back on a Saturday night from the ‘Dot’ of the Guildhall dance, I had to run down this “black hole” to get home!” Her dad, Jack Vickery, managed the shoe repair business ‘Thrussells’ next door. [MRS PRYOR’S SNAP OF HER IN THE GARDEN AT RAM YARD]

Molly Sekulla of Campkin Road, Cambridge, remembers Thrussells and also the Spiritualist meetings that were held in another building nearby. She worked as a tailoress for R. Buttress & Co of St John’s Street between 1946 and 1956. They had premises at 5 Round Church Street and in Ram Yard where the room was above the Cambridge University Cruising Club. Molly and some other dozen or so girls and men used to undertake bespoke tailoring, making men’s and ladies’ suits, blazers, University scarves, ties, gowns and hoods as well as zephyrs – old fashioned tee shirts – which were trimmed in college colours for the boat races. [CAN WE FIND & USE THE PICTURE OF RAM YARD DUG OUT FOR MEMORIES TWO WEEKS AGO]

**

The snaps of Grays workshop, that I featured last week, have attracted memories from two of the girls who used to work there during the war years, Ruby Ketteridge and Joyce Catlin, both now living in the Cherry Hinton area. They had little option for girls then had to undertake work either in factories, the forces, nursing or on the land. Joyce had started work at Chivers when she was 15, but with the war the Company was unable to insure people under 16 so she had to leave. Both recall that working winding armatures was hard on the hands, Ruby developed blisters despite daily inspections, but Joyce says it cured her from biting her nails since handling the wire left an awful taste. Ruby treasures a copy of a photograph showing over 90 of the staff who used to work there, complete with a list of the names. Joyce is amongst them, along with the Manager, Mr F. Ashley and Mr A. Bedworth, the buyer and costing accountant who we believe took the newly-discovered snaps.

But there is still a mystery, for neither of the ladies recall anything about barrage balloon making – so was that somewhere else?

**

Stella Cornell of Bottisham has responded to my appeal for memories of village shops with a poem dedicated to Polly Watson’s store at Swaffham Bulbeck:

“The things she kept within that shop
From sugar mice to spinning-top.
Pear drops and aniseed balls
All mouth-watering lined the walls

The counter all was made of wood
And lifted up as counters should
Upon it stood the old brass scales
On which she weighed her many sales.

Although a shop no more it is Selling sweets and fizzy fizz
In memory I step again
Into that shop near Quarry Lane”

Do you remember it? [PIC OF SWAFFHAM BULBECK FROM NEWS FILES]

**

It was a long-shot when I appealed for assistance in tracking down the story of Cambridge's Meadowcroft Hotel, in Trumpington Road and its connection with the Brackenhurst Hotel in Kenya. But within days a response had been received from Barbara Blake of Barnet who had actually visited the rambling Tudor-style building on the hills outside Nairobi. Now, thanks to her, Roger Foster tells me he has heard from an Oxford lady recounting details of its owner, Hudson Cane and his wife. The Cambridge University Library even has in its Commonwealth Society Library a guidebook from the 1930s with a picture of the hotel. So if you have a piece of research and need help, don't ask the audience – ask the News readers! Write to Mike Petty at the News.

**

Whilst visiting the Cambridge University Library map room the other week I noticed a display of photographs of Cambridge inns that have now vanished. They pictures are part of a collection built up by J Palmer Clarke and later Ramsey & Muspratt, and are quite well known in local historical circles. But one seems to have baffled the experts for this view of the Castle Inn (demolished about 1880) surely shows the west side of Guildhall Street – the Guildhall side, and not the east side, the bit redeveloped for Lion Yard as the caption claims. Are there any 120-year-old drinkers out there who can confirm it! [SCAN]

**

Another photograph from a much more recent period has come to light amongst the News files. It shows the Red Caps Rock Band and was taken in August 1960. But who were they, and did they make the big time. If you can help please let me know [SCAN]

Memories 6th December 2000, by Mike Petty

Amongst my personal mementoes at home I have a little folded card brochure commemorating the occasion when on 4th December 1975 the Lion Yard redevelopment was officially opened by The Princess Anne. The once-pristine front cover has now started to discolour slightly, but can it really be 25 years ago that the bold new initiative to bring Cambridge shopping into the modern age was given a Royal send-off.

The initial ideas for such comprehensive redevelopment dated back to 1952 when two large new shopping streets were proposed – and later rejected. Another scheme in 1959 met a similar fate and it was not until 1968 that the basic outline of the present scheme was accepted. Arup Associates were commissioned to prepare a design which was approved in 1970. Then came negotiations to acquire the land.

It had all been followed by many months of demolition, rebuilding, noise and dust as the south side of Petty Cury, together with Alexandra Street and Falcon Yard, were razed to provide a site for the new shopping centre and car park. Work on the first stage – the car park - had begun in December 1970 with the first section opened in July 1972. A year later work started on the main commercial development and the new Central Library.

By December 1975 Library staff, like those working in the many new shops, had been acclimatising ourselves to the new world, getting fitter as we walked further across carpeted floors and climbing more stairs than ever existed in the old Wheeler Street building. Now we had a library to be proud of, and we were getting a Royal visitor to boot.

Outside stood the Lion on his pedestal looking down on the centre of the new development's shopping centre. Believed to be the original wood carving for a cast lion which stood over the old Red Lion brewery at Waterloo station, it had been discovered at the Woburn Abbey antique centre and completely refurbished at the city engineer's workshops at Mill Road. Now it had been put up in what was believed would be its final home- the Lion Yard. It would oversee a development where people could chat to their friends, gaze at the shops or lounge in the open-air Heidelberg Garden.

An estimated 10,000 people packed the Market Square and stood eight deep each side of Petty Cury as Princess Anne, making her first official visit to Cambridge, walked into the Lion's den accompanied by the official party of councillors, developers, architects and dignitaries. But she found time to stop and talk to the delighted shop girls who were crowding their doorways and also to the eager shoppers who pressed forward to get a closer look at her.

Inevitably criticisms that had been voiced about the architecture of the Lion Yard were referred to during the formal speeches. The city council's Labour leader, Coun Peter Wright, spoke of the 'dissension' which still existed over the complex. Princess Anne, who declared herself a "VI – that means very independent" observer of the architectural scene, said she would report back on the project to two "former students" at Cambridge University when she returned to London.

Then having unveiled plaques and signed visitors' books she was off to lunch at Christ's College and everybody prepared for the rush of people who would, in the Princess' words "come to appreciate this new centre and to love it". [PIX FROM NEWS FILES]

**

Whilst on the subject of Royal Visits Margaret Pearce Higgins has e-mailed to say she was surprised to see a picture of herself with the Queen at the opening of new Addenbrooke's in 1962 in last week's Memories

"I was at that time a student nurse, and my name was Margaret Earl. I don't know why I was chosen to represent the student nurses, except that I was local from Fenstanton and attended Ramsey Grammar School. I was working on the Children's ward and told about my selection two days before her visit. My family were vetted and a new uniform prepared for me. The day before I practised my curtsying with the senior nurse tutor, Miss Tennant, in the place of the Queen. Today I am President of the Addenbrooke's League of Nurses. I married the undergraduate that I took to the Matron's Ball (Miss Puddicombe) in 1963, and have lived in Cambridge since, working as a District Nursing Sister for many years. I still love nursing as much today as I told the Queen I did 38 years ago!"

**

Photographs of war-workers at Grays factory have continued to jog memories. Mrs P. Marsh from Arbury Road, Cambridge was the store keeper there for four years, Mollie Chamberlain (nee Saunders) worked on the barrage balloon side of the works, getting covered in silver and the awful solution used for sticking seams together. Then she worked winding coils for Spitfires, Wellingtons and, she thinks, Lancasters. They had RAF aircrew come round to see they work they were doing and stress how important their tasks were for plane engines. Once the war was over it was back to making tennis balls and racquets.

The definitive account of Grays' war work comes from Richard Gray, one of the Directors. Their records confirm that during the war the firm operated a factory on the site of Grays Court on Milton Road, Cambridge, producing fins for barrage balloons and armature winding which were sent to Woods of Colchester. Their main factory at the time was in Benson Street where they also engaged in war work, producing control panels for the Mosquito aircraft, ten pegs, mallets, water troughs and a variety of other wooden items. The Milton Road site had been used as tennis and badminton courts and was sold to Pyes in 1961 when it was used as a warehouse.

Grays Cambridge factory closed in 1986 when the market shifted from wood to graphite racquets and the head office moved to East Sussex. However the company continues as the only remaining manufacturer of racquets for Real Tennis and Rackets at their former saw mill in Coton & is now controlled by the great and great great grandsons of H.J. Gray, the work champion rackets player in 1861 who founded Grays in Cambridge in 1855.

**

My picture of the Red Caps Rock Band in 1960 brought an immediate response from Nick Winnington, landlord of the Wagon & Horses at Milton, who remembered them as a Birmingham based group that had several hits. He's right – but there was another band of the same name based in Cambridge, as Ken Waterson has been telling me. Ken should know because he played for them for a while, before going on to bigger things. Their line up changed from time to time but included Tony Clark, Ned Bishop, Alan Baker and the late Jimmy Graham. The group played many gigs at the Carlton Club in Newmarket as well as in Cambridge and the villages around.

Ken thinks they also played at Littleport and, if so, they may have performed at one of their 'Miss Littleport' competitions such as this one in January 1964. Do you recognise yourself or anybody?
[SCAN 24 FROM ENCLOSED CD-ROM]

**

The mystery of the bus that crashed into a cottage in High Street Chesterton has now been solved by Mr P. Clarke of Rampton. He was a police Traffic Sergeant at the time and numbers this amongst just one of the incidents he had to deal with. He has sent me a copy of the report from the News that confirms the date as Tuesday 1st October 1963. The house, which had been due to be demolished anyway, was almost wrecked as the bus crashed through the outside wall pushing tons of bricks into Mrs Rhoda Stanford's living room. She was away at the time and considered herself very lucky to have escaped injury. [SCAN OF CUTTING]

**

Ted Mudd of Victoria Road, Cambridge tells me his brother was a sergeant in the University of Cambridge Unit Home Guard during the last war and thinks he recognises himself in the picture I featured the other week. Their HQ was at the Fort St George on Midsummer Common which they would have defended to the end.

David Beynon has e-mailed to seek your assistance. He writes :

“Having made contact with an old schooldays chum of mine of whom I had not heard since 1948, we were recalling events in the Cherryhinton Road area in the period 1943 - 1944. As schoolboys, we were very much impressed by the Daimler, Humber and Staghound armoured cars that were parked in Lichfield Road and other side streets at the Perne Road end of Cherryhinton Road and which were operated by the 27th Lancers. We recalled particularly the Unit HQ & cookhouse that were located in the grounds of a large old house on the site now occupied by Lilac Court, and the morning parades in Hinton Avenue. We believe that the Regiment subsequently moved to the Linton area, before [presumably] embarking for D-Day and the war on mainland Europe.

Since our conversation, we have both tried in vain to find out any of the history of this Unit. Do any of your "Memories" readers recall the 27th Lancers? What happened to the soldier who was [according to local beliefs at the time] severely injured/killed when unfortunately crushed between two of the armoured cars in Lichfield Road?"

You can contact David at djbeynon@amserve.net or write or e-mail me at the News

Memories 13th December 2000, by Mike Petty

Dry Drayton has come under the spotlight with the publication of their millennium history, entitled 'Gallows Piece to Bee Garden'. It is a comprehensive village history of the highways and byways, priests and parsons, farmers and landowners, people and places – but it has something more. For one of those parsons, Francis Walker was a keen observer of village flora and fauna way back in 1876 and his own History of Dry Drayton included a comprehensive list of plants and animals to be found among the lanes. Since then the countryside has changed out of all recognition, with war and agricultural revolutions obliterating the landscape he knew. Now as part of the new history Val Perrin has made a new survey of the insects and birds, plants and shrubs in the parish to provide what may be a unique record of the changing face of the natural history of an English country village.

It is was a village well served by itinerant tradespeople, some of whom have been recalled by its elder statesman, John Hacker. He remembers several gentlemen who would walk or cycle round the district with bulging suitcases stuffed with soft fabrics or other articles of clothing. One dapper little man, a Mr Dewsbury cycled, leaning over the handlebars with his heavy portmanteau strapped to the carrier behind his seat. Mr Onyatt, a heavily-built man, always wore plus-fours, knee length stockings and a tweed jacket, while Henry Cooper was always known as 'Willy Whiskers' – for obvious reasons. 'Old Skinny' was a lean rakish figure, wearing cloth cap and grubby mac, whose tradesman's bike carried a basket of kippers, bloaters, mackerel and herrings on behalf of Mr Chapman, Fishmonger. He also bought rabbit skins for which he would pay as much as sixpence, making the skin the most expensive part of the animal.

Travelling hardware shops like those of Robert Brown of Sturton Street, Cambridge dispensed soaps and paraffin, delivering one week's supplies and taking orders for the following week at the same time. The visiting grocer had perfected a patter of gentle reminders which he would sing or chant: 'Soap, soda, candles, matches; salt mustard, vinegar, pepper; butter mar, lard, suet' – varying it at this time of year to include 'Currants, dates, sultanas, raisins'

Christmas too would be a busier time for the village post office whose one-time postman Fred Walker always rode a lady's bicycle, because he said it was easier to mount and dismount. When he died his third wife, Janet Scambler, took over the post round, but she delivered the letters from an old pram. She also took out telegrams for which she received sixpence for delivering the message and returning with any replies required. But when the post office was shut distraught husbands would throw stones up at the rectory window to get somebody to phone for the midwife on one of the only four telephones the village possessed.

Now with mobile telephones, and internet communication it all seems so long ago. But is only the day before yesterday, & the story is well caught in the 180-page book, obtainable from Rosemary Gardiner at Honey Hill Cottage, Pettits Lane, Dry Drayton CB3 8BT (01954 780679) for £9.95 plus £2 postage. [PICTURES FROM NEWS FILES]

**

One distinctive figure in the streets of Cambridge is the sandwich board man. In May 1961 the CDN photographer snapped Mr Robert Doggett in St Andrew's Street. He was advertising Castle Hill Driving School whose expert tuition was available at the rate of 15/- (75p) per hour. Mr Doggett had not always been a sandwich man, he had worked in college kitchens, on building sites and as a newspaper vendor. He was fit, for as he told the News, strapped between his boards he could walk about the town for three or four hours without feeling the least bit tired.

Do you recognise him – or anybody else in the picture? [SCAN]

**

Roy Gifford has set us all a challenge. He inherited from his grandfather, Mr Frederick Gifford (1865-1952) an ancient long-cased clock made and signed by T.E. Murfitt, a Cottenham clockmaker, dated 23rd April 1842.

On the face it has the inscription "W. Furbank, Loxpit-Hall". Roy knows Mr W. Furbank was his granddad's father in law. He remembers him saying that they were farmers who farmed both sides of the river. They would often have to take two horses, one at a time, in a flat-bottomed boat, across the river to do a day's work and then bring them back by the same method at the end of the day.

Also on the clock face are five paintings. Two show a two-storey thatched house, two a smaller thatched property. The biggest view shows two figures are approaching a thatched cottage beside a river with what appears to be a hill in the background. Do any of these represent Loxpit, or Lockspit Hall a remote farm that stood on the banks of the Old West River, half way between the Aldreth Causeway and Twentypence Ferry. The name comes from the small trenches that divide fenland and is found in Littleport, Willingham & Cottenham parishes and probably dates back to the 1630s.

Roy would welcome any clues & I'll be happy to pass letters on. [COLOUR PICTURES ENCLOSED – PLEASE RETURN MIKE PETTY]

**

More memories of the Redcaps rock band have come in by e-mail from Dave Parker who confirms the line-up in the 1960 photograph as Grahame Smith ('Smudge') on Rhythm Guitar, Grahame Bishop ('Neddy') on Bass Guitar, Jimmy Graham, Lead Guitar. The drummer was Robin Bailey and the lead singer Tony Clarke.

Dave took over as lead singer in 1961 after Tony Clarke, known as 'Tony Earthquake Collino' had left to join 'The Prowlers' and has the definitive story of the group. Towards the end of 1962 they were signed by Decca Records (just after they had turned down 'The Beatles'), Dave changed his name and the group became 'Dean Parker and the Redcaps'. They put out a single, 'Stormy Evening / Blue Eyes and Golden Hair' written by Cambridge undergraduate Paul Williams, who went on to become a BBC Radio 1 producer. It was featured recently on BBC Radio 2 on their 'Sounds of the Sixties' programme.

Mick and Barbara Rooney of Chesterton remembers the group: "one summer evening a group of us met in the Robin Hood pub, later to go on to the Roman Woods where we had a party, cooking sausages over an open fire. Someone worked for a Company who supplied us with equipment for lighting and amplification for the Redcaps who entertained us till dawn. 'Living Doll' was a big hit at that time. It was all good fun, nobody getting drunk or using drugs. We just laughed and danced the night away"

**

The war-work done by Grays at their factories in Cambridge, has been largely overlooked by historians, but now thanks to News readers far more details have come in. Dorothy Musson (nee Green) from Ely worked at the Benson Street works off Huntingdon Road where they made fins for barrage balloons on ships. They were long wooden poles with two smaller ones called toggle arms that were jointed and fastened together to form a triangle. These were sandpapered and given several coats of varnish – the smell made the girls yawn a lot. Each balloon had three fins which were folded up with silver material by the girls at Milton Road. After the contract finished most of the girls transferred to Pye Radio to continue their war work. Dorothy is still friends with another of the Grays works, then Peggy Wilson.

Mrs Gill Morgan (nee Bedworth) from Solihull, whose dad's pictures have prompted such interest, thinks that parachutes were also made and folded, as she has memories of seeing them hanging from the ceiling – but it is all a very long time ago. She also recalls how her mother took bundles of wires and coloured thread to housewives who were paid one penny for each twelve wires they threaded – sometimes the children would do some as well, to add to their pocket money.

**

Last week David Beynon asked for memories about the 27th Lancers during the war, who had their headquarters in a large house in Lichfield Road. Now Marie Burrows of Hinton Avenue, Cambridge, has written in to say that she lived in that very house, 'Falconhurst', until 1940 when her family moved to a smaller property in Luard Road. The house was requisitioned on the day they moved out. She adds: "The house is still there & so is the site of the cookhouse which was my father's garage. The property was sold after the war & several years later part of the garden was used for Lilac Court and its garages".

**

More Ram Yard memories have come from Phyllis Peck (nee Stratton) of Cambridge who was firewatching at Thrussell's Shoe Shop when a German plane bombed Ram Yard – does anybody remember this? Jeanne Barker from Hardwick says the articles have brought back many memories to her. "My best friend, when I was at the County High School, Madge Cadwallader lived in Ram Yard. We used to have such wonderful parties in the old building. I remember endless staircases, landings and almost forgotten rooms in the somewhat ramshackled building. My teenage years seemed to be full of parties in large houses. Gordon Laurie's mum in her big house on the rise in Chesterton Lane baked the most wonderful cakes at least two feet square, and it was a super place to play 'sardines' (quite daring in those days). Other parties were held at 'Kenmare' in Trumpington Street."

Jeanne also recalls how Prziborsky's was the hairdressers to go too before the ar. Her late husband Roy, being still at school, could not afford to go, but his older brother Brian, who was always 'with it' was proud to be a client.

**

Daphne Foreman from Sturton Street is reminded of the visit of the King and Queen to Cambridge in 1947. "It was a roasting hot day and I was working as an office junior in the office of Denton-Smith the architect, over Dolby's gown shop at 40 Regent Street. I went out of the long drawing-office window on to the flat roof over Dolby's works, It was lead-covered and threw up the heat from the sun, and one of the men made me a flag from drawing paper. The King and Queen were in an open-topped car and I had a super view, looking right down into it.

"It must have been later that summer when there was a terrifically heavy storm of rainfall and Dolby's basement was flooded. The youngest trainee architect and I were told (not asked in those days) to go down to help bale out the basement. We had to take off our shoes and wade in about a foot of water with buckets, baling out into a sink or toilet. Dolby's was later taken over by Currys"

**

Can anybody help Margaret Smith of St Ives. About two years ago she heard a story on Radio Cambridgeshire about Thomas Allen of Fenstanton, who was a highwayman. Apparently Thomas and a cohort held up Oliver Cromwell on the Cambridge Road. Thomas was shot in the leg and his partner in crime killed. Margaret thinks it extremely likely that he was an ancestor of hers and would like more details. Sadly nobody can help her track down a book that tells the story. Do you have any ideas?

**

Memories 20th December 2000 by Mike Petty

The reputation of this column for solving problems has received its greatest challenge to date. Father Christmas has a present he is anxious to deliver, but doesn't know who to.

The great man has a number of little helpers of all sorts all around the world, but his main assistant in Cambridge for the last 30 years has been Donald Patman, and it is he who has made contact with the 'Memories' column.

Donald tells me that the real Father Christmas always looked forward to his visits to the Eaden Lilley store in Market Street, Cambridge where he met so many children, some good, some a little naughty, some shy, some boisterous. But they all recognised that the big cuddly man with his red coat and trousers, his shiny black boots and snowy white whiskers, was somebody they could trust with their secrets. There was always a present from out of his sack and to go with it a souvenir photograph of their meeting with Santa. One of these pictures, taken about six years ago, was so good that Santa arranged for a large mounted print of it to be made that he could take back to his own home, but now he would like to pass it on to the little girl concerned. He has gone through his lists, poured over his diaries, racked his brains – and even asked Rudolph, but to no avail. So now he has turned to us for help. Do you recognise the tot on Santa's lap. If so please contact the Newsdesk immediately.

Years ago as in 1925, Father Christmas arrived in Cambridge by train. Crowds of young and old alike would assemble outside the station to see him arrive. Waiting for him was a coach like one from a fairy tale. He had a coachman resplendent in green and gold livery, a footman in blue, & two trumpeters attired in old gold facings and velvet breeches. To the sound of a fanfare of trumpets and the strains of the band he would start on a triumphal tour of the town, en route to his temporary home at Heyworth's stores in Burleigh Street he was officially welcomed to 'Treasure Island'.

In 1943 Santa's arrival was not heralded by the traditional sound of sleigh bells but the roar of an aeroplane engine when he landed at Marshall's airport to attend a Christmas party being held there for children of the reserves on the station. It was then he first appreciated how useful such a large open space would be for him to feed and rest his reindeer while he popped into to Don's house nearby.

Then in 1950 he remembers several hundred children standing in the Cambridge streets & gazing with admiring and speculative eyes as he rode round the town in a lorry from the New Theatre to Mitcham's shop, where he eventually took up residence at the annual toy fair. Many children ran after him for varying distances, but none was so energetic as the youngster dressed in green who ran after the procession from start to finish – a total time of some 50 minutes. When the procession reached Mitcham's Corner, Father Christmas did his traditional disappearing act of climbing down the chimney of the store – but nowadays, with so many houses having central heating he has developed new ways of gaining entry to the homes of little girls and boys. Not even Donald knows quite how he does it, but he asks me to pass on Santa's especial plea that as well as a mince pie and small glass of sherry (not too much because he easily gets tipsy these days!) children should also remember a small piece of apple or carrot for Rudolph.

Gone are the times when kiddies could have breakfast with Santa at Eaden Lilley's with Rice Krispies and pop, sausages and beans while their parents had to make do with more boring things like smoked salmon and Bucks Fizz. In those days Father Christmas used to arrive on a variety of transport, sometimes on sleighs pulled by dogs or reindeers, sometimes by traction engine and once in probably the most famous car in the world, Chitty Chitty Bang Bang. That really was a treat, even though it took so much petrol that he had to keep popping into the garage to top up the tank.

These days you may glimpse him driving around Cambridge in just an ordinary-looking little car, peering through the gap between his furry hat and furry whiskers, as he visits house to house. One little girl on Arbury Road was walking with her dolls' pram when she saw him waiting at the traffic lights. There was even one occasion when he tried to deliver a present at one house but was unable to get in. So he knocked at the house next door, to ask if he would leave the present there instead. The door was opened by a teenage girl who took once glance at the figure on the doorstep and fled upstairs, screaming hysterically, totally unable to believe her eyes.

But it's not just the young who might meet the famous man. For last week he was mixing with older boys and girls – some in their 90s, at the East Barnwell Community Centre. This is a place that holds many memories for Donald, for it was there at its opening in 1945 that he glimpsed the young lady who has been his wife now for over 50 Christmases. He was a railwayman in those days, a fireman on hospital troop trains, he then went to work at the University Arms as a buffet chef, before becoming a removal man for the Co-op where he really became interested in being one of Santa's helpers. Afterwards he worked at Pye TVT whose staff would take toys to work so there would be an extra present to be delivered to children on Christmas morning.

So where do all the presents come from these days. Though many are made by Santa's helpers themselves, he does really appreciate all the toys and teddies that are collected throughout the year by people like Don who has bags and bags of goodies ready to be loaded on to the sleigh in a few days time. And of course sometimes you might spot Father Christmas topping up his basket in the local supermarket.

But wherever you see him, or even if you don't, I hope he'll find you wherever you are and bring you a very Happy Christmas. And if any of this jogs your memory, then settle down after the Xmas pud and drop me a line about your memories of the Christmases you remember

PICTURES

USE THE COLOUR PIC OF FATHER CHRISTMAS WITH THE GIRL ON HIS LAP. THIS IS A SMALL COPY OF THE BIGGER PRINT THAT DONALD PATMAN WANTS TO GIVE TO THE GIRL CONCERNED. IF ANYBODY APPIES PLEASE CONTACT DON AT 26 THE HOMING (NEWMARKET ROAD) – PHONE 292724

PHOTOGRAPHIC HAVE PICTURES TAKEN LAST WEEK OF 90-YEAR OLDS AT THE EAST BARNWELL COMMUNITY CENTRE

PLEASE INCLUDE THE CHITTY CHITTY BANG BANG PICTURE FROM AMONGST THE OTHERS ENCLOSED

Memories 27th December 2000, by Mike Petty

85-year-old Mrs Frances Tebbit has watched with interest the news of the possible move of Marshall's airport to allow more space for housing in Cambridge. She used to live in Whitehill Road, on what was the first airfield, before it moved just a bit further down Newmarket Road. From there she could see the comings and goings of the various planes that flew in – and on one occasion thought one flown by a lady ferry pilot was going to land on her! Now that she's moved to nearby Quy Frances is still in the flight path and enjoys seeing all types of planes.

The sound of aircraft engines reverberating across the countryside is one that can annoy those who live below. But on the night of 16th/17th December 1943 that noise was far greater than experienced today, especially in the area around Bourn. For etched into the landscape were the runways from which Lancaster bombers took off for their perilous journeys deep into Europe. Villagers counted them out and counted them in again.

The planes were crewed by men who had done it all before; they were also crewed by those for whom it was the very first trip, including Peter Mack, always known as Joe. He climbed aboard his Lancaster alongside his pilot, Ted Thackway, Jack Powell, Sandy Grant, Leslie Laver, George Grundy and Tony Lawrence.

The aircrew had made their way to the briefing room to discover their destination was the big city itself, Berlin. Once the briefing was over came the waiting. There was nothing to do but laugh too loudly at small jokes and smoke too many cigarettes. Then one by one the great engines were started, one by one the bombers lumbered, fully laden, down the runways and clawed their way into the sky. It was five to five when they left the ground, it was eight o'clock at night when they arrived over Berlin, along with 450 other bombers.

The journey was eventful, their spell over the target brief, but horrifying as they added their 10,000 lbs of bombs to the inferno beneath. Then it was done, the searchlights and flak were behind them and it was time to head back home, watching all the way for more searchlights, more flak, more enemy aircraft. As they crossed the North Sea Ted brought the aircraft down so they could remove their oxygen masks and breathe a sight of relief. Joe assumed his usual role of crew clown and cracked a joke over the intercom. Everybody exploded with laughter. Their first, very dangerous, raid was over. They had made it back to Blighty. They were minutes from home. They were minutes from death.

Twenty one Lancasters returned back to Bourn, all would land within a space of 90 minutes. One by one they arrived but none could find the field. For thick fog blanketed the area and there was no way of illuminating the runway. One by one the pilots, the navigators, the rear gunners – everybody – peered into the murk, trying to spot a landmark. And they listened as those planes before them in the queue tried to land. As they circled, waiting, so the fuel drained away until there was no more left & the engines died.

Joe's pilot made a landing, but not on the runway. The plane ploughed across a muddy field in a horrible, grinding impact, shedding splinters of its structure as it did so. The fog-bound night shuddered and reverberated, then silence fell. They were down. Joe was alive, but trapped from his waist in twisted metal – and that metal was getting hotter. The fire that broke out set off the unexpended ammunition, bullets whistled everywhere, parts of the fabric melted in the heat.

Joe was lucky, he was pulled out by a passing airman, who'd been making his way back to base after an illicit visit to Cambridge, and by his only other crewman to survive, Leslie Laver. But he was horribly injured and rushed off first to the Leys School, which had been taken over as an annexe for Addenbrooke's Hospital. Later he was transferred to the Royal Air Force Hospital at Ely. At the time of his admittance it had been opened for some three and a half years and was regarded as the most modern and well-built of all the RAF hospitals. A two-storied brick building it was designed in the shape of the letter H with the wards running out at right angles from the cross stroke. Its most striking feature was the large area of window space facing south to obtain the maximum sunshine. It was surrounded by large and beautiful grounds which by 1944 incorporated large numbers of Nissen huts in anticipation of a flood of casualties from the D-Day landings. It was here that Joe was treated in saline baths for the severe burns and fractured legs he suffered in his crash.

There were two orthopaedic wards. Ward 2 was known as the 'clean' ward and Ward 3 was the 'dirty' or 'stinking' ward. Here the smell from fractures that had become infected could be unbelievably awful, especially during hot weather. Joe recalled how masses of flies would descend on the sheets of the worst cases.

Joe Mack was Jennie Gray's dad. She used to listen to his story of that terrible night, when so many other lives were wrecked in fog. Now she has told his story, returning to the field where it happened, walking the furrows and locating fragments of metal and Perspex that marked the site. Her account of Black Thursday brings to life something of what war meant to the thousands of people who flew from Bourn and the surrounding airfields, now almost entirely forgotten. But it does more than that since the book records also the wartime role of the Ely RAF hospital, itself now just a memory. Thanks to her a forgotten tragedy has been recalled and the courage of those who flew, and those who stood and waited for their return, recognised.

Fire by night: the dramatic story of one Pathfinder crew and Black Thursday, 16/17 December 1943, by Jennie Gray is published by Grub Street at £17.99

Do you have memories of the RAF Hospital at Ely – write to Mike Petty at the News [SCAN OF PICTURE FROM THE BOOK, SCAN OF MORE MODERN PICS OF THE RAF HOSPITAL]

**

**

Can you help trace the story of the 27th Lancers Regiment based in Cambridge during the war, asked David Beynon. Yes, answers Kenneth Horton of Wulfstan Way, for I was one of them.

Can you help trace the story of lonely Loxpit Hall, asked Roy Gifford of Cottenham. Yes responded Edna Burgess of Haddenham – I have the deeds. Yes responded John Furbank of Gt Shelford who has researched the family story and actually visited the Hall before it was demolished.

Do you recognise anybody amongst the nurses meeting the Queen at the opening of New Addenbrooke's. Yes replies Margaret Culver, (nee Parkin), e-mailing from Binghamton, New York, USA. She writes: "A school friend sent me a copy of your column with photos of past visits of the Queen to Cambridge. The main photo was of her talking to a nurse in the guard of honour. I thought you might be interested to hear of the whereabouts of two of the nurses in the photo. I am the person standing just behind the nurse being presented and Christine Fallee (nee Place) is the person whose face only is showing between the two nurses in the front row". Margaret has lived in America since 1963 and her friend Christine is now in New Jersey. She adds: we have many friends from our days in Cambridge. It is always good to hear news from one of our favourite cities and of course I was totally surprised to see the article! I have two regular photos of it purchased back in 1962 and one is proudly displayed in my office"

Lucy Peck has e-mailed to say she was amused to see a photo of her husband, Phil, delivering the milk at Dry Drayton back in 1978.

Peter Feast from Milton Road, Cambridge, has written to say he has a copy of the record issued by the Cambridge band, Dean Parker and the Redcaps. But he asks: “if there anything you can turn up, photowise, on The Phantoms. They were also very big around the local venues and made one record issued in 1961 on Palette PG 9014. But they did go on to make a number of others when they went off to Sweden, and I believe got fairly big over there. I first saw this group around the winter of ’58 along Newmarket Road in a pub I believe called the 5 Bells, near the junction of Coldham’s Lane. There was a stage in the main room and when I walked in the place was packed and rockin’. It’s a vision that’s stuck with me forever. This group had a singer by the name of Johnny Cullen or Cullum, but he cut no records with the band as far as I know.”

MYSTERY PICTURE

Can anybody help identify this picture, which I believe was taken at Ely Post Office, probably about 1965 [SCAN]

Memories 2001 in one sequence

Memories, 3rd January 2001, by Mike Petty replacement first paragraph

The recent frost and snow has reawaken memories of old-time pursuits. Somebody in our village even built a snowman, there is some evidence of a snowball battle and various youngsters have been seen on make-shift toboggans. There are even some who hope that roller blades may be able to give way to ice skates.

But despite global warming we will have to go some way yet to meet the conditions of the great frost that lasted from January to March 1895, unbroken except for very brief thaws. From January 18th to the 25th there were snowstorms, floods & north-west gales. Frosts of 15 to 20 degrees turned hundreds of acres of flooded land into skating rinks & for two months it was possible to skate from Cambridge to Grantchester or Ely. Three fields at Newnham were flooded & illuminated by electric lights, which allowed skaters to flock there in evenings.

The National Skating Association, which had been established in Cambridge in 1879, organised races on the ice at Littleport, when 4,000 people assembled to see the most famous skaters of the day. From Cowbit, Southery, Upwell and Whittlesey they came to compete against southerners from Cottenham, Waterbeach and Landbeach. Then there were outsiders from Walthamstowe and Leicester and even an international challenge.

The names of the old skating fenmen are well-known: William ‘Turkey’ Smart, George ‘Fish’ Smart, William ‘Gutta Percha’ See and the rest. Now their achievements are once more revived in a new illustrated history of fen speed skating. It features biographies of the professional champions, men like Sid Greenhall of Landbeach who became British Professional Champion at his first attempt in 1908 & Don Pearson of Mepal – a mere 19 years old when he won in 1929, beating 57 year-old Walter Housden of Upware who had been Amateur Champion was back in 1891.

The first Amateur Skating Championship was held in 1880 at Hendon, but it was a fenman who took the title. Fred Norman was a gentleman farmer from Queenholme Farm near the Old West River, later moving to Lynden Farm, Haddenham in 1917. One of his achievements was to skate around the Isle of Ely in a day. Starting down the Old West River and the Ouse to Denver Sluice and returning on the New Bedford River to Earith and back home.

Normally races have to be held quickly, before the thaw comes but in 1895 there was plenty of time over. So in February they decided to hold a special event: a skating race from Cambridge to Ely and back. The interest was intense and amongst those attending was W.G. Grace, the famous cricketer. In the event the starting point had to be moved to Bottisham so it was decided to make the race from there to Ely, back to Bottisham and on to Ely again. By the time they reached Upware for the first time several of the lesser competitors had fallen behind but the lead was being closely contested by a group who arrived at Ely in just 45 minutes. Turning back with the wind behind them they increased speed, averaging a mile in under three minutes they knocked ten minutes off the return leg.

As they started the final leg the competition was between Albert Tebbit from Milton, the Amateur Champion, and H.A. Palmer from Kettering, winner of an International race earlier that month. The two men skated side by side, fighting every inch of the way as they travelled once more past Upware, beyond the junction of the Cam and Old West and on towards the Cathedral, which the winner reached in a time just one minute slower than in the first leg.

In fact there were two winners, for the men could not be separated and crossed the line in a dead heat. Ten others followed them home – just half of the hardy souls who had set off on probably the greatest race ever held by the National Skating Association.

Since then there have been various occasions when outdoor skating has been possible,, perhaps the most famous was that of January 1963 when not only the river froze, but Parker's Piece became an ice-rink.

Do you have memories of skating around Cambridge – write to Mike Petty

Fen speed skating: an illustrated history, by John Slater and Allan Bunch is published by Cambridgeshire Libraries Publications at £6.75

[PICTURES FROM NEWS FILES]

Twenty-five years ago TODAY [IF THIS GOES OUT ON WEDNESDAY, 3RD] the headlines in the News were of 'Killer Gales' as hurricane force winds hit the country leaving a trail of homelessness, damage and blocked roads. Wandlebury woods was, in the words of its warden Bill Clark, "an absolute disaster area" after 50 big trees were ripped up by their roots, and sent crashing down on power lines.

It was a situation repeated throughout the area. The winds struck the giant greenhouses at Parkhall Nurseries, Somersham, smashing three to pieces. "It looks like a battlefield. One of the greenhouses had been literally demolished to the ground and then spread all over the road", confirmed Gordon

Moore. The village's Windmill pub was plunged into darkness as its electricity supply was cut, but landlord Bill Hayes was prepared and quickly produced a supply of candles and tilley lamps and carried on serving. At Newmarket the motor accessory warehouse of Johnson, Burton and Theobald was also open – which proved a problem for its manager Leslie Balls. For its shutter doors were damaged by the wind and he had to spend the night standing guard to prevent thieves getting away with any of the valuable items. Nearby at Caravan International's site some 30 vans were blown over and damaged.

Almost all the stock of top class boats being built by St Neots Rowing Club were lost when the wall of the boathouse collapsed during the recent storm. They included a brand new £1,200 boat that was to have been used by some of their rowers who had been invited to take part in Olympic trials at Henley. Also lost were some old clinker sculls and clinker fours, now virtually irreplaceable.

In Ely chimney pots were sent flying and in St John's Road the flat roofs blown off a line of council garages. These then knocked down a lamppost which blocked the road. At Alconbury the police office roof was damaged but more serious was the loss of a several hundred-year-old barn at Little Chesterford, blown down in the gales.

Newmarket was virtually cut off by fallen trees and at Milton an ancient elm tree was blown down – it had been declared safe by tree experts just a month before. Everywhere council workmen were kept busy during the night clearing fallen trees on most major roads, including the dual carriageway A.1 north-bound road at Southoe. Telephone and electricity engineers worked non-stop to restore services but some villages were without power for more than 48 hours.

Whatever else the year would bring, 1976 had started with a bang! [PICS FROM NEWS FILES]

**

Some bookmakers may have lost money because of snow this Christmas, but, according to Harold Griffiths it was part of the game. "A bookmaker's life is not all make, and is no holiday either" he told the News in April 1961 – 40 years ago. When he was not on a racecourse he was either driving to or from one or studying 'form'. In fact the only spare time he had was just before Christmas. On the whole, he added, he enjoyed his business life, but would not want to inflict it on any of his friends.
PICTURE SCANNED

**

Christmas is traditionally a time for family get-togethers but many feel that family life is not what it used to be, the fabric of society is changing. It is worth considering what a social worker for the Cambridge Association for the Care of Girls told a meeting of the Cambridge Inner Wheel, 50 years ago. Mrs Everies explained that part of her work involved her talking to girls in senior schools. In addition to questions on sex they were concerned about the correct behaviour to boy friends, whether 16 was too young to start going out with a boy, whether they should use lipstick or make-up and if they would allow a boy to kiss them on bringing them home after a first dance.

She put some of the problem for failed relationships down to the war. Whereas 30 years before broken marriages had not entered into the middle class houses it was very different in 1951. "I believe the break-up of marriages in what we used to regard as good, secure homes, has had repercussions from the top to bottom of society", she said. There was the attitude that 'If so-and-so can do it, so can I'. Some people entered into marriage lightly, thinking that if it didn't work they could break it up, but this could have a profound affect. She spoke of cases where a man and woman had been divorced and had married. Perhaps both had children of their first marriage, and of their own union. There was often a complete lack of respect amongst the children, and a wholly chaotic situation.

Mrs Everies felt that youngsters should be taught that marriage was an art. "It is a dreadful thing to have to deal with young couples who, at 23 or 24 are seeking a way out of their marriage. Many girls went into marriage with the idea of having a good time, or because they felt that as their friends were getting married it was time they did the same. But there is the mundane side too, the washing, baking and cleaning. It is one of those things young people don't seem to realise"

However members of her audience felt that there must have been many unhappy marriages in the middle class of former days, but that it had not come to light, as it would in the 1950s. "There was so much humbug then", one remarked. Another had a different reason for the problem: "There is too much sex education given to children nowadays. Perhaps I am old fashioned, but girls of my day were mostly ignorant of these things, yet they have succeeded in making a success of their marriages".

All this comes from January 1951. If it rings a bell with you do drop me a line with your memories.

**

Hilary Humphries from Newmarket is a collector of material relating to Bacon's the tobacconist who used to have their shop in Market Hill, Cambridge. He writes: "As a 12-year old lad in 1950 I collected cigarette packets and would persuade my father to make the odd purchases in the shop, so adding an exclusive item to my collection. I have a selection of labels of cigarettes issued by the shop. I loved the Alma Mater label, it must have been one of Bacon's most popular lines and sold in several different formats, there was even a Billiard Room size". Pack collecting is now a well-established hobby with its own Cigarette packet collectors club and he has a number of items produced by the company.
[SCAN OF PACKET LABELS]

**

More memories of the Gray's wartime work have come in from Edna Bonenfant (nee Brown) who writes all the way from 1539 Stanzione Drive, North Dighton, Massachusetts, USA, who received a cutting of the article from her sister. Edna confirms: "we did make barrage balloons at first, then we began on the armatures for tanks and planes, that was about 1940-41. I was just a young girl then. I was there until 1945 when I married an American airman and came to the USA in 1946". She is still in touch with a few of the girls from those days. It seems as if Edna was a GI Bride – are there any others in the area who would like to share their memories of those times?

**

Peter Mascall has E-mailed to seek your help with his family history. He writes: "My ancestors seem to mainly have lived in the Castle Camps, Histon, Chesterton area. Does anyone remember William Mascall or his wife Mary Ann Leader who married in 1912. He was a master watchmaker and either owned or worked in a watch and jewellery shop in Histon High Street. His nickname was 'Little Billie'". If you can help please contact Peter at 17 Grasmere Gardens, Folkestone, Kent, CT19 5JN

Memories 10th January 2001, by Mike Petty

A picture of the Whitley Bomber repair section at Marshall's featured in Memories a couple of weeks ago has sparked considerable correspondence. Kevin Peters of Cambridge saw his father-in-law, Frederick Taylor on it – a picture his wife had never seen before, and Mr R.A.C. Powell of Arbury tells me he has a complete list of the names. Margaret Pyner of Bourn recognised her father. He was a master upholsterer, a reserved occupation in the war, and was sent to Cambridge to work on the aircraft which were cloth covered, then painted with dope to tighten the cloth over the wood frames. The girls would do the painting and the rest of the team repair the craft. Her dad picked up a lot of aircraft slang – like 'Bang On' for good, 'Jolly Good Show' and 'Top Hole' – which was fascinating language to a child. After the war he set up in Cambridge as an upholsterer in Thompson's Lane in the buildings that had formerly housed the Cambridge Tapestry Works – and Margaret still has the trestles that held the rolls that the girls worked on.

Richard North from Longstanton has written to say his late father used to work there, along with Jack Burnett, Cyril Cooper and a host of people. He recalls: "I have listened for hours with great interest to the many stories Cyril Cooper told me of those dark, yet happy days during the war. Of how the benches gradually disappeared in spite of strict security; of an employee who had a certain Mr Hitler's photograph on his identity card - which was never discovered; and how one early morning engine start-up was preceded by the sound of running feet and the hasty evacuation of an embarrassed couple leaving the aircraft.

**

All these are memories of more than 50 years ago. But does anybody have personal recollections of another weapon of war, the Thor Nuclear Missiles, the first strategic missile system deployed in the free world, capable of attacking targets up to 1,600 miles away. In 1957 Feltwell airfield was chosen to be the first base for these weapons, with four satellite bases. One of these was at Mepal and in April 1959 the News photographed what it described as "a gigantic cigar", a tarpaulin-covered rocket – minus its warhead – being transported through Ely en route to that base. Their presence was opposed by the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament and there were protest marches on Mepal, with its newly-constructed high-security fence, launch pads and associated buildings. During the Cuban Missile Crisis in October 1962 the site was on the highest alert, ready to launch at a moment's notice. The Mepal site closed down in 1963 and its nuclear role is largely forgotten.

In February 1960 the News was invited to see for itself just what was happening at the main Feltwell base. The report makes interesting reading. "There are three Thor missiles, housed horizontally in special shelters which can be rolled back to permit their being erected into a vertical position. Once its warhead has been attached – the work of an hour or so – Thor can be erected, fuelled and launched in 15 minutes. The launch crews each consist of a British officer, and American officer, three senior technical N.C.O.s and one N.C.O. experienced in air crew duties. The rocket would take 15 minutes to reach a target in Russia; the destructive properties of its warhead are in the megaton range"

The reporter asked about the possibilities of the missile being stopped or deflected once it had begun its journey – in case somebody changed their minds. "The officers explained that the rocket was not designed to fail to reach its target, but that if by any chance it failed to achieve the correct speed and trajectory at which the warhead is normally detached then the whole system would fall harmlessly to earth. There was no possibility of its falling in a dangerous condition on to intervening friendly territories", they claimed.

The News report was illustrated with photographs, some of which have not been published before today. SCANS OF THE FELTWELL THOR BASE; SCAN OF CUTTING OF THOR MISSILE AT ELY AND OF THE CLOSURE OF THE MEPAL BASE

**

Claude Ingrey from Great Wilbraham has written with his memories of RAF Hospital, Ely. "While in the RAF in 1945 I was taken to the RAF Hospital because I had a burst stomach ulcer. I received excellent treatment and was very impressed how modern the hospital was, compared with the Old Addenbrooke's, although ward 16 looked a bit like a large Nissen hut. The Hospital had a full size snooker table, a beautiful lounge and a chapel. Once I was able to get up and about I climbed the fence at the back of the Hospital and visited the city. One day I joined a party being taken all over the Cathedral by 90-year-old Canon Raven. Walking over the East window I felt dead scared!. I used to hitch hike home to Cambridge and after eight weeks in hospital I happened to climb in a RAF truck – who should be sitting there but the Hospital Medical Officer and as I was wearing hospital blue clothing my stay was soon over, and I returned to RAF Kimbolton” [SCAN OF ELY RAF HOSPITAL]

**

Cottenham local historian Francis Garrett has added further details to the history of Lockspit Hall. He tells me that in about 1830 William Furbank kept the Lockspit Hall beerhouse and was the ferryman there. The house did a good trade since baptisms were frequently held in the river. His son Thomas took over the pub when William moved to the Wheatsheaf in Cottenham in 1855. Tragically Thomas’ wife, Alice, was accidentally drowned in December 1883 and he later moved to London. There’s another little detail too, for in March 1839 Charles Swann, a maltster, was lost in the snow when making his way home to Cottenham from the Hall.

**

Memories, 17th January 2001, by Mike Petty

Mr G.W. Meeks of Gamlingay was reading his copy of the St Neots Weekly News recently and spotted a report from the village of Shudy Camps. This reminded him of something that his great-grandfather read in the old Cambridge Independent Press some 60 years ago. It was a poem entitled ‘The Country Rover’ which Mr Meeks has since recited at concerts, schools and rest homes throughout the area. He hopes it might spark a wee bit of interest; I’m sure it will.

The Country Rover

There was a man of Cambridgeshire
Who lived at Shudy Camps,
He roamed the county half the year
In long, unhurried tramps.
From Arrington to Barrington
He wandered, stout old rover,
He walked to Reach and Waterbeach
And many times to Over.

For 60 years or more his feet
Have trodden lane and road,
The smooth green grass of Worsted Heath,
The rutty droves of Lode.
He had a dog, who used to jog
Beside him on his travel,
They roamed the heights of Gog-ma-gog,
The fens of Witcham Gravel.

He’s sat and drank his quart of beer
And munched his bread and mutton
At all the inns in Cambridgeshire, from Hildersham to Sutton.
As for sport, he used to court
A girl from Cherry Hinton
At Burwell he had two or three
And another one at Linton.

High on the hill at Haslingfield

He'd sit & see aloft
The clouds go by, or lie concealed
By Bourn Brook's bank at Toft.
Or sleep away a summer's day
Beside the popped corn,
Then wake and walk to Gamlingay,
Or lie out rough at Bourn.

In winter when they light the lamps
And gather round the fire
They still relate in Shudy Camps
How he would roam the shire
From Baitsbite Locks to Longstowe Fox,
From then to Barton Mills,
By Cheveley Park & Isleham Lark
And back to Bartlow Hills.

And when he said, when old and worn
My tramping days are done
I'll go no more to Bassingbourn
No more to Littlington.
And when at last my end has come
And I have had to die,
'Tis then I shall be deaf and dumb,
Please bury me at Quy

[PICTURES FROM NEWS FILES OF PLACES MENTIONED]

**

Mrs Florence Hall from Eynesbury (ex W.A.A.F. Flight-Sergeant 80930), has kindly jotted down some of her memories of the R.A.F. Hospital at Ely.

"From about late 1941 to June 1945 I was the steward for the Hospital, which also catered for our convalescent home which was situated in Littleport.. One of my duties was to tour the wards to ensure the sisters were happy with the food supplied. I was encouraged to chat to the patients and one of my firm friends there was the late Jimmy Edwards. He was in burns with badly burned hands. Of course he was just an ordinary officer then – indeed it wasn't until years after that I realised who he was – but he was fun to be with even then.

"I met my husband while we were both stationed there, we were married in St Mary's church, Ely and had our reception in the Sergeants' mess at the hospital. He was in the medical profession – a chemist - & we shared the same boss, Squadron Leader Danny Bream. Our time spent at Ely Hospital was very special for both of us & because of all we experienced there – some truly awful things – I'm quite sure it helped us to cope better with life in general"

[SCAN OF ELY RAF HOSPITAL ENTRANCE]

**

"Can anybody help with a picture of the Phantoms Rock'n'Roll group", I asked. Yes replied Mick Barker from Cambridge. He writes: "This group was around in the fifties and early sixties and they were as good as The Shadows, in my estimation. Back in those good old days my wife (who was then my girlfriend) and I travelled all over East Anglia with them. Because I was the doorman come bouncer it didn't cost us anything for admission. They were a very good and very likeable bunch of lads who were very popular over here and in Sweden where they stayed for quite some time and had a number of records released on the Palette label"

The idea for the group started during the EOKA troubles in Cyprus where Ken Leverinton was with the R.E.M.E. and as they weren't allowed out of barracks he practised playing the guitar eight hours a day. On demob Ken joined Pye as an electrician, playing in various local groups until he formed The Phantoms in June 1960. The group played at dances and cinemas throughout East Anglia and had a large following at Cambridge University, in fact two undergraduates wrote "Phantom Guitar", which appeared on their first record.

Mick has sent a copy of one of their publicity photos which gives the line up as Ken Leverinton, Cliff Gentle, Dave Cooke and Freddy Smart. They were all electricians except for Freddy Smart who had his own hairdressing business in Chatteris. [SCAN OF GROUP PIC]

**

Ted Fisher from Cambridge has written to tell me of the sporting prowess of Alice Bilston who ran the London Marathon last year. The achievement is more remarkable given that she was then 88! Alice Clark lived in George IV Street, Cambridge when a girl and attended St Paul's School, Russell Street before going on to the Central School. She was a keen member of the Band of Hope that met in St Paul's Institute in Coronation Street and was often seen playing tennis at Fenners, where the church had facilities. Alice's first job when leaving school was with Laurie and McConnel in Fitzroy Street, which is where she stayed till her marriage to Sid Bilston. After that they moved to Lowestoft and then London. Her husband died ten years ago and it was then that she ran her first London Marathon. Now as she's 'getting on a bit' she only does half-marathons – three times a year! Ted asks: Are there any other 88 year-old athletes produced by this fair city?

**

Can anybody help Colin Matthews of Bassingbourn to track down details of how a member of his family lost his life in the Great War. George Edwin Ingre was a Private (no.13587) in the 11th Battalion of the Suffolk Regiment who died on the Somme on Thursday 1st July 1915, aged 21 years. But Colin has been trying for several years to discover just how and where he died. If you can help let me know and I'll pass the information on

**

EXTRA ODDMENTS IF NEEDED

Can anybody recognise their back garden? I came across this picture when browsing through the News photographic files the other day. It's obviously Cambridge because of the Catholic Church in the distance, and there seems to be a school at the end of the lane on the right. But if it jogs a memory please let me know [SCAN OF VIEW OVER BACK GARDENS]

Memories 24th January 2001, by Mike Petty

With the outbreak of the Great War Cambridge prepared for the inevitable casualties. A hospital for wounded soldiers was established at the Leys school, later expanding to Trinity College where the cloisters under the Wren Library were turned into open-sided wards. As more space became necessary a pre-fabricated hospital was constructed across the Backs on the site now occupied by the University Library. In its operating theatres soldiers were treated, and many patched up to fight again.

Elsewhere convalescent hospitals were established to nurse the wounded back to health. Three large empty houses in Cintra terrace, Hills Road, were placed at the disposal of the Cambridge Women's Voluntary Aid Detachment. The rooms were swept and scrubbed and the girls travelled around Cambridge collecting furniture, going out with a handcart to bring in mattresses, coal-scuttles and all the other essentials. It was the first of several of these VAD Hospitals, others of which were established in villages such as Fulbourn, Cottenham, Whittlesford and Willingham.

It was whilst lecturing in this latter village that one of my class brought in an autograph book containing rhymes and sketches collected from soldiers recovering in one such war-time hospital. In itself this would have been a wonderful find. Little enough is recorded about these institutions, although several, like Cottenham, produced their own magazines. But this one was even more special.

For this did not relate to a VAD Hospital, this was a VD Hospital – and as far as I know there is virtually nothing recorded about them. It is something that seems to have been largely forgotten. I believe there were two such institutions in Cambridge. The Cambridgeshire Collection has a couple of photographs of a tented encampment at Cherry Hinton, but this relates to the other one, just off Newmarket Road. The Cherry Hinton camp treated some 800 men, that at Barnwell 750.

They were established in March 1916 and were not welcomed by local people. Newspapers report protests about the lack of security, of insufficient guards and of fears of patients escaping & causing great danger to nearby residents. But these were not German prisoners of war, they were British casualties of war, men who had perhaps sought comfort from the horrors of the trenches in the company of ladies of the night and found themselves infected as a result.

Some had been wounded before. On the first page of the book a Corporal Johnson from the Middlesex Regiment recalls how he was previously wounded at Neuve Chapelle in March 1915. Others sketched pictures of women, one adding the words, "All one has to live for, Is a pair of ruby lips", while Private Hutt of the Suffolk Regiment drew his cap badge in April 1918

Some of the entries are from the men who ministered at the Hospital whose work even then was kept silent. Quartermaster Sergeant J. Carter Squires penned his tribute to "The Hush Camps".

They've heard of the battles of Flanders
And the fighting at Vimy Ridge
But they've yet to hear of the battles fought
In the "Hush Camps" in Cam-bridge.
And of the men who have fought those battles
Tho' not beribboned or scarred,
They are men who have done their duty,
But to whom all honour is barred.
Some people have called them slackers
But God knows, they don't understand,
For when those battles are recorded,
And despatches come to hand,
Surely they will be accorded
With some credit for making Old England a purer land.

Lance Corporal J. Abrahams, signing himself R.A.M.C. Staff, Barnwell Military Hospital 16th October 1918 penned an acrostic, the first letter of each line spelling out 'Barnwell'

Bravely we enlisted, to fight the murderous Hun,
And bravely heard the mandate, that our fighting days were done.
Rough the life it was, but we didn't care a damn,
Nor groused, nor grumbled, but remained as placid as the Cam.

We finally were shifted, and without shirking for terms,
England beheld her choicest sons, fighting Germans not, but germs.
Loathsome though the task was, we've cured thousands of disease,
Lucky Britons sleep at ease; that breedeth men like these.

Do you have any other mementoes of the forgotten wartime hospitals.

[SCAN OF PAGES FROM THE AUTOGRAPH BOOK ON DISK, SELECTION OF OTHER WAR-TIME HOSPITAL PICTURES IN ENVELOPE]

**

Valerie Haynes of Over has lent me another picture of the 54th Maintenance Unit at Marshalls during the Second World War. It is too large to reproduce fully, but Arthur George Parker is fourth to the left of the 54 MU sign on the top row, and Freda Harradine is the seventh female from the left of centre on row three. [SCAN OF PICTURE ON DISK]

**

Several people have been in touch to identify last week's mystery picture of the back gardens. Paul Arnold can actually see his plot in Eden Street, where's he's lived for 20 years, and says it has not changed much. Julie Sewell went to the Grammar School for Girls, now Parkside Community College, shown in the background & thinks the view would have been taken from the bandstand at Laurie & McConnell's. Karen Alsop & Suzie McCave agree as does Felicity Collins; she too went to the Girls Grammar and says the background trees along the edge of Parker's Piece remind her of many very cold games of hockey played there, with the girls wearing shorts and Miss Allen, the games mistress, wrapped up in her tracksuit! Mr J. Williamson from Romsey puts the date as possibly the late 1950s.

Eden Street was so named because it was built in the Victorian period on an area of land known as the Garden of Eden, then one big market garden. The nearby streets are named Paradise and Adam and Eve. When Sara Payne talked to residents back in 1981 she heard from Bill Metcalfe how the old fruiterer 'Bowey' Odell used to come up with his horse and cart, shouting 'tomatis, tomatiss'. Peggie Temple recalled how Mr King, at number 30, used to be a fireman. He always left his bicycle outside so that he could go off when the bell sounded outside his house summoning him to a fire. When it rang, out he'd come and off he'd go down to the station in St Andrew's Street. [THERE ARE PICTURES OF EDEN STREET IN THE NEWS LIBRARY FILES]

Do you have memories of other streets in the area, or of the characters who made Cambridge special.

Memories, 31st January 2001, by Mike Petty

"It was an awful parting – the pain – everyone went with her down to the station, nobody cried and as she said that the tears were coming down her face".

At the start of the last war thousands of young children were evacuated from London and other places likely to be attacked and brought to the safety of the countryside. But there was another similar exercise that brought thousands of children to East Anglia even before the Second War started – in fact by then it was already too late. These children too had left their parents behind on the station platforms, only their parents were soon put on trains themselves to places with names such as Auschwitz. For these were Jewish children rushed out of Germany for fear of not British bombers, but of Nazi persecution. Last weekend's holocaust memories highlighted the terrible suffering and of the many thousand who found their ways to the concentration camps and gas chambers – but many escaped, thanks in part to Cambridge women.

The story of the British evacuees and the organisation that found them new homes, new schools and a new life has been told, albeit not fully. The story of the organisation that cared for the Jewish refugees is largely unknown.

A Cambridge Children's' Refugee Committee had been established in 1936, one of hundreds that had sprung up spontaneously as news of the persecutions started to leak out. By 1938 their work was being co-ordinated and the country divided up into twelve regions, corresponding to the Air Raid Warnings system already in place. Cambridge was part of region four, East Anglia, and the Cambridge committee was asked to take responsibility for it.

In 1984 Gertrude Dubrovsky was working at the Carnegie Foundation in Princeton when she was invited to visit Cambridge. Whilst here she was introduced to Greta Burkill, the wife of Prof Charles Burkill, Master of Peterhouse. "She was an oddity, born in Russia, she spoke with an Russian accent", it was a meeting that was to change Gertrude's life. She was told a remarkable story of how thousands of children had been found homes and cared for – it was a story she had not heard before. Gertrude didn't really believe it – until she was shown hand-drawn charts with names of children, their parents' names, where they had come from and where they had gone. "You must put these in an archive or library", Gertrude urged. "I cannot; each of these children came through my hands. It is as if each one was my child and this is all I have left of that experience", Mrs Burkill replied.

There was nothing Gertrude could do – they were Greta's documents after all. She returned to America and two weeks later received a letter to say that Mrs Burkill had changed her mind & copied them for her. The next day she received another letter, containing Mrs Burkill's obituary. "I began to see in it the hand of God; somebody pointing at me and saying do this".

Now Gertrude has started to piece together the story, of how a committee, mainly of academic ladies, had taken responsibility for finding families who would be prepared to take the refugee children. And as soon as the folks in Germany learned what was happening their offices in Hills Road received hundreds of letters as people begged to have their children signed up for transportation. The committee could not decide which were the most urgent but felt the immediate priority were teenage boys who were subject to arrest and likely to be sent to work camps. This was not necessarily an easy age range to foster.

They tried to find homes with Jewish families in which the children would be placed, but there were not enough. But would it be appropriate to use Christian homes? As they were careful so they were slow, but the need was desperate and people got upset at the delay. It became stressful point of contention for everyone – but was only the first of many.

On arrival the chosen refugees were sent to Cambridge schools until the age of 14, after that they had to work. The Committee ladies helped them find schools and jobs, neither easy given the language and cultural difficulties. But when the youngsters turned 16 they ceased to be refugees and became a potential danger to the country – they had after all been born in Germany. Many were sent off into internment camps on the Isle of Man, others shipped away to Canada and Australia. The Cambridge Committee ladies had accepted parental responsibility for these youngsters – indeed it was becoming more likely that they were the only parents they now had. They arranged a schedule of people who visited them, wrote letters, sent packages. The pressures just seemed to get greater and greater, the frustrations more and more intense.

On top of all that there was a War on, with all the difficulties that represented. Then the war was over, and the horrors of the extermination camps revealed. Many of the refugees were now orphans, but there must be somebody somewhere. Once more the Committee churned into action, more letters, more assistance, more emotional trauma.

Gertrude had made touch with six of the refugees who were assisted by the Cambridge committee. Some of them were found homes in the Eden Street, Orchard Street area and were cared for by Ann Sofier & Elsie Masefield and her brother. But can you help piece together more of the story; did you or your parents have contact with them, does you family have a bundle of papers like the ones Mrs Burkill preserved that you would be willing to share.

If so please contact Gertrude Dubrovsky at Clare Hall, Herschell Road, Cambridge, CB3 9AL or E-mail her at gd235@cam.ac.uk [SCAN OF BRITISH EVACUEES, PIC OF SOME OF THOSE WHOM GERTRUDE IS RESEARCHING SUPPLIED; PHOTOGRAPHIC HAVE PICS OF GERTRUDE DUBROVSKY WITH HER CAMBRIDGE PAPERS AND OUTSIDE 55 HILLS ROAD – THE CAMBRIDGE COMMITTEE’S H.Q.]

**

Jenny Taylor of Impington is also seeking help in finding somebody – but in her case it is Bubs White who used to play lead guitar in The Chequers rock group in the late 1950s, early 1960. Jenny was a fan of the group and used to follow them around. One night the drummer failed to turn up, and she stepped in. They played the US bases along with the Dorothy and the club above Millers music shop. When the group broke up Bubs went on to do session work and she has lost contact. Bubs is in the foreground of this group picture, with Jenny belting out the beat behind. [SCAN OF PICTURE OF THE CHEQUERS]

Her husband, Alan Taylor, is also seeking your help. He played with the once nearly famous Boston Crabs who had some small chart and TV success in the mid 1960s. Previously he ran the resident band Group Four at The Racehorse in Newmarket Road, Cambridge. The standard line-up was Alan on drums, George Watson on guitar, Lynden (Jock) Devlin on bass and vocals and Jack Asplin on piano. However each Sunday they had an additional member, Dave Gilmour, who went on to fame and fortune with Pink Floyd.

Alan has no photographs whatever of those days and would appreciate any help in tracking them down.

You can contact both Jenny and Alan Taylor at 38 Cambridge Road, Impington, CB4 9NU – phone Cambridge 233000.

If you think that the name Boston Crabs rings a bell, you are perhaps recalling how they topped the Cambridge pop charts in June 1965 with their recording of ‘Down in Mexico’, pushing Sandie Shaw and ‘Long Live Love’ down to to second place. That week ‘Wonderful World’ was at a lowly number 18, though its singer, Cliff Richard, has lasted somewhat longer than Alan and his mates.

Just twenty-five years ago, on 1st February 1976, Cliff was packing them in at the Lady Mitchell Hall, Sidgwick Avenue, Cambridge, where he appeared at an evangelical concert with the Brightwinter Group. Later he moved on to Holy Trinity church where amongst those who turned out to watch was one Christopher South. “He sent himself up in a most winning fashion”, Chris reported, “joking about his age (35) and his handsome head of hair (‘it’s a good fit’). He hammed it up, pretending he was too old and rumaticky to get his foot on to a stool to support his guitar”. Previously a News photographer had visited Cliff in his dressing room as he prepared for the earlier concert, pictures that have not previously been published. Are you in the audience? [PICS SCANNED]

Memories 7th February 2001 by Mike Petty

The telephone rang just before I was due to start my WEA class at Willingham. Could I get to a portacabin at the old goods yard, Ely Station, by 12.30 that afternoon? If so I would find something to my advantage.

In fact I arrived five minutes late and by then Brian Peck had finished his shift and was on his way back home to Cambridge. But there on the step was a large cardboard box and a bundle of maps.

It was a day or so before I had chance even to open it, but once I did I found a number of large lever-arch files. One contained a draft of the marvellous history of Cambridge compiled by Brian and Ralph Phillips from the material collected by Cambridge railwaymen, a copy of which they had presented to the Cambridgeshire Collection about a dozen years ago. The others are full of newspaper cuttings and articles relating to the local railway scene mainly from the 1960s.

There's a copy of the Eastern Region Magazine for June 1963 in which Roma Branton described the line from Cambridge to Newmarket. It gives a fascinating glimpse of the situation nearly 40 years ago. She found: "Leaving Cambridge the first station along the line is Fulbourn, where Mr D.G. White has been station master for ten years. This is a small station but has a fair amount of good traffic. In the first four months of this year they had over 1,000 tons of grain from the silo next to the station. Truck loads of goods are also handled, and sugar beet in season. Another regular traffic to the station is coal, both for domestic use and for the local cement works."

Six Mile Bottom needed police assistance on busy days, for without constabulary help the signalman would never have been able to close the railway gates against the heavy road traffic. The station forwarded sugar beet in season and received mainly agricultural machinery, fertilisers and coal, while Dullingham also handled a considerable quantity of barley.

Newmarket station was often busy with horses; in 1962 they received 748 horses at the station and sent out 1,182 by rail. To help with the work they had two fine strong members of staff – Charlie and Butch, a beautiful pair of shunt horses. They were used to pull wagons and horse boxes in the goods yard and were by then the last horses to be used on the Eastern Region. [THERE ARE PROBABLY PIX IN NEWS LIBRARY]

Railway accidents and incidents feature in the newspaper cuttings, none perhaps as bizarre as in February 1961 when an undergraduate managed to crash his car through the booking hall at Cambridge station, ending up against the indicator board and blocking the exit door. [SCAN OF CUTTING]

There is a reflection too of the continuing problems of providing a fast and efficient system – a problem that seems to have bedevilled the railways since Victorian times according to a cartoon dating from 1856. It is supposed to represent a challenge issued by a Bethnal Green costermonger to race the train with his donkey and barrow. Needless to say, the railway was not victorious and the drawing shows the donkey in front, towing the train while passengers applaud, grateful for such speed. The cartoon was apparently one of several produced by a passenger who used to arm himself with a large bundle of papers, and taking his seat in the front carriage of the train, to fling them out broadcast among the passengers waiting at each platform. But the passengers rushed forward to receive them with such avidity, that he was forced to abandon this practice for fear that some one should be pushed off the platform under the wheels of the train. [SCAN OF CARTOON]

The cuttings also reflect the change as steam gave way to other forms of propulsion and of course the major story that the News broke in March 1963 of how 19 local stations might be closed down as part of the changes proposed by Dr Beeching. [SCAN OF CUTTING]

Cambridge and Ely stations survived the axe and in 1987 won their categories in the Eastern Region 'Best Kept Station' competition, with Elsenham and Newport coming second and third in the class for small stations. [SCAN OF PHOTO]

As this is a history compiled by railwaymen for railwaymen it obviously reflects many of their social activities. The folders include a picture from September 1988 when 20 senior members of BR staff from the Cambridge & March area, some of whom had worked up to 50 years on the railways, celebrated reaching the end of the line at a special presentation at the Maltings, Ely. Brian has most of the names including Dennis Hipkin, Stan Pine and Cyril Stannard but if you see yourself – or have other memories of your time on the railway - I should be delighted to hear from you. [SCAN OF PHOTO]

As for the box and its contents – I will be depositing it in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard library within the next week or so

**

I have received a letter from the Chief Executive of the Guinea Pig Club, based in Crawley. The club was established in July 1941 by airmen at the Queen Victoria Hospital, East Grinstead who had been horribly burned during the early years of the war and continues to this day. Through their experiences of having to live with disfigurement and restricted use of fingers they assist new burns patients, showing them that through adversity a full life can be lived.

Jock Allaway was just one of the "Guinea Pigs" who started their life at Ely R.A.F. Hospital. He writes: "I arrived on October 10th 1943 with third degree burns of the hand, face and body after crashing. The plastic surgeon in charge was Wing Commander Morley who eventually became an Air Vice Marshall in charge of all RAF Medical Services. During my stay at Ely I had many operations, new top and bottom eyelids, nose and many ops on both my hands. Every month the distinguished surgeon Sir Archibald McIndoe used to visit and pick patients to be transferred to the new Queen Victoria Hospital, East Grinstead, Sussex. The city of Ely was very good to us, I even had two weeks' convalescence at the Bishop's Palace."

Jock got to know of the article through Mrs Doreen Barnes of Littleport who as a 16-year-old girl used to visit burns unit at the hospital every Sunday afternoon bringing home-made cakes and fresh eggs. They have kept in touch ever since – proving that the horrors of war do have some benefits.

If you would like to contact the club you can write to 32 Goff's Park Road, Crawley, West Sussex, RH11 8AY

**

Peter Hall E-mails following a recent Memories article:

My father, the late Walter Hall, was born and bred in Willow Place, Cambridge, in 1892, joined the Royal Army Medical Corps in 1914 and finished his service as a sergeant at the First Eastern General Hospital in 1919. After the war a venture into tailoring turned into disaster during the 1926 General Strike, when he and my mother joined my grandparents, Rue and Kate Elsdon, in running The Fitzroy Arms in Fitzroy Street until 1954.

Mr H. Benstead of the Victoria Homes, Cambridge also has memories of tailoring, for his father, G.J. Benstead worked for Mr H.G. Jacobs in the 1920s.

“He worked at home, sitting cross-legged on a board in the back bedroom of the house we lived in in Gwydir Street. After school I used to take the completed work, wrapped in black cloth, to the large workshops over the shop in Burleigh Street. and hand it over to a Mr Stephenson. There were five or six tailors and I remember a Mr Carlisle who was the cutter, a man with a pronounced limp, and a young man who was always referred to as ‘Young Mr Bert’ (Jacobs)

“My father’s main work seemed to be making black mourning suits. These were rush jobs as the funeral was only five or six days later. Dad made the coat and waistcoat and mother the trousers. They would work all day and most of the night. Even I had a job – taking the basting out with a bodkin, threading his needles and waxing the thread with beeswax. After the suit was finished it would be a week or more before he got another job. No work, no pay. This was normal, but my father always spoke well of Mr Jacobs and his firm. They gave him work when there was very little for men coming back from the war.

“I am now 90 years old but still have vivid memories of this part of my life. I can almost smell the steam when the seams were pressed under a damp cloth with a large iron called a Goosie, heated on a gas ring and always kept hot. Before you ask, the answer is ‘no!’ I cannot even sew a button on. I started an apprenticeship and became an electrician!

**

John Wakefield of Gt Shelford adds to our survey of 1950s and 60s local pop groups with a publicity photo of The Quadrant. The line up at the time was Ray Radford (lead guitar). Phil Atkin (drums), George McKeowen (vocals) & Dave Talbot (bass guitar). At a later group they increased to five members with the addition of a Lowery electronic organ with which they performed a good cover version of Procul Harum’s ‘Whiter Shade of Pale’. [PIC SCANNED]

Memories 14th February 2001, by Mike Petty

Peter Johnson from Morton-in-Marsh has been scanning the News website and has spotted my Memories column. He has been sorting out his late father’s writings and has sent extracts in the hope they may be of interest. They certainly are.

Ben Martin Henry Johnson was born in Cambridge in 1890 and died 92 years later in Stoke on Trent. His father, also Ben, was a boatman at Foster’s Boatyard who died a year later from a heart attack whilst rowing in a race. To make ends meet his mother took on a University lodging house at 37 Market Hill and managed to support her two daughters, Maude and Agnes and young Ben. He recalled:

“Boys as well as girls wore petticoats when I was young. I couldn’t tell my sisters what sex my first friend was and they only found out when I took him home one day and he announced his name was Oscar Barker Benfield. He was the son of a college servant and his mother kept a University lodging house over the Macmillan’s bookshop facing the Senate House. The Market Hill was our playground. Our fiends were, Philip & Will Giles from the Criterion in Market Passage, Bert Wisbey from a pub in Bene’t Street, & Bert Culyer from the Rose and Crown [There were three pubs of that name in Cambridge in those days, at Newmarket Road, Pound Hill & Russell Street]

“We had seasons; there was the top spinning season, the hoop season, marbles and conkers. Then there was the inevitable gun and drilling like soldiers, especially up St Mary’s Court. Our actions often spilled over into the Senate House Passage and would come to a halt whenever the Master of Caius and his two daughters appeared, accompanied by much hat raising. We took care not to disturb a blind man who used to stand near the Gate of Honour, his little dog at his side and his tin can in his hand. I think he made good collections from the undergrads going to and from lectures.” [SCAN OF MARKET HILL C1900 – THE PLAYGROUND]

Mr H. Benstead of the Victoria Homes, Cambridge has also sent me memories of his father, G.J. Benstead who worked as a tailor for Mr H.G. Jacobs in the 1920s.

“Dad worked at home, sitting cross-legged on a board in the back bedroom of the house we lived in in Gwydir Street. After school I used to take the completed work, wrapped in black cloth, to the large workshops over the shop in Burleigh Street and hand it over to a Mr Stephenson. There were five or six tailors and I remember a Mr Carlisle who was the cutter, a man with a pronounced limp, and a young man who was always referred to as ‘Young Mr Bert’ (Jacobs)

“My father’s main work seemed to be making black mourning suits. These were rush jobs as the funeral was only five or six days later. Dad made the coat and waistcoat and mother the trousers. They would work all day and most of the night. Even I had a job – taking the basting out with a bodkin, threading his needles and waxing the thread with beeswax. After the suit was finished it would be a week or more before he got another job. No work, no pay. This was normal, but my father always spoke well of Mr Jacobs and his firm. They gave him work when there was very little for men coming back from the war.

“I am now 90 years old but still have vivid memories of this part of my life. I can almost smell the steam when the seams were pressed under a damp cloth with a large iron called a Goosie, heated on a gas ring and always kept hot. Before you ask, the answer is ‘no!’ I cannot even sew a button on. I started an apprenticeship and became an electrician! [SCAN OF FUNERAL]

Rex Codling from Reading has also been delving into his father’s papers. Herbert Codling and his wife Dora lived in a flat above a grocer’s shop in Mill Road, Cambridge, owned by a Mr Barbrooke before getting a council house in Bateson Road. He joined the Auxiliary Fire Service prior to the war and later transferred to aircraft production.

Rex has sent me the programme of the annual outing of the Cambridge Express Printing Company on 1st July 1939. Fifteen brave men and two brave ladies set off for a Saturday day trip to Margate. Nothing special about that – except that this was truly a day’s trip. They left Cambridge station at 4.30 am and were due to return to Cambridge station twenty-three-and-a-half hours later. Surely such a marathon must have attracted the attention of the CDN at the time, I thought, so I turned to the old files. There is no account of the Cambridge Express outing, but Messrs Cyril Ridgeon and Son also set off to Margate – by train – on the same day at the same time. A splendid breakfast was served en route and they reached their destination by 10.30 – but this is an hour-and-a-half later than the Express party anticipated they would arrive. So was there a hold-up? Even so what do you do in Margate until it’s time for the train home at 11.30 at night? The Ridgeon contingent were free to enjoy their various pursuits, the Printers got together again for dinner. At least the day was fine and sunny. Then eventually it was back on the train, arriving home (half-an-hour late) just as dawn was breaking when a tired but happy throng dispersed for a much-needed rest. [SCAN OF PROGRAMME WITH LIST OF NAMES]

**

Following my article on Ely RAF Hospital I have received a letter from the Chief Executive of the Guinea Pig Club, based in Crawley. The club was established in July 1941 by airmen at the Queen Victoria Hospital, East Grinstead who had been horribly burned during the early years of the war and continues to this day. Through their experiences of having to live with disfigurement and restricted use of fingers they assist new burns patients, showing them that through adversity a full life can be lived.

Jock Allaway was just one of the “Guinea Pigs” who started their life at Ely R.A.F. Hospital. He writes: “I arrived on October 10th 1943 with third degree burns of the hand, face and body after crashing. The plastic surgeon in charge was Wing Commander Morley who eventually became an Air Vice Marshall in charge of all RAF Medical Services. During my stay at Ely I had many operations, new top and bottom eyelids, nose and many ops on both my hands. Every month the distinguished surgeon Sir Archibald McIndoe used to visit and pick patients to be transferred to the new Queen Victorian Hospital, East Grinstead, Sussex. The city of Ely was very good to us, I even had two weeks’ convalescence at the Bishop’s Palace.”

Jock got to know of the article through Mrs Doreen Barnes of Littleport who as a 16-year-old girl used to visit burns unit at the hospital every Sunday afternoon bringing home-made cakes and fresh eggs. They have kept in touch ever since – proving that the horrors of war do have some benefits.

If you would like to contact the club you can write to 32 Goff’s Park Road, Crawley, West Sussex, RH11 8AY

**

More wartime memories have been flooding in.

Sheila Wick from St Ives has more memories of the 27th Lancers who were stationed in the Cherry Hinton Road area of Cambridge in 1943-44. She particularly remembers Bill Campbell from Scotland who was crushed between two armoured cars but recovered and rejoined his regiment. She has lost touch since then, but is still in contact with Jack Chalmers who was in the same group and now lives in Lincolnshire. Sheila used to live on Cherry Hinton Road and with her mother used to help in the forces canteen at the Morley School in Blinco Grove.

Mr D. Spencer from Waterbeach was stationed with the 54th Maintenance Unit at Marshall’s, right opposite the Cemetery on Newmarket Road. He was there from March to August 1944 and then transferred into the army, first to Huyton transit camp, Liverpool, then on to Ireland and India until he was demobbed in 1947.

Mrs M. Norman of Queen Edith’s Way, Cambridge did war service at Marshalls Flying School and her sister met and married one of the young airmen featured in the photograph. Both are now dead but she is sending a copy of the cutting to their son who lives in Kent.

Ralph Brownlie from Royston thinks he too may be on the photograph. He has sent me a copy of a poem entitled “The salvage man’s song” describing the hardships of the job, tracking down crashed aircraft:

“Sometimes in a swamp, a ‘plane they will find,
And what with the mud, it’s a bit of a bind.
The job’s seldom done without some kind of a hitch,
You can gamble that most of it’s stuck in a ditch.
But with mud to the eyebrows, they’ll get out that ‘plane
And off on a loader to be fixed up again”

**

Peter Hall E-mails memories of the First World War Hospitals in Cambridge

My father, the late Walter Hall, was born and bred in Willow Place, Cambridge, in 1892, joined the Royal Army Medical Corps in 1914 and finished his service as a sergeant at the First Eastern General Hospital in 1919. After the war a venture into tailoring turned into disaster during the 1926 General Strike, when he and my mother joined my grandparents, Rue and Kate Elsdon, in running The Fitzroy Arms in Fitzroy Street until 1954.

Denise Bane (nee Golding) of Royston was born in one of the old the First Eastern General Hospital huts in Burrell's Walk, Cambridge. Her father, Regimental Sergeant Major Hessell George Golding, had been sent there when he came home from France wounded and was by coincidence allocated a home there in 1923. Denise was christened at Great St Mary's as that was her parish church. She later worked at Pye Granta and played her part in the Second World War with the Women's Land Army. [SCAN OF LAND ARMY – NOT THAT OF DENISE BANE]

**

Derrick Saunders from Oakington has further information on The Chequers group for which he played in its later days, along with bass player Ricky Wills, Dick Parry & an American serviceman called Andrew Fitzpatric, known in Cambridge as 'Fitz'. The band changed its name to the Soul Committee and turned professional, bringing in new personnel. They filled the old Dorothy and had coach loads of fans that followed them around. After Derrick left in 1998 the group continued for a couple of years, making records that still get played from time to time on the radio. He writes: "Cambridge has always been a great centre for musicians and very often when we try to do a kind of history we can't get into the past very easily. I think there are a lot of photos in old attics and perhaps somebody could take on the task of rounding them up and do a book".

Derrick's friends may know that he was in the Cambridge Footlights with Clive Anderson and Griff Jones. They do not know his secret, but as I mentioned Cliff Richard in my article, he now confesses that Cliff is a first cousin to his wife Monica. They were in kindergarten together in India, and, like him, her family name was Webb.

Memories 21st February 2001, by Mike Petty

Michael Bowyer grew up in Walnut Tree Avenue, Cambridge, a line of Victorian houses that stretched from Newmarket Road down to the river and just across the road from Brunswick School. He might have grown up to be just a normal child, were it not for the R101, the giant airship that passed over Cambridge in November 1929. While its nose was over his house, the stern was over Abbey Road and it kept coming. On its tail was the letter 'G'. The young Bowyer wrote it down, so he should not forget it. It was the start of a lifetime passion for noting things down about aircraft.

Schoolboys are inquisitive and Michael was one of a gang. Whenever anything unusual landed at the nearby Marshall's Airport the word spread like wildfire and more notes were jotted down. He can remember de Havilland Moths flying over the road, and Alan Cobham's air displays. He played truant from school to see a Flying Flea flown by Henri Mignet. He'd asked to go to the toilet, and never returned. He ran down Newmarket Road, crept down a lane and hit behind a petrol pump, where his uncle Jack spotted him – but never told. Sadley the Flea never flew that day – it was too windy.

He went to the 1935 Jubilee Review at Mildenhall and noted down the number so the aircraft he saw. His father made him models, which had to be painted to look like the real thing as recalled by his son. He still has some in the attic. By now Michael was totally addicted to anything to do with aviation. He started a diary but never kept the pages until October 1941; he has not missed a day since. He logged down planes, numbers, squadron details, bombs.

By the time the air-raid sirens started sounding over Cambridge he was ready. His memories of it are vivid:

“It was terribly hot, June 18th 1940, and the air raid siren had gone – we’d had a lot of air raid warnings, but this was to be different. We’d just got into the middle room of our house which the air-raid warden had said was the safest place, and my father said: ‘if anything happens you’ll never get out’. We hadn’t been there many moments and all of a sudden there was a whistling and my father said ‘they’re bombs boy’ – we were well aware of the fact that they were bombs. The fireplace came out and went back, the light was swinging furiously, we had wooden shutters that my dad and I had made at the beginning of the war & they were shaking furiously, the house was still there. My mother got up and said ‘I’ll go and make the cup of tea’ and just as she said that there was a terrific explosion and it shook the house. I said ‘Dad, Hitler’s come’; he said ‘I don’t want you swearing any more in front of your mother’.

“Within moments an air raid warden was shouting out ‘take cover’; we walked out of house, the moon was merrily shining, there were people coming from all directions, going to air raid shelter opposite. The shelter had walls nine inches thick and the air raid warden dropped the gas curtain. My mum said ‘I’ve forgot to bring my gas mask’. The air raid warden stood up ceremoniously and said: ‘I have to tell you bombs have fallen; I repeat, bombs have fallen’, and I asked where.

“Up the road the children who died were children I went to school with – it was a terrific shock; when I went to look at Vicarage Terrace in the morning the first thing I saw was a dog with its head decapitated. It was so bizarre, last night all those weird things happened, people were dying while we having semi-merriment”. Later Michael investigated the official records of that raid to learn that the adults had got up to look out following the warning, the children had stayed in bed & it was the children who’d died.

As the war continued & more alerts sounded he did what his dad ordered, grabbed his binoculars and notepad first and his gasmask only second. From his garden he watched a German bomber machine-gun the Brunswick School; from a bus near the Catholic Church he saw the entire roof of the Perse School, that had been firebombed the night before, collapse in a massive eruption of fire and flames. Bits of ash rattled down on the bus, burning embers came through the open windows. The conductor checked tickets, the world carried on. Some of this he later recorded in his book ‘Air Raid! in 1986

Michael cycled round various airfields looking for clues as to who might be based there. At Methwold he picked up a piece of paper with a number on it – 487. Later he spotted that a pilot from 487 Squadron had been awarded a medal. So that squadron was at Methwold. Then at Oakington he spotted a mug with a motto ‘Per Andium per Noctem’ – it was proof that the Stirlings of 7 Squadron had taken up residence there. All Highly Secret information.

Then he got caught. Aged about 16 he had cycled to Mildenhall with his friends and his binoculars. There on the runway stood a Lancaster with a peculiar bump under its fuselage, painted black to disguise its contents. He’d seen them before – he’d sneaked inside the planes for a closer look but could never get the bump open. This one was different, the bump had not been painted black; through his binoculars he could see that inside it there was a scanner. He stood there, binoculars in hand, describing everything in great detail to his friends behind him who jotted it down. Then came the tap on his shoulder – just what was he playing at. This was spying! What was worse Michael had in his hand a long list of serial numbers of other aircraft he had carefully noted down. There was nothing for it, but to swallow the list! The teenagers were hauled off to the Guardroom, the extent of their observations astounding their captors. With security compromised to such an extent there was nothing else for it; he was told to get on his bike, take a short-cut across the runway and get out of there!

Michael joined the Air Training Corps at the County School & when it came for him to join up there could be only one option – the air force. Poor eyesight stopped him flying operationally, but he worked in intelligence, on squadron histories & on the design of appropriate markings for their aircraft.

Afterwards it was time to find a career; his father said ‘Be a teacher’, so he did. He got a job at Bassingbourn school, cycling all the way from Cambridge and cycling over to Girton most evening where he was courting the girl who has been his wife for over 50 years. Mike didn’t want to be a teacher, but the children loved him too, so he gave in. Occasionally at lunchtime he joined other staff in a midday half-pint at the Hoops, where sometimes he chatted to the American airmen from Bassingbourn base, one of whom described in great detail how he’d just been over the Baltic, mapping radar defences. It was top secret information, but Michael knew about it already.

It was a schoolchild who really started him writing. He’d taken a class to Ely Cathedral when one of the girls showed an interest, not in the famous Octagon, but in the stained glass windows of the RAF chapel. He explained the significance of the names recorded there, the planes they flew, and particularly of the wooden Mosquito – the bomber that could fly faster than a fighter. He ought to write a book, she suggested – and her dad had connection with publishers Faber and Faber.

Michael returned home and decided it would be worth a letter. As he set up his typewriter three Mosquitoes began circling his house – they were being filmed for their part in ‘633 Squadron’. It was an omen. Faber expressed an interest and suggested collaboration with Martin Sharpe, the sales director of de Havilland. The resulting book won him a prestigious award from the Chief of the Air Staff. It established his credentials as a writer & led to another book, and then more.

For some time he worked with Air-Fix models, writing articles about the planes they reproduced in miniature. Then discussion in their offices at Bar Hill began to revolve around another idea. There had been books on squadrons, books on planes, but never books on airfields; the sort of book that could go in the glove compartment of a motorcar. The result was the first in a series entitled ‘Action Stations’. He wrote it from memory in three months. It came out on a Monday in 1979 and was sold out by Wednesday. A reprint followed, then another, and another – eventually it had been reissued 27 times with more than 100,000 copies sold around the world.

Such is his prestige that he now has access to sources around the world. He and his camera have photographed Naval Reviews and RAF Flypasts, leaning out of the back of a Hercules aircraft to snap the farewell to the Phantom, or swooping low over spying boats in a de Havilland Dove. In August I joined a group he led to the giant Alconbury airbase where a man in a pick-up truck escorted our minibus past formerly secret U-2 spyplane areas, into strengthened aircraft shelters and to the door of a massive nuclear bunker. Earlier we had gazed at the outside of a building used until very recently as a large underground wartime emergency hospital, kept permanently staffed, day and night, just in case.

Now Michael Bowyer has drawn on over 60 years of personal recording, recollections and official records to revise the Action Stations volume covering Eastern England. It is the definitive history of the major airfields and tiny landing strips, including much information only newly declassified and illustrated by more than 200 rare and unpublished photographs.

Doubtless there is more to find, perhaps buried in official documents, but more likely jotted down or remembered by inquisitive schoolboys or girls. If you have a memory of so long ago then do share it

Action Stations revisited; no.1: Eastern England, by Michael J.F. Bowyer is published by Crecy Publishing Ltd at £24.95

Pictures scanned

Michael Bowyer, aged about 4 with tin-plate toy plane

Michael Bowyer – from Action Stations Revisited

Stirlings of 7 Squadron at Oakington, the plane suffered high losses, 221 crashed at Waterbeach, when tail wings broke off or through other accidents; they were often to be seen stuck in the ditch around the airfield, with their noses sticking over the A10 road,

A Mosquito at Marshalls airfield

An American P-51 lands at Bottisham airfield, possibly on D-Day

On Standby about 1960 – a Javelin at Waterbeach between blast walls which would have protected it from small bombs

Memories 28th February 2001, by Mike Petty

The current horrific headlines of the slaughter of cattle as the dreaded Foot and Mouth Disease spreads across the country will bring back painful memories for many of the similar stories from 1967. Then the first outbreak occurred on a field in Shropshire in October on the day of Oswestry market at which some 7,000 head of stock had been sold, including two from the infected farm. Whole areas of the country were placed under restriction but despite this new outbreaks broke out and by November 14th the controlled area extended as far as Huntingdonshire.

Troops were brought in to help with disinfecting and clearing up, hundreds of slaughtermen permanently engaged. Cambridge cattle market was hit, exports were banned, race meetings called off, ramblers urged to keep away from farmland, the banks of the Cam closed to fishermen, but still new outbreaks occurred. By December people living in areas affected were being asked to stay at home for Christmas, the Irish Government advised visitors to stay away and warned that Christmas parcels containing clothing or used footwear would be automatically returned to the sender.

By January 1968 the situation was becoming easier, though thousands of animals were still being slaughtered each week. The Queen expressed her “Great sympathy for the farmers who have so tragically lost their livestock and my admiration for all who have been fighting with such untiring efforts to control the disease and to ride the country of it once again”. But still odd outbreaks occurred, causing further heartbreak and panic and it was too be April before the last one was reported. But even when the disease had been eradicated, farmers still had to undergo the trauma of restocking and starting again.

The 1967-68 outbreak was not unique, in fact throughout the century there had regularly been foot-and-mouth cases; from 1931 to 1961 there had never been a year in which the number of animals slaughtered was less than 1,000. In 1960 the figure had been 70,000, in 1942 45,251 and in 1923 128,000. Throughout the 1800s local farmers had suffered like everyone else. In April 1884 an outbreak was detected at Wimpole, in February 1882 farms at Offord D’Arcy and Yelling had been hit, in April 1881 Ely cattle market reopened, having been well limed and cleansed after being shut down for three months due the disease. Outbreaks were reported at Chatteris, Manea and Benwick that

January. Earlier in May 1877 the Cambridgeshire authorities had imposed restrictions on the movement of cattle into the county due to another outbreak.

For even then they would have recalled that most frightening outbreak of cattle plague that had struck in May 1865 and raged for two-and-a-half years. Throughout the country and the county parishes reported the decimation of their stock: Stretham reported that 13 herds had been ravaged, at Waterbeach Mr Baxter and Mr Hitch lost cattle. At Littleport James Little had buried 59 head of stock and slaughtered several others, Mr Shrewsbury had lost 19, Mr Gotobed four and a small farmer named Howlett had been entirely deprived of his dairy of seven cows. Each minor tragedy added to the total.

What was worse there was nothing anybody could do about it – except pray. Services of humiliation were held at parish churches, including those of Stapleford and Pampisford, but it is R.G. Edwards, the Baptist minister from Sutton who summarised the feelings of people everywhere in his prayer on the Fast Day, December 20th 1865:

“This dire disease – this Cattle pest,
Which fills with sorrow, all our land,
Proves to us all, that man, at best
Can nothing do to stay thy hand.
Hear gracious God the Village cry,
Preserve our Cattle, for they die.”

The 1865 outbreak was eventually identified as Rindpest, brought in with a consignment of cattle from the Baltic; the one in 1884 blamed on a cargo of imported cattle from Liverpool, Argentinean beef was blamed for the Foot-and-Mouth outbreak of 1967; and as for 2001 – all we can do is wait, watch the headlines - and perhaps pray.

Vic Burling of Cambridge has responded to my request for railway memories. He writes:

“As a BR area relief clerk at the time, I was the person rostered to travel (in my own car!) to all the stations between Cambridge and Bury St. Edmunds the week after they had either been closed to passengers or been reduced to unstaffed halts in November 1966. Being a railway enthusiast as well as a railwayman, it was not a task that I particularly enjoyed doing. Completely closed were Fulbourn(e), Six Mile Bottom, Higham and Saxham & Risby stations, whilst Dullingham, Newmarket and Kennett have managed to cling on to this day because the trains went over to full conductor guard operation which was a fairly new concept then. In its heyday Newmarket had two large booking offices, one on either platform because each had its own separate public entrance. Charlie was the very last of the shunt horses on British Railways, they once numbered nearly 800, and was retired to Somerset on February 21st, 1967.

“The unheated and unlit offices were already cold and damp with condensation running off the walls as I travelled around and I had to do a final balance of the books at each, taking all monies, ticket stocks, parcels stamps and anything else of value through to Bury St. Edmunds.

“A colleague and I also had to undertake passenger travel surveys for several weeks on the Cambridge - St. Ives line. This usually took place in the summer when a lot of the regular travellers were away on holiday and we knew it was simply a ruse for gathering information for closure of the line. We eventually both objected to being used in this way, rather brave for a couple of twentysomethings fearful for their jobs, and were summoned to Great Eastern House on the corner of Station Road and Tenison Road where we had our knuckles duly rapped, although we were then transferred to other work. Unfortunately the St. Ives passenger service succumbed in October 1970.”

Another institution that has succumbed to the process of change is the Cambridge postal sorting office on the corner of Mill Road, where in the mid 1960s the News snapped postal worker, Jim Stuart welcoming group of schoolchildren and explaining how packets were sorted into London postal area. An experience sorter would quickly route packages to the appropriate bag. Do you recognise yourself or any of the group?

**

Workers of a different sort are featured in a photograph lent by Mrs K. Bond of Girton. It shows a group of estate workers at Anglesey Abbey in 1920. Amongst the faces she recognises her late father-in-law, Harry Bond, who was the estate carpenter and later landlord of the Little Rose in Trumpington Street. It also features a couple of ancient vehicles; one appears to be some sort of bus, the other may be a motorcycle combination. If it rings a bell then drop me a line. [SCAN OF PICTURE OF WORKERS]

**

Mr L.W. Cadman from Wilburton has been digging through his postcard album to find a card of Prickwillow during the floods of 1937. As he says in his note: "Not quite as bad as this yet! – but of course we're not into March yet – and it seems to be March when the floods come. [SCAN OF PRICKWILLOW]

*

Mona Rumsey from Saffron Walden has sent a card to say that the picture of Land Army girls that I featured in Memories on February 14th was taken at Burgoynes Farm, Impington. Ted Thorogood was Chivers farm manager and his wife Lily was housekeeper at the hostel. She thinks the year was probably 1943

Memories 7th March 2001, by Mike Petty

Cleaners, cooks and caretakers shook hands with royalty in December 1974 when the Duchess of Kent formally opened the new YMCA building in Gonville Place, erected at a cost of over £400,000 to replace the old building swept away for the Lion Yard redevelopment.

That building was not the first meeting place for the Cambridge branch of the Young Men's Christian Association which had come into being in February 1851, just 7 years after the movement's foundation in London. It existed to cultivate the mental talents of the young men of the town and to give it a religious direction. Thus they sought to provide a library of religious books, a Reading Room with religious periodicals, rooms for classes and social religious meetings as well as lectures on all subjects. But to do this it needed space.

The first rooms in Rose Crescent were too dark and hard to get to, the second in Sidney Street were defective in heating and ventilation, little better than the third home at Hobson Place where the landlord wanted to increase the agreed £30 rent. As they were by then £15 in debt things looked bleak indeed. But the Association had a Committee which included some of the most notable of Cambridge businessmen and by 1866 when they moved yet again, this time to St Edward's Passage, such was the numbers attending lectures and using the library that much larger premises were needed.

At this time there came onto the market a site in Alexandra Street which was in the centre of town, near the Post Office, next to the central telegraph station, surrounded by roads yet away from the noise of traffic. Then other businessmen agreed to act as trustees & the future was assured. When the committee, including Mr Foster the banker, Mr Bowes the bookseller, Mr Sayle the shopkeeper & Mr Munsey the Jeweller, planned a building they looked for the best architect of the time, Alfred Waterhouse.

The foundation stone was laid by William Fowler, MP in 1870, and it opened 11 months later, at a cost of £5,000. It included a lecture room that would hold 400 people that became known as the Alexandra Hall, playing an important part in the social life of the town. It was here that in 1908 a Blackpool company first demonstrated "Animated Pictures" and it was soon in regular use, though only for films of a high moral tone. In 1910 it became one of the first three Cambridge buildings licensed under the Cinematograph Act and was the scene of regular shows. But by February 1914 the cinema was six weeks behind with its rent and the Committee gave them one week's notice to quit. Two new applicants asked to continue its use for the same purpose, but it was not to be.

In December 1914 the Welsh Division marched into Cambridge and the YMCA was the one place ready to receive them. For the next five years the Alexandra Hall was devoted to meeting the needs of the troops, with recreation rooms, canteen and concerts. The process was repeated in 1939 but the work also extended to the civilians evacuated to Cambridge to escape the London bombing. Nor were the troops manning the lonely searchlight and anti-aircraft stations overlooked with a Tea Car soon employed. Mobile canteens were at the Railway Station to welcome the troops returning from Dunkirk beaches and soon even the Alexandra street premises were full, men overflowing on to the pavement outside. Later American troops and Italian prisoners of war came to know and appreciate the facilities.

Post-war the YMCA developed its community role once more until the needs of big business became paramount and the site was needed for redevelopment as part of the Lion Yard shopping centre. Hence the new building with its community rooms and study, bedrooms mainly let to non University students and business trainees that received its Royal opening in 1974.

Now Newton Wills is seeking to find people with memories of the old YMCA. Did you attend dances there, were you one of those that used its residential facilities or benefited from its services in other ways. If so he would be pleased to hear from you at the present Cambridge YMCA building at Queen Anne House on Gonville Place, Cambridge – phone 356998 or E-mail to admin@camymca.org.uk. And while we're about it – what do you remember of the old buildings that used to be on the site. [PICTURES OF THE DUCHESS OF WORK OPENING THE NEW YMCA, THE OLD BUILDING IN POST OFFICE TERRACE THAT WAS DEMOLISHED AS PART OF THE LION YARD AND THE LAYING OF THE FOUNDATION STONE FOR THAT BUILDING

**

At least the Great War soldiers billeted at the old YMCA had comfortable rooms. Others were based in tents on the commons and in various parts of the town. A few weeks ago a lady told me of some ghostly happenings in a house on Maids Causeway. It reminded me of a story that appeared in the Cambridge Daily News of 16th January 1915 telling of the experience of the police of a battalion who occupied an empty house in the area.

“The day’s work had been unduly fatiguing and they soon, each one of them, fell soundly asleep. They were aroused from their deep slumber almost simultaneously. For a while there was an oppressive silence and then the disturbed sleepers were startled to hear curious sounds proceeding from all over the premises and from the direction of the front door. Nearly all of them aver that they saw, in shadowy outline, the form of a man which speedily vanished, and that then the noises abruptly ceased. Courageously enough the police decided to search the house and with fixed bayonets they probed into every nook and cranny of the place. The hunt yielded no clue to a human intruder and some time elapsed before the scared and puzzled soldiers successfully wooed sleep again. The following morning the tale of their experience was received with derision and incredulity. Only by neighbours were they taken seriously and from them they learned the house had an eerie history. Their good neighbours declared that the place was known to be haunted. For seven years the houses had been unoccupied, the last tenant being a student lodger whose reason for leaving was that he had seen ghosts there. And so the place had stood empty for many years.”

**

Christine Green from Comberton writes: “What a nice surprise to see in the “Memories” an article on the Cambridge Express Printing Company. My father was Leonard G.C. Colpus, and my grandfather George E. Colpus were both mentioned on the annual outing to Margate programme. I went on several of their day trips, by coach and recall the stops of on the way and then the crates of beer would be hauled from the back of the coach which the men – and some of the women would enjoy.

“My mother helped in the office and I spent many happy hours there. The noise when the presses were in action was wonderful. The whole building would creak & shake until I feared the upper floors would collapse with the weight of the heavy machines. The guillotine seemed enormous and lethal but Mr Venning could always cut through the great pile of paper as if he were cutting a slice of bread. The men were always kind to me and would let me set up type and print out headings”.

Christine had lent me a picture of the retirement presentation to Mr Ingrey; with him are her father (far right) and grandfather, both wearing glasses, with the Mayor of Cambridge, Mr A. Spalding. But she asks if anyone has a picture of the outside of the premises in King Street, or if anybody else remembers them. [SCAN ENCLOSED]

**

Mrs Laura Simmons of Cambridge has some especial memories of the lead up to decimalization for she was in right at the start of the changes and literally helped shape the future Minting of various coins were underway but one decision needed to be made before production could start – what shape should the new 50p be.

She writes: “On Thursday 18th January 1968 a group of us reported to the Medical research Council’s Applied Psychology Unit in Chaucer Road, Cambridge where we were taken up to an attic room and seated round a hollow square of tables. The new decimal coins were explained and we were given samples to scrutinise and handle. Amongst them was the seven-sided 50p but other groups were tested with pentagons, hexagons or other shapes, to see which was easiest to identify. Then we were all given purses with a mixture of coins and asked to pick out sums like 37p., 65½ p. etc. Our efforts were timed by a stop-watch. There was a slight hold-up at one stage when someone dropped a ½p and we all searched the cork tile floor which made a perfect camouflage. Our second task was to identify particular coins by touch alone. I was a frequent visitor to the Unit for many years, taking part in a great variety of tests. But this is the only one where I can definitely say I helped to plan the future”

Memories 14th March 2001 by Mike Petty

Last week I sought memories of wartime firemen. Colin Summerfield of Landbeach responded immediately with photographs of the Cambridge members of the Auxiliary Fire Service in both formal and somewhat less-formal attire! Can you put names to the faces, or the bodies. His dad, Len Summerfield, is fourth from the right in the dressed group and served throughout the war seeing service in Norwich, London docklands and a large fuel depot fire on the Thames, as well as in Cambridge itself. With his wife, Millie, and two sons, they lived in Vicarage Terrace. They moved out from the house just weeks before the German bombs destroyed it. Colin adds: "My father helped fight the fires and recover the bodies of his friends and old neighbours. This had a profound effect on him and up until his death in 1999 he would not discuss it even with his closest family." There was a brighter side to the job – visiting the wealthier parts of Cambridge and requisitioning large cars that were capable of towing firemen's bowsters. [SCANS OF FIREMEN]

Further details of the work the Cambridge men did in the London blitz were recorded by the late Frank Reeve in an unpublished story 'Going to blazes'. It is illustrated by graphic pictures that capture the horror of that time. [SCAN OF BLITZ]

Mr A.C. Waldock from Fulbourn has forwarded his memories of another war-time job – that of cinema operator. He left school in 1940 and started work in the fitters' shop at Fulbourn Hospital. He writes: "One of the highlights of the job was in the winter evenings when I used to assist the fitter/operator, Mr Harley Overton, to show films to the patients; males on evening, and females another. The programme was a newsreel, cartoon and feature, always the same sort. My job was to hand feed the arc lamp, and put the records on for the reel change, as there was only one projector, an old Kalec No.1. The next day I had to pack up the films to return to the renters.

"I was by now bitten by the cinema bug and in September 1941 I saw an advert in the Cambridge Daily News for a rewind boy at the Regal; I applied and got the job at 25/- (£1.25) a week. I worked there for about a month and got promoted to 4th projectionist at The Central (also ABC, as was the Victoria, Tivoli and Playhouse), where I stayed for 2½ years.

"They had a split week of programmes, Sunday one day, Monday to Wednesday 3 days and Thursday to Saturday – the Minors came along later. The films were delivered Thursday and Sundays and were collected Wednesday and Saturday nights. During the blitz on London the system sometimes went adrift and this caused many frantic phone calls to the renters over non-arrivals. This was alleviated by the use of a standby film held at The Vic for such emergencies, this being put into use until the films arrived by rail. I was usually the one who had to go to the station to collect them and bring it down by taxi. The patrons who came in at one o'clock sometimes saw a triple feature programme.

"The films were normally delivered by the Film Transport Services, a London firm. Our chap lived at Shelford and when he was on holiday or off sick the firm sent a relief driver named Gus, a real Londoner, and a character. He would ask me to come and give him a hand, me being an eager lad was pleased to have a 'night out'. This entailed starting at the Kinema, Playhouse, Tivoli, Arts, Regal, Vic and then Central, then off towards 'the smoke' calling at the U.S. base at Bassingbourn (where the gate MPs went over the van with a fine tooth comb). Then it was on to The Priory at Royston and Ware, Hoddesdon, Enfield and up to Palmers Green where Gus had a watering hole.

"Then it was off to the 'film dump' which was a large garage at West Twinford, near the Brylcreem factory. Sometimes you had to queue up to get in, as vans came from all over the south of England. Once inside you dumped your cans on a bay, then went to a car park and waited until about six o'clock next morning when you reloaded for the return with the next three days programmes. Just think! If Jerry had scored a hit on that garage, with all the nitrate film, not to mention the dozens of vans, each a mobile bomb - you would have seen the blaze in Cambridge!

“During the war the cinemas had firewatchers, who were staff members, usually projectionists or doormen. This entailed sleeping in the circle foyer, and for this we got 6/- (30p) per night. I used to do it three or four nights a week. My eating house was the café over Morley’s pawn shop in Hobson Street owned by a Miss Pearson, an elderly lady. Another regular diner was an old chap named Alf Dellar who delivered the handbills for The Arts and always had hobnailed boots as highly polished as any guardsman’s. Another person I remember at The Central was Bill Pearl – he only had one arm and was doorman, boilerman and cleaner as well as being a good gardener in his spare time. He would bring in big potatoes for our suppers which he would put in the ashpit of the boiler so they would be cooked by the end of the show for the firewatchers’ supper.

“During the blackout my mate Bob Osbourn and I used to take our girlfriends home, and on returning to the cinema, if the doors were locked, we used to slide down the coke chute to get in. Even today as I pass The Central I smile to myself when I see the chute.

“On my next move I was promoted to third projectionist at The Victoria which was my favourite as it had a character all of its own, and there I stayed until I was called up for Military Service in 1944. I was demobbed in 1948 and returned to The Vic where I made it to chief projectionists, being finally made redundant when it ‘went dark’ in 1988” [SCANS OF CINEMAS]

Several villages had cinemas in those days. During the war The Regal at Littleport was hit by incendiary bombs that caused considerable damage. It happened after they had been screening a film entitled “On the night of the fire”. Do you have memories of village cinemas.

Whilst on the subject of entertainment, a Comberton reader asks what happened to the pictures of artists who played at the New Theatre which used to be displayed at the Free Press pub in Cambridge. [SCAN OF NEW THEATRE]

Howard Brumhill of Bartlow writes to say he is researching the change in teaching methods and discipline in schools in Cambridgeshire from the 1950s to the 1990s, especially in the Linton, Sawston, Melbourn and Bottisham village college areas. This seems an ideal subject for ‘Memories’, so if you are willing to share your recollections of the days when discipline was a clip around the ear, or 100 lines then let me know.

Newark Air Museum are hosting a Canberra Reunion on 19th & 20th May to mark 50 years of service by the Canberra with the RAF. They have tracked down many of the aircraft and are now looking for people who flew or maintained them. If you can help please send a large SAE to Bill O’Sullivan at Newark Air Museum, Winthorpe Showground, Newark, Notts NG24 2NY or visit their website at www.newarkairmuseum.co.uk

Memories 21st^h March 2001, by Mike Petty

The news that broke in March 1951, that the King had “been graciously pleased to confer on the Borough of Cambridge the title and dignity of a city” marked the end of half-a-century or more of local government struggle for its councillors.

It obliterated any reminder of the old days of the 1830s when Cambridge council had been condemned as notoriously inefficient – though a portrait of the most corrupt of its Mayors, John Mortlock, continues to hang in the Mayor’s parlour.

In 1888 a Local Government Act enhanced the powers of the Cambridge town council who acquired the responsibilities of the Cambridge Improvement Commissioners, themselves appointed to remedy earlier corporation failings. It also reinforced the developing links with the old enemy – the University – who now won the right to appoint and elect representatives to the council. Soon the University surrendered many of its old powers over town affairs and the relationship between the town and gown improved.

But the Act also established an important new authority – the County Council with new powers and responsibilities. There was talk of sharing offices, but they came to nothing and the new County opened a County Hall in Hobson Street.

Town and County found themselves at loggerheads over Cambridge's plans to expand its area, to take in Chesterton and parts of Coton, Trumpington, Cherry Hinton and Fen Ditton; the County objected. Both were partially successful and in 1912 only Chesterton and a few fields to the south became part of the Borough of Cambridge.

Now new battles erupted for expanded Cambridge felt itself large enough to be allowed to run all its own affairs and not have to pay rates to the upstart County Council. The County opposed fearing that if Cambridge won independence the rest of the county would be unworkable. Once more the town won the debate though tactical voting in Parliament in 1914 frustrated their plans.

In 1934 the town was successful in its campaign for yet further extensions with Cherry Hinton and Trumpington being brought within its boundaries, its area had now increased three-fold in 24 years.

By now the County Council had expanded into a new Shire Hall on Castle Hill. The Town Council were furious - yet new offices for the County whilst they were stuck in their old Guildhall. Ratepayers had rejected earlier plans for redevelopment, this time they would rebuild. The inevitable opposition that once more erupted was dismissed. Buildings on Peas Hill were pulled down and one wing of the new offices put up, then the old Guildhall was demolished and the present building erected in its place. The join between the two stages can be seen to this day. But Corporation hopes of a grand official opening were frustrated due to start of War and the move into the new building took place without ceremony.

Once the war was over the conflict between town and county recommenced. The County Council now controlled planning and brought out proposals that would limit town expansion. Trying to break the shackles Cambridge once more sought County Borough Status in 1950. But by then the rules had changed; the minimum population required was 100,000 whereas Cambridge, despite all its expansion could only muster 75,000.

But then in March of 1951 the Town Council took the first step to acquire City status. It was an appropriate time. It was 750 years since King John had granted their first charter, Cambridge had been chosen as a centre for the celebration of the Festival of Britain and would attract visitors from across the world – and there was to be the Royal Agricultural Show in July. The King himself had attended Cambridge University which was the only ancient seat of learning not to be accommodated in a city. But the High Steward, Professor G.M. Trevelyan, had the most telling reason – “Why should Oxford be a city if Cambridge is not. I don't believe there is any answer to that question”

Whichever factor was crucial the news broke on 24th March 1951 that the King had accepted the recommendation of the Home Secretary; Cambridge would be granted city status, though it was stressed this would not confer further powers. It was a point reinforced by the Deputy Mayor “I hope the inhabitants of the administrative county will appreciate and enjoy the reflected honour that they now have a city as their county town”.

On April 27th 1951 there was an opportunity to thank those involved in the award of the Honour. The King, George VI, and Queen Elizabeth, together with Princess Margaret were in Cambridge to attend a Thanksgiving Service which would mark a number of events. Primarily there was the restoration of the stained glass in King's College chapel windows – removed during the war years, but also the success of the University Boat Race Crew. They had beaten Oxford not once, but twice. In the first race - described as the strangest boat race on record – the Dark Blues had sunk and the Umpire had declared the event void. At the rematch Cambridge raced home to a 15-length victory. They had then crossed the Atlantic to beat all comers in Anglo-American inter-University races before returning in triumph on the Queen Elizabeth and racing back to Cambridge to meet the King. His Majesty expressed his pleasure at being the first monarch to visit the City of Cambridge, an honour for which Cambridge had been asking since James I had visited in 1615.

Then that evening there was another celebration, this one in the University Arms. Amongst the honoured guests was the Home Secretary, Chuter Ede, who had endorsed the grant of city status. There would be officials and Members of Parliament, and of course the Chairman of the Cambridgeshire County Council, Alderman E.G. Gordon Frost. A correspondent noticed that the County Arms on the entrance gates at Shire Hall were being regilded and wondered if this was because of the reflected glory or was a mild hint that the County was not without its own dignified importance.

Later the battles between town and county would be renewed with proposals for County Borough status promoted and rejected in 1960 and 1962. Then came local government reorganisations which saw Cambridgeshire County merge first with the Isle of Ely in 1964 and then with Huntingdonshire and the Soke of Peterborough in 1974. In that reshuffle Cambridge lost control of various of its previous responsibilities, lost the University-nominated representatives on the council, but retained the 'City' status which this year it is once more celebrating.

SCANS OF ROYAL VISIT TO KINGS COLLEGE 1951
MARKET HILL AND GUILDHALL 1950
THE BUILDING OF THE NEW GUILDHALL 1936
TO BE DELIVERED MONDAY

Memories 28th March 2001, by Mike Petty

Once more it is fires and cinemas that have dominated the postbag. The two were neatly brought together by Don Unwin of Cambridge. He writes:

"I was born and lived until 1947 in Magrath Avenue, Cambridge, and was a frequent visitor to the Rendezvous Cinema on Saturday afternoons; the entrance charge was 1d for seats in the first row, no arms, 2d in the second row and woe betide you if you were caught moving back during the performance. However the highlight was the day the cinema caught fire. The fire brigade turned up eventually, at that time the Police Brigade, the hoses were run out and the engine started. When the water started to flow more came out of the leaks in the canvas hose than came out of the nozzle!" Don later joined the fire brigade during the war and has memories of driving some of the requisitioned motor cars used to pull the fire appliance.

Pam Newman has written from Bedford because she saw her dad, Fred Harley amongst the Auxiliary Firemen I featured in Memories on 14th March. She had never seen that picture before but has sent another showing Fred sitting on the right, with his mate, George Harding behind his right shoulder. But what, she asks, is the significance of the cup that the centre fireman is holding? Pam remembers her dad started his duties in Rathmore Road before moving to the fire station opposite the University Arms. Whilst stationed there he used to make sandals in his spare time when he was waiting for the ‘bells to go down’. One particular memory was the night of the Perse School Fire: “After several hours fighting the fire his coat had got soaked. He then rode home on his bicycle. It was a bitterly cold night and when he came in his arms were outstretched – the coat had frozen solid and he couldn’t bend his arms!” Being a fireman’s daughter was not always unpleasant: “I used to do shopping for my grandmother in Gwydir Street and one day I heard the engine coming. It was on its way to Sturton Street and dad was driving. That day I got to stand on the platform and ring the bell!” [SCAN OF GROUP]

More pictures of the Auxiliary Firemen have been lent me from the wonderful photographic collections at Burwell Museum. Jeff Marsh supplied them with the original picture of the Cheddar’s Lane section. His father Neville and uncle Gordon served during the war but later moved to Burwell where they continued to serve until the AFS was abandoned in the 1960s. Burwell fire station was taken over by the County Council and is still run by a retained local crew [SCAN OF FIREMEN]

Thanks to the efforts of the war-time firemen many blazes that may have run out of control were checked and houses that may have been destroyed continued to provide homes. But when the war was won there was another battle to be fought – the fight for houses.

Many Cambridgeshire villages retain their picture-postcard thatched properties and these have featured in memories books over the years. But many other people live in less picturesque houses that were an immense improvement over the old, damp and crumbling cottages of an older era – council houses. They stand in estates or in rows straggling along the approaches to villages, places where no modern council planner would ever approve. But how did they come to be built, what is their story?

In 1894 the newly-established Rural District Councils were given responsibility for improving the often-appalling housing conditions of the period. One of these new authorities was the Linton RDC who became one of the very first in the country to start to provide council houses. They embarked on a project that dragged on and on, with their clerk being called to give evidence to a Parliamentary Select Committee as they grappled with the principles & the finance involved. Then the council could start to build with their first ten houses in Symonds Lane and Back Road, Linton being occupied in 1911.

Building continued after the Great War with houses in Balsham Road completed in 1927 and more following. By 1937 the Council had built 102 properties that were being rented at between 3/6 (18p) and 5/6 (28p) per week, at a time when the minimum wage for farm labourers was 31/6 (£1.80) per week. The conclusion of the Second World War saw demand for housing of any sort rise to an unprecedented rate. By 1951 Cambridge couples who had applied for council houses in 1946 still had a two or three-year wait ahead of them. In the Linton area in 1950 there were nearly 550 families needing bigger houses and 323 without a separate home of their own. This was in addition to nearly 70 families living in ex-army camps or huts. Yet there were shortages of building materials and labour and the government was keen to promote the building of ‘non-traditional’ houses such as ‘Wates’, ‘Unity’ and ‘No-fines’ concrete types of pre-fabricated houses. Out at Linton the RDC erected a new estate at Chalklands and more and more families were able to start a new life.

Council houses had large gardens – but no running water or inside loos. Certainly Linton had to grapple with such improvement to its older properties – let alone parking spaces or central heating - whilst also finding money for new homes. It is an achievement that can easily be overlooked. The story of Linton Rural District Council’s pioneering work in housing has now been told in a fascinating 125-page study that was started by Frank Jeffery and has now been completed by his widow, Iris. It is published by the Linton Local History Society and sells for £8.

Were you a council tenant? It must have been a time of tremendous excitement when you were first given the keys of the new council house and faced the challenge of finding furniture to equip it. Did it come from your families, or did you visit the various sales in Corn Exchanges or Cattle Markets and bid at auction. Are there odd items that you have continued to use ever since. Do you have memories to share? [SCANS]

**

Christine Green asked if anybody had memories of King Street and the Cambridge Express Printing Company, and letters have poured in. David Burbridge of Melbourn even remembered her father, G.E. Colpus who was the air raid warden for an area of Huntingdon Road; he recalls: "I took a form to him to sign to allow my mother, who possessed the stirrup pump, to share with neighbours – we still have the pump". Mr E. Shrimpton of Bar Hill has sent a copy of the cover of the Cambridge Express Street Finder for November 1948 that he acquired when he was transferred from Cambridgeshire County Police to the Borough force. "My first morning on the street I was taken by my Sergeant into the King Street office to obtain a copy of the street finder. It was 9d well spent". He remember there used to be a police phone they referred to as 'Sun Street' on Newmarket Road between Wellington Street and East Road. Sun Street was a row of cottages that were demolished to widen Newmarket Road –but do you remember them.

T. Reynolds of Over was one of those who actually demolished the Express Printing Works when working for Plumb and Nurse, a local firm. He adds: "I recall we had a café nearly opposite where we used to have our breaks. Whilst clearing the rubble from the printers building I recall the digger blacking out the electricity for a while when it struck a live cable hidden in the rubble. Reeds Hairdressers was one of the victims, which was unfortunate as there were customers still under the dryers when the shop lost its power supply". Mrs P. Moorhouse of Chesterton used to live in Trinity Place, off King Street. In fact she and her mother were the last people to move out of the 23 houses that used to be there. Can anybody help her find a picture of her old home?

Another forgotten street is recalled by Beryl Bonner of Whittlesford. Her father, Basil Levett was born in Walnut Tree Avenue which she recalls as "a peaceful tree-line road leading down to the River Cam and the ferry boat". Beryl has lent me a snap of her auntie, Iva, enjoying the peace and tranquillity that was to be found beside the river. It has gone now – replaced by Elizabeth Bridge! [SCAN]. And whilst on the river and river crossings, Derek Stubbings of the Chesterton Local History Society, is anxious to collect as many pictures as possible of the ferries and bridges that used to cross the river between Chesterton and Victoria Bridge. Can you help?

Richard Smith of Cottenham has sent some memories of the early days of films in Cottenham. "I redcall that in the late thirties a Mr Symonds gave film shows in the Lordship Hall, behind the Conservative Club. He parked his van containing the projector close to the building so that when he opened a hatch in the side of the van it was in a position to project through a similar hatch in the wall of the hall. Mr Young sold oranges and chocolate bars during the interval"

Memories 4th April 2001 by Mike Petty

As the foot and mouth disease continues commentators lament the dramatic change to upland landscapes should sheep be removed from the fells. In many parts of rural fenland and Cambridgeshire the sight livestock is now a rarity. Yet only a few years ago most villages were used to seeing the regular procession of cows being driven down the street for milking in the parlour in the farmyard. Browsing through old News photograph files for a forthcoming book of Memories I came across one such picture, this one taken at Sutton in November 1964.

Cows feature in Mary Watt's reminiscences of Over. In the early years of the century – last century now –her father had to work for an hour before he could go to school. She recalls: "He drew up many bucketfuls of water from the well just outside the farm's back door to supply the family's needs for the day and cleaned the cow house each morning. Once when he was already dressed in his school clothes he went back down the yard to fetch a tool for his father and as he passed he saw a cow preparing to relieve itself. Not wanting his work spoiled so soon, he ran to fetch a forkful of straw and stood waiting to catch the 'deposit' as it fell. At the crucial moment the cow hiccuped and overshot the straw. Dad was late for school that morning and his mother was not pleased at having so much extra washing to do.

“After school he drove the cows to drink from Sandpit pond and once had a very narrow escape when the bull accompanying them turned nasty and rushed at him. He managed to get into the garden of one of the nearby cottages and get the gate shut at the moment when the bull made contact with it. Fortunately, the gate was strong enough to resist the impact.

“He was still only a teenager when he drove cattle to Overcote, sent his dog onto the drawbridge to guard the open end, followed the cattle on and guarded the other open end himself and began the crossing. A system of chains pulled the drawbridge slowly across to the Needingworth side. One of the animals broke loose and got into the river and dad had one of his most overwhelming experiences trying to keep the others under control while he got the escaped one ashore. Years later it was still very vivid to him. He arrived at St Ives Market much later than he had expected to!” These ferries were an essential part of the transport infrastructure, carrying not only cattle but also horses and vehicles such as Fred Garner of Willingham’s carrier’s cart, photographed at Overcote. [SCAN ON DISK]

Cattle markets are another side of life that has disappeared. The last auction of cattle and pigs at Ely livestock market was reported on 11th September 1981:

“A 100-year-old tradition came to an end when cattle and pigs were auctioned at the last livestock market held in Ely. During the past few years the market had had less business as more farmers switched from animals to arable farming, so the auctioneers who ran the market Cheffins, Grain & Chalk have decided to call it a day. It was a particularly sad day for the auctioneer, Mr John Grain, who first started work at the market exactly 48 years ago to the day. He said the market was founded by his grandfather, Mr Arthur Trett Grain and continued under his father’s guidance until he took over. At 10.45am Mr Grain rang the bell for the last time to summon farmers, dealers and onlookers to the final cattle sale. This time there was only one animal to be sold – a black Hereford brought along by Mr Sidney King, a Littleport farmer. It tipped the scales at 680kg and was bought by King Brothers of Holbeach, Lincolnshire. Then 78-year-old Mr ‘Nips’ Lee of Ely – a market hand for 63 years until he was forced to retire – was called to ring the bell to herald the start of the final pig sale. The bidding was brisk for the 50 pigs on offer, the last one being sold by Mr William Darby of Haddenham. Entering into the spirit of the occasion the bidders pushed the price up to 290p per kg, when it was bought by Mr Sidney King junior, of Littleport” [SCAN ELY COM ON CD]

The Christmas fatstock markets had been larger affairs in the 1960s when crowds of farmers gathered to watch and participate. [SCAN 028 ON CD]

Working horses are another side of country life that have disappeared. Tommy Parish from Stretham has lent me a snap he took some 50 years ago, this time showing horses being led down the village’s Chapel Street. They pulled the ploughs and harrows, carts and carriages and the horseman who looked after them was a skilled member of the farmer’s team. [SCAN ON DISK]

But it meant work for the children too, as Mary Watts recalls: “children were required to contribute, leading horses to the blacksmith for shoeing, carrying harness to the saddler for repair and driving harvest carts between the fields and the yards where the sheaves were stacked. Cousin Kate remembered taking a loaded cart across a fairly narrow bridge over a ditch between the field and the Potash stack yard and letting one wheel run off the bridge so that the cart tipped sideways, endangering the horse’s safety as well as her own. The uncles and farm men in the yard heard her cries and came running to help. They were in time to free the horse before it could be badly hurt and then had to unpack the sheaves, get the cart upright and reload. She remembered that they did not reprimand her, but rather comforted and reassured her. Mum found being in charge of a cart horse and its load frightening, especially as the fen droves of those days had deep ruts and a zig-zag course was often needed to keep a balance, but she was lucky to have no such mishap during her tours of duty.”

If you worked with animals, or have snaps of the days when village streets echoed to the cllop of hooves and when barns were home to cattle, not commuters, then drop me a line.

On the subject of housing the book “Housing in Linton in the 19th and 20th centuries” that I featured in last week’s Memories is actually even better value than I reported. In fact it costs only £5, having been sponsored by South Cambridgeshire District and Linton Parish Councils as well as the Linton Local History Society itself.

For £8 you can have your own copy of a fenland history classic, the Sabine Baring-Gould novel ‘Cheap Jack Zita’. Set in the fens around Prickwillow and Littleport during the traumatic times of the 1816 riots, it has long been out of print but has now been reissued by Praxis Books of Crossways Cottage, Walterstone, Herefordshire HR2 0DX. It really is a most interesting read, full of detail of fen folk’s life at the time it was written back in 1894

**

Wendy Maskell (nee Bell) from Cambridge has written to say that she saw her dad, the late Reg Bell in the picture of the Cambridge Auxiliary Firemen I featured on 14th March. Also pictured was Reg Smith and Wendy recalls: “During the war we lived at 26 Hobart Road and the Smith family lived at no.12. As soon as the siren sounded both ‘Reggies’ would cycle off to the fire station in Coleridge Road and my mother, brother and I would join Mrs Smith and her two children at her home. I remember my dad having to assist the London Fire Brigade during the blitz. Another memory is of him saying he didn’t enjoy climbing to the top of the training ladder, which of course, was all part of his training!”

**

Mrs Gwendoline Tyler from St Ives has sent a picture with faces for older readers to puzzle over. It shows a children’s tea in St Ives Corn Exchange about 1935-36. She is unsure what the event was— or could it have been in connection with the jubilee of King George V in 1935 or perhaps a Coronation party for King George VI. If you know please tell me [SCAN ST IVES ON CD]

EXTRA STORY NOT SENT ON LINE

Mrs Edna Fryer of Fulbourn has sent me some programmes for seaside excursions organised by W. Heffer and sons’ printing department just before the Second World War. They prove that Cambridge folk in those days were prepared to enjoy themselves over a very long day out. In 1936 they went to Blackpool, which meant a 4.20 start in the morning, arriving at their destination six hours later. They were refreshed en route with bacon and eggs, dined at the Savoy Hotel on lamb or beef followed by peach Melba or cheese and finished off the day with a supper on the train back comprising soup, a roast joint and more cheese. If the 11 pm train home took as long as the train there they could expect to be home about 5am.

Perhaps it was all a bit much, for by the time they set off in 1938 for a waygoose to Llandudno they had somewhat less of a day of it. For a start they could lay in much later – the train did not depart till 5.10am and the journey was a mere 5 hours 40 minutes. What’s more they had an early start for home, leaving “the queen of Welsh resorts” at 10 pm.

Being a printing firm they produced a timetable brochure, but not even Heffers could get things right all the time, as part of the verse on their Blackpool trip shows.

Memories 11th April 2001, by Mike Petty

It was April Fools Day the other week, but sometimes I wonder if people could make up some of the happenings I'm told about.

Take the case of Ken Howard of Ely, who I met at a talk last week. He had a tale of how a half-cut boat got into the Cutter Inn, Ely, through the window. I know that area of the city is rather low-lying and there are plenty of snaps of the pub being lapped with water, but who was he trying to kid?

But it was true. Ken used to work in the building and surveyor's department of the old Hall, Cutlack and Harlock Brewery whose workshops were in the building now occupied by the Babylon Gallery on Waterside, Ely. When the Cutter was being refurbished back in 1964 Bob Woods, the surveyor, had the idea of making a bar in the shape of a boat. So he and his team drew up the design & acquired the English oak, which they steam-bent into shape. Then once it was complete all they had to do was install it in the pub, just down the river. They could have loaded the bar onto a lorry and driven it around but this would have been too tame. So they arrange with boatbuilders Appleyard Lincoln to ship it on one of their barges. The workshop team of Stan Angel, Ken, Gerald Murfitt (clerk of the works), Adrian Flude, & Aubrey Davis took one side, while George Cooper, Bill Bean, Ian Scott and Ken Foreman took the other as they carried it down to the river. Then after a short voyage it was unloaded and manhandled into the bar through the window. And yes, they did know it wouldn't go through the door when they built it! [SCANS OF BREWERY WORKSHOP WHERE BOAT-BAR BUILT, THE NAMED GROUP CARRYING IT DOWN TO THE RIVER, THE BOAT EN ROUTE DOWN RIVER AND BEING MANHANDLED THROUGH THE PUB WINDOW]

The brewery became part of East Anglian Breweries but closed suddenly in January 1969 when some 300 employees found their jobs in Ely had gone. Many of the older workers might see themselves in a photograph Ken has of a retirement presentation to Walter Chevell about 1954-55. They include more Days than there were in a week, including Rocky, Banger and Billy. The site has now been redeveloped as Brewery Close. [SCAN OF THE RETIREMENT PRESENTATION]

For many working in a brewery might seem an ideal job, but the conditions down at Waterside Ely was far from ideal. On a damp November morning the smell from the brewery would mingle with the smell from the Sugar Beet Factory, the smell from the Jam Factory, the smell from the Gas Works, and the reek from the sewage works to produce a cocktail that was far from pleasant. No wonder the maggots from the nearby rag-and-bone works would walk out under the gate!

But Ken has proof that this brewery at least did know how to organise a booze-up. Their annual dinners were grand affairs, quite the highlight of the social calendar, as here in about 1960 when the venue was the old Women's Institute Hall in Newnham Street, Ely. [SCAN OF THE PARTY]

And, talking of ladies of mature age, his wife Pamela (nee Hills) is happy to embarrass herself by allowing me to feature this view of her (third from right, front row) in this photograph of pupils at Silver Street school, Ely. She would not wish to embarrass her classmates – most of whom she can name – by pointing out that they are all this year approaching their 65th birthday. Just three names elude her from amongst those in the second row from the top. The person fourth from the right (whose face is obscured by a mistake on the picture) and the two at the end of that row, just the other side of Doreen Turner. [SCAN OF SILVER STREET SCHOOL GROUP]

**

At an earlier meeting, of the Cambridge Instrument Company pensioners, Derek Wilderspin told me of an incident when a double-decker bus overturned in Sidney Street, Cambridge one Friday 13th. So I promised to keep an eye open for details. Then I got a letter from Mrs Muriel Taylor of Weston Colville. Inside was a picture of an overturned bus in Sidney Street, Cambridge dated 13th October 1945. Talk about co-incidence. Except that 13th October 1945 was not a Friday. I turned up the back files of the CDN to find an account of the accident, but there is no mention of it at all. Muriel knows the details: "The driver of the bus was my father, Percy Wolfe, and the conductress was Daphne Wilson (who lodged in Kingston Street). It was a Saturday morning and the cause was that the front axle broke, turning the bus on its side and causing traffic chaos. My father, who was with the Eastern Counties Bus Company for nearly 50 years, was only badly shaken but the conductress suffered a broken collar bone". Derek is adamant this is not the crash he saw, which was further along outside the Gas Company's shop, for he was away in 1945. So when was the other crash? [SCAN OF BUS CRASH]

The Instrument Company fellowship have been busily collecting memories of the 'good old days' for a Millennium booklet. In it John Green recalls his recollections of the firms Christmas Parties in the 1950s. They were held in the staff canteen at the back of the works on Chesterton Road and for John the highlight was the film show. He reports: It started by the wheeling out on it's trolley of the projector with it's wooden cover, by I think Mr Sutton and Mr Hammond. Whilst we children waited, the spools were fitted, the film threaded through, the lights dimmed, and the "show" began. Up on the screen appeared Charlie Chaplain, or Mickey Mouse, or other Disney characters. Then the real "show" began! There would be a small bang and the image on the screen would disappear to be replaced by a yellow light. Messrs S&H would ask for the lights to be put up, off would come the wooden cover and the gluing together of the film would begin. The film then mended, back on would go the wooden projector cover, and to cheers from the children the film would start again, to be followed - as it always seemed - quite quickly, by another break in the film.

"After several episodes of the same it would be decided that the film already had too many bad joints, and it would be re-wound and replaced by another film. Whilst this film changing was taking place the opportunity would be taken for the Rev Walter Partridge, (vicar of St Luke's in whose parish CICO was situated) to walk around and talk to the children. Unfortunately my only recollection of him is that he always wore on his lapel a painted plaster toy head, which he thrust at you, and wiggled!

"Once the film had been replaced off would go the lights again and a new film would commence, then if we were lucky another and even better "show" would take place! As the film progressed a small brown spot would appear on the screen which would rapidly spread, and then the film, joy oh joy, would burst into flames! This would often finish the film show!"

Can anybody help Peggy Brutnell who remembers when she was eight years old seeing the R101 Airship flying over Cambridge. She writes: "I lived in New Street and was playing "houses" with fallen leaves with a few friends on the New Street Rec and we all started running home when the airship appeared, but a photographer called us back and sat us amongst the leaves. The photograph was on the front page of the evening newspaper that night. I'd love to see it again. I am 79 now but often think of that day". Once more we have a mystery for I know the R101 was featured in the C.D.N. on 9th November 1929 – but not with the picture she remembers. Did it come back over Cambridge before its fatal crash in October 1930?

Helen Harwood of Great Shelford would like more details of another form of transport – railway shunting horses. She writes: “I was every interested to read in Memories of 28th February about Mr Burling’s memories of Charlie the last BR shunt horse. My dad was a shunter in the 50’s and 60’s and had steam and diesel shunting engines, but never a horse! Please could we have more about Charlie and what his duties were! Can you help?

And keeping on railways Mr P.A.L. Brunney would like details of a railway engine that crashed through the buffer and went on to Station Road in Cambridge. Once more its over to you.

Memories 18TH April 2001, by Mike Petty

Ten years ago Royston was still in a state of shock following a series of explosions and fires that had devastated the area in the early evening of Friday 8th March 1991.

Police sealed off the town, traffic was halted on the outskirts and abandoned cars littered the area as motorists trudged the final miles to their homes on foot. Trains were stopped on the main line for fears that sparks from the overhead power lines could cause further devastation.

Firemen were inundated by a flood of calls for assistance as a heavy cloud of gas hung in the air and gas appliances sprung leaks or burst into flames.

Frightening stories began to emerge; one lady in Sun Hill had been taking a mid-afternoon nap when she was awoken by the sound of an explosion. As her bedroom filled with smoke she rushed downstairs to find her kitchen boiler ablaze, flames and smoke spewing out. As firemen tackled that blaze they were alerted by screams from a bungalow two doors down as a lady fled her home after her gas fire exploded in flames. Plans were made to evacuate 25 homes in Green Drift after an explosion in a terraced house shattered windows.

Another huge explosion rocked Greneway School where caretaker David Hanchett saw flames billowing from ventilation slots in the boiler house. The kitchen, hall and changing rooms were damaged in the blast and music teacher Adrian Jacobs led 40 children to safety.

But where was safe? An emergency centre was established at Tannery Drift School and at Royston Hospital patients were issued with extra blankets as the heating had to be turned off, though food continued to be cooked – carefully – in electric ovens.

As police with loudhailers toured the streets warning people to turn off their gas appliances some 250 engineers were called in to make checks on some 5,000 homes, shops and businesses. Those that were not occupied were broken into. It was an operation that would take all night, and the fitting of new gas meters to every premise would taken even longer

Once the immediate situation was stabilised the clearing up could begin. It was to be a long job. Five weeks after the explosions some people were still without heating, cooking or washing facilities, everywhere redecorating and repairs were being undertaken.

But how could it have happened. An enquiry revealed that during work on a new medium-pressure gas main a pipe had been connected wrongly, sending a surge of gas with 15 times more pressure than usual into the domestic supply. [THERE ARE THREE PHOTOS OF THE ROYSTON GAS INCIDENT IN THE NEWS LIBRARY PHOTO FILES UNDER ‘GAS’]

In October 1965 it had been Cambridge's turn to experience the fear of a gas explosion – though this time the danger was of a different kind. As daylight broke on 27th October 1965 students from Magdalene college were awoken by a strange noise. They peered out to see a steel cable stretching into the night sky and far above a wartime barrage balloon was hovering. It had broken away from R.A.F. Cardington carrying its weather instruments with it and dragged its wire rope thirty miles across country before becoming hooked on scaffolding at St Johns College. The College was evacuated whilst it was winched to the ground, firemen carefully avoided protrusions that might pierce the hydrogen-filled canopy and cause an explosion. [SCAN OF BARRAGE BALLOON]

Another balloon flight was recalled last week by Peter Hamence of Sutton who showed me two picture of an blimp that came down near Sutton Gault in October 1913. It sailed along Bury Lane, turned left and landed in Eddy Read's field. One photo quite clearly shows the advertising slogan 'Give her Bovril' on its envelope, the other is a wonderful detail of the flying controls. [SCANS OF BALLOON]. He also has a picture of a windmill at Mill Farm in Sutton which had to be demolished when Mepal airfield was built during the second world war and last week I heard from a lady in Chatteris of the awful night in September 1943 when a heavily loaded bomber failed to take off from that airfield and ploughed into nearby council houses, killing three on the ground as well as the crew.

Mrs Caroline Neech of Milton has a piece of another crashed bomber, the German Dornier that came down at the back of her house in Warren Road, Cambridge in February 1944. The crew had bailed out and the plane flew itself until it ran out of fuel and made a landing on the allotments, one wing caught a shed and swung the plane round, away from the houses. Her husband, a fitter in the RAF, was home on leave that night and heard what sounded like a glider landing. He went outside to investigate and could hardly believe what he saw. The plane was there for a two or three days before the wings were taken off & it was carted away, People living in the area opened their back gardens to sightseers and collected money for the Red Cross. [SCAN OF CRASHED BOMBER]

Then to complete the aviation theme I met Derek Miller from Longstanton who was searching for a picture of a glider that crashed on to the central reservation of the M11 in November 1984. Both the instructor and the student pilot from the Cambridge University Gliding Club escaped serious injury, but the machine was badly damaged. Fortunately it was early morning when traffic was light or the situation could have been even worse. I have located a picture of a glider flying over the M11, but not one of the actual crash. Can you help. [SCAN OF GLIDER OVER M11]

Arthur Caldecoat of Cambridge believes he may be able to shed some light on the overturned bus I featured in last week's Memories. He seems to recall that the bus actually fell on its side outside the Gas Board showrooms in Sidney Street but that it had to be dragged down to the corner of Market Street where it was wide enough to get it upright again. He remembers that it was placed on sheets of metal to drag it along and that police had to divert traffic for some time. Rodney Dale from Haddenham, who was in his youth an avid bus aficionado, remembers the bus was on route 101 (Green End Road - Cambridge Railway Station). The accident happened before 8 o'clock one morning, and the only passenger was a Mr McKenna who was 'on top' and slightly injured. Rodney can't remember the registration number of the bus (it might have been VE2802), but is pretty sure that its Eastern Counties number was AH223, because it was the only AH bus with a flat, as opposed to curvaceous, front.

Paul Carter of Wadhurst, East Sussex has written: "During my researchers into bus and coach operations in the Cambridge area I have come across several references to the Gogs Fete and the competition amongst the local bus and coach operators to cater for the large number of locals wishing to reach this event. Do you have any information about it?"

It was certainly flourishing in July 1933 as the Cambridge Chronicle reported one of the largest gatherings at the Wandlebury House of Sir Terence Gray when 18,000 people assembled to enjoy ten hours of fun at a fantastic fete. The crowd was in good humour, the sun blazed continually, and with twelve hundred helpers to ensure that everything went according to plan it was a resounding success. Five bands kept the action going while other attractions included Clay Pigeon Shooting, Tennis Tournament, Fixed Jack Bowling, Quoits, Darts, Whippet Racing, Greyhound Racing, Bowling, Skee-ball, Skittles, County Treasure Hunt, Borough Treasure Hunt, Ringing the Horse and Cutting the Chicken. And the long list of prizes for the draw should surely have persuaded even the most reluctant to have a small flutter. The holder of ticket no 17763, a Mr R. P. Williams, won the first prize . . . a Morris Minor Motor Car. Entertainment abounded, and 'The Great Risko' - a famous aerial gymnast and Royal Command performer - thrilled the crowd by launching himself into space from a height of 70ft held by only one ankle.

But can you add more details

Tony Brotchie of Cambridge has managed to solve the riddle of the picture of members of the Cambridge National Fire Service personnel and their cup. He tells me it commemorated the success of the station in a pump drill competition in 1942 in which they were runners up. The firemen pictured were Charlie Perrin, Jack Ives, George Harding, Arthur Smoothy in the back row with firemen Coe, 'Tosh' Burton and Fred Harley in front. The pump in the background had been bought for the Cambridge Police Fire Brigade in 1939. Tony was a junior fireman / despatch rider in those days and tells me they still hold a reunion every year.

Mrs Jose Parr of Ely can add more details about the Cutter Inn boat-bar I featured last week. Her late father, Eric Howard was foreman of the building department of the brewery for many years and was in charge of the building of the bar. He is shown holding a plane in the picture of the workshop. Jose and her mother have other pictures and also an official invitation to the launch of the new bar at the Cutter in 1964.

My mention of the reprint of the Victorian story 'Cheap Jack Zita' has brought a response from Janice Clarke (nee Parr) of Royston. She has a copy of a 'New Edition', dated 1894. Inside is a note that the book originally belonged to Miss A.E. Gill, later Mrs A.E. Spenceley. It was bought at her sale, on 8th February 1952, by Mr C.J. Fendick of Little Downham Lodge; he gave it to Janice's mother, Mrs Kathleen Parr who in turn passed it on. But Janice adds: "I grew up in Little Downham but have no recollection of a Mrs Spenceley. I wonder if she came from Littleport, where I know Mr Fendick had a business. What was the reason for her sale?" Can anybody help?

Memories 25th April 2001, by Mike Petty

More readers have come forward with details of the bus crash in Sidney Street that I featured in Memories on 11th April. My picture, lent by Mrs Muriel Taylor of Weston Colville was dated 13th October 1945 in ink on the top corner of the photograph, and that was a Saturday. But reader Derek Wilderspin had been certain the bus had overturned on Friday the 13th and he has been backed up by Mrs M. Walker of Cambridge & by Roynon Howes who E-mailed with more details:

"I am certain that it was, indeed, Friday 13th because my father was at work and he did not work on a Saturday. He was in fact in charge of the workshop at the then Eastern Counties and it was he who oversaw the recovery of the bus. You show the bus, still on its side outside the old Sainsbury's and quite rightly so because, although it fell further up in front of the Gas Showrooms, actually touching but not breaking the windows of the showroom, it was impossible to raise it to an upright position as it required three cranes to do this. Two of the cranes came from RAF Waterbeach and a third one joined them later from, I think, the American base at Mildenhall. The two cranes, one at the front and the other at the back, carried the bus, still on its side to where the photograph was taken and the third approached from the Market Square. It was this one that then was able to pull the bus upright. It was a very tricky job as they had to prevent the bus from overshooting and crashing down on its other side.

"The three cranes, two at the front and one at the rear, then transported the bus through Cambridge to the repair shop at about one and a half miles per hour. Each time they met an obstacle like the bollards in front of Lloyds Bank, the bus would have to be lowered and one crane disconnected. It would then go round the obstruction and drag the bus round it before carrying on down St Andrew's Street. It was a painfully slow business. The first idea was to take it up to the repair shop in Hills Road but then they decided to change the route to take it up to the Newmarket Road depot. It held up the traffic all day in Cambridge and it was a talking point for several years."

Roynon feels that the year was not 1945, but earlier. "I am sure that only one bus fell on its side in that area, ever", he adds

John Dench has also E-mailed with what may be the conclusive proof, for he recalls that date as Friday 13th October 1944. "It happened early morning around 8 am near to the Green Street junction. My memory is very clear on this as it was the year I started work at Galloway and Porter's bookshop and I remember viewing the scene from the shop steps in the company of the later Mr George Porter."

Armed with his information I turned back to the files of the News and there, indeed is an account of the accident. It includes the name of the driver, Percy Wolfe and the conductress, Daphne Wilson, as recalled by Muriel Taylor. One of the passengers was William Howes – confirmed by his daughter, Ivy Jordan who has also written in. She tells me he was taken to the Leys School which was then used as an annexe for Addenbrooke's Hospital where he had a plate inserted in his arm. [COPY OF CUTTING IN ENVELOPE DELIVERED SATURDAY]

So it looks as if the date actually written on the other picture might have been wrong - but the bus in the News picture is surely facing the other way from the bus in the photo lent by Mrs Taylor – is there still a mystery here?

And on the continuing issue of bus crashes Malcolm Boston seems to recall there was another double-decker that fell over in Petty Cury in the late 1940s or early 1950s. It ended up leaning against the Boots building and the Eros upstairs restaurant. Does this jog any memories? [PHOTO OF BUS SQUEEZING DOWN PETTY CURY IN NEWS LIBRARY FILES]

**

There has also been some progress on my search for information on a train that crashed onto Station Road. Mr H. Mansfield from Radegund Road believes the train overran the turntable that used to be on the railway property on the left as you approach the station. His late father, Arthur Mansfield, was a sergeant in the railway Home Guard and was on duty that night. He had to go around all the sentry posts to make sure the men were at their posts and awake. His route was the air raid shelter, Rustat Road, Mill Road, Devonshire Road, across Station Road to the then upper yard, behind the flour mills, along Hills Road and back. As he walked down Station Road in the blackout he thought he could see a train in the road and told himself it was impossible. He always wondered what anyone would have thought to see a sergeant patting an engine to see if it was real! But does anyone have a picture to prove it?

**

When Helen Harwood asked for memories of Charlie the shunting horse at Newmarket station she stimulated a host of recollections.

Vic Burling from Cambridge is a rail enthusiast and has sent me a copy of an illustrated article that appeared in 'The Railway Observer' of June 1967. It confirms that when Charlie retired on 21st February that year he was the last in a long line of shunt horses on the railways of Britain; there had been 772 such animals in 1928, by 1955 the total had dropped to 76 and now they were gone completely. His work had involved shunting horseboxes, often containing valuable racehorses. [PICTURE OF CHARLIE AT NEWMARKET AMONGST THE ENVELOPE OF PICTURED DELIVERED ON SATURDAY]

Molly Pringle from Newmarket writes: "I knew Charlie well as my husband had a forage business on the Newmarket railway crossing and supplied Charlie with his feed. We lived on the premises & saw Charlie at work every day. He was a 'gentle giant' and a dear old friend. Charlie appeared one year at the Horse of the Year Show in London and I was very proud to be able to see him walk majestically across the area"

Other readers recall shunting horses elsewhere. Mr E.A. George from Cambridge recalls: "My memory goes back to the 1920s & early '30s in Shelford. As far as I remember there was one horse at the station which both pulled the trolley used for local deliveries and the odd little shunting job, though the main shunting was done by the engine of the pick-up which called most days. If a wagon was difficult to start a lever was applied behind a wheel; once moving it was not difficult for the horse to keep it going. The main generally in charge of the horse was known as 'Trolley' Robinson and the goods foreman was Bob Page"

Syd Butter from Gt Shelford used to work at Cadbury's depot in Hills Road, Cambridge during the 1950s, next door to Pordages the vegetable wholesalers. Both firms had goods delivered by rail. The wagons were shunted in each morning by horse. Syd continues: "The fellow who was with the horse hardly had to give an order, it knew exactly where to stop. The wagons weighed a few tons, so he would lean forward with all his strength and once they moved he eased off and let them roll".

Helen has written again to say she has been contacted by an ex-work colleague, John Capes, who remembers shunting-horses being used at North Walsham up to about 1947. There they were used to move open wagons containing sugar beet and closed vans for parcels and livestock. They also used to deliver parcels on a cart. John also remembers 'mechanical horses' – a three-wheeler cab to which trailers could be attached. Walter Martin Lane photographed one such machine at Ely station goods yard at about this time. [SCAN]

**

Brian Attmore seeks your assistance urgently with a picture of an event at the Abbey Stadium Football Ground sometime between 1945 and 1953. He is working to produce a picture book on Cambridge United, the profits of which will go to the club and needs to know what is going on; perhaps the bunting, flags and fashions may help. He is also on the lookout for any other details of events such as gymkanas and garden shows that used to be held there. If you can help then E-mail him at Brian.Attmore@btinternet.com or ring on Cambridge 245168 [HE E-MAILED THE PICTURE TO THE NEWSDESK ON 20TH APRIL 11.26AM AND THIS SHOULD BE ON THE SYSTEM]

**

With May Day approaching Mrs Molly Sekulla of Campkin Road, Cambridge has lent me a picture taken outside Merton House, Grantchester on 1st May 1937. She writes: "In those days the girls of the village chose a May Queen and processed through the streets singing Spring songs & collecting money which was divided between us at the end of the day". She believes the ceremony might have been discontinued at the outbreak of the war or when the 11-year-old pupils went to Sawston Village College for their further education, having previously been educated until the age of 14 years at the village school. [SCAN OF GIRLS] Do you have May-Day memories of processions – or trades union demonstrations?

Memories 2nd May 2001 by Mike Petty

In May 1976 tourists flocked to view a sight that if repeated today may well have caused them to flee in panic - such is the hysteria generated by foot-and-mouth disease in certain countries.

But then tourists deserted King's College Chapel and cars came to a halt on the Backs while a Stapleford sheep farmer gave what many people took to be a demonstration of sheep shearing.

But for Mr. Gerald Beavis it was as a routine job of work. With a flock of 41 Suffolk ewes grazing on Scholars' Piece, the area of rough grass across the river from the manicured lawns, he had decided to do the shearing at the college rather than lose time by taking the sheep back to his farm. Never can he have performed a routine farming task to such an audience as some 100 camera-toting tourists jostled to take his photograph.

When King's college head gardener, Mr Dennis Gifford, made a brief appearance he was immediately assailed by questioners demanding to know whether it was an ancient Cambridge tradition being enacted and whether the college really approved of such rural goings on in such surroundings. He told them: "We often have sheep here and we prefer them to cattle because they keep the grass nice and short".

Old engravings show that animals have grazed there for centuries. What made this special was that as far as anybody knew it was the first time sheep had actually been shorn there.

**

One man who knows all about such matters is Dr Peter Jackson from Over, who works at the University Veterinary School. But he has not always been an academic, as he explains in a fascinating letter:

"I am sure that I am just one of many who enjoyed your recent article on the changes that have taken place on Cambridgeshire Farms in recent and not so recent years. It brought back to me many memories both of growing up in the villages of Cambridgeshire but also of my life as a local veterinary surgeon which started in 1960.

My decision to become a vet was taken in the village of Babraham where my mother was headmistress. My greatest joy was to help out at the Home Farm where the Adeane family had a dairy farm. During school holidays and at weekends I was up at 6.00 am to help with the milking and other jobs with the 35 or so cows that lived there. One morning a Jersey cow named Annabelle was having a problem calving. Mr J.P.G. Runciman, who with his father ran the long established veterinary practice at Downing Street, Cambridge, was called and arrived to deal with the problem. I was alone on the farm and was asked to help. We delivered twin calves with some difficulty but the experience made me feel I had seen the Holy Grail. I knew this was the job I wanted to do and after struggling a bit at the Perse School to gain sufficient A levels I managed to gain a place at Edinburgh University.

The farming scene was totally different in the 1950s and 60s than it is today. The majority of farms were mixed, growing crops on rotation and usually having cattle, pigs and sometimes sheep and poultry too. When I was working in Cambridge as a student we attended a herd of Guernsey cows and a Friesian herd in Trumpington, two in Grantchester, one in Thriplow, one in Lolworth as well as a number on the Cambs- Suffolk Border. There was at least one dairy herd in each Cambridgeshire village. A large farm had perhaps 60 milking cows but many farmers managed to make a living with far fewer.

My first job after qualifying was at March and then in 1966 I moved to Chatteris where we opened a branch practice and lived happily for the next 10 years. When I went to work in March in 1960 there were five dairy herds in the town and its immediate vicinity. At Chatteris we attended four dairy farms in the town and others in Mepal, Sutton, Haddenham & Somersham. The most numerous farm livestock were pigs and we looked after the veterinary needs of approximately 40 pig farms or smallholdings in Chatteris or its immediate neighbourhood. There were many more in the surrounding villages.

In those days many of our pig keepers were tenants of Cambridgeshire County Council renting smallholdings at Tick Fen near Chatteris, Coates, in fields near March and also at Manea and Benwick. We also had smallholder clients in Huntingdonshire and Norfolk. Some smallholders managed to make a reasonable living on as little as 10 acres of good fen land and there were very few of more than 50 acres. The tenants grew corn, potatoes, sugar beet and other vegetable crops in rotation. Almost all had six to ten sows and fattened or sold on their offspring making a reasonable profit whilst doing so. Many smallholders also had one or two cattle, or beasts as they were called, to fatten over winter and some older men had a heavy horse working around the farm too. Quite a few people in March, Chatteris and the surrounding villages kept one or two fattening pigs or a sow at the bottom of their gardens. Not everyone kept a boar and it was not uncommon to see the late Mr Claude Bayes walking his boar along Bridge Street in Chatteris to mate with a neighbour's sow.

The financial situation in livestock farming was totally different in those days. Pig keepers could make a profit of up to £5 a pig which made the job very well worth while. Our farm visit fee in those days was 10s 6d (55p) and a visit plus an injection to a sick pig would cost no more than £1.25. It was not uncommon to visit a sick pig once, twice or even three times and still leave a profit for the owner. Costs were very different too - petrol was 30p per gallon and you could buy a new Ford Anglia for about £500. All four vets in our practice averaged 30,000 miles a year and we could change our cars yearly for about £150. My wages in 1960 were £1,100 a year and my take home pay about £16 a week. Full board and lodging at the Station Hotel in March was £6.00 a week.

Swine fever (recently seen again in East Anglia) was endemic in those days and we spent a lot of time vaccinating pigs against this disease and another common disease Swine Erysipelas. This latter disease is now easily cured with penicillin but was a dreadful scourge in the pre-antibiotic days. Older clients in Chatteris would recall taking out barrow loads of dead pigs which had died from this disease.

Farmers were mostly reluctant to try and treat their own animals believing it to be a job for the vet. As a result any obstetrical and other veterinary problems would result in a call for veterinary assistance at any time of day or night. Sadly it is now often not economic to seek veterinary assistance for a sick pig. Although most farmers would still do anything for their livestock most have less time to spend with each animal. I remember being called to see a sow in March suffering from severe mastitis. Her udder was hard and she was showing signs of toxæmia. Mastitis is a potentially dangerous and life threatening disease. Antibiotic and anti-inflammatory therapy will do much to help but nursing care is of great benefit too. I advised my March owner to massage his sow's hard udder with udder cream as often as he could and to get her up on her feet every few hours. The next morning I visited the sow expecting to find that she had died. Instead she was lying happily feeding her piglets. Her udder was soft and full of milk. There was no sign of the owner but he emerged slowly from his house looking tired and unshaven. 'What do you think of her mate?' he asked. I replied that she was unbelievably better. 'You gave me a job and a half mate' he said. 'I've been up all night rubbing her udder with goose grease and getting her up as you said. It looks as if it's done the job.' It had and the life of the sow and indirectly her 10 piglets had been saved partly by my drug therapy but with enormous input from the owner. That was just one example of amazing devotion to duty that we saw. Farmers and stockmen and women had time then to take that extra little bit of trouble with an individual animal.

Skin disease was quite common in pigs and we had drugs to alleviate this unpleasant condition that caused so much irritation to affected pigs. Our clients liked 'pig oils' to help improve their pigs' skins. It was a form of oily liquid paraffin and when mixed with flowers of sulphur not only reduced the effect of mange but also improved and soothed the pig's skin too. Pig powders were another favourite and with white or green horse oils were some of our best sellers. The powders had a lovely aromatic smell and when mixed with meal tempted the pig's appetite, acted as a mild purgative and provided some of the pig's mineral needs. The horse oils worked well on horses and cattle with tendon strains but also provided apparent help for people suffering from bad backs. Many people thought the world of the white liniment of turpentine that was the active principle of horse oils and claimed it did more to help them than any medical treatment. They often came back for further bottles priced at 2s 6d.

Few of our clients had cars and we visited many small animals in their homes. On an average day we each made 30 or so visits and at weekends we might make up to 45 visits in a single day. Ten of these might be in the same village where we might visit several pigs, a cow, some calves, a horse and several cats and dogs. With modern dairy farms of over 200 cows the vet can easily spend two hours or more dealing with fertility problems on just that one unit.

There were many more people working on the farms. Our biggest client in Chatteris was Mr Arthur S. Rickwood. He farmed over 7000 acres in Cambridgeshire and Norfolk. He kept large numbers of pigs, cattle and bred Percheron horses. He bred his famous Large White pigs at the Laurels in the village of Mepal but the lovely traditional farmyard where they lived has long been a housing estate.

There was always plenty of help available on our farms. At one of the first calving cases I attended at Sutton five men came to help but luckily were not needed. Mr Rickwood employed large numbers of men and women on his farms - 35 men reported every day for work at Horsey Farm, Chatteris. Much of their work was gang work on the land picking potatoes, singling sugar beet etc. Most of this work is now done by machine and better sugar beet seed that does not require singling and chopping out is available.

How farm life has changed and not necessarily for the better. Back in the 60s we never thought that things would or could change so much or that local farms would be denuded of both people and animals. The coming of the Common Market initially aided arable farmers but animal production became less and less profitable. Animals were kept in larger and larger groups with more being looked after by fewer people. Less and less time was available for individual animal care. The vet is an infrequent visitor to many farms but able to provide overall guidance about animal health. There is less chance for many reasons to examine and treat individual sick animals in the way that we did regularly so many years ago.

I left general practice in 1976 but I feel very lucky to have lived through those distant days and work with so many nice Cambridgeshire people and their animals.

SCAN OF STRETHAM FARMER GODFREY PARISH AND HIS PIGS, 1950s; picture taken by Mr Tommy Parish
PICTURES OF CHATTERIS IN 1960S & VARIOUS ANIMALS FROM NEWS LIBRARY FILES IN ENVELOPE WITH CHRIS ELLIOTT
SCANS OF SHEEP SHEARING ON BACKS 1976

**

The importance of animals in many people's lives was commemorated at a service held in Ely Cathedral in April 1988:as the News reported:

“Some of the congregation howled and barked when the organist started to play the first hymn during a service at Ely Cathedral. Others let out yelps and growls that echoed around the mighty Norman building. A few even managed to doze despite the racket while others munched contentedly wondering what all the fuss was about. The vice-dean, Canon Dennis Green, used a microphone to make himself heard to the rest of the congregation. No one minded about the chaos because all were taking part in a blessing service for animals and owners, thought to be the only one of its kind in the country. It was organised by the Dean and Chapter in conjunction with Wood Green Animal Shelters following the success of a similar event last year. Hundreds of people took animals of all shapes and sizes to the service – cats, dogs, sheep, goats, ponies, donkeys, pigs and cows” [SCAN]

**

Brain Warner of Hartington Grove, Cambridge has been scanning his old photo albums and has unearthed a picture of the Park House Football Team, winners of the inter-house football cup at the old Central Boys' School, Cambridge in 1948. He is the goal-keeper and in the outside-right position is David Hunt who now lives in Long Melford. But can anybody recognise any of the others? [NOTE THE ORIGINAL OF THIS PICTURE IS NOT VERY SHARP]

I WILL BRING THE SCANS IN ON A DISK ON MONDAY MORNING - MIKE

Memories, May 2nd, by Mike Petty

Do you have May Day memories, I asked last week.

Yes replies Mr A.Tall from Colne, for he has photographs of May Day celebrations in that village from 1913 onwards. He writes: “My grandfather, J.A. Fitch, always drove the May Queen round the surrounding villages of Bluntisham, Earith and Somersham collecting money for the school outing to the seaside. The last day of April was used to collect wild flowers such as cowslips and bluebells from local meadows to decorate the carts. When the May Queen had been crowned we used to dance round the Maypole in the school playground in front of all the parents”.

Photographs in the News archives shows the custom was still being continued at Oakington in 1986 with a charming group of young ladies touring the village on a decorated float. That was 15 years ago so some of those girls may have daughters of their own by now – if so let me know [PICTURE OF THE OAKINGTON FLOAT 1986]

Pictures of groups dancing round the May Pole also feature with children from Mayfield School being joined by a Hobby Horse on Jesus Green in 1978 [PICTURE OF MAYFIELD] and a newly-formed Morris dancing group making its first public performance on Parker's Piece, Cambridge in 1976. "The Staploe Hundred", based in the Soham and Burwell area had been training hard at Wicken for their great day [DANCERS ON PARKER'S PIECE]. It was part of the biggest May Day celebration Cambridge had seen for many years with children from several county primary schools dancing at several city-centre locations in an event organised by the Cambridge branch of the English Folk Dance and Song Society. There were other traditions too for visitors to wonder at, with brightly dressed dolls suspended in hoops being carried by girls and a Morris fertility cake which, it was claimed, had been baked by seven maidens. But normal – for Cambridge – life continued with a procession of graduates in full academic dress making their way towards the Senate House for degree day, needing a police escort through the maypole dancers in Petty Cury.

While the folklore enthusiasts of 1976 were rejoicing at their success another group were bemoaning a lack of support. For the May Day March organised that year by the Cambridge Trades Council attracted less than 100 people, including children and babies in prams and pushchairs, who followed just one union banner to their rally on Parker's Piece. It was only a pale shadow of the event in May 1973 when 600 people had paraded behind a mixture of banners as part of the Trades Union Congress protest against Ted Heath's government. Yet the numbers were still considered too low on a day when hundreds of thousands of workers stayed at home, transport workers struck and car workers at Dagenham and Luton failed to report for duty. Locally Caravans International at Newmarket was forced to close, though at Huntingdon's Vauxhall factory work continued normally, despite striking engineering workers. [PHOTO OF PARADE FOLLOWING CAMBRIDGE TRADES COUNCIL BANNER]

May Day, strikes and Parker's Piece were also in the news in 1990 when hundreds of marchers paraded through the city to protest against the Poll Tax before throwing their poll tax demands into a burning dustbin [PHOTO OF MARCH IN MARKET HILL – DEFENDING PUBLIC SERVICES BANNER]

But it was just 75 years, in Spring 1926 that the country experienced its largest protest, the General Strike. Cambridge was divided. In the "Red Romsey" area across Mill Road bridge railwaymen stopped work, and in the True Blue central Cambridge undergraduates did likewise. The University gave time off studying for any that wished to respond to the call and keep the country going at this time of need. And as the time of need coincided with the time of examinations many were only too happy to oblige.

Over 2,000 students took the opportunity for work experience in professions normally denied to men of their breeding. Upper-class gentlemen could be found working as labourers at the docks in Grimsby, maintaining the peace as Special Constables in London, or keeping the wheels of transport rolling. On the Tubes, on the buses, lorries or trams the Cambridge accent could be heard.

Some could fulfil every schoolboy's dream and play on the trains. It was imperative that the trains be kept running so that food supplies could be maintained – and also so that undergraduates could be despatched to the places where their services as strike-breakers were in demand. Many however travelled by car with daily convoys leaving the Backs and heading off to all points of the compass. Others found work nearer home.

Whilst the Baptist and Methodist churches on Mill Road, Cambridge, opened their doors to local striking railwaymen, a Chesterton town councillor made his way to the station and on the first day of the strike found himself driving a locomotive to Sudbury. His companions on the footplate included a number of undergraduates. One was the son of a former chief of the Conservative Association, there was a member of the Macintosh toffee family, Lord Hinchingbrooke from Huntingdon, two rowing Blues, a White Russian émigré and the son of a Newcastle manufacturer.

A newspaper correspondent joined two undergraduates from St John's College for a trip on the footplate, one stoking the furnace whilst the other kept watch with the driver for obstructions on the line. They found the work dirty and hard, and the twelve-hour shift was somewhat different from their usual labour at college. It was all good fun.

The strikers found their fun in cricket matches on Parker's Piece, in sports on the Rec and a concert in Romsey School. They also found great amusement when an engine went off the rails in their own heartland near Mill Road Bridge. Hundreds of strikers turned out to mock and chaff at the students' misfortune.

Then came the tragic news of a fatal accident at Bishop's Stortford where a good train had rammed a passenger train waiting at the platform. The impact lifted two carriages off the track and smashed the station awning, two men waiting on the platform were killed.

The strike was soon over, the Unions beaten. Some local railway strikers were victimised, as was the one engine driver who had reported for duty. For the students it was the end of a great adventure; they had been to places and done things that had given them a new outlook on life – but the dreaded examinations were still waiting for them. [GENERAL STRIKE COMPOSITE – SCAN]

**

Jean Gimbert from Cambridge has responded to my mention of a bomber that crashed on a Sutton council house in 1943. She has her own reason for remembering it. "I was one of the children evacuated from the nearby houses, and spent an uncomfortable night on a thin mattress on a classroom floor at the village school. It was a very scary night too, and no-one slept very much because the bombs on the plane went off one by one, each shaking the building violently.

"I think we were allowed back home mid-morning the next day, when all the bombs had exploded and the danger was passed. The house had not been damaged, although there was a film of dust over everything and flakes of plaster had drifted down from the ceiling. I remember being very relieved that my pet budgerigar, left behind in the hasty evacuation, had apparently escaped unscathed!"

Jean adds that she enjoys the articles and sends them to her ex-neighbour who now lives in Canada – but of course her Canadian friend could read them for herself on the News web-site at Cambridge-News.co.uk

Memories 9th May 2001 by Mike Petty

In May 1976 tourists flocked to view a sight that if repeated today may well have caused them to flee in panic - such is the hysteria generated by foot-and-mouth disease in certain countries.

But then tourists deserted King's College Chapel and cars came to a halt on the Backs while a Stapleford sheep farmer gave what many people took to be a demonstration of sheep shearing.

But for Mr. Gerald Beavis it was as a routine job of work. With a flock of 41 Suffolk ewes grazing on Scholars' Piece, the area of rough grass across the river from the manicured lawns, he had decided to do the shearing at the college rather than lose time by taking the sheep back to his farm. Never can he have performed a routine farming task to such an audience as some 100 camera-toting tourists jostled to take his photograph.

When King's college head gardener, Mr Dennis Gifford, made a brief appearance he was immediately assailed by questioners demanding to know whether it was an ancient Cambridge tradition being enacted and whether the college really approved of such rural goings on in such surroundings. He told them: "We often have sheep here and we prefer them to cattle because they keep the grass nice and short".

Old engravings show that animals have grazed there for centuries. What made this special was that as far as anybody knew it was the first time sheep had actually been shorn there.

**

One man who knows all about such matters is Dr Peter Jackson from Over, who works at the University Veterinary School. But he has not always been an academic, as he explains in a fascinating letter:

"I am sure that I am just one of many who enjoyed your recent article on the changes that have taken place on Cambridgeshire Farms in recent and not so recent years. It brought back to me many memories both of growing up in the villages of Cambridgeshire but also of my life as a local veterinary surgeon which started in 1960.

My decision to become a vet was taken in the village of Babraham where my mother was headmistress. My greatest joy was to help out at the Home Farm where the Adeane family had a dairy farm. During school holidays and at weekends I was up at 6.00 am to help with the milking and other jobs with the 35 or so cows that lived there. One morning a Jersey cow named Annabelle was having a problem calving. Mr J.P.G. Runciman, who with his father ran the long established veterinary practice at Downing Street, Cambridge, was called and arrived to deal with the problem. I was alone on the farm and was asked to help. We delivered twin calves with some difficulty but the experience made me feel I had seen the Holy Grail. I knew this was the job I wanted to do and after struggling a bit at the Perse School to gain sufficient A levels I managed to gain a place at Edinburgh University.

The farming scene was totally different in the 1950s and 60s than it is today. The majority of farms were mixed, growing crops on rotation and usually having cattle, pigs and sometimes sheep and poultry too. When I was working in Cambridge as a student we attended a herd of Guernsey cows and a Friesian herd in Trumpington, two in Grantchester, one in Thriplow, one in Lolworth as well as a number on the Cambs- Suffolk Border. There was at least one dairy herd in each Cambridgeshire village. A large farm had perhaps 60 milking cows but many farmers managed to make a living with far fewer.

My first job after qualifying was at March and then in 1966 I moved to Chatteris where we opened a branch practice and lived happily for the next 10 years. When I went to work in March in 1960 there were five dairy herds in the town and its immediate vicinity. At Chatteris we attended four dairy farms in the town and others in Mepal, Sutton, Haddenham & Somersham. The most numerous farm livestock were pigs and we looked after the veterinary needs of approximately 40 pig farms or smallholdings in Chatteris or its immediate neighbourhood. There were many more in the surrounding villages.

In those days many of our pig keepers were tenants of Cambridgeshire County Council renting smallholdings at Tick Fen near Chatteris, Coates, in fields near March and also at Manea and Benwick. We also had smallholder clients in Huntingdonshire and Norfolk. Some smallholders managed to make a reasonable living on as little as 10 acres of good fen land and there were very few of more than 50 acres. The tenants grew corn, potatoes, sugar beet and other vegetable crops in rotation. Almost all had six to ten sows and fattened or sold on their offspring making a reasonable profit whilst doing so. Many smallholders also had one or two cattle, or beasts as they were called, to fatten over winter and some older men had a heavy horse working around the farm too. Quite a few people in March, Chatteris and the surrounding villages kept one or two fattening pigs or a sow at the bottom of their gardens. Not everyone kept a boar and it was not uncommon to see the late Mr Claude Bayes walking his boar along Bridge Street in Chatteris to mate with a neighbour's sow.

The financial situation in livestock farming was totally different in those days. Pig keepers could make a profit of up to £5 a pig which made the job very well worth while. Our farm visit fee in those days was 10s 6d (55p) and a visit plus an injection to a sick pig would cost no more than £1.25. It was not uncommon to visit a sick pig once, twice or even three times and still leave a profit for the owner. Costs were very different too - petrol was 30p per gallon and you could buy a new Ford Anglia for about £500. All four vets in our practice averaged 30,000 miles a year and we could change our cars yearly for about £150. My wages in 1960 were £1,100 a year and my take home pay about £16 a week. Full board and lodging at the Station Hotel in March was £6.00 a week.

Swine fever (recently seen again in East Anglia) was endemic in those days and we spent a lot of time vaccinating pigs against this disease and another common disease Swine Erysipelas. This latter disease is now easily cured with penicillin but was a dreadful scourge in the pre-antibiotic days. Older clients in Chatteris would recall taking out barrow loads of dead pigs which had died from this disease.

Farmers were mostly reluctant to try and treat their own animals believing it to be a job for the vet. As a result any obstetrical and other veterinary problems would result in a call for veterinary assistance at any time of day or night. Sadly it is now often not economic to seek veterinary assistance for a sick pig. Although most farmers would still do anything for their livestock most have less time to spend with each animal. I remember being called to see a sow in March suffering from severe mastitis. Her udder was hard and she was showing signs of toxæmia. Mastitis is a potentially dangerous and life threatening disease. Antibiotic and anti-inflammatory therapy will do much to help but nursing care is of great benefit too. I advised my March owner to massage his sow's hard udder with udder cream as often as he could and to get her up on her feet every few hours. The next morning I visited the sow expecting to find that she had died. Instead she was lying happily feeding her piglets. Her udder was soft and full of milk. There was no sign of the owner but he emerged slowly from his house looking tired and unshaven. 'What do you think of her mate?' he asked. I replied that she was unbelievably better. 'You gave me a job and a half mate' he said. 'I've been up all night rubbing her udder with goose grease and getting her up as you said. It looks as if it's done the job.' It had and the life of the sow and indirectly her 10 piglets had been saved partly by my drug therapy but with enormous input from the owner. That was just one example of amazing devotion to duty that we saw. Farmers and stockmen and women had time then to take that extra little bit of trouble with an individual animal.

Skin disease was quite common in pigs and we had drugs to alleviate this unpleasant condition that caused so much irritation to affected pigs. Our clients liked 'pig oils' to help improve their pigs' skins. It was a form of oily liquid paraffin and when mixed with flowers of sulphur not only reduced the effect of mange but also improved and soothed the pig's skin too. Pig powders were another favourite and with white or green horse oils were some of our best sellers. The powders had a lovely aromatic smell and when mixed with meal tempted the pig's appetite, acted as a mild purgative and provided some of the pig's mineral needs. The horse oils worked well on horses and cattle with tendon strains but also provided apparent help for people suffering from bad backs. Many people thought the world of the white liniment of turpentine that was the active principle of horse oils and claimed it did more to help them than any medical treatment. They often came back for further bottles priced at 2s 6d.

Few of our clients had cars and we visited many small animals in their homes. On an average day we each made 30 or so visits and at weekends we might make up to 45 visits in a single day. Ten of these might be in the same village where we might visit several pigs, a cow, some calves, a horse and several cats and dogs. With modern dairy farms of over 200 cows the vet can easily spend two hours or more dealing with fertility problems on just that one unit.

There were many more people working on the farms. Our biggest client in Chatteris was Mr Arthur S. Rickwood. He farmed over 7000 acres in Cambridgeshire and Norfolk. He kept large numbers of pigs, cattle and bred Percheron horses. He bred his famous Large White pigs at the Laurels in the village of Mepal but the lovely traditional farmyard where they lived has long been a housing estate.

There was always plenty of help available on our farms. At one of the first calving cases I attended at Sutton five men came to help but luckily were not needed. Mr Rickwood employed large numbers of men and women on his farms - 35 men reported every day for work at Horseway Farm, Chatteris. Much of their work was gang work on the land picking potatoes, singling sugar beet etc. Most of this work is now done by machine and better sugar beet seed that does not require singling and chopping out is available.

How farm life has changed and not necessarily for the better. Back in the 60s we never thought that things would or could change so much or that local farms would be denuded of both people and animals. The coming of the Common Market initially aided arable farmers but animal production became less and less profitable. Animals were kept in larger and larger groups with more being looked after by fewer people. Less and less time was available for individual animal care. The vet is an infrequent visitor to many farms but able to provide overall guidance about animal health. There is less chance for many reasons to examine and treat individual sick animals in the way that we did regularly so many years ago.

I left general practice in 1976 but I feel very lucky to have lived through those distant days and work with so many nice Cambridgeshire people and their animals.

SCAN OF STRETHAM FARMER GODFREY PARISH AND HIS PIGS, 1950s; picture taken by Mr Tommy Parish
PICTURES OF CHATTERIS IN 1960S & VARIOUS ANIMALS FROM NEWS LIBRARY FILES IN ENVELOPE WITH CHRIS ELLIOTT
SCANS OF SHEEP SHEARING ON BACKS 1976

**

The importance of animals in many people's lives was commemorated at a service held in Ely Cathedral in April 1988:as the News reported:

“Some of the congregation howled and barked when the organist started to play the first hymn during a service at Ely Cathedral. Others let out yelps and growls that echoed around the mighty Norman building. A few even managed to doze despite the racket while others munched contentedly wondering what all the fuss was about. The vice-dean, Canon Dennis Green, used a microphone to make himself heard to the rest of the congregation. No one minded about the chaos because all were taking part in a blessing service for animals and owners, thought to be the only one of its kind in the country. It was organised by the Dean and Chapter in conjunction with Wood Green Animal Shelters following the success of a similar event last year. Hundreds of people took animals of all shapes and sizes to the service

– cats, dogs, sheep, goats, ponies, donkeys, pigs and cows” [SCAN]

**

Brain Warner of Hartington Grove, Cambridge has been scanning his old photo albums and has unearthed a picture of the Park House Football Team, winners of the inter-house football cup at the old Central Boys’ School, Cambridge in 1948. He is the goal-keeper and in the outside-right position is David Hunt who now lives in Long Melford. But can anybody recognise any of the others? [NOTE THE ORIGINAL OF THIS PICTURE IS NOT VERY SHARP]

Memories 16 May 2001, by Mike Petty

How often when spring cleaning do we find tucked away a yellowing scrap of an old newspaper. Immediately work stops as we peruse the faded pages and are transported back to an earlier time, when prices were different, the world was younger and when people faced problems very similar to those we face today. Almost inevitably the most interesting story is the one that ends in mid-sentence and we are left wondering just what happened next.

The earliest Cambridge newspaper was issued in 1744. It was entitled the Cambridge Journal and Flying Post and for a while it was the only record of local life; but then in 1762 the Cambridge Chronicle arrived which within five years had absorbed the older paper. It enjoyed an unchallenged presence on the streets until The Cambridge Intelligencer came in 1793, flourished and failed in 1803.

Then in 1819 came the forerunner of the Cambridge Independent Press. Whilst the Chronicle supported the Tory Cause and the Established church, the Independent was more Radical and promoted nonconformity. Throughout the century each reported the news as they saw it, and chose not to report topics they disagreed with. Other titles – the Cambridge Advertiser, Cambridge Gazette, Cambridge Guardian & Cambridge Express amongst them - came and went but the big two continued to dominate.

The in 1888 yet another title appeared on the scene. The Cambridge Daily News was different – unlike them it came out six days a week. It took time to persuade Cambridge people of the need for a local daily newspaper and villages were quite indifferent, but it was to become a formidable force and within the year had started its own sister title, the Cambridge Weekly News. As the new century advanced so the new Weekly title flourished, absorbing the Cambridge Express in 1909; but when in 1916 the Cambridge Independent Press became part of the group its title was so well-established that this name continued. The Weekly News banner was dropped, only to be revived decades later as the title for a series of free newspapers.

The Great War presented immense problems for newspapers. In 1914 the CDN issued war bulletins on Sunday and used Central News Telegraphs to ensure their war news was up to date. But always alongside the reports from the front were the heart-breaking stories of local losses. And there were new developments with the regular use of photographs. The Cambridge Graphic had been the first local paper embrace this new medium, using high-quality paper to reproduce the pictures, but this had failed in 1902 after only two years. Now they were back, and not just ‘new’ pictures for a regular series of ‘Peeps from the Past’ ran for many years, with readers sending-in their photographs and commenting upon them.

Major local stories would be guaranteed to increase circulation. In 1921 long queues formed for copies of the Cambridge Daily News which reported developments in a King Street murder saga. Then in June 1930 came more drama with a triple tragedy in a Cambridge college after an undergraduate shot his tutor and a Cambridge detective before turning the pistol on himself. It was perhaps ironic that this should happen at the time that the paper was reporting the sale of the old gallows at the County Gaol before its demolition to make way for a new Shire Hall. This was the age of massive change for Cambridge, with hundreds of new homes being built and new families looking to the News for information about the radical changes in the town centre. There old properties in Sidney Street were ripped down for massive new shopping developments for Boots, Woolworth and Sainsbury, and the Dorothy Café Restaurant enhanced the town's social life. But as the depression bit the rivalry between the Cambridge Chronicle and the Cambridge Independent Press finally came to an end as the two papers merged.

In 1938 a triumphant Cambridge Daily News celebrated its 50th anniversary with a souvenir supplement so large that it caused problems for the newsboys who had to deliver it. But by then the local news was being overshadowed by the activities in Europe as the world moved one more to war. Censorship was introduced, preventing the News from mentioning that the first town to suffer direct German air attack was Cambridge itself. Headlines tried to be upbeat as the Dunkirk evacuation saw the launch of a new Local Defence Volunteer to counter the anticipated invasion. And when that invasion came – of American, not German troops, that news had to kept off the front pages, for it was thought that everything reported in the News would be known in Germany. Certainly the news that Generals Eisenhower and Montgomery were in Cambridge planning the D-Day invasions was something that had to be kept silent – at least until the war was won.

The 1950s saw the elevation of Cambridge to city status as it struggled to cope with the increasing demand for homes and plan its way into the second half of the century. The News reported the interminable wrangles that saw first the Lion Yard and then Fitzroy Street transformed into major shopping areas. Its music correspondents covered the arrival of large-scale pop concerts, including a new sensation, The Beatles; the University correspondent saw the arrival of moon rock brought to Cambridge for analysis in University laboratories. There were tornadoes, royal weddings and the weddings of more ordinary folk to fill the pages of what was by now the Cambridge Evening News.

But papers are more than news. A major series of feature articles saw both Erica Dimock and Sara Payne travel 'Down Your Street' telling the story of the people who lived and worked in the Cambridge of the 1960s and 1980s; their words illustrated by photographs that capture the changing face of the city. Advertisements for the latest motor cars look outdated after only a few years, whilst house prices from 1988 – when the News celebrated its centenary - now seem incredibly cheap.

For the local historian the files of local newspapers comprise a unique record, putting the local events into their national and international context and – importantly - reflecting the opinions of Cambridgeshire correspondents. Cambridge's central library in Lion Yard is home to the country's largest collection of Cambridgeshire newspapers & over the last 30 years they have pioneered extensive indexes and cuttings files to allow people to exploit at least some of the information reported. In April 1983 the cuttings files themselves made headlines with news that a Russian spy had found them so interesting that he had taken copious copies of their reports on local reaction to cruise missile bases.

Now, as newspaper technology changes, more recent stories can be found much less publicly through the ability to search back issues via the News' own website.

Today's news is tomorrow's history and no history is as accessible as that presented in newspapers. They carry the day-by-day hopes and fears, the ideas that succeed and those that fail, although as a glimpse of my daily 'Looking Back' columns will show – the same ideas and stories do seem to come up time and again!

**

Mike Petty lectures on Cambridgeshire newspapers and the local researcher to Courses and groups throughout the region.

SCAN OF RUSSIAN SPY HEADLINES – CEN 6th April 1983; OTHER HEADLINE PHOTOS WILL BE DELIVERED ON MONDAY

Memories 23rd May 2001, by Mike Petty

With all the debate about the American Star Wars missile defence project let us not forget that this year marks the 75th anniversary of the establishment of another defence force – the Royal Observer Corps. Set up during the Second World War to keep watch over aircraft movements, both friend and foe, they established look-out posts across the area. At Stretham they moved into the disused windmill so that they could have a high vantage point from which to observe over a wide area. To give a better view they removed the sails – and, some say Lord Haw Haw, “Germany calling”, came on the wireless to ask why!

Later the windmill site was adapted again, this time with the construction of an underground bunker from which the effects of nuclear war could be monitored. But what actually went on down there? In June 1976 Rodney Tibbs, a News reporter, was invited to another underground post to find out. This is his report from the time.

A number of times a year a group of shadowy figures converge on a low grass mound on Oakington airfield, raise a steel hatch and vanish into the bowels of the earth. The steel hatch clangs behind them. The Royal Observer Corps is going observing. The observing posts, about one every 15 miles, are really concrete bunkers buried deep in the ground. When hostilities were imminent the part-time civilian observers would get a telephone call, they would then pass the message on to another of the team. It was then a question of cycling along the country lanes, using their local knowledge to skirt blocked roads and fallen buildings should hostilities have started before they actually got to their post.

Once safely below ground they would contact their headquarters at Bedford and keep a wary eye on their various recording instruments. The bomb power indicator would reveal the size of any explosion though measurement of increased air pressure. If the radiation levels were intense the observers must be prepared to stay at their post for long periods, in total isolation. They had beds for those off duty and iron rations (which if they still survive must be pretty hard by now!) Should the very worst occur and the post find itself totally cut off in war-torn Cambridgeshire with radiation reaching dangerous levels they could warn those residents above ground by operating their portable siren.

The News photographer in June 1976 snapped Observer Lieutenant Stan Barnes emerging from his underground post. But he also went down below to picture Observers David Lane & Alex Blackmore busy at their all-important tasks.

In 1976 however there were problems. The shelters were proof against radiation and against a moderate amount of blast, but not against rabbits, according to Observer Lieutenant Stan Barnes: ‘Recently we found that the rabbits had been pretty busy in the grass mound which is part of our protection against radiation. We had to fill up the rabbit holes'. That is something at least that should not affect the Star Wars shield!

**

T. Gooding of Godmanchester spotted something of particular interest in my 'Looking Back' stories for 8th May 1951 which reported the crash of a Wellington aircraft at Brampton. He tells me the aircraft was a model T.10 used for navigational training & operated by 201 Advanced Flying School. Its serial number was RP341 and it was on a cross-country training flight. It is thought the pilot may have misread his instruments as at the time of the crash it was 55 miles off course. Mr Gooding even has the names of the crew.

John Dench of Cambridge has gone back even further for, following my note on the R101 visit to Cambridge, he has been sifting through his late father's scrapbooks and unearthed a picture of the German airship, Graf Zeppelin above Wembley Stadium on cup final day – probably the Bolton Wanderers v Manchester City final of 1926, John calculates. As he points out both airship and stadium are now history.

**

Mrs M. Owen from Cambridge has dropped a line to say that she has been reunited with a best friend after nearly 50 years – thanks to a piece in "Memories". Muriel Taylor from Weston Colville had sent me a snap of a bus driven by her father that overturned in Sidney Street. When she read it Mrs Owen knew it was her friend, tracked her down and they have now met to share memories. Roger Holroyd of Arbury still cannot understand how the bus actually came to turn over and how it came to be travelling down Sidney Street. Muriel says it was caused when the front axle broke and as for going the wrong-way, well I believe that it was 1948 when the major one-way- traffic scheme was introduced in Sidney Street, Trinity Street and Market Street three years after the crash. But if you know different please get in touch.

**

Valerie Doty from East Road, Cambridge was having lunch with her aunt recently and trying to remember where in Petty Cury the Waffle Café used to be. Her grandmother used to work there as a waitress in the 1940s. The owner was a Mr Alvey and she seems to remember it was over the top of the Fifty Shilling Taylors, next door to Lyons Tea Shop. I have a picture of the corner of Petty Cury taken in 1950 that shows The Corner House Café over Burton's tailors. Am I right in thinking this would have been the place?

And whilst mentioning Waffles, does anybody recall another café of that name that used to be on the corner of Gold Street and Fitzroy Street, Cambridge. About 25 years ago it was a very trendy eating place with undergraduates flocking there for their May Ball breakfasts – memories please [SCAN OF MARKET HILL AND OF WAFFLES]

**

Syd Fullman of Stonehouse in Gloucestershire also seeks your help, this time on behalf of a lady from Holland; she has a picture of her father and would like to know when and where it was taken. He is shown forming part of the guard for King Peter II of Yugoslavia and his mother who, having escaped from their country during the Second World War, lived in exile at Great Gransden for some months in 1942. Syd thinks the picture may have been taken there just before the King moved to Witchford, where his mother, Queen Marie, had bought a farmhouse. Does anybody recognise the lych-gate in the background, or can you add further information. If so please write to me and I will pass it on. [SCAN]

Shirley Brown from Trumpington needs help in her research.

Entering Trumpington from Long Road you pass a large block of spacious, well-appointed flats. But do you remember what was there before the flats were built?

At the end of the nineteenth century there were plantations on the South Side of Long Road (known then as Mill Road). By 1888 a large house had been built at the junction of Long Road and Trumpington High Street. It was called 'Gilmerton' and was occupied by Stephen Mansfield. By 1904 he had a neighbour in an equally large house called "the Beeches". The two houses changed hands several times and the orchard of 'Gilmerton' was sold as building land. In 1941 both houses were sold to Block & Anderson, a London company producing printing machines similar to 'Gestetners'. Many local people were employed there. Were you one and if so what do you remember of those days

After the war 'Block & Anderson' returned to London, 'Gilmerton' and 'The Beeches' were converted into flats and let to members and fellows of King's College. In 1964 the houses were demolished and the land sold for £27,000. Tenants spoke sadly of the demolition and some tried to save pieces of the lovely glass. Has anyone a memento of either of these houses? [SCANS]

Memories 30th May 2001, by Mike Petty

Two long-established traditions of village life have changed this year; one may not be noticed, the other may not be forgotten.

The old-style 'Best-Kept-Village' competition, organised by Cambridgeshire Acre – Action for Communities in Rural England – has a new format. Now villages will be assessed to see how they are functioning as communities, looking at the way they care for the young and old, the environment, the businesses – and even their use of the internet. The winning villages will go through to a national final with written submissions, a presentation and finally a village visit by judges.

Previously teams of volunteer judges would quietly arrive early in the judging process and walk every village street, peering into bus shelters, checking notice boards for out of date events or details of recycling facilities. The state of decoration of the village shop, seat or sign and the overall pride that individual villagers had taken in their own gardens, be they on main street or back lane, would be noted. Once three or four villages of similar size had been assessed comment forms would be posted off, points calculated and one of the villages would pass on to a second stage of the competition. At the end of the process would come the unveiling of 'Best-Kept-Village' signs – something else for the hard-pressed parish councils to keep maintained until the next year.

Some villages took the whole competition to heart – or were just more proud of their community. In June 1968 Witcham parish councillors set up a working party to trim the playing field hedge and tidy up the bus shelter – but although the village roadman had also been particularly diligent they still dropped marks on the previous year. They finally achieved the award in 1973. Newly-elected MP, Clement Freud who unveiled the sign confessed: "I don't know how you go about judging the best kept village, but I noticed that Witcham was the only village which had taken down all the John Stevens, Barry Young and Clement Freud election posters. That has got to be one of the largest contributory reasons!"

[SCAN OF WITCHAM BEST KEPT VILLAGE TROPHY UNVEILING 1973 – WILL TRY AND FIND OTHERS FROM NEWS FILES TUESDAY AM]

Another excuse for a general tidy up would be Feast Sunday – in our village always the third Sunday in May as it has been for many, many years. Indeed the newspaper reported how in 1877 the main topic of the conversation between ladies meeting in the street would be 'have yer done yer cleaning yet' and any housewife who did not have her home spick and span by the great day would be frowned upon by her neighbours. It is part of the tradition of village life, a time when relatives return home from all parts of the country.

The feast traditionally had three separate sections - a procession, a funfair and a church service; the service is the oldest segment. At Haddenham in 1873 it was emphasised this was an important religious occasion, a celebration connected with the original dedication of their church.

The second stage was a funfair and really was an event to be looked forward to. People walked or cycled from their own village to visit the neighbouring feast. In Melbourn in 1859 there were five or six sideshows depicting the wonders of the world, a pig with two heads, a sheep with six legs, there were shooting galleries & travelling photographers. At Histon in 1900 there were roundabouts brought by Messrs Barker and Thurston, shellfish and confectionery stalls and dancing in the public houses. In Rampton 1912 was the year that one of the traction engines pulling the amusements hit a tree on the Green - which could be seen to be leaning, years later. Jack Nightingale had his rock stall, toy stall, coconut shy, swinging boats and shooting range - a penny a shot at the clay pipes which were the targets or for the same money you could get a strip of liquorice, about 15 inches long $\frac{3}{4}$ inch wide. The celebrations went on for a number of days but Thursday morning was the saddest of the week, for on the way to school you would see the wagons all packed up and ready to go, and on returning, at dinner time the Green would be empty with just the memory to last until next year. These travelling fairs have often become memories themselves. Some villages continue to celebrate all week, at Sutton in 1976 the programme promised entertainment for seven days with prize bingo, pram races, the police male voice choir, discos and displays culminating on Sunday with the fancy dress and decorated floats.

The third section was the parade. This owed its origin to the Friendly Societies, the groups who supported their members through illness and unemployment in the days before social security or free medical care. In Waterbeach there were three: the Shepherds, Foresters and Victoria Benefit who combined for an annual parade from the Green through the High Street to the Baptist Chapel, where a united service was held. When in 1893 Addenbrooke's Hospital issued an appeal for financial help to maintain and improve their services the Societies responded to the call by linking their parade with a collection for the Hospital. So 'Hospital Sunday' or 'Feast Sunday' came part of rural life, with the Red Cross Friendly Societies Banner in pride of place in the procession.

It is this parade which became the essence of feast week. Children dressed as Cowboys & Indians, people from other lands, cavemen and who knows what else clambered on to decorated trailers or lorries & tried to collect money in their nets at the end of sticks, no longer for Addenbrooke's but other worthwhile causes such as cancer research or the blind. The parade was led by the village bobby and a local band and paused half-way for a united church service, the pews packed with a most colourful and seemingly multi-ethnic congregation. It was the day when families were reunited, when those now living away brought their children back to visit, when evacuees would return & woe betide any grandmother who failed to spot her grandchild amongst all the other youngsters on the back of the float. Many adults also wish they could be up there on the lorries, both to have a tour of the old village and relive the days of their childhood when they too were stretching out for sixpences, threepenny bits, even farthings - as long as it would not drop through the hole in that net.

It happened year on year, But this year our streets were empty.

The last time the parade was stopped it was because of Hitler's bombers, this time it was halted because the Police Service would not make officers available to control the traffic - unless they were paid for – and the organisers preferred any income went to charity, as in the past.

Instead organisers rallied around to arrange a fete on the recreation ground, with bouncy castles, exhibitions, stalls; and the band sat down to play at the united, open-air service – on which the sun for once shone. It was a great financial success, the charities benefited more than before. But it was not the same. Older folk wandered around with their bags of coins they had saved up for the children's nets, wondering quite what to do with them

So has a tradition now become consigned to the history books – or will another year village youngsters be able once more to enjoy their annual celebration of community life as their parents did before them.

Do you remember the Feasts of days gone by – write to Mike Petty at the News
SCAN OF STRETHAM PARADE

Another type of feast is recalled by Peggy Day of Quy who has just published a selection of letters written to her by her mother, Kitty Watts between January and August 1945. Peggy was in the Wrens and so missed the invitation to tea at the RAF camp in Quy Park. For that day rationing was to be a thing of the past – there was going to be real butter, boiled eggs and all kinds of fancy cakes and buns. But the event was slightly different, as her mum told her. "Billy quite enjoyed the Camp treat. I don't think he had much tea as there was no bread and butter, just trifles etc and creamy cakes and buns and tea and lemonade. He had two pieces of cake and got someone else to eat the cream. There was just a cup of tea for the mothers, but after the kiddies had finished they were allowed to finish the rest up. Percy came home unexpectedly last night so Aunt Beat was very pleased. She had let his bed to an airman and his wife, but I expect she would sleep with the kiddies and he with his Dad" "More letters from home" is available from Peggy Day, 8 Orchard Street, Quy for £3.60 (including postage) or from the village stores.

Laura Staves is researching the history of Girton Baptist Church. One fascinating source of information has been a magazine called the "Cambridge and County Baptist Quarterly", which was published for a number of years at the end of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Each magazine contained a postcard-sized photograph of a local church or personality. A bound set of the magazines is in the Cambridgeshire Collection, but unfortunately the pictures have not been included. (She only knows about them because a few unbound magazines are also in the collection). The edition for January 1914 has a focus on Girton and starts "Our illustration for this quarter is of the interior and exterior of Girton Chapel". As you can imagine she would particularly like to see an early photograph of the building; they have tried all the Baptist College libraries, theological libraries in Cambridge, the University Library and the British Library, but without success. Now she wonders if somebody somewhere might just happen to have a copy of the photograph.

Memories 6th June 2001, by Mike Petty

It was about 50 years ago today that William Thurbon, known to many people as "Billy" retired from what many people would think of as a most depressing trade – undertaking. He recalled his own life and times to a reporter in the Cambridge Daily News in June 1951.

Billy had spent the previous 49 years working for just one firm, Ellis Merry, at Abbey Walk, Cambridge. In all that time he'd made 13,000 coffins from their rough wood stage. He had fitted them, polished them and taken them to the homes where they were needed, where his workmanship would be appreciated as the body would often stay in a room in the house before Mr Thurbon conveyed it in the hearse to the funeral.

It had been hard work; once following the tragic sinking of a ferry boat at Fen Ditton he'd worked 24 hour straight off, without a break, then went back after an hour's sleep to make two or three more coffins. On one occasion he had to fetch a body from Heacham in Norfolk back to Balsham when the back axle of the hearse broke. He and his colleagues were such a long way from any town or village that they'd had to spend the night in the open air. There was another time when he dealt with a number of people who'd died during an outbreak of smallpox – "How we didn't get it was a miracle", he mused.

Ernest Gill, a former mayor of Cambridge, recalled some years ago how he would visit Billy at his work. "I was very inquisitive indeed, asking 'who is this one for?' Said Billy 'Oh, this one is for an elderly lady, and this for a young man', and so often he replied, 'This one is for a dear little child'"

Best of all Billy remembered the old days when he could drive a hearse led by three or four Belgian horses with black coverings worn under their harness and black rosettes attached to their bridles; not only the undertaker but all of the bearers wore top hats and morning coats. But when Merry's horse-hearses were not needed to convey the dead then would be used to carry the living, transporting invalid patients to hospital. There is a snap that shows a living patient being loaded into the hearse for what was – hopefully – not his last ride.

SCAN OF FUNERAL PROCESSION IN ST JOHN'S STREET & MERRY'S HORSE DRAWN AMBULANCE, BOTH ABOUT 1903

When Valerie Doty raised the question of Waffles café in Petty Cury, Cambridge, she unleashed a flood of memories from readers

Was it over Burton's I wondered. No replies Peggy Green of Cambridge, that was The Corner House Café & was something different. It was a lovely, very big café, owned by G.P. Hawkins which ran partly over the International Stores on Market Hill, right across Burton and then above Dolcis shoe-shop in Petty Cury. Peggy ought to know as her sister Flora was the manageress for many years until she married and moved to the U.S.A. to live – and Peggy herself worked there as a cashier for a short time.

The Waffles was about half-way down, on the left hand side at number 32-33 Petty Cury as Joan Futter of Histon points out, with Lyons tea shop on one side and Empire Meat on the other. Nearby was an umbrella maker and another butcher – Rose. (Whatever happened to butchers in Cambridge?) Mrs P. Anderson of Cherry Hinton Road remembers it & Doug Jones of Histon visited regularly before 1939; he recalls that you went up stairs to the first floor and a wooden-beamed room – and they served good coffee. Valerie Doty recalls how you could sit at the window and look down on all the people going in and out of the Lion Hotel opposite.

Reg Wood from Saffron Walden gives, as usual the definitive answer to anything about shops. He writes: "The Waffles café was patronised mainly by undergrads who took their girl friends there, rather than going to college rooms. The next café in Petty Cury was the Mecca, later to become known as The Eros. This was where the middle class went to tea, on the maids' half day. The maids went to Lyons tea shop, which was much cheaper. Another popular tea shop was The Friar House on the corner of Free School Lane in Bene't Street, while another popular eating place was under Burton's shop and known as the Venetian Restaurant."

Joan Futter also recalls the Venetian “I remember going there as a small child with my mother and grandmother. It was always a great treat after an afternoon shopping in town. We usually had toasted teacakes & very strong tea – too strong for me”. By 1963 it had become The Francis Restaurant, as a snap of nightlife shows. Peter Andrews from Histon used to patronise the Scotch Hoose on the corner of Market Street, next to the Victoria Cinema restaurant. First set up at the end of the Great War in Petty Cury by a Cambridge graduate concerned about the limited means of students, supplying plain well-cooked food at nominal prices, it moved to Market Hill in the early 1930s. In its early days it catered for teas and coffee as well as lunches and dinners but by the mid-1960s concentrated on main meals, and had built up a considerable reputation. It was probably the only place in East Anglia where Scottish haggis could be obtained – unless you know different.

And as for different food, Peter Adams from Saffron Walden is one of several readers who recalls the other Waffles, the one in Fitzroy Street. “It had been a baker’s shop and was an odd, somewhat triangular shape. Customers sat at small tables on bentwood chairs. There was not much space, particularly in the evenings and at weekends when it was crowded. There really were queues out into the street. It served nothing but waffles to eat, with a wide range of sweet and savoury toppings, and, as I remember it, fruit juice drinks. After decimalization the chap who ran it made a point of having the prices in shillings up on a board on the wall – he felt it made the prices look lower, but I wasn’t convinced. He once told us that if anyone ate one of each of the different kinds of waffle (sweet and savoury) they got the meal free, and only one person had every done it. It made a good, unusual, cheap meal, hence its popularity. After the Kite area was largely bulldozed away for the Grafton Centre redevelopment the establishment moved to a place on Castle Hill, but it closed many years ago”

SCANS

OF SOUTH SIDE PETTY CURY 1949 SHOWING LION HOTEL WITH ITS
PROJECTING WINDOW ON LEFT;
BEN’T STREET 1964 – THE FRIAR HOUSE RESTAURANT WAS THE HALF-
TIMBERED BUILDING ON THE RIGHT
MARKET HILL AT NIGHT 1963 SHOWING THE FRANCIS RESTAURANT - FORMERLY THE VENETIAN & SIMILAR SCENE IN 1937
PERHAPS FILE PHOTO OF WAFFLES, CASTLE HILL

Readers have also been quick to solve two other mysteries. Both David Daniels and Alan Marr of Great Gransden have been able to confirm that the picture I showed of King Peter of Yugoslavia was indeed taken in their village, in fact the lychgate in the background is exactly the same today. Alan says that although the Gransdens Society copied some hundreds of local photographs when compiling their book of pictures of the village, he had never seen this particular snap before.

Shirley Brown from Trumpington has also received more information in her search for the story of the two large houses near the corner of Long Road, Gilmerton and The Beeches. They had been used for a while by a company called Block and Anderson who made Bandas duplicating machines. Victor Stirling from Cambridge was one of their employees who moved up to Cambridge when their London premises were bombed out and stayed until he was called up in 1944. Almost as soon as he left Cliff Parker, now at Thriplow, was taken on as an apprentice tool maker and stayed with them for 16 years. It was only a short time however before the firm moved to Aycliffe Trading Estate in County Durham, just a new miles north of Darlington. There they expanded, although the offices moved back to London from where they had been bombed out. They were a grand company to work for and many of the staff stayed with them for much longer than myself. Cliff however left to join the training division of the Department of Employment and is grateful for the grounding he received at B

& A. He has another memento too: “my wife joined the firm and we have now been married for nearly 51 years”

Pat Beavis has written from Great Walsingham, Norfolk, following another ‘Memories’ piece, the one about her husband, Gerald, shearing sheep on the Backs in 1975. Gerald has now retired but lectures to various groups on ‘Old Time Sheperding’ and is off to Wroxham and Leicester shortly. I have found a snap taken by the News at the time, showing him hard at work on King’s meadow where he attracted a considerable audience of visitors and locals alike.

SCAN OF GERALD BEAVIS SHEARING SHEEP ON BACKS, MAY 1975

Joan Smith from St Albans Road, Cambridge has been scanning through the family album following recent articles about airships. She has a photograph showing the R101 moored at Cardington; “I well remember being driven by my father (Mr Gerald Maddox of Huntingdon) in a car in a long, slow queue round the field to see it at its mooring”.

Brian Saunders from Coochiemudlo Island, Queensland, Australia has aerogrammed me to seek help tracing his ancestors. He’s got back to John Saunders who married Grace Mayes at Fen Ditton in June 1748, but now he’s stuck. If you can dislodge him drop me a line.

Memories 13th June 2001, by Mike Petty

The other weekend I had a meeting in London and decided to let the bus take the strain. The coach would depart from Cambridge’s Cowley Road park and ride at 8am. A few minutes before the hour there was no sign of the bus, so I asked the Information Manager in the newly-built waiting room – “No mate, I only deal with park and ride. I don’t know nothing about any coaches”. A helpful bus driver suggested it would leave from Milton Road, so I hurried there – only to find the coach drew up on time outside the new departure building on Cowley Road as it does every day. I hurried back, feeling less than happy to be the cause of amusement to the dis-information official. On arrival at Drummer Street there were more passengers, mainly foreign visitors taking advantage of the £8 return – providing they had the right fare. Sadly many did not, the driver rummaged in his pockets but had run out of change – come back the bus conductor with his satchel!

Drummer Street bus station opened in November 1925, despite major protests about the loss of a strip of grass from Christ’s Pieces to create sufficient parking space for cars. Now country buses would stop there, instead of clogging up Senate House Hill, as they had previously. Soon there were disputes between the bus companies as to who could stop where, with wrongly parked buses being manhandled out of the way. By 1947 there were complaints that it was too small for the number of buses using it, and proposals for changes have continued ever since.

Then in June 1951 came a major improvement to the facilities with the opening of a mobile canteen based in a brand-new, beautifully equipped Berkeley caravan. The Mayor declared it would be a great asset to the city. Inside everything was spotlessly clean with plenty of cupboard space for glasses (no plastic cups in those days). At one end there was a gas stove used in winter for making “hot-dogs”, and a sink to wash up. It was open from 8.30 am to 10 pm on weekdays, and from 2pm to 9 pm Sundays. Prices were reasonable; cups of tea 2d, coffee 3d, squash and minerals 4d; sandwiches cost from 3d to 6d and cheese rolls 4d. Even at these prices the facility was expected to cover its costs, there would be no subsidy from the rates. To complete the improvements there were new bus shelters, where you could sit and munch your snack while you waited for the bus to arrive.

Then in 1991 came a major revamp to bring it up to date, with new glass waiting areas, improved toilets and - hopefully - helpful staff who do actually know where buses leave from!
PICTURES OF DRUMMER STREET

**

One of the current issues in the news is the future of the reinforced concrete bunker at Brooklands Avenue. Now nobody is in any doubt as to its existence. But in April 1963 it was a top-secret structure – until a group known as “Spies for Peace” publicised its existence in a duplicated leaflet. R.S.G.4 was, they revealed, the regional seat of government for East Anglia; a post-nuclear military government stand-by headquarters which in event of war would take over the running of the region. They went on to list the names of some of those who would staff it – “if you are not amongst them there will be no room in R.S.G.4 for you” they warned. They even gave its telephone number (Cambridge 58900), together with the locations and phone numbers for the others scattered around the country.

Their leaflet concluded with “The Secret Anthem”

God save our R.S.G.

No room for you and me

Where shall we be?

We shall die alone in the wilderness

Our queen could not care less!

The whole country’s in a bloody mess

God save the R.S.G.s.

It caused quite a stir at the time, now its future is in doubt. Were you on the list, did you work inside it – or are you still sworn to secrecy? Or can you shed light on the background to this Ban-the-Bomb protest from the early 1960s?

FIND PICTURE TAKEN RECENTLY OF THE BUNKER

Ken Holliday has written from Norwich to say that he was one of the Observers at the Stretham windmill Royal Observer Corps posts, having added two years to his age! He has also drawn my attention to a contemporary newspaper account giving more details of the ‘Give Her Bovril’ airship at Sutton in October 1913 (Memories 18th April).

“Much excitement prevailed in the village when it became known that an airship had come down in the fens, not very far distant, and cyclists were soon speeding to the spot from all directions. Many were under the impression that it was one of our army airships, but it proved to be the Bovril advertising airship which left Hendon last Friday and has since been touring the country. First Pilot R.F. Dagnell was in charge assisted by Second Pilot S. Heath. Mr Sole’s Tubbs’ Farm is not exactly a nice place for an airship to be housed, so that when Mr A. Drake suggested it should be brought nearer Sutton those in charge readily fell in with the idea of moving it. A gang of Messrs Drake & Son’s men, who had been employed near by, therefore shouldered the car and proceeded towards the village. This was rendered easier as the envelope still contained sufficient gas to give it buoyancy and thus helped them over ditches and other obstacles. When they reached the high road a crowd soon gathered and it looked a curious procession that proceeded to Bury Lane where our aerial visitor was to spend the night, Mr E. Lowe staying “on guard”. Many people visited the scene when Mr Alf C. Drake was present and made a collection in aid of the Welsh colliery disaster relief fund, the pilots having consented to keep the airship on view as long as possible for this purpose. The airship will then be packed up and sent by rail to Hendon”. [SCAN OF THE AIRSHIP PILOT]

**

Mrs P. Anderson from Cherry Hinton Road, Cambridge, writes: "I was surprised and delighted to see my late father (Prof Saddington) mentioned in your "Looking Back" column on June 6th". I had delved back into the files of the News for 1926 to report how a demonstration of ju jitsu had been given in Cambridge by Mr A.J. Morgan and C.W. Boxsell who deputised for Professor Saddington and the son of Professor Sitton, the old University boxing instructor. A carpet about five feet square was requisitioned for a mat and Professor Saddington supplied ju jitsu costumes. The proceedings opened with a demonstration of "Kime-no-Kata, or ju jitsu self-defence methods. This was followed by methods of defence against an armed assailant which was loudly applauded while a display of ju jitsu wrestling brought the house down.

Mrs Anderson continues: "My father died in 1964 but ju jitsu had always been his great interest and he only stopped taking an active interest when the wound he received in World War I broke out again. How he would have enjoyed these reminiscences. I remember being taken to the gym and watching the students practising their throws and their falls. I seem to think the gym was a room behind the Guildhall". She also remembers the Prof Sitton lived in Madingley and his son Robert was a partner in the Cambridge motor firm Sitton and Mothersole

Delving into the News photo files to find a picture to accompany her letter I came across a very dramatic shot taken in December 1982 of a young Richard Patient from Bar Hill who had then just passed his examination for a junior black belt, not in ju jitsu, but in the Shotokan form of karate. Club secretary Mike Harris commented: "When you see him in normal dress he looks so unassuming that you wonder almost if he could burst a grape". It made quite a change from his other hobby – that of ornithology. Today Richard has turned his back on martial arts to become an accountant, but travels the world bird watching. Do you recognise any of the other youngsters at the Bar Hill club.
PICTURE ENCLOSED

Keith Hamilton from Cambridge is an avid collector of anything to do with fairs and fairground folk, and is the area correspondent for "The World's Fair", the show people's newspaper. Referring to Memories of 30th May he writes: "I am sure the habit of having everything spick and span for feast still holds with some of the older folk in villages where the feast is still kept up. I am aware the habit still holds with show people to some extent. Although the Cambridge Midsummer fair does not possibly have the same impact it once did there is still a tradition among many fairground families that everything must be just so in time for Cambridge. Trailer (living wagons) are washed down outside and they have a general tidy up. When stalls, transport etc are due a tidy up and possibly a repaint it is still a tradition to get it done in time for Cambridge. Indeed when I visited Thurston's fair at Luton last week there was quite a bit of painting of lorries going on 'in time for Cambridge'. Having most of my friends from the business I even find myself having a bit of a spring clean in my modest flat 'in case someone calls!'" PICTURE OF FAIR

One of the girls shown on the picture of Histon feast that week has come forward: "I've just seen a copy of the Evening News and much to my surprise the picture of Histon feast in 1985 is the Girl Guide float with me and my sister on the front row. I am second from the left and she is next to me with dark hair. I remember that day as it rained and we all froze in our shorts and grass skirts. I was 10 years old at the time. For your information I'm Helen Smith and best known for losing my limbs to meningitis"

**

Jeanne Cherry from Thompson's Lane, Cambridge has set us a puzzle. She has acquired a large photograph from 1910 showing a tennis match with a very fashionable and large crowd watching. It was in an album compiled by A.L. Prinsep who played lawn tennis for Trinity College at that time. But where was it played? “I have walked to every possible spot in Cambridge, hoping to recognise the chimney pots of the two houses in the background,” Jeanne says, but without result. Can you identify them? Write to Mike Petty at the News [SCAN OF PICTURE OF TENNIS MATCH]

Memories 20th June 2001, by Mike Petty

Helen Windibank (nee Batt) from Ashford in Kent is on the ancestor hunt. Her great aunt, Kate Batt married a member of the Morley family who was a photographer in Cambridge. They had daughters Grace, Kate and Dorothy of whom Grace graduated from the University in the early 1900s and may have been the reason the family moved to Cambridge.

Helen may have a search on her hands for the 1904 Spaldings' Directory reveals numerous Morleys in Cambridge at that time; Arthur was landlord of The John Gilpin in Gold Street, Edward was an electrical engineer, Ernest the manager of the International Tea Company, Frederick a pawnbroker and jeweller – and at that time also a Town Councillor. Then there was George, a guard on the railways, Harry a coachman, Herbert the secretary of the Stockwell Street Baptist Chapel Sunday School – not to mention John a shoemaker, another John a labourer – and yet another who was an architect. There's no space to mention more than Richard, a cleaner at the pumping station, Walter the lead glazier of Mawson Road or William a bricklayer in Eden Street.

Such is the wealth of information tucked away inside the covers of just one of the series of Cambridge Street directories issued by William Potter Spalding from 1874. Originally they came out every 3-4 years but they became an annual publication after the Great War; they stopped at the start of World War II after which Kellys took over publication

Spalding's 1904 directory is typical. The first pages start with advertisements – for Bolton's removals, Joshua Taylor, Cole the jeweller, Matthews the grocer in Trinity Street – some of which are forgotten, others of which linger on in the memory of older residents.

Then comes lists of officials and organisations- the school attendance officer, collector of market tolls, names of each of the borough police, the surgeons at Addenbrooke's Hospital – a record of those who served in so many capacities. Postal times, hackney carriage fares, lists of societies, names of churchwardens – on and on they go

But the main feature is street directory; from Abbey Road to York Street the compilers surveyed house by house, listing the name of the occupant. Often the same names come up year after year, directory after directory, enabling you to identify those who have lived in your house; sometimes occupants change regularly – making you wonder why?

Spalding however went further than just listing names, he also included jobs, giving a wonderful feel for the area and how it has changed– just how many laundresses, pawnbrokers' assistants, soap boilers or cab proprietors live down Abbey Road today?

Corner shops, pubs, breweries and factories all feature street by street; but they also come together in a classified list of trades. Cambridge in 1904 had autocar companies, bath proprietors, blackboard renovators, braziers, ironfounders and perambulator makers alongside the manufacturers of artificial teeth and vacuum cleaner companies.

In fact within its 300 pages Spalding's directory for 1904 crammed a mass of information. But some things defeated even him. The names are there – but there is no overall index to them, so Helen would have to plod page by page.

This was something that confronted another family researcher, Hugo Brown who has been working on his genealogy for many years. He'd discovered that his wife, Melanie (nee Johnson) was born in the Mill Road Maternity Hospital in the 1960s and lived for a while in a simple two up, two down terraced house at 39 Gwydir Street. Then when checking the 1881 Census for her ancestors he came across the entry for her former home. In that small house there had been no fewer than 15 occupants, and more amazingly they were actually Melanie's great-great-great grandparents James and William Smee! No-one in the family knew of this co-incidence. They only lived at 39 Gwydir St for a very short while and Hugo found it difficult to locate them on the 1891 Census. So he resorted to the files of Spalding's directories in the Cambridgeshire Collection.

He scanned through year after year of directories. He located James Smee, who was a college servant, in all the Spalding Directories except for 1904. So he decided to create a short index to that year, just surnames only, to locate James Smee. But by now he was hooked & soon realised that it would be far more interesting to create a full alphabetical index of all 14,555 entries contained in the 1904 Directory with copies deposited with the Cambridgeshire Collection and the Cambridge Records Office. But when the index was finally complete he was no further forward; he still hadn't found him, he just wasn't listed.

But at least other researchers could save themselves hours of work by using Hugo's index.

However Hugo Brown has gone much further than merely index the names; he has indexed the names of houses, indexed pubs, occupations, advertisements; and he's not confined it to paper; he's cut it on a CD-Rom. This is a monumental project, involving many hours of work, but it does not take up much disc space. So Hugo has scanned the complete directory, page by page and constructed links so that you can click on a name and be taken immediately to the page of the directory where it is shown.

But some of the streets have now vanished. Spalding included a map with his directory, so Hugo has scanned that as well; and while about it he added other maps for 1924 and 1949 enabling one to compare how areas have changed over the years.

In fact he has put some much time and effort into all these sections that it is a shame few people will consult them fully.

For in addition to all this he has scanned in some 1,000 pictures, half of which he has taken himself over the last 20 years, the other half of which have come from the Cambridgeshire Collection. They are arranged in fifteen sequences – streets, colleges, churches, pubs, events, people, parks amongst them. There are links upon links and soon one just keeps clicking, meandering through hundreds of images, old and new. There are even town trails of the city before 1930 and after 1980 – with fascinating comparisons, of colleges, pubs and churches. Click on a picture, it comes up on the computer screen, click on the print button and it prints out.

The Cambridge Explorer CD-Rom is due to be launched shortly. It will cost £20 and be available from Heffers, from the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library or from Hugo Brown at The Cambridge Explorer, Ash House, Prickwillow Road, Queen Adelaide, Ely, Cambs CB7 4TZ. Of course there is a web-site at www.cambridge-explorer.co.uk

To view it you need a Pentium PC with a CD-drive and Microsoft Internet Explorer v5 (or newer). If you have an interest in Cambridge history, but have not yet ventured into the new technology then this is the time to approach your grandchildren for their assistance. Mind you they will probably want to keep it themselves for all those school and college projects – or just because it shows whose was living in their house nearly 1900 years ago.

Memories 27th June 2001 by Mike Petty

In the early 1960s the prospect of seeing-in the 21st-century seemed remote. The Great Powers were caught in an arms race that could only end in atomic war; East Anglia was the centre for both British and American H-bombers, perhaps nowhere else in the world had as much destructive power concentrated in one area. It was therefore an obvious target for Russian bombs.

The Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament tried to raise awareness of the effect of an atomic attack and thousands of people protested peacefully. But for some this was not enough. A national Committee of 100 initiated a campaign of massive civil disobedience, organising mass marches and sit-down demonstrations, and an East Anglia committee was formed, with a Cambridge schoolmaster as its secretary. One of those shadowy figures was a youngster, Raith Overhill – now a magistrate and Cambridge city councillor. Like many others he agonised about the aftermath of an attack: “There may or may not be any survivors. You might be one of them. Think of that for a moment ... Imagine everything burnt to the ground. No food, or water contaminated by radiation. Would you wish to live in such a world”.

But, like it or not, some would survive, at least for a while; and once the fires had died away and the radiation levels dropped somebody would have to try and pick up the pieces. So the Government established a series of regional centres, bomb-proof bunkers where officials would shelter safely. One of those was in Cambridge. It was top secret.

The teen-aged Raith was employed by Wally Undrill’s upholsterers and French polishers, based in Catharine Street. The firm had a contract with the Government offices in Brooklands Avenue, refurbishing, moving filing cabinets, putting in carpets. They also got the job of fitting out the new bomb-proof bunker - and Raith was one of those assigned to the work, fitting and assembling furnishings.

There he was, a committed anti-nuclear protestor, author of ‘Food for Thought’ and ‘Save Humanity’ leaflets, and he was being granted access to a absolutely top-secret installation.

“My first impression of the building was daunting, it was stone grey, stark and windowless. The large steel door was swung open, to me it was like a portal which lead to a labyrinth of corridors and dormitories. The ministry official who would direct the work, showed me the water purifying system operation and mess rooms, where groups of men were laying flooring”. (The flooring did not survive – the lino, specially made for the job, was the wrong colour. It was ripped out and burnt.)

“At this point I was handed a floor layout plan, with TOP SECRET stamped over it; those plans gave the instructions where furnishing and, most important, the beds were to be erected. Over the next few weeks myself and two other young men worked hard to complete our task. As we were unable to have a radio – no signal could penetrate the massive walls - we would sing pop hits of the time, and some times out of bravado I would sing the Red Flag. To this very day I could never understand how I was allowed into the building wearing my CND badge.

“On what was to be my last day in the building and my reason for leaving, was an inspection by senior ministry officials. One high ranking military officer said that the beds would have to be taken apart and re-erected in another part of the building, I protested, as I had the official layout plan. But I was no match for his seniority, and decided that I would not wish to spend my time with the likes of him in such a claustrophobic building, in the event of a nuclear holocaust.”

Raith left, went to his Committee of 100 meetings in Fen Ditton and helped produce the “Spies for Peace” leaflet that told the world about the shelter in which he had been working.

All that was a long while ago. But last week Raith went back, wearing his old CND badge. Nowadays the gaunt building is swathed in greenery. Inside it remains as he remembered, stark concrete corridors, small windowless offices some still equipped with their regulation mirror and filing cabinets with the original labels tied to the, now empty, drawers. In one larger room there is a map of East Anglia, lying nearby the pins which would have plotted explosions. While some of the air purification equipment still stands ready for use, the male and female dormitories, where the 300 beds had been erected – as per plan – are now empty. It is a warm, quiet and sterile environment – our guide had never seen a single spider or creepy crawlly inside it.

From out of a folder of papers Raith produced a leaflet advertising a march from Cambridge Guildhall to this other centre of government. “Perhaps in the four minutes before annihilation you can run the mile from the city centre – press the doorbell for admission!”

But however terrible it would have been for those outside the prospect for the men and women locked inside their shelter would surely have been far worse. For they knew far better than any idealistic youngster just what would be happening to their own wives and children outside, alone. And who would want to emerge afterwards if the world was like the campaigners were predicting.

So far it has not happened, the bunker still stands and councillors – like Raith – will be involved in deciding its future. It is not the most attractive piece of architecture in Cambridge but had somebody pushed the button it might have been the only building left!

**

It’s the time of year when papers are full of stories of escaped vultures, fen tigers or anything animal. But Michael Snelling of Haslingfield is concerned about a missing lion. The beast is described as being about 100 years old and bright red in colour. It was last seen in central Cambridge some months ago, high up near the library, where it had been for some 25 years, but has now disappeared. Has it been culled because of woodworm, has it gone to breed with the other lions near the Fitzwilliam Museum – or is it lurking in some yard somewhere. Wherever it is Michael would like to see it brought back, for without it all the people who used to say “meet you under the Red Lion” are quite lost.

**

The other evening I spoke to a group at Kirtling, one of a cluster of small parishes to the south-east of Newmarket. During the tea interval the talk inevitably got around to the changing way of life, to the arrival of new residents who do not have time to attend village gatherings, to the soaring price of housing that force village children into Newmarket for accommodation. But last year a group of some fifty of the older residents took the opportunity to share their thoughts and feelings about old times, present times and future times with village children, and the children responded with their own hopes & memories. It has all been brought together by a team of writers and photographers, using illustrations produced by the children and published in a book dedicated to the young generation. But this is not just another book of memories for it includes a CD-Rom including the voices and artwork of children adding their insight into aspects such as childhood, technology, health and food. One major change has been travel; it may be much easier now to get away, but Victor Dickerson captures much of the romance of a Sunday School Outing in his poem from Dullingham station.

The day has arrived for our Sunday school treat.
Washed behind ears and clean socks on our feet.
We travel by train, the same as last year -
We're all getting on without a care.
Third class carriage, sixteen squeezed in –
Good thing that some are thin.
No lavatory on this train –
You had to go before you came.

On arrival it's off to the beach

Sandwiches in newspaper - dripping or marg.
(Sometimes a cake - nothing too large.)
Should you, by bad luck, let them fall
You'll have to eat them sand and all.
A bee's stung Mr. Goody on the chin.
Tea at the Church Hall - all fall in.
Long tables have the goodies on,
Meat paste sandwiches nearly all gone.
As usual Betty wants to pee –
No wonder - she's drunk a pint of tea!
Games are played with a lot of passion
And afterwards it's off to the station.

Finally the train reaches home

Mums and dads are at the station,
Mum looking good in a nice white apron.
We have sticks of rock as our day-out token -
Sad to say many are broken.
Some are sticky from the heat,
Wilkie's got his on his teeth.

I snuggle into bed and it starts to rain -
I hear it on the window pane.
Oh happy days - roll on next year -
With another day out without a care.

Do you remember Sunday School outings – write to Mike Petty at the News

“Millennium Child” is published by Cross Board Arts at the Wysing Arts Centre, Fox Road, Bourn, CB3 7TX

Memories 4th July 2001, by Mike Petty

One of Cambridge's foremost fashion shops, closed this week, 50 years ago. George Stace was a name that had come to stand for a good, solid, middle class trade. It was not necessarily a smart one, but it met the needs of a definite section of the community. It catered for the matron, and for the essentially well-to-do family of both town and county.

In its day it had striven to meet the needs of its customers, providing work for a small army of girls in making and adapting clothes. In 1898 the firm had been summonsed for employing 17-year-old Kate Ladds after 8pm contrary to the Workshops and Factories Act. On June 4th she had begun work at nine o'clock in the morning and finished at 9.20 at night, with just an hour and a half for meals - & was not paid anything extra for the overtime. She said some of the employees in the showroom began at 8.30 a.m. On this particular night she was making a hat that a lady wanted home that night. Despite her assurances that Mr Stace was not a hard taskmaster and was not sweating the girls he employed he was fined one shilling.

On George Stace's death in 1918 Mr R.E. Moore took over as manager, but the shop had remained largely unchanged, as had its reputation for good class trading. They had survived the hardships of the Second World War, and enjoyed a good sale in January 1949 when the possibility of the ending of clothes rationing had a psychological effect with people inclined to be a bit rash with their coupons and the half-price, half-price coupon goods went well. They cleared some of their Old Look stock and a number of suits have been sold at a quarter of their price - £20 coats at £4.19s.6d. It was pointed out that the "shorter lady" scored, as some of the old length garments look new length on her.

News of the closure was a serious blow to many of the customers who had shopped there for many years. One lady summed up its appeal: "My mother brought her wedding dress there, and I bought mine. My daughter's wedding dress came from here and I was hoping my granddaughter's would be bought here too in due course". Sadly it was not to be; Joshua Taylor acquired the goodwill of the business and hoped the ladies would transfer their business to them. [SCAN OF STACE'S]

But you do not have to go back so far to reflect on change. In June 1976 the News took a stroll through the 'Kite' area of Cambridge, down Fitzroy and Burleigh Streets, an area then threatened with redevelopment but which provided "the sort of service that makes shopping a pleasure, where shoppers can ask favours - and know they'll get them". There was Laurie & McConnal's, "the delightfully unrushed family department store (with free parking and a pleasant restaurant on the first floor)"; the Talk of the Town - "not so much a department store as lots of chic mini stores under the same roof", and fashionably simple clothes - lovingly chosen hand-knits, hand-weaves - at the shop called just Fitzroy.

Like other areas it had its multiples but here "the chainstores that settle in the Kite lose their usual anonymity. Here the Boots, Tesco (furniture), Fine Fare, Woolworths and others all become part of the community, presided over by the Co-op, all lumbering Victorian without and comfortable modern department store within".

Warming to the assignment the reporter of 25 years ago took us on a jaunt: "Go early one Saturday while the sun's still streaming up Gold Street & have a wander round. You'll see the do-it-yourselfers drawn up in their cars at the DIY shop (Fitzroy and James street corner), and just before nine you'll see a small crowd of devotees begin to gather outside the model shop (Ren-Models). Pick up your morning paper at Woods in Burleigh Street and have an early coffee in the Rumble Tum. Now go on and spoil yourself and pop into The Jays and buy that LP or tape you've been holding out on before foraging in the fashion shops - Fades for all you want in denim, Trend Tailoring and Dysons for men, and Mandrake and Josephine Parsons for women. Then when your spending's got to stop, treat yourself to lunch. The Peking does midday lunches with good portions of sweet and sour pork at 65p. Chopsticks make a delicious meal last longer and there's gentle advice on choosing dishes"

There was plenty of choice and plenty of parking space, but just one problem: "Don't go shopping in the Kite on Thursday - it's early closing". [PICTURES FROM NEWS FILES]

**

Does anybody remember working for Messrs I & R Morley? They had a world-wide reputation for woollen products and a factory in Abbey Road where in 1951 they were producing as many as 135 dozen woollen garments in a month. In April that year plans were announced for extensions and improvements designed to turn the premises into a modern up-to-date knitwear factory, with machine room, yarn store, press room, boiler house and mechanic shop. The expansion meant that more workers would be needed in a job that carried interest and personal pride in craftsmanship. There were none of those dull machining tasks associated with large-scale factories and girls would complete the whole garment – one could produce the body work of a garment in about 45 minutes and a really nimble-fingered girl could make as many as three dozen garments in a week. Amongst their products were cable stitch sweaters for cricket clubs – including the M.C.C. Pullovers, slipovers, jumpers and sweaters were packed for distribution to every part of the world.

The firm offered excellent canteen facilities and social activities including a trip to the coast during the summer and a visit to London in winter. But do you remember it?

**

Joy Hall from St Ives has sent me a poem of her memories of a Sunday School outing by train to Hunstanton – the excitement of the first glimpse of the sea, the spades and buckets, sandwiches and pop, and the paddling. Last week we too went back again; the station has long gone, but the ghost train's still there; the boating lake's been filled in but there are still donkeys on the beach. I forgot to see if the picture postcards still show the pier as they did long years after it had disappeared! Mr M. Beeton of Histon has more tangible evidence of change for he still treasures a number of cine films of Histon Baptist Sunday School outings that were taken by his late step father, R.T. Barnes in the 1930's, 50's and 60's. He recalls: "It seems that nearly all the village turned out for this annual treat. When you arrived at the resort a mad dash was made for the beach, followed by the funfair, skating rink etc. Games such as beach cricket and rounders were organised for anyone to join in. The day was always finished off by a tea that catered for everyone". Then in winter the film would be shown back at the Church to remind everyone of their excursion. Do you remember them?

Mr D. Coote from Luton has been digging amongst his family archives to find a photograph taken in Guernsey in 1947. It shows a group of youngsters from the Central School, Cambridge He is there on the back row, one from the right; Ivor Fuller is on the left of the row in front while "Cambridge's Diana Dors" with the blonde hair was, he thinks, named Betty Fiske. Ted Mudd has a picture of the real Diana taken when she visited the Tivoli cinema, Cambridge in the 1950s. If you recognise yourself or would like to share memories with Mr Coote let me know. [SCAN OF GROUP & OF DIANA DORS WHEN SHE VISITED CAMBRIDGE]

Christine Branch from Haslingfield has a much older query. She has a photograph of the Girl Guide Company attached to the Catholic Church in Hills Road, Cambridge, taken between 1921 and 1926. The captain was Miss M. Goss (centre) and the person on her right was probably her assistant, a Miss Watts. Christine's aunt, Cecily Hughes (nee Wilkins) is seated front left. Do you know the number of the unit (somewhere between the 13th and 17th Cambridge), have any memories or know why it was disbanded. If so please contact her at 10 The Meadows, Haslingfield, phone Cambridge 870136, or write to me at the News. [SCAN OF GIRL GUIDE TROOP]

Memories 11 Jul 2001, by Mike Petty

The recent high temperatures have recalled memories of the summer of 1976; in early May and June that year temperatures had sometimes reached into the 80s but from 22nd June to 26th August the weather was consistently dry, sunny & hot. The summer of 1975 had been the hottest for nearly 30 years, but this was worse. Every day between 23rd June and 7th July the thermometers soared into the 90s – a record.

As temperatures hit 94 degrees in the centre of Cambridge even King's College chapel organ went out of tune, The main King's Cross to Cambridge railway line became distorted at Shepreth, roads at Swaffham Prior started to break up in the heat and News reporters tried cooking an egg on the bonnet of a car.

Working conditions became almost impossible; Cambridge policemen removed their ties, Huntingdon barristers their wigs and gowns, At Haverhill Taylor's Foundry removed skylights to encourage a breeze and furniture makers dished out free drinks. Mildenhall factory workers began clocking in at 6am so they could leave by mid-afternoon when the heat was at its most intense. Marshalls and Pye Unicam workers followed suit. Building workers were in demand when houses cracked through subsidence as the soil dried out beneath them.

Cambridge pubs ran out of lager because of a 100 per cent increase in demand and brewers were unable to replace stocks. Newmarket pubs ran out of lemonade and a Haverhill Hotel ran out of ice – which so annoyed one customer that he threw his drink at landlord Colin Addy.

Children too were suffering. About 100 Cub Scouts and Brownie Guides collapsed from heat exhaustion at an open air service conducted by the Bishop of Ely at the Cub Scout jubilee camp at Braham Farm, Lt Thetford.

Ely swimming pool was overwhelmed with visitors but the annual swim through Cambridge, organised by the Granta swimming club, had to be cancelled for the first time in about 40 years because of the low level of water in the river Cam. Due to possible pollution problems they dare not risk the health hazards involved. The situation got worse when a sudden storm caused failure in the city's stormwater system and oil that had collected in the drains during the hot weather was washed into the Cam, causing giant oil slicks. This added to the problems being experienced by fish as water temperatures soared and water levels fell. Farmers were stopped from extracting water to irrigate their parched fields where the harvest was coming on about three weeks before schedule; nor would they be allowed to burn stubble for fear of wholesale conflagrations.

Extreme heat took its toll of animals. At Cambridge abattoir in Coldham's Lane one animal died on the premises and three others were dead on arrival because of the intense heat-induced heart attacks. There were fears too for chickens; about 1,500 died at Baldock and Wilburton poultryman Edward Everitt, who had some 50,000 hens, expressed concern at the difficulties being faced in keeping them cool

But as well as heat there was another crisis that year – drought. Summer rainfall had been less than half the average, but this was just part of the problem. The drought had begun in April 1975, it had been serious by April 1976 and still there seemed no end in sight.

Trees were parched, Wandlebury nature reserve shut its gates as branches fell off because of the drought and other nature reserves considered closure.

Cambridgeshire fire fighters faced their biggest crisis in years as the heatwave continued. In the Cam Causeway area of Cambridge Stephen Stokes and Robert Earl were amongst children and adults who turned out in force to help firemen fight a fire which threatened their homes. It raced across waste ground and broke through the fence line at the bottom of their gardens before it was controlled. It was the third fire on the land in a week. Cambridge Fire & rescue Service, already stretched with other alarms could initially only send one engine, so its first action was to put a call out for everyone to pitch in and help. Everywhere firemen were finding difficulty getting water as ponds, fen drains and rivers dried up; Hobson's Brook gurgled to a stop and reservoirs emptied. At Graham Water remains of submerged farms became visible. Water rationing was introduced and standpipes erected - though Newmarket racecourse continued to irrigate its July course.

Then on 15th July more than an inch of rain fell overnight; it was a relief, but nowhere near enough – water engineers noted that we needed at least three months of heavy rain to get anything like back to normal. The Cambridge Water Company was warning that by 1981 it would be short of more than 1.25 million gallons of water a day and were planning a Great Ouse Groundwater Scheme to remedy the situation.

In desperation the Government appointed a Minister for Drought, Dennis Howell, to co-ordinate water conservation. Within three days it started raining. Over August Bank Holiday roads flooded and at Soham and Isleham pubs and private houses had to be pumped out. Normal weather was resumed. [PICTURES FROM NEWS FILES]

**

Hot weather was welcome on Sunday School outings; Mr A. Challis of Bar Hill recalls: “The invitation in the Cambridge Evening News to relate Sunday School outings of years ago tempted me as, at 90 years of age I remember them well. As secretary of the Hills Road Methodist Sunday School (corner of Norwich street) in the twenties I organised them for children of the church. The main organisers of the special trains were Mr & Mrs David Moore who lived at "Lumen" Histon Road. Mr Moore was a chemist at Chivers and he and his wife Florence were keen workers for the Temperance Movement. Each summer in the twenties they organised special trains to selected places for families from Cambridge and surrounding villages. This was a popular outing, probably in July and I remember collecting the pennies from January onwards and also arranging the teas at the venue selected. The fare would have been modest by today’s standard. Places visited were Skegness, Gt. Yarmouth, Hunstanton etc and a film would taken of the day which was shown in the following winter to the various churches which participated. At these events they were known as Uncle David and Auntie Flossie and for several years they did a good job in giving many people a day out when travel was not so easily available. These trips would have been in the early 20's as by 1925 I was working, I still have a photograph or two of the trips including one of Miss Emilie Lewis who had an excellent contralto voice and later formed the Mackenzie School of Music”. (Uncle David’s films still survive and have been copied for the East Anglian Film Archive; from time to time filmshows are given to packed chapels)

Pubs also had outings; this picture is headed “The Blackbird’s outing to Southend, July 17th 1933” – can anyone shed light on it? [SCAN]

**

With the fortunes of the Marconi electronics company in the news at the moment, Mr P. Johnson of Moreton in Marsh, Gloucestershire, has sent me a snap of the founder and radio pioneer, Guglielmo Marconi, being presented with an honorary degree in the Cambridge University Senate House, probably in 1931. It is not the best photograph in the world but was taken by Agnes Johnson who managed to find herself a seat in the gallery with a very small camera in her possession. Notes on the back of the snap record: “The uniforms made a very colourful scene; that of Marconi himself being a marvellous affair of purple faced with gold, which fitted him without a crease. Amongst those present on the dais was Sir J.J. Thompson and Sir Will Spens in his Vice Chancellor’s robes”. [SCAN]

Memories 19th July 2001, by Mike Petty

The dedication of the new Processional Way at Ely Cathedral marked the first major addition to that building for many centuries, launching the Ship of the Fens into the 21st century, after much of the preceding century had been involved with the skilful restoration and repair of the original fabric. 100 years earlier another major religious building had been completed; this time the Roman Catholic church of Our Lady in Hills Road, Cambridge. One company links the two – Rattee and Kett.

George Kett was a Norfolk man who had worked on the restoration of Norwich cathedral in the 1830s, and then moved on to the new Houses of Parliament in London. Meanwhile in Cambridge another craftsman, James Rattee, had enhanced his reputation with his carving on the choir stalls at Ely Cathedral. He had also acquired a building site on the corner of ‘a little land leading to nowhere’. He chose a good spot for a few years later the railway reached Cambridge, and the lane became Station Road.

The two men struck up a partnership and a ‘Wood and Stone Carving Works’ was established. They constructed their stone and joinery works, builders yard and office beside Rattee’s house, Poplar Cottage at the end of the road. Their partnership was to be short lived, Rattee fell violently ill and died within forty-eight hours. Kett continued the business. The rest, as they say is history. Wherever there was restoration or stonework the company was there; in colleges, cathedrals, churches its craftsmen were employed. Huge blocks of stone were transported to Cambridge to be shaped and carved in the traditional way. But as the century moved on the old workshops became too small. A piece of land was bought at Purbeck Road and the stone works moved there; in the 1950s the joinery department also moved, leaving only the offices on the original site. Then they too moved.

The old house was pulled down and a modern office block, Kett House erected, with its distinctive emblem of the oak tree – a reminder of a much earlier part of the family story, the revolt of 1549 when peasant farmers had rebelled against inclosure. Kett House itself has now recently been renovated.

Meanwhile at Purbeck Road work continued. In 1963 the company was working on renovation of the Prime Minister’s residence in Downing Street and at the same time building the new Churchill College in addition to a miscellany of jobs such as tombstones, boundary stones, fountains and all manner of intricate stone and wood work. In wooden outbuildings the fine craftsmanship continued, and outside working hours the craftsmen took part in social and sporting activities, such as cricket matches. Their yard was filled with rough blocks of Purbeck and Clipsham stone offloaded by giant cranes from lorries that had negotiated the Cambridge.

A couple of years ago Rattee and Kett were on the move again, this time to Longstanton. Their present premises do not have the quaintness of the original Station Road site but have been designed for efficiency, the heavy blocks of stone transported by overhead gantries through the various processes of rough and intricate shaping. But the traditional craftsmanship is still there with the ancient skill of stone carving now supplement by men like Trevor Wilson producing intricate pieces of sculpture or mouldings, but utilising a modern material, Codestone, to produce exact replicas of historic artefacts.

Rattee and Kett have taken their traditional skills into the Digital age, but do you remember the old days, did you work on the turrets or pinnacles of King’s college; can you add some more personal memories to a history that is literally carved in stone?

SOHAM GRAMMAR SCHOOL STORY – PLEASE INCLUDE FROM ITEM E-MAILED PREVIOUSLY

Memories 25^h July 2001, by Mike Petty

THE LEAD STORY WAS SENT LAST WEEK; IT IS UNCHANGED

It was probably the greatest of the Cambridge University student stunts & it was one answer to the Cambridge traffic problems.

On Saturday evening all seemed quiet and normal; on Sunday morning strollers in King's Parade on June 8th 1958 could not believe their eyes. For parked serenely in the heart of the city was an Austin 7 van that had obviously been there for some time and had not been moved on by the police. In fact despite the best efforts, not of the police, but of the Civil Defence volunteers, it would remain parked for several days.

Cambridge planners had already decided that the answer to their parking problems was to erect a multi-storey car park, in Park Street – but not a stone had been turned. So what was this vehicle doing high up in the air – perched precariously on the roof of the University Senate House.

It had not been there the night before. It was certainly there now. But how did it get up there?

Only slowly did details start to emerge, and still the full story has not come out. But this weekend I met one man who had been involved – though, he claimed only in a supporting role. Even after all these years he does still not want his identity revealed, so I will call him Bob from Burradoo.

He confirmed that Engineering students from the University had been planning the operation for some time. They had run through their plan on the Wednesday evening, but Saturday evening, as dusk fell, the operation was commenced.

First they needed a van – from where he does not know; then they removed the engine. Without an engine how do you get a van into Senate House Passage, and yet once there they were only part way. There was building work going on on the old University Library and some of the scaffolding poles were taken down. Two undergraduates then used their night-climbing skills to shin to the roof of the Senate House from which they dropped down ropes. Bob and other students helped to tie the scaffold poles to them and up they were hauled. Once there they were constructed into a derrick.

Meanwhile a cradle was being positioned around the old van; this was secured to the rope from the roof and, using a winch it was hoisted up into the air. So far so good. But then it got stuck half-way. Bob was one of those on look-out duty, at the end of Senate House Passage watching the entrance to Clare College; it seemed an age to him before one of the undergraduates could clamber to the van and release it. Then those on the roof grabbed its bumper and swung it up to the centre of the roof. It was not the end; the make-shift derrick had to be dismantled and the scaffolding poles carefully replaced where they had been found. The whole operation took over 3 ½ [THREE AND A HALF] hours.

It was the evening of the Bump Supper, a time of revelry marking the end of the May races, but Bob did not hang around any longer. Like other students he was in lodgings and his late arrival home would have to be marked in by his landlady. But in Bob's case this was not a problem, for his landlady was his wife. It was very unusual for undergraduates to be married in those days. In fact he was fined by a Proctor for walking arm in arm with her in the street – it was an offence for a student to canoodle with a lady; but this was no lady, this was his wife. It made no difference, University rules did not recognise that students could have wives.

But Bob from Burradoo was an unusual student all round. For one thing he was a Cambridge lad, having grown up a few doors from Milton Road School, and attended the County School. He had worked for a while in the Central Library at the back of the Guildhall, spending some time in the cupboard that then housed the largely unsorted Cambridgeshire Collection, before gaining admission to Fitzwilliam Hall to study law.

His legal training came in handy when he was apprehended for another prank, this time in Oxford where he had celebrated a Varsity Rugby match somewhat too well and had decided to bring home a souvenir of the occasion, a notice board from an Oxford church. There he was amongst his mates, singing rugby songs in the street, when it dawned on him that the other voices had disappeared. Behind him stood two Bobbies, arms crossed. He handed over the board and bolted. Regaining his friends he recalled how he had escaped; "Indeed sir?" intoned a gruff official voice! Bob convinced the powers that he had not stolen the sign, just borrowed it.

Back at the Senate House Cambridge's Mayor Christopher Wordingham, together with Town Clerk Alan Swift, Councillor C.A. Mole, chairman of the City's Civil Defence Committee and reporters were watching as after a day or so's deliberation the van was prepared to be lowered back to ground level. Once more a derrick was erected on the roof of the Senate House, a pulley was attached and ropes secured again. But this time the van would not pass between the legs of the derrick. A Civil Defence volunteer picked up a hammer and tried to flatten out the protrusions to make the obstinate shape more streamlined. But to no avail, it would not budge. They took down the derrick and re-erected it – still without success. In all this they were 'assisted' by 'advice' from students looking on from the roof of Gonville and Caius college urging them to send for a team of undergraduates to help them. Others watched from turrets and battlements, balconies and upper windows; crowds lined the pavements, police controlled traffic and the nation's press were there in abundance.

The grads had got in up in one piece, civic pride dictated it should come down in one piece; only they couldn't. There was no denial that in spite of the ingenuity, and at times real courage, of the Civil Defence men, this time they were beaten.

So they inspected the van more closely and found that, not only had the engine been removed, but that the body was in two parts, loosely bolted together. It had not been such a triumph as originally thought, city officials claimed. But Bob is adamant it went up intact (though there was an admission at the time that the rear axle did go up separately).

As daylight began to fail it was time for extreme measures. In came an oxy-acetylene torch to reduce the van to segments. Down came the bonnet, the radiator, the steering column, the roof and sides. By 8.35 pm all that was left was a pile of scrap metal, and a number of red faces; the authorities flushed with embarrassment at having been soundly beaten, the undergraduates with something more to celebrate at the end of term.

Bob himself says he stayed away from the scene, fearful of the retribution that might be doled out to the perpetrators; he gained his degree and took himself off to carve out a career in Singapore, from where he has retired to New South Wales. But despite his best endeavours to remain anonymous he was actually captured on camera. If you recognise him disguised as a lady road-cleaner tormenting a long-suffering Bobby on Rag Day then do let me know. And now one of the perpetrators of this most audacious stunt has come forward perhaps others will follow suit. And, whilst in confession mode, if you know anything about any of the other student stunts involving motor cars now is the time to confess. Write to Mike Petty at the News.

"BOB FROM BURRADOO" IS ROBERT T. CONSTABLE, MANHASSET, 50A
BURRADOO RD, BURRADOO, NSW 2576, e-mail bobcon@ozimail.com.au

Memories 25^h July 2001, by Mike Petty

EXTRA STORIES .

In 1943 as war raged around the world a secret plan was being hatched in Cambridge. Stephen Dykes Bower, a church architect was instructed to begin planning, not for the invasion of Europe but the occupation of Girton, Histon, Milton, Fulbourn and the Shelfords. The invasion would come once the war was over; part of the reconstruction of Cambridge – though Cambridge had not been badly bombed. It was the first act of a regional office of the newly-formed Ministry of Town and Country Planning, set up in Trinity College, Cambridge. Dykes Bower had no planning experience and his terms of reference have not survived, but it was clear that any proposals for future development would be controversial, with disputes inevitable. So he made it easier for himself by seeking out those known to be sympathetic to his ideals & not talking to those most likely to oppose – the college bursars, and the residents of those villages that would be need to be urbanised as satellite centres for a super-Cambridge. Only three copies of the masterplan are known to have survived, and only one of those is complete. It is held in the archives of the Cambridge Preservation Society and has now been revealed for the first time in a new study on ‘Planners and Preservationists’ by Anthony Cooper which examines the development of the Cambridge Green Belt from 1928 to 1985. Now once again villagers once more prepare to fight ‘urbanisation’, but this time at least they have some ideas of the plans being hatched.

‘Planners and preservationists; the Cambridge Preservation Society and the city’s Green Belt 1928-1985’ is published by the Cambridge Preservation Society at £15

**

My mention of Morley’s knitwear firm has brought back memories to Peggy Brutnell, nee Beamiss of Cambridge, who was employed there 60 years ago. She recalls: “It was a Mr Denney of Victoria Park who we worked for, & in charge of us girls was a lady called Rene Crossman (a lovely lady)”. The company was taken over by the Army about January 1942 & they all went their different ways, several of the girls got married to Americans. Graham Clark of Woodlark Road, Cambridge joined the company after they restarted: “I began my career with the firm in Abbey Walk in 1950 as a knitting and sewing machine mechanic. The firm employed approx 80 women who operating the machinery, winding yarn onto bobbins and knitting and making-up the actual garments. The manager then was Mr R. Warren as his daughter, Sheila, was the making-up manageress.” Graham left the firm to do his National Service in 1953 but later returned for another four years before the firm had to cut its overheads by moving the factory back to the Midlands.

**

Various readers have seen faces they know on the recent photo of a trip to Guernsey. Jane Reeson saw her mum and dad, Bertha Jacklin and Alec Reeson – did you remember them? Brian Halls of Cambridge saw himself in the picture but says it was the Central Youth Club (not School) and was taken in 1946. Muriel Brotchie (nee Edwards) from Chesterton agrees; the camp was arranged for the Cambridgeshire County Youth Clubs and as a large number wanted to attend it was divided into two groups. While they were housed in a local school some of the boys found a stack of German rifles under the floorboards! She has a picture of the whole group – which I featured amongst the Rattee & Kett pictures last week! (Oops)

Memories 1st August 2001, by Mike Petty

Last week I popped into Age Concern's drop-in centre in Parson's Court, Cambridge, right beside the Corn Exchange. It provides a welcoming and inexpensive cup of tea, snack or lunch for any over-50s who find themselves in the city centre and would like to pause for a while either under cover or in their courtyard garden. Here you are likely to bump into people you've not met for years and catch up on old, or new gossip.

Memories flowed, from the old Chesterton Workhouse, where the tramps would wait outside on a seat near the Co-op until it was opening time, to "Kinky" in his frock coat, deerstalker hat and shepherd's crook. Then there was the 'East Road College' – St George's school whose reputation was such that shops advertising for errand-boys would state: "Boys from East Road College need not apply". The Territorial Army was not so particular and many lads volunteered for service, less for the annual camp or pair of boots, than for the £20 enlistment payment, a fortune.

Cambridge in those days was "Pride and Poverty", people had lace curtains at their windows so others could not see how poor they were. A 'moonlight flit' was a regular occurrence, and Coulson's had a cart that could be rented for 6d to take your meagre possessions from one home to another where the rent was cheaper. The first thing was to strip the wallpaper – it was full of bugs, and you never bought a second-hand mattress for the same reason. There was great interest in a Billhead, lent me by Eileen Gander of Cottenham. It records purchases made by her mother from the London Furnishing Company, Fitzroy Street, in 1922, though the beds and chairs would have been beyond the reach of many Cambridge folk, despite being the cheapest in the trade. [SCAN OF BILL]

One of those whose cup of coffee I interrupted was Fred Unwin, whose first "Pimbo" book, with its graphic evocation of Cambridge life, was published just 25 years ago, having been previously serialised in the News. It was not however his first published work for while browsing through the old files of the CDN I came across an article dated 16th August 1951 in which he described the joys of being a milkman. WERE YOU A MILKMAN – write to Mike Petty

Fred Unwin has recorded this tribute to his old school in one of his verses, "East Road Ballad"

East Road 'College', past Loker's school-house lane,
Had Kingdom, Baldry, Coleman and Mallett,
To teach emphatically on, how to 'spell it'
May be a future errand boys' domain;
But, worthy lads emerged from such a place,
Going there, was certainly no disgrace!
[SCAN OF 'EAST ROAD COLLEGE 1929]

**

My photograph of the final parade of Soham Grammar School has brought in several responses. Frank Burton, now living in Fen Ditton, attended the school in the 1930s and in his first year travelled by train from Haddenham station, changing at Ely for Soham. Next year the station closed and he went by Ortona open-topped double-decker bus. He has lent a photograph of staff c1934, including Messrs Neil (Head and divinity), Ford (chemistry and geometry), Crouch (history, music & art), Johnson (English and Latin), Hunt (science & biology), Riley (French & scoutmaster) and Britten (maths) [SCAN] [GOODS TRAINS CONTINUED TO RUN FROM HADDENHAM STATION UNTIL 1964 – SCAN]

Trevor Smith from Cambridge was there between 1957 and 1962 and for most of that time boarded with Mr & Mrs Armitage at the Moat House. "There was a timetable for everything from meals to homework and lights out, this timetable was not flexible. There was also time for some recreation and games such as table tennis, darts, cricket and football on the lawn. I also recall the PE period when five-a-side-football would be played early on very cold and frosty mornings and plunging into the frozen puddles on the cross country run heading out towards the Wicken Road". Amongst the teachers he remembers were "Sid" Saunders, "Rat" Taylor, "Taffy" Thomas, Pete

Askem, “Jingo” Waller, “Punch” Lawrence, Lionel Hart & “Tabby” Tabraham, whilst “Charlie” Ford & “Slug” Riley had been there since Frank’s day.

Alan Dench, now at St Ives, was one of the pupils in the Soham School photograph and identifies Mr Tabraham, the deputy head, and Mr Taylor, head of the Lower School, flanking Mr Armitage at the head of the procession. Mrs Joan Pickup from Cherry Hinton saw her son in the parade; he’s now running his own business in Berlin – thanks to Mrs Armitage who persuaded him to study German.

**

Geoffrey Hawes from Waterbeach was a member of the Coleridge Youth Club in June 1946 and went on one of the holidays to Guernsey. He writes : “On arrival at St.Peter’s Port, the first thing that struck me, was that the large main building, probably the port offices had painted on it’s wall in large Gothic script, a word declaring it’s function in German! On leaving St. Peters Port, going on to St. Sampsons where were housed in their local school, we passed many reminders of the "Occupation", a couple of Swastika marked Armoured Cars, doors and gateways, carrying the notice, "Betreten Verboten," and so on. We arrived at the school, where we allocated to various classrooms for dormitories, and slept on the floor. He has a photo taken at the back entrance of St. Sampson's School. The young lady, having her hair washed, was he believes, Peggy, the lad holding her left arm was one of the Norden brothers from Linton, (County School Boys,) and the one on the right, looking on, was known as, "Aitch." The youth looking over his shoulder, was a “Central Schoolboy” [SCAN 63.61] Jean Clinch (nee Oldham), now in Fen Stanton, was also on a trip that stayed at St Sampson’s school – were you? [SCAN OF GUERNSEY GROUP]

**

Many such journeys started from local stations. Many of these have now vanished and others that still survive are remarkably different from what they were only a few years ago. A picture of one such is amongst those featured in a new book of aerial photographs of British railways, then and now. Over 120 stations are featured, from Aberdeen to Portsmouth, but can you recognise this one, shown here in May 1954. Whilst the passenger facilities remain much the same, the goods area to the left of the station has been replaced by industrial and retail facilities, giving a graphic illustration of the decline of the commercial use of the railway over the last 50 years or so. [SCAN] [THE PICTURE IS OF ELY STATION 1954] Aerofilms’ “From the air: Britain’s railways then and now” is published by Ian Allan at £35

Mrs Pearl Reed from Cambridge was interested in the story of Rattee and Kett; her grandfather Robert Woods and his dad, Daniel Woods, were carpenters who worked on the wood carving on the ceiling of Norwich Cathedral in the 1830s.

Mr R.A. Minks of Stapleford recognised himself at the wheel of his Hillman Minx car in a photograph I featured of Burleigh Street taken over 30 years ago. He remembers the number, ULB 144. Presumably the car is now long gone – or is it?

Peter Rolph of 92 Lancaster Rd, St Albans is researching his family history and is particularly interested in a Richard William Rolph born in Fulbourn in September 1865. He went into service as a page, progressed to a footman and finally became a butler. But who did he work for, did he have connections with St Albans or Harpenden, and where is he buried. If you can help contact Peter on 01727 869942

Ros Buffery has solved the mystery of the location of the tennis match in Jeanne Cherry’s photograph that I featured on June 13th. She remembers that the University tennis courts were in Clarkson Road, on the site of the new Mathematics Faculty and the houses in the background stood on Madingley Road. And an even earlier “Memories” – that on 24th September 1999 - has also born fruit. Keith Marfleet from Swindon has been in touch to say that he was one of the people on a photograph of Laurie & McConnal’s staff. So if you have a mystery write to me and one day we may get an answer!

Memories 8th August 2001, by Mike Petty

Cambridge is a city of students of all ages; when one batch go down, another come up. But for two such students the last fortnight have been a case of revisiting the past, both had been here before. They were members of an Elderhostel group, based at Lucy Cavendish College and come with others from across the United States to take part in a series of lectures and excursions comprising a course on 'Cambridge, a sense of belonging'

Margery Tuttle, who'd travelled from Concord, New Hampshire, had once belonged to Newnham College where she arrived as an undergraduate to study science in the mid 1930s. She went back to her old haunts to revive memories of the days she'd had to make up her own coal fire in her room to keep warm in the winter months. She had little time in those days for undergraduate excesses but did regularly borrow a dog for walks to Grantchester and take tea at the Whim in Trinity Street. Margery went down in 1939 when the air raid shelters were being constructed and worked in the American Embassy in London throughout the war. Despite her studies Margery – then Miss M.A. Lowe left without an M.A. degree – for the University of Cambridge did not award them to women students until 1947.

Graham Marsh was a student at Cambridge for just one term, but he studied under Bertrand Russell and other senior academics. He was not at King's or St Catharine's, but the one in between – Bull College. This had been founded in October 1945 for 149 American officers and enlisted men who'd arrived at Cambridge to pursue studies under the U.S. Army's Information and Education Programme, and were billeted at the Bull Hotel, the American Red Cross Headquarters.

But by the time Graham arrived in 1946 with the second batch of Americans – one minute he'd been in Berlin rounding up members of the Hitler Youth, the next he'd been told he was off to Cambridge – the college had moved to Brookland's Avenue & the men based in huts. But when the College moved to its new home, a large part of the British Red Cross Staff went with it & played an outstanding role in making his term a pleasant success. Besides providing them with every facility for study and recreation, their efforts were an important reason for the overwhelming success of social teas, dances, and other entertainment.

Lillian Bourne, who was a Red Cross Hospitality Hostess throughout the war years, acted as liaison between the Americans & the people of Cambridge, organising teas in the homes of University dignitaries such as the noted historian Dr. Trevelyan, and Dr. Sheppard, Provost of King's College. The Bull College mess, the only army mess serving five meals a day, was managed by Edyth Dove, dietician extraordinary from the Bull Hotel. Miss Mary Corke acted as secretary, her advice a never-ending source of help for the students while Audrey Swain, besides having charge of the pay roll, handled nearly every job in the office.

Graham and his companions also organised entertainment for themselves, challenging the locals to a darts competition – and being soundly thrashed, and competing in the rowing races, determined to bump their way to the head of the river. Despite all their practice they were having difficulties making the grade, until they brought in a secret weapon – WAC Sergeant Connie Grayson. The first lady cox on the Cam was an exceptional news story and the principal news agencies and film companies, "Time Magazine", Paramount and Pathe, interviewed and depicted the American crew. Graham was not amongst the rowers but was there to see them make a 'bump' – when they rammed into a college boat that had got itself wedged across the river. No lives were lost and Anglo-American relations were not strained too much.

When the course finished each student was issued with an alumni magazine containing their names and faces. Graham brought his back to Cambridge with him and retraced his footsteps back to the Bull. He was greeted by the Head Porter of St Catharine's, Dom Mulcrone, who opened the door of the old hotel – now part of the college – for the first time in years and invited him inside. It was somewhat different from the wartime days, but it brought back many memories that Graham will take back with him to Tucson, Arizona – the second time he had been made to feel that he ‘belonged’ to Cambridge. [PICTURES TAKEN OF GRAHAM MARSH AT THE BULL BY PHOTOGRAPHIC, SCANS OF PICTURES FROM HIS MAGAZINE, OTHER PIX]

**

It is just 50 years this week that Ely hit the headlines after a Harvard two-seater aeroplane from RAF Feltwell crashed in St Mary’s Street. It first struck the top of a forge owned by Messrs Brand Brothers, then careered across the street, ending up with the engine and forepart of the aircraft in a showroom belonging to Messrs T.W. Nice’s garage & the tail and part of the body in St Mary’s street. One wing of the plane came off and overturned a car, the other ploughed into the middle of the road. The aircraft’s crew were extricated from the wreckage, but one died later at the R.A.F. Hospital. As it crashed the plane hit a lorry owned by Darby’s Sand and Gravel, hurling its cab into the garage showroom and the crushing the driver under the engine. [SCAN OF ELY AIRPLANE CRASH]

Today giant American jets fly over the City as they make their approaches into Mildenhall. If the crew glance downwards they see beneath them the Ely station complex, much smaller today than when it was photographed in May 1954, for this was the station I featured last week from the Aerofilm’s book, ‘British Railways, then and now’.

Many memories have come in of the celebrated Van on the Senate House Roof incident, and I will feature these next week; but Gill Wordingham has contacted me to point out that her father - the then Mayor of Cambridge – was Leonard (not Christopher) Wordingham. Len was a railwayman who was granted special leave to enable him to carry out his mayoral duties, following in the footsteps of other highly respected railwaymen, Tom Amey and W.L. Briggs & like them he was elected an Alderman. He became a Director of Cambridge City Football Club – for whom he’d played in his younger days, and a Justice of the Peace; Mr Joshua Taylor, chairman of the Bench paid tribute to his memory when he died in August 1969.

More memories of Morley’s Knitwear have come in from Margaret Adams of Caldecote who worked there between 1954 and 1958. She has lent me a photograph of the firm’s Christmas lunch of 1957 and can identify the manager, Mr Holmes, (back right), Mr Shirley his assistant (back left) while Beryl and Molly worked in the office and the man in the front was Harold, the caretaker. [SCAN OF GROUP]

Pamela Noakes writes from Tioga Trail, Parker, Colorado, USA: “My brother recently sent me the article on the Waffles Café. I remember if being above one of the shops along Petty Cury and frequented it often between 1955 and 1963. I also remember the Eros café a little further along. Opposite these shops was a passage where the Lion Yard shops are now; just along on the left had side was a Chinese restaurant called the Hang Chow. There was a fish market called McFisheries, they had a fish tank in the middle of the shop which was built into the floor, as far as I can remember. I am sure you have received many other pieces of information but apart from a yearly visit home I now reside in the USA and it has given me a warm feeling of fond memories to tell you my ‘remembrances’”

Stephen Hullyer is researching Cambridge during the 1970s and would like pictures showing the Lion Yard area at that time. Do you have snaps that can help him –if so send them to me and I’ll copy them and pass them on.

Alan Gall, a member of the History of Physics group of the Institute of Physics, seeks your help. He is trying to find information about Felix Niedergasass, a glass-blower who moved down from Manchester in the 1920s and was employed by Ernest Rutherford, the nuclear scientist, at the Cavendish Laboratory, Cambridge. If you can help contact Alan at 16 Hawthorn Road, Bamford, Rochdale, OL11 5JD.

Memories 15th August 2001, by Mike Petty

A few weeks ago – in Memories for July 25th – I featured the story of the Austin 7 van that was hoisted to the roof of the Cambridge University Senate House in June 1958. Could anybody add further details, I wondered. The response came from Nigel Balchin who E-mailed to say he'd been one of the main perpetrators and that the full story, first published in the Caius College Magazine some eighteen months after the event, is now featured on the College's website (cai.cam.ac.uk). The article names the men – and women involved - and solves many of the mysteries.

So where did they get the vehicle? Old Austin Sevens were then so popular in Cambridge that even a wreck was unobtainable from the local scrap yards, but eventually they found an engineless black van, axle deep in a nettled at Harston. They brought it for £4.10s. on condition that the back axle, good tyres, and other vitals were returned. It was towed into an overgrown farmyard at Coton where preparations were made.

Every internal component was stripped out, consistent with it remaining steerable, a square hole was cut in the roof to pass the lifting tackle, and a lifting eye firmly fixed to the chassis. The back axle was loosened so that it could be dropped off on the road and returned to the owner as soon as the van had been towed into Cambridge. Special fittings were attached so it could be trundled on front wheels only, like a wheelbarrow, from its parking place to the launch point.

But how could the lightened van, whose axles were only held on with fence wire and finger-tight pins, and which looked more like a stage prop than a road worthy vehicle, be towed in without attracting police attention? Nigel had the idea of disguising the tow-in as publicity for a May Ball; enormous coloured posters were prepared and festooned around the skeleton van. Then after lunch on the Saturday the bizarre procession set off from Coton for the centre of Cambridge. It attracted much attention, but its innocence went unquestioned. Another member of the team had earlier parked his car on Queen's Road to reserve a parking space & on arrival the van was surrounded by mechanics who propped up the back end and removed the rear axle, driving seat and four good wheels for return to the owner. They fitted two ancient and useless tyres in front, and the doors and two rear wheels were removed, wrapped in brown paper and taken into College disguised as pictures and cushions. The remaining bits of the van were covered with a billowing polythene cloak, equipped with the statutory parking light, and abandoned.

Meanwhile plans laid so that whenever an alarm was given there would be somewhere to hide. The warning was to be given by a lookout starting a Vespa scooter by Great St. Mary's Church - the racket would be audible to everyone concerned. Various distractions were arranged, a large Bentley jammed by revellers on Garret Hostel Bridge and an elaborate system of decoys employed to divert both police and proctors, including students without gowns and a couple apparently fighting over a girl.

Then it was time to start. A plank was laid from Caius college to the Senate House roof and a small party scrambled across taking various detached bits of the van across, before raising the drawbridge after them. They built and erected the necessary derrick and rigging using scaffolding poles and prepared to hoist the chassis. The operation to raise the van was trickier than they had expected, and then when it was in mid air it was spotted by a party of inebriated undergraduate oarsmen. Nigel informed them that he was tethering a captive balloon, but that rides could not be given without Ministry approval. Satisfied, the drunks moved on. Finally the van was across but at the last moment it fell backwards the last five feet on to the roof. Working like madmen the party manhandled the van by brute force up the thirty-degree slope to the apex, refitted the doors and wheels, dismantled the derrick and threw the rigging down to the lawns below.

By now it was light and as they walked back across the plank to Caius an early morning policeman patrolled his beat past Bowes and Bowes. But he failed to spot them and his gaze did not wander to a black tattered pre-war Austin Seven van placed neatly on the apex of the lead roof of the Senate House.

The event made headlines around the world as pressmen gathered to witness the operation to remove the vehicle. Patrick Mills from Cambridge was there, but for a different reason. "My future wife and I were having our banns called for the first time at Parish Communion at Great St Mary's, so my wife's father, Tom Green, then University Marshall, came to church that morning. This was his first 'free' Sunday as during Full Term he had to have an early lunch before going to the Senate House to organise the procession to Gt St Mary's for the University sermon. But immediately after Communion he had to go home and change, then return to organise the removal of the car. The Rev Mervyn Stockwood wasted no time in arranging an unprecedented Sunday opening of the tower for special viewing of the operation – and further income for the church!"

Business was brisk as visitor paid their 6d. to ascend the Tower to see the spectacle. Patrick Schicker of Milton Road, Cambridge, was one of those who saw the activity: "Early in the evening we were filmed watching the efforts to bring the car down and a haughty Civil Defence lady told us to be sure to get home by 10pm to see ourselves on the news. But at 10.30 pm the film crew were still there waiting the descent of the van, and soon after the Civil Defence called it a day!" The next morning oxyacetylene cutting equipment was raised to the roof, and a few spectators saw the fiery end of the story, as the van was dissected into six pieces, lowered, and driven away as an inglorious pile of scrap. [SCAN OF ARTICLE SHOWING VAN ON ROOF, REUSE PICS FROM JULY 25TH ARTICLE]

Then, a few years later something similar happened again, as Ray Walker related in the Cambridge Austin 7 and Vintage Car Club newsletter in November 1983 which has been sent in by his widow, Mary.

"One day in June 1963 five or six students came to my garage and were looking at the Austin 7's in the yard. At that time there could have been between 12 and 15 - some customers' cars, some my own. Although they could have bought a runner for about £15 or £20 their focus was on an extremely rough box saloon without an engine or gearbox, the radiator and bonnet having been put back on for preservation. I had given £2 for it and sold the engine for £5 for a speedboat. Thinking they really wanted something to run I pointed out the deficiencies and explained that a lot of work would be involved in getting it running.

'Oh, that's alright' said one, 'we don't need an engine or anything like that, it doesn't need to run. How much do you want for it?' With the Senate House incident in mind I said quite sharply: 'Look, this isn't for some stupid prank is it? Because if it is I am having no part in it'. Looking extremely crestfallen they turned towards the gate to go, their hopes obviously dashed to the ground by an irate garage owner. As they reached the gate I called 'Hey! just a moment. I do not want anything for the Austin Seven and if I come in tomorrow morning and find it gone you will hear no more'

Sure enough, in the morning it had vanished. I did not see the students again and did not know the fate of the car until there was published in the Cambridge Daily News a picture showing it suspended beneath the Bridge of Sighs. The feat was accomplished by poling the car down the river on a platform supported on a number of punts lashed together. Wire ropes were passed through the window of the bridge and the windows of the car and tightened up, then the raft was floated out from underneath. The College authorities had no great problems in removing it. They borrowed one of the floating platforms from a nearby punt hire firm and used that to bring the car back to dry land. [SCANS OF THE CAR UNDER BRIDGE OF SIGHS]

A similar stunt was repeated in November 1968 but this time a Bond Minicar was used. In this case a couple of scaffold pole "trapezes" were slung under the bridge and the car lifted up bodily from its raft onto these, relatively easy with such a small and light vehicle. The job was carried out between 2.30 and 4.45 in the morning. The College were once again on the ball and the car was spirited away in the same manner almost before anyone had a chance to see it."

Ron Frost from Cherry Hinton has seen more student pranks than most including a Ford Escort suspended under the bridge of Clare College, where he worked from 1960 till he retired twelve years ago. He writes: "I've seen banners flying from King's college pinnacles, trees covered with toilet rolls and shop dummies beside the clock of the Lloyd's bank in Sidney Street. In Clare the weather vane was taken down at least four times and the Old Court was decorated with Christmas trees before the end of term".

In 1951 the Leys School's Clapham Society published a survey they'd undertaken of the small village of Horningsea. First they researched its history, then they looked at the community as it then was. Their findings make interesting reading. The village comprised some 85 houses, only 36 of which had mains water, the rest depended on wells and pumps. Only three had main drainage, the rest relied on cesspools. 58 homes had connections to the electricity system, but two generated their own and 25 homes were without, relying on oil and paraffin for both lighting and cooking. Even those who had electric light did not generally cook with electric, preferring an open hearth or oil stove. There were very few unemployed or retired people and most of the work was done in and around the village. So what did the people do? Of the 93 men surveyed 46 worked in agriculture, the majority as farm workers. Two were employed as butchers with one each of grocer, furniture man and fishmonger in the village services whilst others were categorised as craftsmen – boot repairer, carpenter, potter, blacksmith's mate or builders. Of those 17 men who found employment outside the village two worked at Bottisham Village College, five on the railways, three were in the Forces and the rest a mixture of pest control, brewery worker, telegraph installer and one mathematician. Nor did Horningsea add greatly to the Cambridge rush-hour traffic, for only nine used their car for work, three went by motorbike, one each by bus, lorry and horse – but 24 cycled to their job. By now, presumably, things have changed but the survey is not out-of-date, instead it remains a valuable picture of a community as it was at the start of the 1950s. [SCAN OF COTTAGES FROM THE LEYS SCHOOL SURVEY / PICTURE OF HORNINGSEA FROM NEWS FILE]

Another old survey has just been reissued with a glossy colour photograph on the cover. Arthur Mee's "Cambridgeshire" was originally trumpeted as "the most complete picture of a county ever present to the public" when it came out in 1939. It records that Chivers jam factory employs 2,000 people making a hundred tons of jam a day, that at Prickwillow rhubarb and cabbages grow around the church, and at Papworth Everard the traveller is struck by the number of chalets in a tree-shaded row – the open-air bedrooms for patients arriving at the tuberculosis hospital. We learn that Lt Thetford is a tiny hamlet near Grunty Fen and has little to see "except a few thatched cottages and a little lowly church with a roof like a mantle of moss". But a fuller survey would have revealed an impoverished agricultural community, with cows driven through the streets; indeed it was said that that if you lived there you lived down Cow-Sh*t Lane. Now the village has become gentrified and the small community doubled in size with a new housing estate approached via a new access road named – ironically – Cow-Slip Lane! The guide was illustrated with photographs which generally show unchanging aspects of unchanged buildings, though there is the odd gem, such as Stretham windmill which then had sails. But the quality of the modern reproduction does not match the original 1939 edition, copies of which can readily be found in antiquarian bookshops.[SCAN OF STRETHAM WINDMILL FROM THE 1939 EDITION OF THE GUIDE] - “Cambridgeshire, the country of the fens”, by Arthur Mee; republished by The King’s England Press £17.95

Betty Anderson, (nee Fiske) was the ‘Diana Dors’ lookalike featured in the Central Youth Club outing to Guernsey and has a picture of all the youngsters who went. She now lives out at Linton but finds that when she visits Cambridge she never sees any of her old friends or acquaintances – perhaps she would at the Age Concern drop-in café, Parson’s Court. Betty now wears glasses and has her hair much shorter but if you do spot her, say hello.

Mrs J. Clements of Campkin Road, Cambridge was a former pupil of; she started her school life at East Road school when just three years old, before the Infants department moved to Norfolk Street. At the age of 11 she went back to the old site, then known as St George’s Senior School where she was given an good education thanks to the excellent teachers– even though in her final year there were 53 pupils in her class due to the evacuees.

Memories 22nd August 2001, by Mike Petty

When Jack Diver from Histon phoned me the first thing I did was to check the date – it must surely be April 1st!

For he had memories of two people wrapped in sacking – mother and son, he thought - who appeared with a pile of parcels, and moved them one by one, along the road from Cambridge to Histon. They slept in the parcels at night and were supplied by food by a car. Then one night a lorry turned up and they vanished. He thought it was in the 1970s.

So it was with little hope that I asked the staff at the News office library. “Oh yes”, said Linda, “I think we’ve got a file on them”. And she had.

The mystery couple first hit the local headlines in February 1966 when they were spotted resting by a hedge at Little Paxton, near St Neots. But by then they had been on the road for three years, having been dogged every step of the way by reporters and television interviewers. “It all began with the simple wish of a pair of Southerners to see the North. It has become a complicated one, but also a very ordinary one” they told the News. They had plodded along the Great North Road with a pile of parcels, carrying part of their one-ton load about 100 yards down the road, then returning for another batch. It was a laborious way to see the world and they made less than a quarter of a mile progress in one day.

Neither of the travellers would give their names. The woman was aged about 50 and spoke in a cultured voice: “We are not really unconventional people. There is nothing we like better than the comforts of home, an easy armchair with a book, or visits to libraries and art galleries”, she explained, as she crouched amongst the disorderly pile of parcels and poured over a road map. Her companion said little but nodded assent as his companion described the hardships of the journey. “The weather is frightening sometimes”, she went on. “I remember one day walking along a frosty road which had been sprayed with salt. The salt caked to our feet and the pain was terrible”

It took them some four months to get from St Neots to Cambridge, only to find the police waiting for them. They were welcome to enter the city – but they would have to leave their bulky baggage behind. Halted in their tracks the couple abandoned their parcels and accepted a lift back to Caxton in a van – which then returned for the mysterious load. They were later spotted at Fenstanton in August 1966.

Their massive trek came to an end at Histon in Spring next year. Police swooped to impound the parcels following complaints from residents. A police truck made several trips to collect the mysterious packages – found to contain a miscellaneous assortment of old rags and cardboard – which were stored under plastic sheets in the police station yard. Their owners were seen wandering around near the Rose and Crown pub, the woman on the point of tears: “What is there to do. We have lost everything. They have just gone. But really it is not important. We can start again”, she sobbed. They then disappeared into the night but were spotted by a News reader walking towards Holbeach, some 60 miles away; they carried a woollen blanket – but no parcels.

As the police produced their case for submission to court a local councillor rallied to the travellers’ support. “I love these people. They have guts and character. It seems extraordinary that they could find themselves being arrested as a result of being what they are, parcel people who have opted out of our so-called civilised rat-race” he said. The police said the charge was depositing litter and causing obstruction with their parcels at Histon.

They parcel pair failed to appear at the Magistrates’ court in May 1967, but police dropped the charges. They were left with a problem – what to do with their possessions. The magistrate remarked: “To me it is worthless, but it might be of some worth to the owners”.

And there the trail goes cold. There was some speculation it was all a stunt, that there would be a book at the end of it. But if you know more, let me know. [PHOTOS OF THE PARCEL PEOPLE FROM NEWS FILES]

**

In those days the railways provided a more effective way of transporting parcels. Derek Harris from Histon sent his memories of Ely station goods yard:

“This was an important assembly point for traffic generated from the outlying fens and staff manned the yard continuously, working on three shifts. The goods yard for loading and discharge of produce by local traders was between the Goods Sheds and the Station building with an entrance on Station Road. Traffic generated here was picked up by freight trains booked to call at Ely. Local trains departed to Newmarket, Shippea Hill, Littleport, & Downham Market for agricultural traffic and to Brandon for wagons of pit props for the coal mines. We also had our own trains to Cambridge and Whitemoor yards.

“The Goods Department had their own quarters in Station Road, beyond which were two long Goods Sheds. The work handled here was the distribution of the town goods by horse and cart, a large hand cart and later on by a Scammel motor truck. Every day, at the appointed time, the Ely Yard pilot engine and shunters went, 'down the hole' - to the Goods Sheds - to place empties and bring the loaded up into the yard. During the war period, two trains of loaded vans were sent up to Ely on Saturday to be 'transhipped' on the Sunday morning; vans were loaded at Depots with goods for any number of destinations - in railway terms 'rough-loaded'. Work commenced then to shift commodities around with hand barrows and trucks, working from the long wooden platform of the shed. Each shed could hold two trains each placed on either end of a central platform.

“The busiest period was autumn when the Sugar Beet Factory at Adelaide opened for the Campaign. This embraced the transport of sugar beet and its product of sugar, molasses and pulp, well known to farmers as animal feed. Dried pulp, known as pulp nuts, was bagged and sent away in covered vans, the wet pulp dispatched in open trucks. To 'feed' the factory, coal from the mines came on a regular basis on local trains from Whitemoor yard to Ely and 'tripped' to the North Junction. During the campaign, a BR pilot engine and a foreman shunter, transferred the loaded and empty vehicles to & from the factory private sidings. The BR locomotive was not permitted into these sidings beyond a certain 'limit of shunt' notice. The beet factory employed two industrial steam loco's with a foreman and shunter to finally place the coal and return the empties to BR."

All has now gone, and the Sugar Beet Factory no longer sends its distinctive smell across the fens, nor provides the well-paid seasonal employment it used to. Did you work there? [SCAN OF ELY GOODS YARD]

**

Railways are part of the agenda for the Cambridge Conference of the Association for Industrial Archaeology which has attracted enthusiasts from all around the country. But does Cambridgeshire have anything industrial for them to see? Yes indeed as a new guide points out. Nigel Balchin and Peter Filby have identified wind and watermills, pumping stations and coprolite pits, chemical manure works and steelyard amongst a wealth of sites. Nor are they merely relics of the past, for the giant straw-burning power station at Sutton is very new technology while some of the oldest forms of production, hand made bricks and tiles are produced at Burwell. "A guide to the industrial archaeology of Cambridgeshire and Peterborough" ISBN 0 9528930 4 5 [IF NECESSARY USE WINDMILL PICTURES FROM NEWS PHOTO FILES – I WILL POP IN ON TUESDAY MORNING]

**

Recent Memories features have encouraged readers to write. G.A Cooper from Cambridge says he actually took the picture I showed of the Youth Club outing to Guernsey in 1946 (Memories 1st August) on an old Agfa plate camera his father lent him – and has still got the negative. He can identify most of the people, including Peggy Bailey whose hair was being washed. John Norden of the County school was holding her left arm, while Peter Bond watches from the steps behind the girl in the foreground. "Aitch" on the right is yet another County classmate, Cyril Harding, while the face peering between Geoff Hawes and John Norden might belong to Mo Summerfield. He adds: "The return voyage was made in daylight and the sea was very rough. As I think about it now I can still see Peggy's face go a horrible yellow/green as sea sickness overcame her". As tangible reminders of the visit he has two copies of the 'Guernsey Star' printed during the occupation period and a German army gasmask, complete in its steel case, that he liberated from a concrete pillbox on the island. [REPEAT THE PICTURE USED ON 1ST AUGUST]

Mrs P. Lucas from Gt Shelford spotted her father on another "boat" – the one being used to recover the Austin 7 car from the Bridge of Sighs (Memories 15th August). He was Bill Gentle, a motor trimmer who had a workshop on Quayside, and was well known in the area. His workshop was also called "Gentle's Mission" because of all the people who called on him to have a smoke or cup of tea, or just a warm by his tortoise stove that stood in the middle of his workshop.

Somebody providing refreshment to Americans in wartime was Mrs W. Abbs of Cambridge who writes of her experiences. "I worked at the Bull Hotel donut dugout which was above Marks and Spencers in Hobson Street. Then I went to the Brooklands Avenue. I am in the small snap of workers, six from left, back row (Memories 8th August). I would be interested to know if any of the group are still around. I worked with Miss Dove, Audrey and Mary. It brought back many happy memories"

Valerie Doty, from Cambridge, was born at Staffordshire Street and wonders whether anybody has any old snaps of the area. One from the Cambridgeshire Collection appears on the Cambridge Explorer CD-Rom; it was taken in the 1920s. Do you have any others? [SCAN OF MAN OUTSIDE TERRACE HOUSE]

Memories 29th August 2001, by Mike Petty

Mrs Vera Pope now lives way down in south Devon but it only took five days before she had received a “Memories” article about East Road. Straightaway she sat down to pen her own recollections of that part of Cambridge where she was born over 90 years ago.

As her memories gush out Vera writes them down: “I was born at number 61 East Road in 1909. Just opposite across the road was Nelson Street where my grandfather preached in the ‘Mission’ & my grandmother gave mugs of tea and a sticky bun to all the drunks who came in.

“We went to Brunswick School, near Chesterton ferry [now Elizabeth Bridge]. Every morning Jimmy Fletcher brought the milk in a gallon can, then walked my sister and I across the road, down Nelson Street into Gwydir Street where his parents had a shop. There were thirteen children and each took a can of milk for delivery before going to the Council School on East Road, near Donkeys Common.

“Easter Monday everyone flocked to Parker’s Piece, if you had a large skipping rope you were more than welcome. [Do you remember the tradition of skipping on Parker’s Piece?] I remember Brunswick School we took two pence every Monday to pay for our books. Across the road there was a theatre next to a slaughterhouse. It was terrifying Monday mornings; pigs were being slaughtered, little dwarfs ran out of the theatre & we couldn’t get inside the high school gates quick enough. [The theatre was the Hippodrome, later known as the Gaiety, in Auckland Road. It had started life as a permanent indoor Circus about 1895]

“Strangely enough my sister married the milk boy in later life, his sister married a young man named Brown whose parents kept a tiny cycle shop in Burleigh Street opposite the Methodist Church

“I remember boat race night, when the winning boats were set alight on the Market Square [does anybody have more memories or snaps of this] and Saturday morning markets when my grandmother bought a bag of ‘tacky’ oranges from ‘Buller’ Whitehead and made them into wine. In your photograph of East Road on the left hand side is a cottage where every Friday evening we would take a basin and buy two penn’orth of mushy peas with vinegar.” [PHOTO OF EAST ROAD IN 1963 AND OF DOGETT’S HORSE-DRAWN MILK CART]

Another News article, this one by Natasha McDowell on Cambridge during the Great War, has brought a response from Ray Lawton of Cottenham. His father, John Lawton, went to Magdalene college as an Officer Cadet in January 1917 for three months’ training. Whilst there he penned letters home which give vivid details of his experiences; these have now been printed along with other correspondence between 1915 and 1919 under the title “A soldier writes home – John Lawton’s wartime letters”

Back in 1917 he wrote:

“There are four companies in our battalion which is the Garrison Officer Cadet Battalion. Our College is a magnificent old pile with many fine traditions. The Cadets here are collected from all parts of the United Kingdom & from nearly every regiment in the British Army. The majority of them are N.C.O.’s, but some of them belong to the R.A.M.C., & do not know much drill. They are all very nice & ‘pukah’ gentlemen. . We are treated as officers all the way through & are to behave ourselves generally as ‘cadets & gentlemen’. We have to provide ourselves with cadet uniform. However the usual procedure is to buy better cloth & to have it made into officers uniform so that it will be ready for us when we get gazetted otherwise we shall have to discard the ordinary cadet uniform in a few months time & that would be a waste of money. We are allowed £8 [EIGHT POUNDS] for this outfit & what we have extra we pay for ourselves. We are recompensed for this extra cost afterwards by the other £42 [42 POUNDS] we receive when our commission is granted. We are all practically certain of getting our commission: in the last two classes only one chap failed to pass the final exam, and even he got his commission". [Given the slaughter in the trenches officers were badly needed at the front]

Their daily routine started with roll call at 7.30 am and progressed through physical training, drill, map reading, engineering and trench digging lectures till bed at 10.15 pm. In all this they were mixing with the few students in the college & every evening they dined in the big Hall with the Dons. "The table is covered thick with plate emblazoned with the college arms & is lighted by innumerable red-shaded candles. The chief says Grace in Latin & then all that one can hear is the tinkle of silver & the subdued murmur of conversation". It was a memory that was to last, for John Lawton survived the war, trained as a teacher and obtained his first headship at Dry Drayton school in 1927. ['PUNCH' CARTOON OF OFFICER CADETS IN CAMBRIDGE COLLEGE]

Long-distance correspondent, Peter Johnson from Moreton in Marsh, has discovered some unprinted glass negatives taken by Agnes Johnson in Cambridge about 1914. One of these shows horses being watered in the Cam at Jesus Green, when Cambridge became the gathering place for hundreds of troops before being despatched to the front. [SCAN OF PICTURE OF HORSES IN CAM FROM HER ORIGINAL NEGATIVE; SCAN OF PHOTOGRAPH OF TROOPS ON JESUS GREEN – NOT TAKEN BY HER].

Peter's father's memories, that I have featured from time to time, have now been published in expanded form in the latest issue of the Cambridgeshire Local History Society Review. Other articles include a survey of clay tobacco pipes and their makers (about the only 'interesting' things I ever find in the garden), the famous Manea community of the 1830s which abolished money and installed centrally-heated houses and some most interesting notes on the early days of the Cambridgeshire police force. The Review is free to members of the society (annual subscription £8) or obtainable from the Secretary, Gill Rushworth, at 1a Archer's Close, Swaffham Bulbeck, CB5 0NG at £2.50 including postage.

Mrs Patricia Peterson from Histon Road, Cambridge has written seeking your help. "Do you happen to have – or know how I can get – a photograph of the American Service Organisation and the Donut shop next door in Hobson Street, Cambridge in the 1940s. I was a guest at this club several times. Also we used to go to the Eros Restaurant in Petty Cury, do you have photos of this". If you can help let me know. [PICTURE OF HOBSON STREET IN THE 1960S FROM NEWS FILES]

All of this is a long time ago; meanwhile Stephen Hullyer, who is continuing his researches on the Lion Yard area in the 1970s has two questions about car parks: When were the Queen Anne Terrace & Lion Yard and multi-storey car parks started and finished?

According to notes I have plans for the Queen Anne Terrace project were approved in 1968 and the car park opened in 1971; meanwhile work started on the Lion Yard car park on 28th December 1970 and Mayor Peter Wright opened the first section in July 1972. But since then there have been further additions and extensions, and now there are plans to knock it all down and start again – so no wonder it is taking some researching. If you can help contact him at stephen.hullyer@ntlworld.com

While the new car parks were being constructed an old car park was closed. Pictures in the News files show Market Hill packed with cars, vans and lorries in July 1964, with the stalls just around the outside. All that changed five years later, in 1969, when traffic was banned. But shoppers could still take a bus into the city centre, though as another picture dated September 1965 shows, these could be held up by traffic obstructions in Market Street.
[SCANS OF MARKET HILL CARS AND BUSES]

To Christine Corby of Newmarket Road, Cambridge, Market Street meant Eaden Lilleys and she has committed her memories of that famous shop to verse

Down memory lane I do recall
The department store that had it all
Eaden Lilleys was one of these
They sold everything you would need
Their aim was always the customer to please
From ribbons, cottons, needles and pins
Beautiful brooches and diamond rings.
Perfumes to greet you as you walk through the door,
A wonderful feeling as you walk through the store.
The lingerie department, with floaty frills and lace,
Would put a happy smile on any lady's face.
Never will we see the likes again
As a bookstore now resides in this domain
Now it's just a memory
Of one of the grand stores that use to be....

Eaden Lilleys

[PICTURES OF EADEN LILLEY IN NEWS LIBRARY]

Memories 5th September 2001, by Mike Petty

Last weekend it was Wilburton church's turn to hold its festival of flowers and painting, like so many other communities, in their bid to raise money to maintain their church.

Many hours of organising, planning, picture-hanging, flower arranging, baking and effort came to fruition when the doors opened to visitors on Saturday morning, being preceded by a successful musical launch the evening before.

Having been given the opportunity to contribute a stand I watched as villagers and visitors came in, in their ones and twos; first scanning the paintings, anxious to have the first chance of acquiring their own mini masterpiece; then slowing down to appreciate the floral displays, and finally glancing through photographs to see faces from the not-so-distant past that they recognised.

But there were times when the church was almost empty, save for the stewards and those whose particular talents lay not in artwork or floristry, but in music. And the most magical moment of the weekend came whilst the church was silent, save for the sound of a harp and the crystal voice of two ladies in the chancel, singing an old English folk song. Shafts of sunlight streamed through the windows, illuminating them – and the blond toddler, sitting on the chancel step, captivate by the sound.

Later I peered into the church vestry where, in dusty frames, hung photographs of past ministers, some now fading into obscurity. What would they have made of the previous night's jazz in the nave, or the angelic voices? [PIX OF WILBURTON FROM LIBRARY FILES]

The life of one Victorian village vicar has been explored in a new book from Sawston. Edwin Daniel was appointed in 1836 to a parish many of whose residents were very poor, working-class and new to the village, having been attracted by its industrial developments, but whose Lord of the Manor was a staunch Roman Catholic – views Daniel opposed. The new vicar had a growing family but inherited a small vicarage. He resolved to build himself a house which would also serve as the base for a private Classical Academy to supplement his income.

Whilst his school flourished, his family did not; two of his sons died, one whilst an apprentice to the House Surgeon at Addenbrooke's Hospital. Then one of his daughters eloped with Thomas Sutton Evans, the son of the tannery owner.

When Edwin died in 1855 he was succeeded as vicar by his son, Edwin Swann Daniel. But he soon found himself at odds with his brother-in-law, T.S. Evans, an arrogant, argumentative and vindictive man who quarrelled with many of the village tradesmen, and became known as the tyrant of Sawston. They battled for some 22 years before Edwin was forced from his house, resign his living and eventually died a pauper and lunatic at Fulbourn Asylum.

All this and more is examined by Jane Lane in her book, 'A Cambridgeshire Vicar' which is available at Sawston Book Shop and the SPCK, King's Parade, Cambridge, at £14.99 [PHOTOS OF SAWSTON]

Another book new to the shops comprises reflections from a Cambridge drawing-room, by Louis T. Stanley, a remarkable man whose career included the role of industrialist and economist with that of chairman of BRM motor racing team. Over dozens of dinner-parities at his Trumpington home Stanley has entertained a host of eminent personalities, from legends of stage and screen to statesmen, saints and heretics. He was a friend of Donald Campbell, whose body was recently recovered from the waters of Coniston Water years after his speedboat, Bluebird, had flipped over during his quest for the water-speed record. "He telephoned me very early to say he was about to make the official run. Sleepily I asked had the course been swept. 'As much as possible. It was imperative that a new record could be announced at the opening of the Boat Show later that morning. The odds against hitting floating debris would be 1000-to-1'. Sadly that bet was lost".

Louis Stanley's main sporting interests lay in motor racing with the BRM team, and he numbered amongst his drivers Juan Manuel Fangio, Mike Hawthorn, Graham Hill, Niki Lauda and Jackie Stewart who said of him; "Louis Stanley undertakes many tasks, some of which seem impossible. The duties he undertakes would fill the lifetime of lesser men". His recollections of people he has known reads fill some 240 pages of his latest book, "Vignettes and Memories" (Robson Books, £16.95) [SCAN OF DONALD CAMPBELL, PHOTO OF LOUIS STANLEY WITH JACKIE STEWART]

Top footballer, in Stanley's opinion, is Stanley Matthews. Cambridge United's fans may disagree. Some might nominate names such as Roy Ruffett who was captain when United won their first victory over Cambridge City in a competitive match in 1952, goalie Rodney Slack, voted player of the season three times at the Abbey in the 1960s, or Phil Chapple who led the team to victory at Wembley in 1990. That was in the playoffs for promotion from the Third Division and saw the team accorded a heroes' welcome at the Guildhall. These and many more are featured in a new pictorial history of Cambridge United which draws heavily on the News' photographic files, as Brian Attmore and Graham Nurse combine to cover the club's story from 1912 to the present day, together with a glimpse into the future with a new all-seater stadium in the offing. Images of Sport: Cambridge United Football Club is published by Tempus at £10.99 [SCAN OF AN EVENT AT THE GROUND IN THE EARLY 1950S; PHOTO OF THE TEAM'S ARRIVAL AT THE GUILDHALL AFTER THEIR WEMBLEY APPEARANCE]

Julie Wilson from Chesterton seeks your help in identifying an old photograph of a group of gentlemen preparing to enjoy a river trip. It was taken by Ralph Starr who opened his first photographic studio in Mill Road in 1888, moving one year later to Fitzroy Street. It was followed with another branch at Ely in 1900 and a third in Regent Street as he developed into one of Cambridge's most eminent photographers and went into partnership with a Mr Rignall. Some of the excursionists are wearing medals and one carries an accordion. Perhaps the most important are those guarding the crates of beer. They may have had something to do with the sewage pumping station at Cheddars Lane. Any ideas? [SCAN OF MYSTERY PIC]

The pictures of the Parcel People have prompted memories for Margaret Twigden who has e-mailed:

I was in my late teens and lived in Swavesey and well remember being taken to "see" them when they were somewhere in the vicinity of the American Cemetery. I assume that from Fenstanton, they made their way via Fen Drayton and then to Swavesey. It was so exciting, they spent almost a week outside our house in School Lane. Everybody was fascinated by these two mysterious people. It was assumed that they were mother and son (I think she was older than 50), she was very well spoken and said a lot more than he did. I spent a lot of time talking to them, they were very nice people, even though they were a bit smelly and dirty!! I asked them if they were mother and son, she replied "We are of the clan" !!! People used to say that they were wealthy and there was a rumour that every so often a limousine would appear and whisk them off into the night (leaving behind the parcels) and then they would re-appear the next morning.

They were always coming round asking for drink and food. I remember my Dad being quite annoyed about them, but I used to sneak stuff out whenever I could. From Swavesey they made their way through the villages until they ended up in Histon, which as you say is where it all came to an end.

Rodney Dale from Haddenham has more thoughts: I compiled the first-ever collection of what are now called Urban Myths (but were then called Whale-Tumour Stories) which was published in 1978. Therein I recorded:

"The Parcels People approached from the north via Willingham, Rampton, Cottenham and towards Histon. They had piles and piles of parcels, which seemed ever to grow, kept dry under sheets of plastic. There were tales of a large car (Bentley or Rolls) visiting in the dead of night with nourishment. According to a letter to the Observer 13 February 1977 'the story was told that they went into a fish and chip café near Stamford and proffered a cheque in payment, which the owner refused to accept. The Parcels People then told the café owner to ring a certain number in London, which he did, and the voice at the other end told the owner that the cheque would be honoured as the people concerned were very wealthy' [REPRISE PARCEL PEOPLE PIC]

Memories 12th September 2001, by Mike Petty

Haddenham steam engine rally was held last weekend. Amongst those flocking to the scene was Gerald Bailey from Wicken, as he has for many years. But in conversation on Friday Gerald turned his mind back to the days when the machines he drove were modern, powerful – and essential for the country's survival.

When the Second World War broke out Gerald was called up, but pronounced unfit for military service. He returned to the Wicken farm where he worked as a tractor driver, knowing that he would be unpopular – for if he did not go then one of the other four farmhands would be sent instead. So Gerald resigned his job. He applied to the War Agricultural Executive Committee for work and was offered employment in Leicester – a skilled tractor-man like him was badly needed to train others. But why work away, when there was work nearby?

With the country in desperate need of all the food it could grow the Government had introduced measures to requisition land that was not being farmed to its full potential – such as water-logged fenland that was impossible to cultivate without machinery beyond the reach of farmers who had been struggling just to survive throughout the depression of the 'thirties. Some of that land was in Burwell Fen, just over the Cock-up Bridge from Wicken and adjacent to Priory Farm, whose story has been told by Alan Bloom in his book, 'The Farm in the Fen', published in 1944.

Gerald worked with his caterpillar tractor clearing bushes and scrub, dragging out the giant bog oaks that were a constant problem as deep ploughs carved through land never cultivated before. He has memories of the Land Army girls, based at Swaffham Prior, who would be brought to work in the fen, and while away the cold, wet days when work was impossible by singing in the barn. He also recalls the day when a taxi was seen bumping its way down the rutted road; it drew to a halt and out stepped two smartly-dressed men in plus-fours and polished shoes who asked the driver to return for them at four in the afternoon. They walked across to the farmworker who seemed to be in charge and asked what he would like them to do – they had been sent to play their part in the war effort. They were not dressed for hard, dirty work, but they were given dirty work to do, spreading black fen soil. Come dokey-time and they had no sandwiches, but produced instead a small box from which each took two pills – vitamins, they said. When the taxi came again at the end of the day they departed in a cloud of dust, to return next day. It took little detective work to realise that these men were conscientious objectors, fighting the war on the farm front, rather than in the front line.

There were other less-willing workers, the Prisoners-of-War. Whilst the German PoWs worked with a will, their former Italian allies were less prepared for labour. Gerald recalls how he used a spinner to unearth potatoes, the Italians picked a row, then sat down to discuss the state of the world and seemed reluctant to start work again. Nor could the 60-year-old foreman impose his will on such a batch of strapping young men. But the British soldier sent to guard them found a way. He fixed a bayonet to his rifle, inserted a bullet into the chamber and fired over their heads. This galvanised them into activity, they found the incentive to work.

The German prisoners not only worked well, they ate well. Whilst the Land Army girls had Spam and raw carrot in their sandwiches, the Germans enjoyed piles of bacon – which they were happy to share when asked. Less happy was one of the farmers who discovered the prisoners had borrowed his boat, purloined his binder-twine to make nets and were catching all the fish in the Cam.

Gerald spent several years at the War-Ag machinery depot in a commandeered barn at Stretham, working to repair equipment that had been damaged by unskilled drivers. When the Stretham depot closed he moved across to Bourn, but the bureaucracy of having to drive from a fenland farm at the end of the day, just to clock-out – and then drive all the way home to Wicken – was ridiculous, especially at a time of petrol rationing. He was given a van and authority to stock it with whatever he needed and to service the tractors throughout the area. It was something he continued as an agricultural contractor after the War-Ag was wound up in the 1950s, keeping-up-to-date with the latest machinery, but at the same time applying his skill to the older steam-machines such as those he was happily recalling at the Haddenham rally this weekend. [NEG OF GERALD BAILEY ON TRACTION ENGINE 4817.88.32A – I WILL LOCATE; SCANS OF CATERPILLAR TRACTORS DRAGGING OAKS IN BURWELL FEN (not Bailey); DIGGING OUT BOG OAK (not in Burwell fen)]

Whilst Gerald was driving tractors, Derek Harris, from Histon, was involved with even heavier transport – steam locomotives. He recognises some of the men I featured at Ely station goods yard – Memories 22nd August – as Ronnie Lark, a goods guard and later relief signalman, Peter Cooper then Ely yard foreman who eventually became Yard Inspector at Cambridge and ‘Moses’ Hutchins, one-time Beet Foreman at Ely North Junction. [REPRISE PICTURE OF ELY GOODS YARD]

Derek himself started his railway career in 1940 as a signal-box lad at Ely North, aged 14. He has vivid recollections of the Ely Sugar Beet Factory, now itself but a memory. He writes: “Ely North Junction was at the hub of rail activity during the Sugar Beet Campaign, usually from September until early January. The Ely factory was one of a group and could remain active well into February if they were chosen as the ‘clearing up’ factory. At the end of the campaign, rail loaded sugar beet would be diverted from the surrounding counties and as far away as Colwick (Notts) to Ely.

“Beet was loaded in loose-coupled, open coal wagons which were worked into the various marshalling yards and made up into block train loads for the various factories by the Beet Foreman who possessed the qualifications of a shunter, main line guard and the ability to work with a locomotive as well as a good knowledge of geography! His only assistant was a goods porter who worked with the factory staff, labelling and recording the destination, numbers etc., of all empties and loaded wagons.

“On one occasion, bagged raw sugar (dark brown which contained molasses) loaded in locked, sealed vans, was awaiting disposal in the North Junction sidings. A considerable quantity of it was ‘run-off’ in the night through holes bored up through the floorboards. All the sugar made at the factories was stored in bonded warehouses and monitored by Customs & Excise but they missed out on the cunning of the thief on this occasion.

“Of course the input of sugarbeet was regulated, much of it came by road in open topped lorries and in the early days without any protective covering so that much of it lay in the gutters of Nutholt Lane, the Prickwillow Road and Adelaide. These fallen pieces were a useful supplement for the diet of tame rabbits (which many folk reared for food or the cattle-market sale on Thursdays) Some beet was brought in by the river barges, a suitable quay had been constructed for this purpose.

“One of the most remarkable sights but not seen by many, was the display of wild flowers in the Beet Factory holding sidings throughout the spring and summer. These siding were where some hundreds of trucks of beet we held over, especially during the Christmas period. They were constructed beside the lineside path from leading from Springhead Lane (popularly known as Love Lane) level crossing to the North Junction box and cottages. A path tolerated by BR otherwise the signalmen would need to go via Adelaide to reach the ‘box. Seeds from earlier plants and new seed deposited from the Autumn collection of beet there, provided a wealth of variety and colour to the beholder.” [PICTURES OF BEET FACTORY AND RAILWAY LINE APPROACHING IT WERE SORTED OUT LAST WEEK]

Whilst on the subject of signalmen, I owe an apology to the family of the late Bert Garwood of Littleport, whose picture in his signalbox in 1969 is featured in my forthcoming ‘Memory Lane, Ely and the Fens’ book. A gremlin transposed the ‘G’ to a ‘Y’, making him appear a relation to the famous impersonator. Let me know of other slips when you spot them so they can be put right in later reprints. (‘Memory Lane, Ely and the Fens’ is due in the shops shortly) [SCAN OF SIGNAL BOX AND MR GARWOOD]

**

Julie Wilson from Chesterton seeks your help in identifying an old photograph of a group of gentlemen preparing to enjoy a river trip. It was taken by Ralph Starr who opened his first photographic studio in Mill Road in 1888, moving one year later to Fitzroy Street and later Regent Street, Cambridge with a branch in Ely in 1900. He developed into one of Cambridge's most eminent photographers and went into partnership with a Mr Rignall. Some of the excursionists in the picture are wearing medals and one carries an accordion. Perhaps the most important people are those guarding the crates of beer. They may have had something to do with the sewage pumping station at Cheddar's Lane. Any ideas? [SCAN OF MYSTERY PIC]

**

Recent articles about East Road, Cambridge, have prompted Bob Doughty to send me memories of his grandfather, Herbert (Wally) Beamiss. Wally was born at The Three Compasses pub in East Road in 1902. His family ran and owned several homes and businesses in the area but unfortunately by the time he came of age he was on his own and for a time was forced to live rough. He got several jobs in the building trade, working on the Guildhall in the 1930s – and at one time falling off the roof. He also worked as a delivery driver for Charles Hall and Bob remembers how when a lad of four or five years old he went out with Wally and his mate Buster in the lorry. Herbert Beamiss passed away two years ago, aged 98, but will surely be remembered by several people.

Memories 19th September 2001, by Mike Petty

The world has been stunned by the events of the last week. But incredibly similar things have been reported on the same day in the past!

News of the tragedy in America was met with disbelief around the world and fully reported in the columns of the News. In Cambridge “inhabitants hastened to show their regret and sympathy with the great sister nation across the sea. Everywhere was heard expressions of sorrow. Flags at half-mast mournfully floated from the summits of public buildings, churches, houses of business and a few private residences, for the sorrow and sympathy were as universal as they were keen”

From churches everywhere came sympathy with American nation “as it passed along the path of darkness and perplexity”. At St Andrew's Street Chapel the pastor trusted the eyes of rulers “would be turned to the causes of dissatisfaction, commotion and distress among the nations, so that out of this great sorrow some good might come to the American people and the world.”

These snippets may be have been written yesterday; in fact they come from copies of the Cambridge Daily News for September 14th and 16th 1901, when the shock was the death of American President William McKinley after being shot by an assassin. His words in the immediate aftermath of the attack were quoted from the pulpit of Emmanuel Congregational Church: “The President murmured a message to his wife, and then bade no one hurt the miserable wretch who had assailed him”. [COPIES OF NEWS PAGES FROM, SEPT 1901]

The sight of the devastation wreaked by two planes horrified thousands of people who witnessed it. The News reported how “a dead silence fell on the horrified crowd, a silence which remained united – save for the shuffling of feet as the spectators surged back until the desperate tragedy ended in a burst of flame and black smoke and the dull roar of the subsequent explosion". Once more this was not September 2001, it was 17th September 1951 – just 50 years ago – reporting the collision of two Meteor jet fighters during a Battle of Britain display at RAF Waterbeach. One plane crashed within 200 yards of the crowd, another on the edge of the airfield, near the Cambridge-Ely road [CUTTING FROM CDN 17.9.1951]

And also this week I heard an eye-witness account of a search for survivors, as Bill Hutchings of Teversham described his horror at reaching the end of Sturton Street and looking at the heap of smoking rubble that had been his home in Vicarage Terrace. Of the panic of trying to find somebody who could tell him if his mother had survived, and his relief when she was finally found wandering shell-shocked and covered in dust in a nearby street. Others were not so fortunate, several lives were lost, others shattered. That date was June 1940 when Cambridge became the first target for the direct aerial attack by Germany during the Second World War. That tragedy is still remembered, the few contemporary photographs reprinted again and again. But the news was censored at the time, the suffering unreported until the War had been won. Still details come to light; last week a lady told me how her father had the job of clearing the household effects, and that she still has his pencil-written records. [VICARAGE TERRACE WRECKAGE]

But, largely forgotten, Ely too suffered in that first war-time raid and one man died during the bombs that fell near the newly-constructed army camp in West Fen Road. And as I reported in Memories (Aug 8th) Ely also suffered tragedy when a plane crashed in St Mary's Street in August 1951. Janet Smith this week E-mailed me an eye-witness account of that event as remembered by 81-year-old Olive Silcock who now lives in Clacton where she is writing her memories in their local newspaper. Olive recalls: "I remember it was sometime before 9am. I had asked my oldest son, Edward Silcock, to go to Mr. Fletcher's grocery shop for milk etc. He said he wouldn't - it was as well he didn't! – because a large bang, which made No. 3 St. Mary's Street (my house) tremble. I thought it was a bomb - the darkness and the hail of dust, earth rattling at the doors and windows, it was very frightening. It's sound was like a million hailstones hitting our roof. I remember I was afraid to move!!

"Some of the wreckage fell outside our front door so, as my son, by refusing to go on an errand, saved his life. A pram outside Joe Brand's shop was crushed and the King's Arms (opposite) had their pub windows and door damaged. People came from nowhere, but I was told not to leave the house because of the fuel that was everywhere, running down the street. A passer-by, who I knew, said the driver of that lorry had stopped to buy cigs at Mr. Cook's shop opposite the Church. Had he not, then the 'plane would have missed him - it was a grim sight. (Her sons ran out despite being told to keep in and told her the driver's head had been decapitated)

"I also remember the vicar of St. Mary's Church was also on the scene as the young airman was dying. I remember the second airman was taken to the RAF Hospital, Lynn Road, but later was taken to Fulbourn Hospital in Cambridge. The road was blocked off and RAF servicemen were on guard. It was a day to remember. This is a scribbled account but worth a mention. I guess if the plane's wing had come off I would not be writing this story"

[REPRISE PIC OF CRASH]

Even wartime hardships can bring happiness to some. Mrs Jean Potter of Golding Road, Cambridge was struck by a Memories (Aug 29th) photo of troops on Cambridge commons at the start of the Great War. She writes: "My mother, Violet, lived with her parents (Mr & Mrs Joe Day) who had The Britannia public house on East Road. He was also a blacksmith, so they had, attached to this a forge and wheelwright business. The soldiers from the tent camps had to bring their horses to use the forge for shoeing and that's how by father, George Sullivan from Newport Wales, who was in the Welsh Regiment, met by mother. They married before he eventually went overseas. After the war ended they lived for a while in Wales but returned to Cambridge after my Grandmother died, leaving by grandfather with 4our younger children to bring up. They then spent the rest of their lives in Cambridge, having three girls, Vi, Zena, and me” [REPRISE PIC OF TROOPS ON COMMON]

One element of the attack on New York has been the dramatic transformation of the skyline. In this respect the changes in Cambridge itself have been largely self-inflicted, such as the clearance of the south side of Petty Cury for the Lion Yard redevelopment and the clearance for the Grafton Centre which left the areas looking like a bomb site. [POSSIBLE PICS OF GRAFTTON STREET OR LION YARD REDEVELOPMENT FROM NEWS LIBRARY FILES]

This week however Ernest Best has passed to me a wonderful series of drawings made by an artist named Lewis, dated 1954 and 1956 that capture many areas of the city that have now vanished. Many I recognise; some I don't. If they jog memories for you or if you call tell me something about the artist please let me know. [SCANS]

Memories 26th September 2001, by Mike Petty

Over morning coffee at the Age Concern's 'Pop-in' centre in Parson's Court, Cambridge the conversation revolved about grass. Not the immaculate grass of the college lawns, nor the illegal substance, but the old fashioned, everyday stuff that is cut with a lawnmower. The question was – where can you get grass seed in Cambridge.

The obvious answer was Sanders the seed people. It was the obvious place that many generations of Cambridge folk had turned to for their garden needs. But incredibly it is no longer there, a part of Cambridge's history has gone, unnoticed.

A couple of evenings later and the name came up again when Eileen Ward recalled her distress after she learned that the name had gone from the shop in Hobson Street. For Eileen and her family had been associated with the business since the First World War. And in her attic at Histon she had a pile of material relating to the company and its history. When I visited her home she produced masses of seed catalogues, the firm's neat, hand-written ledgers kept by her father, Leslie Scarr.

Trying to piece it all together it would seem that the business was started by one James Sanders in 1866; he had a nursery at Newnham and a shop at 23a Petty Cury, on the north side, Petty Cury end. Eileen even has a catalogue from those distant days full of details of wrinkled peas – American Wonder being one of the earliest types, though two new varieties, Alderman and Boston Unrivalled were new on the scene. Bibby's Defiance celery, Lee's Immense Hardy Green lettuce, Champion Moss Curled parsley and Hackford Park Prolific tomato could all be had from stock. Those more interested in flowers could select from page after page – Betteridge's Quilled asters, Empress of India nasturtium or Double German wallflowers amongst them.

Leslie Scarr had joined the firm in July 1917, aged 16 shortly after the death of its founder. His wage of 13s a week was a great advance on the 7s.6d he's previously earned as an office boy at a bill-posting company after leaving the Higher Grade School aged 14. James Sanders' business was continued by his nephew, Montague Shirley Alliston until he died suddenly just after Christmas 1926. Leslie stayed with the firm, first helping the widow and then being taken into partnership, after the shop relocated down to Regent Street in 1927. It was a period of intense activity for him for he was also overseeing the building of his own new home in Coleridge Road at a cost of £500!

The shop was quite convenient for the railway where potatoes arrived by the truck load to be transported to the shop door and carted into the shop. Eileen recalls how, later, sand that arrived by lorry was tipped onto the pavement and had to be barrowed into the shop as quickly as possible to allow traffic and pedestrians free passage.

With the outbreak of the Second World War it became imperative to grow your own vegetables; there is a pause in Eileen's file of catalogues but a bundle of 'Dig For Victory' leaflets, one of which was devoted to 'Saving your own seeds' – something a seedsman might have been forgiven for keeping at the back of the counter! Another war-time guide gave instructions as to 'How to Dig', aimed at the gardener, not the constructor of Air Raid Shelters. Leslie Scarr had been too young for the First war, he was too specialist to be spared for the Second and granted exemption as a seed expert.

The business continued in Regent Street until the premises were redeveloped by Downing College in 1979, when it moved first to King Street, then round the corner into Hobson Street. By then Leslie had gone into partnership with his daughter Eileen and her husband Dennis Ward. By 1991 he was retired – as a 90-year-old is entitled to be – but still went in to run the accounts and give advice to the sons and grandsons of customers he had served years earlier. Things were different then, the rise of garden centres had had an impact; potatoes no longer arrived loose by the ton, but came hand-packed. But you could still get grass seed – a choice of varieties, at the quantity you required, from two ounces to two hundredweight.

On his days off Leslie devoted himself to his own garden, and sadly died when going out to get potatoes. On that same day Eileen learned of her husband's terminal Cancer. The business was sold on, the name continued above the shop in Hobson Street until about a month ago when gardeners found the door shut, the fascia board removed – and asked well where do you get grass seed in central Cambridge now?

Now the names of James Sanders seeds has passed into history, and the records of the Company have been passed to the County Record Office at Shire Hall, Cambridge, where historians, both local and botanical can have access to them both now and in the future. [PHOTOGRAPHIC HAVE PICTURES OF EILEEN WARD AND HER MATERIAL; SCAN OF SEED CATALOGUE, HOW TO DIG LEAFLET AND – PERHAPS NEGS OF LESLIE SCARR – 1251.87.9 (in greenhouse), 6571.91.3 (outside shop). PERHAPS PIX OF REGENT STREET/ KING STREET – I WILL TRY AND FIND THESE]

Sid Martin has written from Langdon House, Chesterton, to say that he remembers Gerald Bailey and his mechanical skill with tractors (Memories September 12th) "I was one of the tractor drivers who when in trouble called on Mr Bailey and he came and put things right". Sid worked for many years on farmland that ran up to the Huntingdon Road, now disappeared under Bar Hill. It is now one of the busiest of the country's roads but was different in his day: "I used to see mostly old men walking along both ways and wondered where they did so. They were called "Tramps" or "Roadsters". Occasionally a few elderly women also did this same walk, but mostly men. They lived in hundreds of well-built brick or stone buildings like huge barns, dotted all over the country, about five to twelve miles distant from each other. These buildings had various names, "Spikes", "Unions", but mostly "Workhouses". The men were only allowed to stop overnight and then had to move on to the next 'Home', but each morning they had to do a small job of work, mostly chopping firewood or household duties. One of these 'Unions' was in Union Road, Chesterton – later it became Chesterton Hospital."

I have been told that the men would wait for the Union to open sitting on a bench around a tree on the corner of High Street and Chapel Street Chesterton – and this was another of the topics sketched by Lewis Todd in the 1950s. Two of the other scenes I featured in last week's Memories have been identified; one is St Matthew's Church that stood right alongside Vicarage Terrace, the other is a thatched cottage in Clement Place that was demolished to make way for Park Street car park. Can you help with any of those in this week's batch?

[SCAN OF SEAT AROUND TREE AND OTHERS]

Mrs P.C. Mason of Cambridge has been having a clear out of papers relating to the family and has send me various items including a group photograph of the Central Boys' School 1948. Can anybody put names to faces? [SCAN OF PHOTO]

Alastair Hopkins spotted a face he recognised recently – his own! He was idly scanning pictures in the new 'Memory Lane Ely and the Fens' book and came across one of himself and his mother when they were harvesting potatoes on their Sidings Farm at Prickwillow in 1974. He remembers the visit of the News photographer but never saw the resulting pictures. Now they are in a book! Although it's not officially launched until later this week already numerous people have seen themselves or their relations. If you're one of them please let me know – I'll be signing copies at the News office at Ely on Friday, do come along for a chat.
[SCAN OF POTATO HARVEST]

Memories 3rd October 2001, by Mike Petty

It is that time of year when members of Cambridge Antiquarian Society are awoken in the morning by the clump of the arrival of the latest volume of 'Proceedings'. This years' hefty 150-page volume concentrates on religion in Cambridgeshire over the last 2000 years. It contains a varied number of scholarly papers including a detailed assessment of a Romano-Celtic shrine at Little Paxton quarry, over 30 pages on Cambridgeshire church bell-frames and a remarkable analysis of the dust removed from the choir stalls in King's college chapel which gives a fascinating insight into the uses and misuses the building has been subjected to over the centuries.

There is also a history of another building, not itself of any great antiquarian significance, but one that plays a most important part in the religious life of the Muslim community in Cambridge. Little has been researched about the diverse multi-ethnic community whose members trace their roots to a variety of nations, including Mauritius, Bangladesh, Pakistan and Turkey. They first used a room at the Cambridge Guildhall as a place of prayer before moving in 1975 to a house on Chesterton Road where two small downstairs rooms were used as a mosque. But these premises were not suitable for the required alignment facing Mecca, and nor could they be demolished and rebuilt. There was also a small matter of planning permission for change of use from a domestic house. Their search for permanent accommodation led them to consider the disused All Saints Church in Jesus Lane or the then empty St Andrew the Great church where application for conversion into a mosque was turned down. Eventually they found an old Gospel Hall, later a meeting place for the Plymouth Brethren off Mill Road, Cambridge. The former church meeting hall now includes a minbar [SIC] (the short flight of steps used by the Imam to deliver his sermon at Friday prayers) and where copies of the Qur'an and other religious texts can be stored, while a second prayer hall has been added. An upper room provides a place that women can use for prayer, being excluded by custom from the main body of the mosque. Even so the space is often full and during the major festivals, most notably the Eid [SIC] or id al-fitr [SIC] prayers at the end of Ramadan the congregation have sometimes erected a marquee on Midsummer Common or in the grounds of Jesus College. During his researches Timothy Insoll, then a Research Fellow at St John's college was aided by a fellow student, Talib Ali, and by photographs from the News archives to ensure that something of the important story of the Cambridge Muslim community can be recorded in a journal that circulates around the world. If you have memories to share, then write to me at the News

[PHOTOS OF MUSLIMS AT PRAYER IN THE CAMBRIDGE MOSQUE, 29.11.1985 AND THE CELEBRATION OF THE END OF RAMADAN ON THE LAWNS OF JESUS COLLEGE, 27.4.1990 – I HAVE SCANNED THOSE FROM THE PROCEEDINGS AND WILL TRY AND TRACK DOWN THE ORIGINALS]

The story of the discovery of the remains of an old Cambridge Street Tramways car that was broken in the News last week has stimulated memories for Charlie Goodge of Ely. He will be well remembered in the city as a shoemender and tells me that when he left Needham's school at 13 years of age he started work for Batas in the High Street then moved to Charlie Prior who had his shoe shop in Minster Place, Ely. In those days there were various cobblers in the city as people tended to have their shoes repaired more frequently than today. But the arrival of the army camp in West Fen Road at the start of the Second World War boosted the demand even more and as soon as Charlie finished work at 6pm he would walk to Downham Road where Mr Herbert Johnson has the contract to repair army boots. On arrival he blew a whistle and waved a green flag – thinking he was about to enter a railway carriage. But it was in fact the old tramcar. It had a tortoise stove in the corner and they kept it warm by burning worn-put soles. Next morning it was back to the day-job where he stayed until he was called up into the army. On demob he started his own business next to the old Majestic Cinema in Newnham Street.

Somebody who did know the full significance of Mr Johnson's workshop was Michael Gates, the well-known local historian. He was however asked not to divulge the secret, even after Mr Johnson died some years ago, but every time he drove past he slowed down to check the valuable relic was still in place. You can imagine his excitement when Mike Salmons, the builder who acquired the land, recognised its importance and allowed its removal for restoration. The story of the carriage – originally a double-decker pulled by a single horse on the route from Cambridge station to Market Hill – is well recorded. But now the restorers are seeking any additional photographs of the tram, that carried the number one, to aid their renovation. If you can help then give him a ring on Cambridge 293803 – and drop me a line. It's probably too far back for any personal recollections, but you might have fathers or granddads that worked on the Cambridge Street Tramways Company between 1880 and 1914. [SCAN OF TRAM & WEST FEN ARMY CAMP]

Mrs Silvia Miller of Sutton has lent me a picture of another ancient form of transport with a photograph of Sutton station that must have been taken in the early years of the 1900s. In January 1964 the News took another view when it recorded the trip of the goods train that ran along the old Grunty Fen railway from Ely before it closed that July. En route the train needed to stop at Little Thetford and close the crossing gates across the A10. People bemoan the loss of the old railway lines, but given the amount of traffic along that road they would have a very long wait before they could do it today! And am I the only person who remembers the queues that used to build up at the Milton Road railway crossing in Cambridge – especially when the underpass filled up with water? Do you have pictures of the railway gates there – or others that have now disappeared? [SCAN OF SUTTON STATION OLD PHOTO, NEWS PHOTO OF SUTTON STATION JANUARY 1964 AND LT THETFORD RAILWAY CROSSING GATES WITH FIREMAN ROBERT GILBEY AND JACK WATSON, JAN 1964]

Whilst signing copies of 'Memory Lane, Ely and the Fens' last week I learned the names of two of the domino players featured in the bar of the Railway Tavern, Shippea Hill. One is 'Dorcy' Butcher from Kenny Hill, the other a Mr Sparrow who was a builder from Littleport. Dominoes used to be a prominent feature of pub life, with the air of hushed concentration giving way to detailed analysis after a game was concluded. But who do you recall from all those who would while away hours in play – with only the odd break for a refill of the pint mug? And do you have snaps of games in progress? [SCAN OF DOMINOES AT SHIPPEA HILL JULY 1977]

Last week's picture of the Central School in 1948 has brought immediate response from various old boys. John Goddard of Cherry Hinton recognised Alan Dant, Alan Sharpling, John Davies and David Burling amongst the students. He recalls his old teachers, as does Peter Hammond from Bar Hill who adds his own memories of them. From the left: Mr Bill Newett (Metal Work), "Taffy" Evans (PE and Science), Harry Bell (PE and Maths – "a former Notts County footballer and a real gentlemen" according to Peter), Ted Edsour (English – "a great supporter of the RSPCA, if you gave him a halfpenny you could forget your detention"), Ralph 'Buster' Brown (Deputy Head and Maths), 'Jock' Livingston (Head – "a very wise and very fair man, who commanded our respect"), Dick Annely (Geography), Mr Mansfield (Maths – "very sticked"), Percy Frankham (Commerce – "he had only one arm and his handwriting was perfect"), Mr Beckerley (History), 'Percy' Giles (Woodwork – "he taught me a great deal about wood and woodwork, which is still my trade after 48 years – 41 with Marshalls Aerospace") and Roland Parker (French) who also wrote books on Cambridge and Cambridgeshire history. David Brown from Cambridge knows that he was on the picture, but was just chopped off from the section I showed. [REPRISE CENTRAL SCHOOL PHOTO]

Nick Wise has e-mailed to identify two of the sketches by Lewis Todd that I featured on 26th September; one shows the old entrance to Jordan's Yard, between 13 and 14 Bridge Street; the mid 1970s redevelopment moved the passageway a little further north. The left-hand sketch was the now demolished Wray's Court off Sidney Street, where Sainsbury's now stands.

Memories 10th October 2001 by Mike Petty

Mary Rae from Cambridge was delighted when she opened the News on 26th September and saw a picture of Wrays Court. "I remember this clearly. The little girl with the dolls' pram is my daughter Christine who would have been about 2½ years old and the black cat was our Tim. I can also remember the man sitting on his stool at the entrance to Wrays Court sketching this about 1953/4. We used to live at no.6. The Passage was between Spalding's Map Shop and an electrical shop in Sidney Street, but was demolished and is now part of Sainsburys. The sketch appeared in the CDN at the time which I kept, but over the years it seems to have got lost and I felt one day it would come up in one of your 'Memories' articles, and he it is. I feel so pleased its come out of the archives after all these years, as I have spoken of this sketch many times with my daughter"

Another letter came from Diane Todd; she not only knew the sketch, she knew the artist – her husband, Lewis Todd. Lewis worked for the Cambridge Daily News as a cartoonist, successor to Ronald Searle and Sid Moon who went to the Sunday Despatch. He recalls the old News offices in St Andrew's Street, Cambridge, where in an upstairs room the photo engravers cut their sheets with zinc, the acid dropping through the ceiling into the room below.

Lewis' job was to research and produce four cartoons a week, mainly devoted to sportsmen. From boxes at his home in Over he produces piles of cuttings depicting such heroes as Brian Stonebridge the 'scrambling' wizard, sketched at Littleport in September 1951 and unsung heroes like Jack Haylock who by September 1952 had been a groundsman at Fenner's for 45 years. Lewis chatted to Jack and recorded his memories – such as Charlie the horse. "Wearing hoof leathers, he used to pull a five-ton roller that took eight men to handle, and a 42 inch cutter, the cut line of which he followed with uncanny precision. But he would like a mouthful of grass at the end of each 'cut' – and woe betide the man who tried to prevent him. Charlie eventually took exception to a mechanical horse while lauding a load out of the Pit lawn one May Week and had to be destroyed. You can still see where the stables stood".

Another character to emerge from the cuttings was Mr L.D.V. Wordingham, who is depicted hiding under a table during a torrential downpour as he gave his commentaries during the August Bank Holiday sports meeting at the Milton Road ground in 1952. Lewis himself presumably got soaked!

It was during the August 'silly season', when news was short, that Lewis suggested to the editor of the News, H.H. Higgins, that he should produce a series of sketches on the theme 'Know your Cambridge' to tease readers – though the answer was always given at the bottom of the page. So it was that he arrived in Wrays Court, as Mary Rae remembers. Later, when his week's work was done Lewis returned to the scenes he had sketched, this time with his canvas, easel and paintbox. He still has many of his original paintings, hoping one day for a retrospective exhibition of his work. But the views do not lay unseen for he has reproduced many of the older paintings which he sells on Saturdays on All Saints Green and on Sundays on Cambridge Market.

But whilst the characters are captioned, and the streets recalled, there is another side to his cartooning which is more tantalising. For he also depicted contemporary issues. One sketch from Swaffham Prior in 1957 laments the loss of a fountain and horse trough, another depicts an irate character in the 'Forgotten village' of Grantchester – who can shed light on the background to these. But another from 1953 needs no explanation; it shows the traditional annual arrival of students and their luggage, though these days the scene is somewhat different.

PHOTO OF LEWIS TODD WITH HIS 1950S PAINTINGS OF PRZIBORSKY'S
HAIRDRESSERS SHOP, RAM YARD; PHOTO OF HIS PAINTING OF THE JACKSONS WHO SOLD THE CDN ON MARKET HILL IN 1950S; THEY ARE SHOWN IN THE BUN SHOP PUB, ST ANDREW'S HILL
SCAN OF WRAY'S COURT, SIDNEY STREET SHOWING MARY RAE'S DAUGHTER,
SCAN OF BRIAN STONEBRIDGE, SCRAMBLER; L.D.V. WORDINGHAM
COMMENTATING FROM UNDER TABLE, AUG 1952 & JACK HAYLOCK AT FENNERS SCAN OF SWAFFHAM PRIOR FOUNTAIN, GRANTCHESTER & UNDERGRADS
ARRIVING AT COLLEGE
SCAN OF PAINTING OF NORTHAMPTON STREET/ MAGDALENE STREET CORNER

**

The work of an earlier Cambridge artist, Robert Farren, is on show at the galleries of Cambridge Fine Art, Church Street, Little Shelford, from 15th October. Three of his original watercolours of the Wrestler's Inn and Falcon Yard, Cambridge that he painted about 120 years ago will be on display alongside landscapes, seascapes and still life by a variety of Victorian artists [SCAN OF FALCON YARD – NOW LION YARD, CAMBRIDGE]

**

Robert Gilbey of Cambridge saw himself in "Memories" on 3rd October; he was fireman on the 'Grunty Fen Express' train in January 1964 and is shown opening the crossing gates at Lt Thetford.

**

The picture of the Central Boys school 1948 has continued to bring in responses; P.D. Stearn from Cambridge, Nigel Neville from Dry Drayton, & Steve Foreman from Girton, all have contacted me. Philip Shaw recalls how "Taffy" Evans the music and maths master, was well known for eating blackboard dust at the start of the first chemistry class of the afternoon – he suffered from indigestion and was eager to explain the chemistry of indigestion remedies. Peter Froste from Laxfield near Woodbridge thinks it would be nice to have a reunion – but Malcolm Smith says that some of the old chums still do get together. Margaret Rowe writes from Leatherhead in Surrey to say she saw her father, Frank Mansfield. He taught at the Central from 1930 to 1953 when he became headmaster of St Andrew's Church of England School in Chesterton until he retired in 1964. He then became a qualified Cambridge Tourist Guide; a long-time member of Castle Street Methodist Church and sometime circuit steward, he died suddenly in 1969.

Since so many Central old boys have seen themselves I wonder if we can repeat the exercise with Central School Girls, but this time going back much further, to 1933. The picture has been supplied by Edna Arnold of Cambridge and is one of a batch that she will shortly be donating to the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard library. [SCAN OF CENTRAL GIRLS' SCHOOL SEPT 1933]

GIVEN THE NUMBER OF PICTURES YOU MIGHT LIKE TO HOLD OVER THESE FAIRGROUND NOTES

Edna also saved a copy of 'The Forget-me-not', the school magazine, for Spring 1930. In it Pearl Hardy gave her impressions of Midsummer Fair

"As one enters the fairground one hears the shouting of the rock merchants and the high-pitched voices of the fortune-tellers mingled with the noise (I will not call it " music ") of the merry-go-rounds. Now the harassed and perplexed vendors of sweet-meats hurry to serve impatient customers. Now a small child, confused by the dust and din around it, begins to wail loudly. Now the oily mechanic perspires freely and longs to get out of the stuffy interior of the round-about. Now the switch-backs let off their steam and deafen the bystanders. Now the old lady holds her hands up in disgusted amazement as the people are whirled round in the chara-planes".

Albert Sheldrick describes a similar scene in Ashwell at about the same time: "After morning Sunday school it was important to be at the recreation ground in time to see the first caravans arrive from Melbourn where the fair had ended the previous night. Then came the big steam engine, Lord Kitchener, towing a huge wagon loaded with all the bits and pieces which made up James Harris and Sons flying horses, soon followed by Viscount Lascelles, a slightly smaller engine towing more of the fair equipment. By midday most of the fair had arrived, the water tap near the Cricketers pub had been connected to supply water for the horses, the engines and the caravan people.

"It was only a small fair. The Harris's came from Biggleswade and Jim's brother drove the Lord Kitchener which provided power for most of the fair's lighting, powered the flying horses, and the organ with its figures automatically banging drums and playing flutes and other instruments, blasting out such popular tunes as "Valencia" and "I'm one of the nuts from Barcelona". Every now and then, just to hurry patrons along, there was an almighty shriek on the whistle, which could be, heard all over the village.

"The Harris girls, blonde and smartly dressed, attracted the customers to the dart stalls and a shooting gallery where you fired corks at packets of Woodbine cigarettes, boxes of Swan Vesta matches and other two penny items. Young Jim Harris was usually the caller at a set of large faces with open mouths and clay pipes instead of teeth. You threw three wooden balls for two pence in an attempt to smash the 'teeth'"

Ken Page of Biggleswade has researched the story of Harris' fun fairs and traced the relationships with the Thurston family of showmen. He has published a lavishly illustrated history but he is anxious to trace any other connections. If you can help, or have other memories to share, contact Ken at 10 Victoria Court, Back Street, Biggleswade, SG18 8LG.

His book "The story of Harris's fun fairs" sells for £20 – plus £4 postage. [SCAN OF ALBERT HARRIS, A CLASSIC SHOWMAN FROM THE BOOK]

Memories 17th October 2001, by Mike Petty

Last week I listened once more to the voice of Percy North, who had a memory as sharp as the photographs he took.

Many older folk will remember that Percy was a mainstay of the St John Ambulance brigade, having joined in 1902, & transferring to the Red Cross at the beginning of the Great War - the first man in Cambridge to don the uniform. During the next War he was commandant in charge of stretcher parties at Addenbrooke's Hospital and saw every casualty caused by the raids over the city. Although blinded by an attack of shingles when he was 90 years old he remained independent, preparing his own food and baking his own bread until his death in 1983, five months short of his 100th birthday.

He enjoyed many hobbies: music - at one time having his own orchestra – needlework, oil painting & antiques – and was able to tell the story of each of the items in his mini-museum which ranged from old lemonade bottles to clocks and fine furniture. But his main love was photography. Percy made a photographic survey of the back streets off Newmarket Road, recording the dereliction and demolition of an area that he could people with memory and recollection. [SCAN OF AREA]

He would sit and recall the names of tradesmen in the shops around Burleigh street as they were in the days of his youth, nearly a century before. His memory was not only of names but sounds - the calls of the traders who hawked their wares around the small streets off East Road. "Jam jars or bottels" encouraged children to bring such containers to be exchanged for a paper windmill, the lavender girl attracted their older brothers, the trotter man none at all. Some thirty years ago Percy committed these to tape which he deposited in the Cambridgeshire Collection and so the other week I was able to share them with other old Cambridge residents.

He could also recall the sounds of the great Midsummer Fair, held on the common almost opposite his Newmarket Road chiropodist's premises. Percy saw it change from the days when horse-drawn caravans were strewn across the grass and the drinking booths by the river thumped to the sound of heavy dancing. Nearby would be the cockle and whelk stalls where Mrs Hames used to have a great boiler of hot peas - an old halfpenny a basin. Nearby too was the Red Cross tent where North and his colleagues administered to the innumerable accidents and illnesses, sprains, monkey bites and air gun slugs which afflicted the visitors and fairground people alike. If you have tapes of people recalling olden days, please do let me know

In Spring 1930 Pearl Hardy recorded her impressions of that Fair in the 'The Forget-me-not', the Central School for Girls magazine, which Edna Arnold has lent me. Pearl recalled:

"As one enters the fairground one hears the shouting of the rock merchants and the high-pitched voices of the fortune-tellers mingled with the noise (I will not call it " music ") of the merry-go-rounds. Now the harassed and perplexed vendors of sweet-meats hurry to serve impatient customers. Now a small child, confused by the dust and din around it, begins to wail loudly. Now the oily mechanic perspires freely and longs to get out of the stuffy interior of the round-about. Now the switch-backs let off their steam and deafen the bystanders. Now the old lady holds her hands up in disgusted amazement as the people are whirled round in the chara-planes".

Albert Sheldrick describes a similar scene in Ashwell at about the same time: “After morning Sunday school it was important to be at the recreation ground in time to see the first caravans arrive from Melbourn where the fair had ended the previous night. Then came the big steam engine, Lord Kitchener, towing a huge wagon loaded with all the bits and pieces which made up James Harris and Sons flying horses, soon followed by Viscount Lascelles, a slightly smaller engine towing more of the fair equipment. By midday most of the fair had arrived, the water tap near the Cricketers pub had been connected to supply water for the horses, the engines and the caravan people.

“It was only a small fair. The Harris's came from Biggleswade and Jim's brother drove the Lord Kitchener which provided power for most of the fair's lighting, powered the flying horses, and the organ with its figures automatically banging drums and playing flutes and other instruments, blasting out such popular tunes as “Valencia” and “I'm one of the nuts from Barcelona”. Every now and then, just to hurry patrons along, there was an almighty shriek on the whistle, which could be heard all over the village.

“The Harris girls, blonde and smartly dressed, attracted the customers to the dart stalls and a shooting gallery where you fired corks at packets of Woodbine cigarettes, boxes of Swan Vesta matches and other two penny items. Young Jim Harris was usually the caller at a set of large faces with open mouths and clay pipes instead of teeth. You threw three wooden balls for two pence in an attempt to smash the ‘teeth’”

Ken Page of Biggleswade includes Albert's memories in a book on the story of Harris' fun fairs and has traced their relationships with the Thurston family of showmen. He has published a lavishly illustrated history but he is anxious to trace any other connections. If you can help, or have other memories to share, contact Ken at 10 Victoria Court, Back Street, Biggleswade, SG18 8LG. His book “The story of Harris's fun fairs” sells for £20 – plus £4 postage. [SCAN OF ALBERT HARRIS, A CLASSIC SHOWMAN FROM THE BOOK] [OTHER PIX FROM NEWS FILES]

**

Cambridge's Market Hill is another place where the vendor's cries can still be heard. A fine photograph features in the re-issued ‘Memories of Cambridge’ book produced some years ago by True North Books. In the foreground is one of Jack Baldry's delivery lorries. The soft drinks firm started in Gold Street, Cambridge in 1923 and by 1969 had taken over another old-established firm, Barker and Wadsworth and were producing some 800 dozen bottles of mineral water an hour. They later relocated to Newmarket Road and then to Sawston in 1979. [SCAN OF MARKET HILL & BALDRYS]

Another company that features in the book is that of Spicers Stationery work in Sawston, with a picture taken in the mid 1950s. Whilst several firms have their own sections in the book Spicers does not. The author wonders just what the young women featured would have to say about working conditions were like in that vast room filled with machinery. If you remember, please drop me a line. [SCAN OF SICERS]

**

Mrs Mella Ball of Milton has been browsing through the family photo album and come across one of her father at the Cambridge Cattle Market in December 1958 – the gentleman with his hand up. His name was Bruhl and he was head chef at the Lion Hotel. But do you recognise any of the others? [SCAN OF CATTLE MARKET]

Geoffrey Sandell from Cambridge has e-mailed to respond to my teaser in ‘Memories’ of 19th September. He is quite right in saying it shows farmers in the corn market at Cambridge Corn

Exchange. They are leaning on one of the stalls where they displayed their grain. He also says the bell was rung when the auction was about to begin. [SCAN OF STALL]

Further memories of another Corn Exchange, this one at Ely, were recorded by the News in December 1962 when it was used for the last time as a corn market, the purpose for which it was built in 1847. It had just been purchased by a London development company and was shortly to be demolished to make way for the Market Place shopping centre.

Only a handful of farmers, corn merchants and representatives of seed, feeding stuffs, fertilisers, oil and seed companies turned up for the building's last two-hour use as an indoor market. Before the war as many as 300 people from all parts of the eastern counties and from London congregated at the Corn Exchange every Thursday. Mr Frank King, the custodian, recalled: "65 years ago, Broad Street used to be packed with people coming off the trains to the markets. Admission to the market cost farmers 3d (1p) a week, or 7s.6d. (37p) a year". Mr Harry Sale a Cambridge corn merchant whose association with the market started 41 years before, said stand holders paid £3.5s. (£3.25) a year, walking merchants – those who did not have stands - £1.6s. (£1.30) a year, and merchants who visited occasionally 1s (5p) a week. While in the past sellers and buyers turned up in their hundreds, the average attendance in the last five or six years had dwindled to between 30 and 40. The corn market activities were transferred across the street, to the club room at the rear of the Club Hotel while the Corn Exchange continued in use for a while for a variety of events. It had provided a setting for dinners, political meetings, wrestling, boxing and darts tournaments. [SCAN OF ELY CORN EXCHANGE 1962]

**

Leslie Hayward from Wimborne in Dorset seeks your assistance in his researches into Gertrude Ellen Sharp. She was brought to Cambridge in 1890 as a young girl when her father, David Sharp, a distinguished entomologist, took up his position as curator of Zoology at the University. It seems likely Gertrude attended the Cambridge School of Art before going to the Royal College of Art sometime between 1909 and 1911. She married John Adams in 1914 and became prominent as a designer after the partnership of Carter, Stabler and Adams took over the Poole Pottery in 1921 & established a reputation for elegance and decorative modernism during the 1920s and 1930s. Later she remarried and is better known as Truda Carter until her death in 1958. Leslie knows most of the story, having written a major book on the Poole pottery, but is now seeking any Cambridge connections and particularly any photographs of her. So far he has drawn a blank – but can you help?

Mr S.R. Howchin of Cambridge has lent me a photograph of an attractive young lady at Byron's Pool, taken in May 1939. He was the projectionist at the Central Cinema in Hobson Street but on 9th April it had burnt down, and now he was out of work. He took his young lady for a stroll to the well-known beauty spot – and they have been together ever since. [SCAN OF BYRONS POOL]

Memories 24th October 2001, by Mike Petty

Twenty-five years ago the people of Cambridge's new Arbury Estate prepared to welcome back a Royal visitor.

In September 1955 the first house had been completed on the new Arbury Estate extension, an area that would take a large bite out of Cambridge's 4,337 housing waiting list. Monkman, the builders, took out an advertisement to emphasise the speed of their construction: started 1st June, occupied 17th September.

Others took much longer to complete their dream house. Several families responded to an advertisement in the News announcing a meeting for ordinary people who were prepared to co-operate to build their own homes. Cambridge Self-Build Society was set up and eventually they learned of some building plots in the barren fields and allotments off Milton Road.

The men bought a second-hand cement mixer, some scaffolding, some spades and the various bits and pieces needed to build a house. This included floodlights so work could continue long into the night as “Essex Close” started to rise. It was one way of beating the housing shortage. Post-war housing had started with pre-fabs as a temporary measure; 450 were built in Church End and Walpole Way, 100 in the Lichfield & Golding road area, another 40 at Gilbert Close. Mowlems erected concrete ‘Easiform’ houses at a cost of £1,400 providing dwellings within the capacity of people to pay, after all not everybody could afford 35/- (£1.75) per week!

By 1952 the Council had built 2,000 non-traditional houses since the war but when that year Ernest Marples opened the 5,000th Unity steel and concrete house he urged caution on those who advocated cutting costs by reducing standards. “One had got to stop somewhere, otherwise we could be building little pigeon houses with one room upstairs and one down”, he said.

By 1954 there was a 15-year waiting list for council houses and nearly half of new buildings were set aside to re-house people living in some 1,250 “slum” dwellings. The Mayor urged the erection of large blocks of flats in the newly cleared areas rather than taking acres of agricultural land but instead eyes turned to the County Council smallholdings and poultry farms on the north of the town, already separated from Milton Road by a line of houses. Gilbert Road had been established shortly after the Great War and sold off to speculative developers who had erected villas but other development had paused for the Second. Now it was all systems go again. Soon the landscape was changing as roads were laid and plots pegged out.

Not all residents relished departure to pastures new; their small houses might be over a century old, with a blank wall at the back, inadequate ventilation, lavatories or drainage but they were in the New Town or Fitzroy Street areas with their local amenities and community spirit. To some, particularly young mothers with children, the new Arbury could appear bleak and unwelcoming. As the vast estate mushroomed and new phases expanded towards Kings Hedges Road some thought it less of an estate than a New Town – but without the facilities of a new town. An Editorial of December 1968 described it as “an urban wilderness, a dormitory suburb with no life of its own”, others, termed it “slumburbia”, “like a prairie” and “completely soulless”.

The plan unveiled in February 1955 had included provision for shops, schools, a pub, cinema and two churches. The cinema did not materialise but the church did. For a while the congregation met in individual houses but then an army hut was bought for their first church. Then in July 1957 Princess Margaret came to lay the foundation stone of the new Church of the Good Shepherd a building designed to play an essential role in providing a community spirit to the rapidly-expanding population. In October 1976 she was back for a service of dedication of the cross on the top of the church to mark its completion – although it was not actually completed as was originally planned. A tower that formed part of the architect’s design had not been built, and a large window had been put in the west wall instead. The Princess was welcomed by the vicar, the Rev Martin Suter and outside by a crowd of mothers and children who huddled in the rain for an hour, awaiting the Royal party, who were a little late due to the bad weather

The soaked crowds did not have to wait so long for the Princess' departure, for she left earlier than scheduled for her next appointment, a visit to Langdon House in Chesterton, the home she had opened during her 1957 visit. Here she met some of the original residents, including the oldest, 99-year-old Mrs Alice Standiforth, and the matron Mrs Elieen Mackinder. And, perhaps intent on not being late twice in a day, the Princess was whisked off 15 minutes ahead of schedule for the inauguration of the University Clinical Medical School at Addenbrooke's Hospital. As news of her early departure was telephoned ahead it threw the department into panic stations, but they rallied around and ensured the entrance hall was packed with patients, visitors and medical staff in time for her arrival. Then it was time for lunch and a tour of facilities accompanied by the University Vice Chancellor, Miss Rosemary Murray, when she was introduced to the Chairman of the Area Health Authority, Mrs Pauline Burnet and the Regius Professor of Physic, Prof. John Butterfield. Princess Margaret met various people on her tour, including 10-month-old Nicola Woolnough from St Neots, cradled in the arms of Staff Nurse Jillie Walker. If you recognise other faces amongst those snapped by the News photographers please let me know.

Then at the end of a hectic day the Royal visitor sped off, leaving scores of people with their personal memories of the day they met the Princess. [PICTURES OF THE VISIT FROM NEWS LIBRARY FILES]

**

The weekend's downpours, turning roads into rivers and lawns into lakes will doubtless bring forth a mass of memories of the great floods of days gone by – and I look forward to a bumper postbag. But older generations also experienced flooding, as a picture of Jesus Green footbridge shows. It was taken in August 1879 when more than three inches of water fell in six hours. The Cambridge Chronicle reported that “the lightning and thunder were awful in grandeur and the downpour of rain and hail terrible”. The Cam flooded at Midsummer Common and the Jesus Lock footbridge stood only inches higher than the river. The scene was captured by the Simpson Brothers – Charles and John. If you have other old photos of ancient floods I should be pleased to see them [SCAN OF FLOOD]

**

It may have been a bit like taking coals to Newcastle, introducing a group from Duxford and Whittlesford to an aircraft museum. But like everybody else they were captivated by the collection of mementoes crammed into the Witchford Airfield Museum, off the Lancaster Way business park near Ely, and listened entranced to Barry Aldridge's account of the losses suffered there during the war. Duxford local historians have been busy collecting reminiscences of their village and have just issued a booklet crammed full of fascinating stories of their own Second World War incidents.

If there was an air raid the Home Guards on duty with the Wardens were expected to patrol the village. A more regular duty was to keep a look out from the tower of St John's Church for enemy parachutists and the like. Joe Bright remembered what it was like. “I used to have to go up there all hours. All we had was ladders tied together to get up through that little door. No lights. We stood on top of the tower to watch” They were not always taken seriously. Alf Cutter recalled “Poor old Timmy Gray was on duty out there one night and us boys locked the door at the bottom. We could hear him shouting, 'let me out'. He was a great man. He threw a sandbag at a Bren gun carrier and blew it up one night in one of their mock battles”

In spite of the watchers, on one occasion a German airman walked unmolested through Duxford; Grace and Irene Chandler recounted the incident. “The Wardens were supposed to be on guard that night and who should walk by but a German airman who had come out of a plane. And they didn't see him. ... He was shot down or something. Anyway, Stella saw him go by and my aunt saw him go by our two houses. ... He went up to the aerodrome ... He gave himself up. But those fellows were supposed to be on guard. They never see him; they let him go by". Joe Bright, a Home Guard at the time, maintained that he did see the airman, but decided to leave him be: "I lived over the other side of the road when he came up this side. I let him go. I got to go to work! I was at the paper mill then. I thought, well, I don't think I'm going to bother about you, so I let him go". "Duxford Remembered", by John Patrick is on sale at Duxford Post Office or from Jim Longstaff, 88 St John's Street, Duxford, CB2 4RA for £4.50, plus 84p postage. [DUXFORD PHOTO FROM NEWS FILES]

Do you have memories of another local company, Spicers Stationery works at Sawston. A fine photograph features in the re-issued 'Memories of Cambridge' book produced some years ago by True North Books. It shows a photograph taken in the mid 1950s. Whilst several firms have their own sections in the book Spicers does not. The author wonders just what the young women featured would have to say about working conditions were like in that vast room filled with machinery. If you remember, please drop me a line.

And do you remember Baldry's, the soft-drinks firm. One of their lorries features in the foreground of a photograph of Cambridge Market Place. They started in Gold Street, Cambridge in 1923 and by 1969 had taken over another old-established firm, Barker and Wadsworth, and were producing some 800 dozen bottles of mineral water an hour. They later relocated to Newmarket Road and then to Sawston in 1979. Memories of Cambridge, published by True North Books, £9.99 [SCAN OF MARKET HILL & BALDRYS]

Joan Watts writes (nee Williams) to say she always looks forward to "Memories" each week and was delighted to see the picture of the Girls' Central School. She was in it, with her friends Eileen Howard, Patsy Blows, Joan Pilsworth & Joyce Pledger. Some of the teachers were Miss Morley, Miss Pauley, Miss Shrive & Miss Shedd. Another old-girl has pointed out that all the teachers were unmarried – and if they did marry they had to leave their job. This seems incredible today – do you remember other instances?

Memories 31st October 2001, by Mike Petty

Saturday afternoon saw scores of Cambridgeshire local historians making their way to Madingley Hall, the home of the Cambridge University Board of Continuing Education. There in the splendour of the Saloon, overlooking the croquet lawn, antiquarians from Thriplow, Littleport and Duxford mixed and mingled; Huntingdonshire Local Historians discussed CD-ROMs with Cambridgeshire Family Historians and everywhere people compared experiences – and of course shared memories.

The occasion that had brought them together was the 50th birthday of the Cambridgeshire Local History Society, which had been established in the distant post-war days to encourage individuals and groups to investigate the fascinating history on their doorsteps. Today societies have mushroomed and in villages and towns throughout the county halls are regularly packed to hear talks on a myriad of local historical topics.

But many do more than listen. There has been a tremendous outpouring of publications recording the history of virtually everything, from football clubs to bus companies, chapels to war memorials, families to communities. Each is the result of hours of research and writing but much of it appears and disappears without wide acclaim; indeed so great is the output that few bookshops have space to stock even a fraction, not even newspaper columns can mention them all.

So as part of their celebrations the Cambridgeshire Local History Society decided to express their appreciation of the work being undertaken locally. There is one place where all publications come together, and Chris Jakes, Librarian of the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library, Cambridge, sifted through the hundreds of books and pamphlets to produce an initial listing of contenders. These titles were then assessed by Society members each of whom had the unenviable task of producing a short-list which in turn was discussed and debated until finally just seven titles were left on the table.

They included a history of Girton Baptist Church from 1859-1934 with its description of members of the early church, such as William Hoppett, a stone-breaker on the roads who would attend chapel arrayed in the old time quaintness of knee breeches, and careless of all rules of pronunciation would announce the hymns thus: "Let us now sing, to the praise and glory of God, the 465th hume" [SUBS – IT SHOULD READ 'HUME']. Like many such congregations they suffered the loss of one of their former Sunday School boys during the Great War that so devastated communities. John Symond researched both that and the Second World War so that when the names are read out in his village on Armistice Sunday the sacrifice of the "Heroes of Over" can be remembered.

Peggy Day has been writing the story of Quy and its neighbourhood for many years and even when the pile of publications had been weeded down, there were still two of her works left on the table. But not even such a prodigious writer could have two awards, so it went for her title 'Life in Quy', an account of the village – in which she claims there have been no major historical events – from the beginning of time to the year 2000. By contrast Dr Chis Lewis had only a modest task – he was concerned with only 1,000 years of life in the parishes of Kirtling and Upend, producing a detailed piece of research that has been published by the parish council in advance of the long-anticipated final volume of the Victoria County History of Cambridgeshire. The final page was handed over to a thirteen-year-old, Timothy Oates of Kirtling to give his views of what the village might be like in another hundred year's time. He predicts that cities and towns will have become so polluted that villages like Kirtling with clean, fresh air will be for the privileged. It will, however, escape the worst of the expansion of new housing and the only real changes to the older houses will be subtle, with things like the use of alternative power and a greater and wider use of technologies such as the Internet.

One of the most riveting parts of the presentation came when older residents of the villages around Kirtling described how they had embraced this new technology during the production of "Millennium Child". This combines memories of long-time villagers with those of the younger generation and incorporates a CD-ROM to add a new dimension to Cambridgeshire history publications. Peter Hewitt includes no such advances in his concise account of "Fenland: a landscape made by man" but combines ancient maps and old prints to produce a most attractive booklet on an area of Cambridgeshire that can often feel overlooked, that part between Chatteris and Wisbech. Some of my own favourite memories are of travelling on behalf of Cambridge University Board of Continuing Education to take a class way up in Outwell. And when members of that class visited Cambridge and saw for themselves the resources available for fenland history in the City & University Libraries it proved a rewarding experience for everyone.

For most who had made the journey on Saturday it was a trip into unknown territory, and they went away loaded with brochures of courses they could attend at Madingley. But for some it was almost literally on their doorstep. There had to be one publication that was first amongst equals and it was judged to be "Gallows Piece to Bee Garden", a history of a very ordinary village – or so its compilers claim – Dry Drayton. But few villages have had the advantage of a clergyman with the knowledge to produce an authoritative account of his parish – which is what Francis Walker did in 1876. Nearly a century and a quarter later parishioners tuned back to his work as the basis for a new study covering all aspects of their settlement, including its natural history. The result was a 180-page, well-produced volume that had involved many members of the community including the parish council, school and village association. It aimed at keeping alive pride in their village and a determination to conserve all that is of value and is a model for others to emulate –at least in the opinion of the Cambridgeshire Local History Society.

For further details of the Cambridgeshire Local History Society contact Gillian Rushworth, 1a Archers Close, Swaffham Bulbeck CB5 0NG [VILLAGE PICTURES FROM NEWS FILES; SCAN OF A FENLAND DRAINAGE MILL FROM PETER HEWITT'S BOOK; PICTURE TAKEN AT MADINGLEY HALL SATURDAY]

**

Frank Wayman of Over has recently been shown a 'Memories' cutting from 22nd August about the famous 'Parcel People' of 1966. He has special cause to remember them as they lived on his property for about six weeks. He writes: "I had little contact with them. We were especially busy with the fruit harvest during that period and I was working most of the daylight hours. They had many sacks containing old clothes, papers and heaven knows what, which I assume they slept on. I often heard cars pull up during the evening and occasionally saw people handing over food and transferring drink from thermos flasks and on the first occasion the young man came knocking on the back door asking for a large flask to be filled with tea. The wife was a bit apprehensive about this and I gave them strict instructions that a repeat of this behaviour would result in their prompt dismissal. I was told they used to badger people some distance along the street for food and drink, which caused a certain amount of resentment. When the nights grew colder I gave the man my army tank suit which I brought home after the war and thereafter he wore it night and day.

"The time came towards the end of October when I had to tell them to leave because builders were coming in to demolish the shed and re-roof the barn. They were clean in their habits and left no rubbish behind, but where they washed was always a mystery to me as were their sanitary arrangements because I found no evidence anywhere. I came to the conclusion they probably used my loo, which was in an open fronted hovel across the yard, when we were away working. This was in pre-sewerage days and many properties had fresh air loos in buildings away from the house.

"I never knew where they came from or went to. I remember hearing that the lady spent many hours sitting in a pew at the back of the church and passed some of the time writing."
[PARCEL PEOPLE PICTURES IN NEWS BIOG FILES]

Mrs H. Bainbridge (nee Cornwell) from Cambridge says her memory was jogged by my picture of the Central Girls School in 1933; she's there on the second row from the back. She recalls some of the teachers as Miss Churchill (headmistress), Barker, Morley, Pawley, Shedd, Stubblefield, Sykes, Shrive, Howlett, Latimer and Clark. She also has, somewhere, a picture of the May Queen at the school. Shirley Brown from Trumpington confirms that women teachers had to remain unmarried, although in her school in Yorkshire one married lady teacher was allowed back during the Second World War, her husband was fighting overseas. Post-war there was a scramble to train teachers and several emergency colleges were opened to give a one year's intensive training course for primary and secondary-modern teachers. Shirley was one such and on her final school practice taught a class of 48 seven-year-olds! When she actually started teaching in 1956 equal pay for men and women was being phased in - in seven annual increments.

While back on the theme of schooldays, I have had a plea from an Ely lady to ask if anybody can identify the children photographed at Sutton school with headteacher Mr A.W. Williams back in November 1964. They are taking part in what the News described as a 'tape-assisted reading lesson'. Do you remember this form of learning. [SCAN OF SUTTON SCHOOL IS NO. 366 ON THE MEMORY LANE, ELY AND THE FENS CDS WITH SANDRA]

Memories 7th November 2001, by Mike Petty

Beryl Frost from Cambridge has written me a most interesting letter prompted by several memories that have been generated in recent weeks. Prziborsky the hairdresser was her uncle Fred. "His wife had ladies hairdressing on the first floor; they had two sons Norman and Tony, neither of them followed the trade. Ram Yard was the yard to the left of the hairdressers. Several Jewish families from London were evacuated there during the war and I was friendly with the Bogomonos. Sid Maltby the cobbler had his workshop next door; he was an extremely kind man and made sandals for most of the evacuees because they had no shoes. I can still remember one of the many epigrams he had on his wall: 'The devil wants your souls to ruin – Sid Maltby wants your soles to mend'

Other Jewish children aged about four came from Austria or Germany. Zickma & Zilla were the youngest. Paula, who worked at Ramsey & Muspratt, the photographers in Post Office Terrace, took care of them. She later went to America and took Zilla with her and I believe Zickma was adopted by a Cambridge family. Ernst Bergman was a mechanic at King and Harper salvage in Jesus Lane. Dagmar Mizanski was a special friend of mine, we worked at Robert Sayle. When I first befriended them they were billeted at the house next door to the old Central Boys School on Parkside. They came to England with the clothes they stood up in and precious little else. The house at Parkside was bare, bunk beds against the walls. Gradually they found other accommodation. What wonderful people they were in times of despair. At the end of the war the Red Cross searched for their families back home in Austria. Dagmar was told her brothers and father had gone to the gas chambers and her mother killed; that was when she decided to go to relatives in America. I often wonder where they are now."

Beryl has a question: "When at Chesterton Girls School there was a scheme where we went to help at Addenbrooke's Hospital and the Leys School (also a hospital then). We wore white headbands with a red cross and white apron. I remember I went to the children's ward almost every night. I used to read to the children, especially a lovely little girl named June. She had a tumour on the brain and unfortunately after an operation she lost her sight. When she was discharged I used to cycle to Waterbeach every Sunday to see her – even through the winter in blackout. The Leys School was for wounded soldiers, friend or foe. One evening I was asked to take supper to a patient in a side ward. He was bound from head to foot in bandages. I was shocked and went back to the kitchen but a nurse insisted I feed him supper. From then on he was my first call. Miss Tweed was the 'first aid' teacher and organised the rota. Does anyone have photographs of us marching through Cambridge on Remembrance Day 1943-4?"
[SCAN OF PRZIBORSKY'S SHOP, RAM YARD/ROUND CHURCH STREET]

More memories that time are contained in a wonderful booklet of memories produced by Addenbrooke's Hospital League of Nurses. They record how during the war the Ministry commandeered the Leys School and sent the boys to Scotland for the duration. Addenbrooke's was asked to run it as a hospital, so baths, basins, sinks etc had to be installed together with three hundred and fifty beds. It was decided it should be established as a hospital capable of dealing with all types of cases, but that it should primarily be used for treatment of service cases and Emergency Medical Service patients.

Margaret Williams was one of those who transferred over. Her memories were recorded in the book: "I can remember being informed between 7p.m. & 8 p.m. in the evening that a hundred and fifty wounded soldiers would be arriving during the night about 3a.m. I went to the Dining Room where the nurses were having supper and asked for volunteers. They all volunteered although they knew there was no extra salary or time off. We did not need them all so we selected the number required and sent them off to bed to sleep for a few hours. They had already worked a full day. We called them when the convoy arrived”.

She was full of praise for the medics nearer the front line: “The standard of treatment carried out by our Medical Staff in France was of a very high order. The wounded patients' limbs were placed in plasters for protection. The date the wound occurred, the type of wound, the treatment given, any dangerous drugs administered on the way over, the name, dose, time and date were all clearly written on the plaster. We had no difficulty in picking up where they had left off. There is no doubt that many, many, of our men's lives and limbs were saved by this prompt and efficient treatment”.

They gave the best of treatment to soldiers from both sides: “A convoy of German prisoners of war (some of them Colonels) arrived one night at The Leys. They were kept separate from our boys. Their wounds were treated as were our own men and they were given the same food for which they were grateful. It was more than they expected. They were with us until their wounds healed, and then the military took them over.”

Mary Ayers Brown was another of those on duty. “I was the nursing Sister of School House, which was used for German Prisoners. I recall one specific night waiting up until the early hours of the morning for a convoy of German prisoners, approximately fifty of them. We were given strict instructions as to our responsibility for them, as well as significant phrases to use to enquire as to their condition. We had a guard present all the time. It is a good thing that most of us were not fluent in the German language so we didn't understand that many times they were swearing at us when we treated their wounds and of course after we left the bedside they shouted Heil Hitler, which we naturally ignored. It was quite an experience.”

Her sister Joan – now Joan Garrett - was Night Sister at Addenbrooke's where Griffith and Hatton wards were emptied to await the wounded. She recalled: “Griffith received a convoy of Italian prisoners of war, but later the ward was converted as an emergency ward to be used for gas contaminated patients. Oxygen had been piped to every bed, and all trolleys laid for emergency work. The Consultants attached to the 14th Eastern General were housed at Kimbolton Castle and they attended all convoy patients. The first convoys we had were Germans. They had been flown to Salisbury Plain after being treated with field dressings & arrived at Cambridge station at 2 a.m! Those who had been given morphine were clearly marked with a label M tied to their clothing. Very few could speak any English at all. The medical staff were there promptly and examined each patient carefully. Those requiring surgery were dealt with in order and very promptly. The theatres were ready to receive them. Most of the men were quiet and easy to care for, though I do still remember one or two very difficult individuals.

“After about a week and as soon as they were fit, the men left hospital and were I think transferred by the army to Prisoner of War camps. One thing I remember is that the Germans had lovely voice. When the lights went down at 8 p.m. they started to sing German songs. I enjoyed this as I sat writing the night report!

“A sentry was stationed on the first floor of the hospital between Griffith and Hatton, just outside Matrons office! He remained there while the Prisoners of War were in the hospital. Later we had convoys of our own men. Many or most of them had been in concentration camps for quite a long time and were found as the army overtook the camps towards the end of the war. Some had had a long journey home after wartime or years in captivity. Almost all were very sick and in a poor condition. I still have a very vivid memory of one or two - some were so shocked and shaken they were unable to converse. Eventually, as they were well enough they were transferred to hospitals nearer to their homes, leaving Addenbrooke's free to receive the next convoy.

“Hard work but Happy” is a remarkable record of the dedication of generations of Addenbrooke’s nurses. Their memories and anecdotes will ring bells with anybody who has ever nursed or who remembers the old Addenbrooke’s Hospital. It is available from Gill Winsor, The Moors, Nags Head Lane, Hargrave, Northants, NN9 6BJ for £5.75, including postage. Any profits go to the Addenbrooke’s League of Nurses Benevolent Fund. [PICTURES FROM NEWS FILES]

Down the road at Duxford they had other memories of visiting Germans!

If there was an air raid the Home Guards on duty with the Wardens were expected to patrol the village. A more regular duty was to keep a look out from the tower of St John’s Church for enemy parachutists and the like. Joe Bright remembered what it was like. “I used to have to go up there all hours. All we had was ladders tied together to get up through that little door. No lights. We stood on top of the tower to watch” They were not always taken seriously. Alf Cutter recalled “Poor old Timmy Gray was on duty out there one night and us boys locked the door at the bottom. We could hear him shouting, ‘let me out’. He was a great man. He threw a sandbag at a Bren gun carrier and blew it up one night in one of their mock battles”

In spite of the watchers, on one occasion a German airman strolled unmolested through Duxford; Grace and Irene Chandler recounted the incident. “The Wardens were supposed to be on guard that night and who should walk by but a German airman who had come out of a plane. And they didn’t see him. ... He was shot down or something. Anyway, Stella saw him go by and my aunt saw him go by our two houses. ... He went up to the aerodrome ... He gave himself up. But those fellows were supposed to be on guard. They never see him; they let him go by”. Joe Bright, a Home Guard at the time, maintained that he did see the airman, but decided to leave him be: “I lived over the other side of the road when he came up this side. I let him go. I got to go to work! I was at the paper mill then. I thought, well, I don’t think I’m going to bother about you, so I let him go”. “Duxford Remembered”, by John Patrick is on sale at Duxford Post Office or from Jim Longstaff, 88 St John’s Street, Duxford, CB2 4RA for £4.50, plus 84p postage. [DUXFORD PHOTO FROM NEWS FILES]

**

Suzaune Langford from West Wrattling is compiling a scrapbook of material relating to the village and has come across a mystery photograph that she hopes somebody can identify. It shows a dramatic scene, with a group of villagers gathered near the ruins of a cottage destroyed by fire. One man seems to have lost his head – but doubtless this is a slight malfunction of Edgar Morley’s equipment. He was the Linton newsagent who became a prolific photographer and published several postcard views, of which this is one. But this picture was not taken in Linton – so where is it. If you can help, let me know. [SCAN]

Memories 14 November 2001, by Mike Petty

The news that mortgage rates are the lowest than they have been since 1955 [PLEASE CHECK THIS IS RIGHT!] prompts some thoughts as what life was like all those years ago

A perusal of major and minor news for 1955 makes interesting reading

More and more people were moving into Cambridgeshire with the population increasing much faster than the rest of the country. The number of houses had increased by a third since 1931 but still there were difficulties finding homes. The new Arbury estate was being constructed in Cambridge and planners were advocated extra development in 'necklace' villages to boost the region's population from 18,800 to 25,000 within 20 years. Histon, Impington, Milton, Gt Shelford, Stapleford, Harston, Girton and Fulbourn were earmarked for the biggest expansion. But they should not be built at Fulbourn - it had been developed as far as it could be developed & they were already packed like sardines one resident complained at an inquiry into a plan for another 500 houses.

There were three cottages to be had in Town Close Fulbourn where in June the charity trustees were seeking £200 each. There might well be another house going beside the railway line, as the 'Sunday Pictorial' reported on 18th December. Five times in the last two years the gates on the level crossing at Teversham Road, Fulbourn had been open when they should have been closed and so were wrecked by passing trains. It happened twice in nine days in 1955 – and the gatekeeper resigned - and then in December it happened again. On each occasion the excuse was "I was called away for personal reasons". Next week the paper returned to the subject – for it had happened again! Only this time there was a difference: only one gate had been wrecked – the engine driver had read the 'Pictorial' story and was braking as he neared the crossing, thinking that the gates might be closed!

Railways were also in the news at Foxton in September where parishioners were fighting to maintain their railway station. Its closure would speed the drift away from the countryside to the town, and there was a lot of development planned for the area which would bring more passengers. The Railway claimed that during September only 69 people had got on trains there, a figure disputed by residents. The situation would be better for commuters at Burwell for diesel trains were to be run on the Mildenhall line by December and, coupled with reduced fares, would it was hoped boost passengers and prevent the line being closed.

But safety concerns were in people's minds. In January 1955 there was an explosion at Lords Bridge station when fire broke out in a hanger containing mustard gas which used for experimental purposes. A radius of 1,000 yards was cordoned off and local people were told that if they developed any rashes they could go to RAF Lords Bridge for treatment. In May a Corporal was awarded the George Medal for his bravery in preventing what might have been a major disaster with spread of toxic vapour over a wide area. He'd gone into the midst of an inferno of toxic smoke searching for casualties and checking appliances to prevent the spread of poison gas.

There were also air disasters with incidents at Bassingbourn in January & at Comberton and Landbeach in February where a Vampire jet crashed in flames narrowly missing the school, rectory and church. Meanwhile other communities were seeking to repair damage caused from the air. Heydon church on the hills near Royston was still wreathed in scaffolding as work continued on the building following a German bomb in 1940; rebuilding would cost over £21,000, mainly funded by the War Damage Commission. Meanwhile Longstanton church was rethatched and Oakington parishioners were seeking help from the Air Ministry for repairs to their church which had been shaken by being under the flight path from the local airfield.

Armistice Sunday 1955 was a time to commemorate the sacrifice of airmen for a memorial window to over 19,000 men of Bomber command lost during the war was unveiled at Ely cathedral. The cathedral had been a landmark for the battered bombers returning home after their raids and in the new window the badge of the Royal Air Force was displayed side by side with that of the Royal New Zealand Air Force - whose men had travelled half-way round the earth to play their part to aid the Mother Country. Other war dead were remembered with the unveiling of the roll of honour at Cambridge Guildhall.

Despite the heroism of the American airmen the owner of Wimpole Hall wanted them out. Her land had been requisitioned in 1940 and two years later the Americans had set up a hutted hospital and a sewage farm just outside the main gate of her stately home. They had returned in 1951 and were still there. Three times they'd smashed the ironwork of the historic gates, and they were always trying to get her trees cut down, she complained.

Elsewhere international relations were being strengthened with the opening of the Bell School of languages in October bringing 50 people from some 22 different countries. New schools were in the pipeline with plans for ultra-modern Queen Edith's school unveiled in October. It would be a secondary grammar constructed on "inter-grid" system costing over £170,000 & be ready by September 1957. Another much-needed facility was also in the offing when in July the Government announced permission for a new Addenbrooke's hospital on Hills road.

Cambridge City Library was celebrating its centenary year & opened a new Reading Room in December, but reading was under pressure because of new developments in the cinema. The Regal got stereo sound in March, the Central in Hobson Street gained cinemascope in June, but the Rex Cinema in Magrath Avenue made the biggest headlines in April when the shocking new Marlon Brando picture "The Wild One" was given a local X-certificate so it could be shown there. Some saw more threat from television and the Independent Television Authority reported a strong signal in a test transmission in September.

Some things never change. Cambridge was a transport blackspot - parking was so bad it was deterring people from coming to shop there, said the News in November 1955. And when shoppers arrived in Cambridge there was danger crossing the road. The new Highway Code had been launched at Cambridge Guildhall in March and was soon selling well - but what were the Belisha beacons it referred to? They were playthings for undergraduates - 34 had been damaged or stolen between January and April. A Caius College man was fined £2 after a policeman saw him jump up and pull the beacon off the one in St John's street before dropping it on the ground. They were also favourite souvenirs: police found two suspended from the ceiling of a Downing college room. The student claimed he had not known where the first one came from - it just appeared - but it looked out of place there on its own - so he took another to go with it!

But traffic problems did not prevent the crowds descending on the city centre in October to get a glimpse of the young Queen Elizabeth and her dashing Prince, Philip. "He's smashing - but she's super" was the verdict as she inspected guard of honour of the Cambridgeshire Regiment - newly constituted as an Airborne Light Regiment - which was drawn up outside the Guildhall in the pouring rain, whilst the Duke sought refuge inside! They both appeared on the balcony to wave to the crowds below. Their main event was the opening of the new University School of Veterinary Medicine in Madingley Road before moving on to Girton college where they met members of the recently founded New Hall. The Royal couple left by car en route for the train to London, which they caught at Histon railway station.

But the main issue on everybody's mind was housing.

I WILL E-MAIL ADDITIONAL NOTES ON THE CAMBRIDGE HOUSING SCENE ON MONDAY AFTERNOON

**

A recent picture of the Spicers Stationery works at Sawston in the mid 1950s (Memories 24th October) has brought a letter from Helen O'Donovan (nee Wood) of Comberton. Her father, a chartered accountant, took a post in the company's offices in 1930 and stayed until 1947.

Helen writes: “As a child I remember being taken along when parties of visitors were shown round the mill and still have memories of the paper-making process. Being high-quality paper it was made from rags which were purchased in bulk from rag merchants. Rag fibres give the paper much greater strength than wood pulp or recycled paper. The first stage in the process was the sorting. In a vast room sat the ‘rag-women’, a cheerful, chatty band, who had to eliminate all unsuitable materials such as old corsets from the rest. Each lady sat at a wooden sorting table to which was fixed a sharp upright blade for slicing off buttons”. The rags were boiled down into a greyish mush and then bleached before beginning the process that would result in enormous rolls of dry paper. Helen never worked at the factory end, where the paper was made up into pads and envelopes – but did help out in the mill canteen.

Gillian Collins (nee Dockerill) from Woodhurst thinks she was the second girl from the front in the picture, just behind her friend Helen. She would have been 15 or 16 years old at the time. The machines were very old and very often broke down and did not fold the envelopes correctly

Memories 21st November 2001, by Mike Petty

A couple of weeks ago Beryl Frost recalled how when at Chesterton Girls School she went to help at Addenbrooke’s Hospital & visited the children’s’ ward almost every night. She remembered: “I used to read to the children, especially a lovely little girl named June. She had a tumour on the brain and unfortunately after an operation she lost her sight. When she was discharged I used to cycle to Waterbeach every Sunday to see her – even through the winter in blackout”

This immediately rang a bell for Martin Howlett of Waterbeach for this girl was his cousin, June Carter. The brave little girl would not tell her parents that she was going blind until she started to bump into things. June died from her tumour but in the family album Martin has a photograph of her taken outside her house with members of the Waterbeach Salvation Army whose hall was next door. Her grieving parents penned a poignant tribute to her in the back of the album, a sentiment shared by Beryl.

If we had all the world to give
We’d give it yes and more
To see her smiling face again
To speak to her once more.
Some may think that we forget her
When they often see us smile
But they little know the heartache
That’s hidden all the while

SCAN OF PHOTO AND VERSE

Such personal tributes mean everything to those who are seeking to trace their family trees; many hundreds of them journey to the Family History Centre at the Church of Latter Day Saints in Cherry Hinton Road, Cambridge where there is a room devoted to genealogical sources. The church has been undergoing renovation and on Saturday evening there was a celebration concert and buffet to mark its reopening – though it will be next year before the Family History Centre is operational again. Scores of people, young and old, mixed and mingled; amongst them was Leonard Reed who has for many years been researching and publishing material on the church’s history. His latest volume is an account of Elijah Larkin, a Cambridge policeman whose detailed journal of the period from 1854 to 1867 forms the basis of the book. It records his early life in Chesterton, his conversion to the Mormon faith and subsequent emigration.

It provides a unique insight into the policeman's lot in Victorian Cambridge. On 1st August 1861 Elijah joined some 2,3000 other people at Cambridge Botanic Gardens, though he had no time to admire the flowers, as he noted: "Blondin, the great Niagara Falls tight-rope walker walked across a rope 45 feet high. Carried a man, wheeled a barrow and done other extraordinary feats across it. Also walked with his head in a sack across it. There were several London thieves present and as the people crowded out at the close of the performances they commenced work, and Mr. Coward of Cambridge and Mons Perritt of Newmarket lost their watches. We immediately arrested four of the thieves and took them to the station and searched them but did not find the watches. No doubt they were either put into the persons' pockets or thrown away. We then marched them to the railway station where we found seven more of the gang and searched them on the platforms, and one woman I took to the Railway Hotel and had her searched by Miss Newman, the landlord's daughter. We then kept all of them in custody until the train was ready to start then put them all in one carriage and gave all the passengers notice to take care of their pockets, and away they went back to London."

Life in those days could be violent as Elijah reported on 10th November 1862: "This evening as it was the Prince of Wales birthday, the town was partially illuminated and a great number of people assembled on the Market Hill. At about 8 o'clock a mob of about 50 or 70 university men came four deep onto the hill but the town people showed no desire for a row, and gave way for them to pass round the hill, and went opposite Rose Crescent. They ran out in skirmishing order with the corner of the Gowns evidently loaded among the people and commenced to strike some, but it was not returned by the Town, and a body of our men came up. They were dispersed but exclaimed they would be revenged for Friday the 5th work. They then patrolled the principal streets of the town shouting, "Gown, Gown, Gown", and got together about 100 and came on the Hill again, but the proctors being sent for by the superintendent they soon dispersed". For a couple of hours the police kept town and gown apart "until at last a body of about 20 or 30 University men came down Rose Crescent, and we took a stick from one of them and then some of the University men struck our men, and at it we went and ultimately succeeded in capturing two University men and took them to the station. Shortly after a cry was raised that University man has a pistol pointing at the people. Myself and Inspector Thompson followed and I caught hold of his arm and took the pistol which was broke from him"

When Elijah decided to hand in his truncheon in 1862 and make the pilgrimage to Salt Lake City, Utah, he found his wife Sarah very uncertain about the move. But together they made the long journey by sea, railway, steamboat and wagon train to their new world. Their relationship remained stormy, especially after Elijah took his second wife - polygamy was then an acceptable form of marriage in the church. He was later ordained a high priest and died in 1905.

Twenty-five years ago today another group of family enthusiasts gathered just a bit further along Cherry Hinton Road when eighty couples, some of them travelling hundreds of miles, came to celebrate the Golden Jubilee of the Cherry Hinton Road United Reformed Church. They all had one thing in common – they were married there. The "earliest" married couple there were Arthur "Snowy" Chapman, then aged 64, and his wife Irene who were married in March 1933. He had once been a salesman at Laurie and McConnals. Mr Chapman recalled that as a child his playmate was the future wife of one of the two retired ministers at the service, the Rev Clifford Taylor, who was at the church from 1948-1961. Inspiration for the service had come from a television programme about a vicar who organised a service for couples he had married a decade before and the Rev Stuart Smith decided to borrow and expand the idea. The 80 couples who attended represented about a tenth of the marriages solemnised at the church up to 1976. The News photographer was there to record the event – do you recognise yourself or a friend in the picture taken on 21st November 1976? [NEG 4087.76.24]

While these two buildings continue to serve their congregations another is coming to the end of its community life. The York Street Mission, off Newmarket Road, Cambridge was established in 1885 by three ladies, one of whom quarrelled with the others and went off and founded another, Peoples Mission, around the corner. In 1905 it was bought for St Columba's Church to bring Christianity and companionship to residents in what was then the poorest area of Cambridge. One of the greatest strengths was the joint Bible Class and Club which combined religious studies with a strong social side, with games of badminton, billiards, lexicon and draughts, an annual social & a sick club. From 1923 to 1944 it flourished under the guidance of Labour Party activist Alex Wood, who worked at the Cavendish Laboratory and encouraged visiting scientists and academics to visit and talk to its members. In those days the bible classes were well attended, the hall being packed out, especially when Uncle David and Auntie Flossie brought their Band of Hope film shows, but after the Second World War things changed. The Mission closed, it became home to a youth club and the Cambridgeshire College of Further Education & now the building is scheduled for demolition and rebuilding.

York Street Mission is etched in memory of Snowy Easton of Long Road, Cambridge, who grew up in the streets around "Dobblers' Hole" – a rubbish strewn rag-and-bone yard. His grandmother was its caretaker and Snowy remembers polishing the wooden floor until it gleamed; he treasures a snap of a wedding reception of Percy Easton and Ida Ryder following their wedding at Cherry Hinton church about 1927, with himself as a very young lad in the front row. Later in his capacity as funeral director he buried many of the guests. His aunt Miss Gertrude Easton ran Guides and Brownies there for more than 50 years, many of them in a wheelchair, & received a medal and commendation for her work from the Chief Guide, Lady Baden Powell in 1974. SCAN OF WEDDING RECEPTION, OTHER PIX FROM NEWS LIBRARY

Another long-serving Brownie leader was in the news in November 1976. Miss Betty Macleod had run the 1st Cambridge Brownies, believed to be the oldest pack in the world, since 1919. She had a Brownie hut at the bottom of her garden in Newton Road with meetings in her own home when wet. The number of meetings she had missed could be counted on the fingers of one hand, but now she learned that under a national edict all guiders had to give up their warrants on reaching the age of 65 – and she was 79! But before she handed over the pack she was planning a diamond jubilee party for past and present members at the Scout and Guide Hut at Newnham Croft School. According to her records the first meeting of the pack took place on January 3rd 1917 in Downing College. It was started by Miss M.A. Gaskell who in 1911 pioneered the Guide movement in Cambridge by founding the 1st Cambridge Guide Company. The first groups were called 'Rosebuds', but the name never found favour and Baden Powell had suggested the name 'Brownies' instead. NEWS NEG 4070.76.26; PIX FROM NEWS FILES; SCAN OF GUIDE CAMP PROBABLY AT CHIPPENHAM 1930S, FROM EDNA ARNOLD OF CAMBRIDGE – 64.50

Mrs Grace Hughes from Royston writes that during the Second World War she visited a soldier in a convalescent home in a big house on the Gog Magog Hills. She asks if anybody remembers it. This would have been the mansion once owned by the Godolphin Osborne family, the Dukes of Leeds, that Sir Harold Gray purchased in 1904. It seems to have been a large rambling structure of no great distinction, though over the centuries it had produced an interesting accumulation of chimneys, which was about the only part of the house that was easily visible as the rest was virtually covered in creepers. After Sir Harold died in 1951 the house, then in a seriously neglected state with outbreaks of dry rot, passed to his son, Terence Gray. He wished to dispose of the Wandlebury estate and approached the County Council to see whether they would purchase the area and turn it into public open space; they were interested in the land, but they had no use for the house itself. After various discussions the council dropped out and the Cambridge Preservation Society, who had offered the county

75% of the purchase price, stepped in to make an offer on their own behalf, which was accepted.

The magnificent Wandlebury ring and surrounding land was to be preserved and made available to the public, but the house itself was another matter. They sought advice on the practicality of converting the mansion into a number of residences but found it was not practicable to preserve it. So in 1955 the house was demolished, though the Cupola Stable Block was preserved and still stands in the centre of the Wandlebury ring, visited by thousands of people each year.

Grace Hughes also says that during the period 1934-1936 she belonged to The Robins, a young people's group organised through the Robin Goodfellow column of the CDN, that maintained a cot at Addenbrooke's Hospital. Every year a concert was given for the Robins which was held in the Guildhall and every child on leaving was given a bar of Cadbury's milk chocolate. Are there any other Robins who remember this, she asks.

In 1964 Tesco opened their first Cambridge store in Regent Street. Here Donald Pears signs records for his fans at the store; a photo lent by Snowy Easton [SCAN]

Memories 28th November 2001, by Mike Petty

It was in December 1976 that the news broke; though it was news that had been expected for several months. The curator of the Cambridge Folk Museum, Miss Enid Porter, was retiring because of ill-health, after running it single-handed since 1947. Under Enid had the museum's popularity and size had grown considerably.

The Museum had been started following an exhibition of folk items by the Women's Institute in 1936. Cambridge Rotarians had launched an appeal for a folk museum and eventually the present premises in Castle Street were acquired.

Enid had taken over from Reginald Lambeth who one day had been passing a demolition site when he saw a complete Georgian shopfront. Thinking it would be a useful addition to the Folk Museum he asked permission to take it away - but was refused. Nothing daunted Mr Lambeth made numerous nocturnal visits on his bicycle bringing a portion away at a time, until eventually the whole shopfront was rebuilt in the museum. It still stands in the yard.

Enid Porter experienced similar difficulties in acquiring items for the Museum - one might almost say "her" museum - for in many minds the two were completely synonymous. Enid was the Museum the Museum was Enid; she provided a human face to what might otherwise be an obscure institution and people need a face they can relate to - for it is often the family's treasured possession they are giving away, they need to feel it appreciated and cared for.

In 1958 a large collection of records relating to fenland history were acquired from an old fenman - and to the fenman Cambridge can be a remote and unwelcoming place. But Enid had a feeling for the area and their people and assisted W.H. Barrett and Arthur Randell to set down their memories and tales of the fens in books which are to be found, in many a local home. Books that people read who never read anything but newspapers or magazines.

Enid Porter had an honours degree in Modern Languages, had post graduate teacher training, was awarded honorary degrees from the Open University and the University of Cambridge. She was an expert - yet she was also prepared to clean the museum windows, to run the museum single-handed on a pittance of a salary. She would sit in her small office with its electric fire and chat to visitors, learning things which would otherwise have been lost - the most valuable members of society she said in 1968 - are people in their 70s and 80s, we have so much to learn from them.

But she also had much to give; an authority who would always be there to answer the multitude of questions that visitors asked - and 1200 schoolchildren toured her museum in 1968 alone. For Enid know each item and its story.

She shared that information, writing over 70 articles in newspapers, magazines and journals on topics such as fenland barges, witchcraft, woad, public baths or skating. Then there were her books such as the Josiah Chater diaries of Cambridge Victorian life, and of course her major work on Cambridgeshire customs and folklore - over 400 pages about the Madingley plough boys, fenland beliefs, cures for lumbago, rhymes and rags.

Enid shared to her knowledge too in her public lectures, in villages or in Cambridge guildhall following the annual meeting of the Folk Museum Association showing slides and telling stories about them which were taken from no book, but learned from her visitors during hours of patient discussion.

In 1971 there was great excitement about the possible arrival of local radio; draft programmes were mooted - news from the Fitzwilliam Museum, a live report from rehearsals at the Arts Theatre, Cambridge teenagers would present their own choice of music and the city councillors explain their views on proposed rent rises. At peak evening listening there would be a major treat: Enid Porter would talk for an hour about fenland life 50 years ago. Local radio did not arrive just then but and many hundreds listened enthralled to her tales of Christmas pant which were broadcast on Radio Cambridgeshire on Christmas day 1982. By then television had discovered the knowledge and interest housed in the museum and its curator.

By 1975 over 15,000 people were visiting but many more found the doors closed, Miss Porter was ill and there was of course no deputy to call on, she retired the following year and died in January 1984.

Now the Folk Museum stands poised on the brink of an ambitious expansion programme that will see the old curator's cottage replaced with additional galleries and the lecture facilities it so badly needs. Once more the future is bright. [SCAN OF FEN EXHIBITS AT FOLK MUSEUM, PIX FROM NEWS FILES]

After Enid's departure various curators have played their own part in the museum's development. One of those was Nick Mansfield who has gone on to become Director of the People's History Museum and Research Fellow in the Department of History at the University of Manchester. Nick's own latest publication was launched at the Ironbridge Gorge Museum, Coalbrookdale, last week. It is a study of English farmworkers and local patriotism between 1900 and 1930. Much of the research is based on the area around Shropshire and Herefordshire but there is a section on the Cambridgeshire volunteers who came forward in 1914 - though initially few did. In part this was caused by there being nowhere local to join up, Sam Fairweather being one who walked 27 miles to Bury St Edmunds to enlist - only being he was too old.

George Ellis was successful in his application and had a drink to celebrate. He was found drunk and disorderly and his company commander refused to have him back in his unit - 'they could not be justified in allowing the nation to pay for the training of such a man'. Newmarket stablemen - fine, fit, young men - were also rejected - until the Suffolk regiment decided to reduce height and chest measurements for recruits

Some men gave up their jobs to join up, but were turned down because the administration could not cope. They refused to go home since they now had no job to go back to. Cambridge University and the colleges guaranteed to provide work once the war was over, Sir Charles Walderston at Newton Hall also made up the pay of any of his men who enlisted. Cambridge Corn Exchange became a base for the 11th Suffolks until May 1915 – Nick’s dad remembers visiting his uncles there, to collect their washing. Such personal memories do much to bring the great national and international events alive.

Nick Mansfield’s study is published by Ashgate of Aldershot and will hardly become a best seller, priced as it is at £40. But he had deposited a copy in the Cambridgeshire Collection at Lion Yard Library where he himself spent much of his time in earlier years. ‘English farmworkers and local patriotism, 1900-1930’. ISBN 0754602974

Enid Porter recorded various Christmas traditions in her monumental 400-page book ‘Cambridgeshire customs and folklore’. She mentions Mummers’ Plays at Barton and Grantchester, with children with blackened faces parading the village and collecting money; there were Town Waits who paraded the centre of town entertaining people with their music and singing. She mentions Bellmen’s Verses – but not Father Christmas. So can you help fill a gap in the Christmas story? What are your memories of Santa Claus – write to Mike Petty at the News [SANTA PIX FROM NEWS FILE]

**

Mrs Grace Hughes from Royston writes that during the Second World War she visited a soldier in a convalescent home in a big house on the Gog Magog Hills. She asks if anybody remembers it. This would have been the mansion once owned by the Godolphin Osborne family, the Dukes of Leeds, that Sir Harold Gray purchased in 1904. It seems to have been a large rambling structure of no great distinction, though over the centuries it had produced an interesting accumulation of chimneys, which was about the only part of the house that was easily visible as the rest was virtually covered in creepers. After Sir Harold died in 1951 the house, then in a seriously neglected state with outbreaks of dry rot, passed to his son, Terence Gray. He wished to dispose of the Wandlebury estate and approached the County Council to see whether they would purchase the area and turn it into public open space; they were interested in the land, but they had no use for the house itself. After various discussions the council dropped out and the Cambridge Preservation Society, who had offered the county 75% of the purchase price, stepped in to make an offer on their own behalf, which was accepted.

The magnificent Wandlebury ring and surrounding land was to be preserved and made available to the public, but the house itself was another matter. They sought advice on the practicality of converting the mansion into a number of residences but found it was not practicable to preserve it. So in 1955 the house was demolished, though the Cupola Stable Block was preserved and still stands in the centre of the Wandlebury ring, visited by thousands of people each year.

Grace Hughes also says that during the period 1934-1936 she belonged to The Robins, a young people’s group organised through the Robin Goodfellow column of the CDN, that maintained a cot at Addenbrooke’s Hospital. Every year a concert was given for the Robins which was held in the Guildhall and every child on leaving was given a bar of Cadbury’s milk chocolate. Are there any other Robins who remember this, she asks.

Pat Houghton from Foxton has personal memories of the Royal visit of October 1955, for she was one of the New Hall undergraduates who met the Queen at Girton College – but it was in the morning, not afternoon as I reported, and before she opened the Veterinary School.

In 1964 Tesco opened their first Cambridge store in Regent Street. Here Donald Pears signs records for his fans at the store; a photo lent by Snowy Easton [SCAN]

Memories 5th December 2001 by Mike Petty

It was at the Regal cinema on 19th March 1963 that Cambridge fans got their first glimpse of "a four man 'rock' group with weird hairstyles as a gimmick" who sang and played their current hits "Love Me Do" & "Please Please Me". The four lads from Liverpool, John Lennon, Paul McCartney, George Harrison and Ringo Starr were part of a bill that included bigger name stars such as Chris Montez, Tommy Roe, Debbie Lee & the Viscounts. Despite the wealth of talent the News reporter was not impressed: "The fast moving show was not the best Cambridge audiences have seen"

But then Cambridge audiences were used to these touring shows; Cliff Richard, Adam Faith, Billy Fury & Phil Everley had played the venue in previous months, as had Eden Kane, Dave Clarke and various others. One of the biggest names of all, The Rolling Stones were to appear that September. In fact often so many stars appeared in the same bill that some had to change at the University Arms and run across road to the stage. Sometimes they dined at the Hotel, Rosemary Preston from Cherry Hinton collected Billy J. Kramer's autograph on the back of a dinner menu for the University Arms Hotel on Sunday 11th August 1963 - dinner was 15/-

Rosemary was one of those who used to queue for the pop concerts at the Regal as she recalled in a "Memories" article in September 1998: "One memory I have is of skipping technical college one afternoon with my friends and going to see a show. We got a lad to climb up a drainpipe in the passageway at the side and he came down and opened a fire exit to let us in. We ran up the circle and saw a band on stage rehearsing. We then went through to the restaurant where some of the performers were eating before getting thrown out."

In November 1963 the Beatles returned, but by then their debut album "Please Please Me" had soared to the top of the album charts and a subsequent single, "She Loves You", sold 1.6 million copies in the UK alone. Beatlemania was in full flow. Wherever they went, they were mobbed by screaming fans. For their Cambridge performance they arrived under police escort, and took the stage at the Regal Cinema in front of 4,000 youngsters, mainly girls. The queue for tickets had stretched round the building and been controlled by members of Cambridge Police's 12-strong Vespa motorscooter squad including Roy Coxon, one-time goalkeeper for Cambridge Town Football Club & Jock Urquart. The normal-looking police helmets were reinforced to give extra safety in event of scooter accidents but the crowd were peaceful

The Red Cross had dozens of men ready for fainting or hysteria amongst the 4000 in the audience. Rosemary Preston was there. She recalled in "Memories" how: "We heard nothing because of the screaming, but had a really good time just seeing them. They had the Shelford rugby club at the front of the stage to stop people trying to get onto it. The next morning my mother came to my room with a copy of the Daily Express in her hand with a photograph of me and a couple of my friends at the concert screaming. The caption was "City of learning and culture bends to the sound". The date November 27th, 1963"

After the show, the Fab Four were smuggled out, using a decoy police van. The News reported: "It took the four young Beatles less than a minute to run down a flight of stairs back-stage and scramble into their van. As soon as police sergeant Arthur Quinney, who was driving the van, pulled away from the kerbside, the decoy Black Maria, with headlamps blazing, headed towards the crowds of teenagers."

The following year, the scenes of adulation were repeated worldwide when The Beatles went to America. More than 73 million viewers tuned in to watch them on the Ed Sullivan Show. In 1966 they notched up three number one hits with “Day Tripper”, “Paperback Writer” and “Eleanor Rigby”, and in 1967 they released the album many regard as their masterpiece, “Sgt Pepper’s Lonely Hearts Club Band”. The group went their separate ways in the Seventies, each member having highly successful solo careers. As far as I know neither John, Paul, Ringo nor George returned to Cambridge – or did they – over to you.

If you saw the Beatles in Cambridge or elsewhere share your memories with Mike Petty at the News [SCANS, PIX FROM NEWS FILES]

Memories 12th December 2001, by Mike Petty

It now appears that some of those who flocked to the pop concerts at the Regal in 1963 were not quite sure of the identity of the handsome young heroes in front of them. I refer not to the performers on the stage, but to the performers in front of the stage. They were not members of Shelford Rugby Club, but of Shelford Football Club. Jim Dean, who still lives in Lt Shelford, was the organiser responsible for recruiting the lads who protected the Beatles, the Rolling Stones and the rest from those who sought to mob them. It was a particularly noisy operation, but one that had its compensation, fighting back hundreds of lovely young ladies. When peace returned there would be a crate of beer for the battered defenders. Jim himself worked for the ABC chain and had to be there early to welcome the performers as they arrived. On the first visit of the Beatles his memory of John Lennon is of guiding him through to the toilets so he could scrub the cuffs and collar of his shirt. Jim met them all and was the person delegated to visit the dressing room to collect autographs for the rest of the guys.

Lots of people treasured the programmes for these concerts, but lots of people have also seemed to have put them away for safety, and then cannot remember where. Do you still have one?

One of those in the crowd for that first Beatles performance in March 1963 was Christopher (now Professor) Calladine, who writes from Peterhouse. He writes: “I went by accident. A friend and I decided to go and see the film at the Regal that week. But when we got there we discovered that instead of the film there was a live performance. We decided to stay, joined a short queue and got seats near the back, downstairs. There were many young girls in the audience and there was a great deal of screaming from them

“The lead singer that night was Bobby Vee, and whenever he came on stage the screaming became very intense. He was a short, young American singer dressed in a very shiny suit. He had a particular gimmick which elicited wild creaming: at the end of a song he would come forward from the back of the stage at speed, and then throw himself down on his knees so that he slid for several yards on the floor of the stage, coming to a stop at the very edge of the platform.

“Another feature of the evening that was new to me was the way in which young girls would go down the aisles to the very front and attempt to throw themselves onto the stage. This was particularly difficult because there was a gorilla-like man at the end of each aisle to turn them back. The only way of getting a note on to the stage was to throw it over or round these custodians.

“The Beatles were, as I recall, the number two act. I was particularly struck by the way in which Paul McCartney’s head moved from side to side as he played, as if his neck were double-jointed. There was a good deal of screaming during their acts too – but not at the level accorded to Bobby Vee.

“A few years ago at the Henley Regatta I met a man who had been present at the same concert. He had been part of a group of undergraduates who had been taken by Monsignor Alfred Gilbey, the then Roman Catholic Chaplain to students at Fisher House. I knew Gilbey slightly and I found this vignette of him rather surprising, but I have no reason to doubt the veracity of my informer.”

In the 1950s music for many meant music for dancing. Les Isaacson of King's Hedges has dug out a number of photographs including one of a BLESMA – British Limbless Ex-Service Men's Association ball at the Embassy dancehall, Mill Road, at Christmas 1953, when the music was supplied by Freddie Webb and his band. The host and hostess for the evening were Vic and Maude Brown and amongst those enjoying the evening he recognises Mr & Mrs H.I. Isaacson, Day, Flack and Cornell – who kept a fruit and veg shop on Cherryhinton Road. Grace Toats, a dancer and Mrs Fordham a piano teacher are also there. Do you recognise others? [SCAN]

As Christmas approaches towns and cities around the county are encouraging shoppers through festive displays of decorative lighting. In 1965 it was Ely's display that caught the attention of News reporters and photographers:

“Colourful and well-designed window displays, a repeat of the popular and much-admired decorative street lighting, with a star in the centre of each span, and as an innovation the introduction of a dozen eight-foot high ‘Mod’ angels erected at strategic points. These are amongst the attractions, which allied to top class salesmanship, excellent service and ingenuity, are certain to make yet another Ely and district chamber of trade ‘shopping week’ a success. It will spotlight the ability of trading establishments to supply, in wide variety and quality, all the shopping public's needs. The street illuminations have in past years bought praise from a wide area and set a pattern followed by other towns. The ‘Mod’ angels complete with golden crowns and candlesticks are illuminated at the head and feet and placed in positions where it would be difficult to extend the decorative lights. The chamber's president W.A.T. Rayment said “I believe there are definite advantages to shopping in Ely, and for the customers coming in from the villages by car.”

But as the picture shows the Ely pavements in 1965 seemed unable to cope with the Christmas crowds

[SCAN 251 ON ELY MEMORY LANE CDS WITH SANDRA]

Chatteris' Christmas lights are famed throughout the fens and this year many of the townfolk will be including an additional present in their families' stockings. For members of the Chatteris Good Companions have been setting down their memories and reminiscences; these have been edited by local historian Rita Goodger and produced just in time for Xmas.

Club members come from all over the country and their memories span the world. Some of my favourite local recollections come from Sylvia Casey who recalls when Chatteris cemetery was bombed during the war & from Gwen Vortmann who remembers the mock airfield that was laid out in the fens around Benwick in an attempt to distract German bombers away from the real targets – only too well as far as Benwick folk were concerned.

But I particularly love Reg Wenn's reminiscences of some of the local characters he met when working for Crawley's motor and agricultural engineers. They included “Putt” Dunkling, a local farmer. “Mr. Dunkling had a vehicle the likes of which were seldom seen in the fens, it was in fact identical to the old London taxis. One particular morning he phoned the garage because his vehicle would not start. We all knew Mr. Dunkling as 'Putt', and mostly he addressed people as 'Matey Boy'. On answering the phone 'Putt' said "Hello matey boy, the old taxi won't start, can you come and see to it?" "We are rather busy at the moment, but when we have a mechanic free we will come to you, where are you?" "I'm down at Seward's Farm matey boy, I'll leave it with you."

"Seward's Farm was a good three miles from Chatteris, but before we were able to get out to the broken down vehicle it was delivered to the garage by 'Putt' and his little daughter Mavis. We could not believe our eyes, there was 'Putt' with a horse collar round his neck and ropes attached from that collar to his old taxi, and little Mavis was steering it. "How's that matey boy, I thought I'd save you a bit of time." This little man with enormous strength had pulled that vehicle from his farm, and there is quite an incline coming into Chatteris up Huntingdon Road. We were all quite amazed at what 'Putt' had done, but he just laughed. Then took his thick leather belt off, walked over to the workshop anvil and tethered his belt to that anvil. When he was satisfied the belt was secure he placed the big buckle in his mouth and gradually lifted the anvil from the ground and swung it round and round only holding it with his teeth. Mr. Dunkling was truly an amazing man."

Do you know of other such feats of strength – write to Mike Petty at the News

READERS' REPLY

Mrs Mansfield saw her father Edward (Ted) Phillips and his brother Stanley amongst the group of people outside the York Street Mission, (Memories 21st November) another brother Frank is in the picture somewhere. The Mission appeals to whole families; on Sundays after the evening service was over the children used to collect the hymn books whilst the parents chatted, on weekdays it the main building was used as a club room with ping pong as the most popular attraction. Members used to take it in turns to serve hot drinks; the favourite was hot lemon and it was her job to squeeze the lemons.

The picture also jogged memories for Ann Prior of Haverhill. She writes: "I was a Brownie and a Guide, we held out meetings there and I have many happy memories. We were the 19th Cambridge Guides, with Miss Easton as Captain. I remember she lived her life in a wheelchair. I used to shop for her and was paid 6d." Ann includes a photo taken on an outing to Hunstanton about 54 years ago; she's standing on the far left second row. Does anybody else remember the trip? [SCAN]

Mrs Doreen Price from Cambridge has written to express her surprise at seeing her parents amongst the group of people who gathered to celebrate their weddings at Cherry Hinton Road United Reformed Church in November 1976, that I featured in Memories a couple of weeks ago. Doreen's mum and dad are the couple right in front, next to the Rev Taylor. Their names were Phyllis and Sidney Hill who lived in Coldham's Lane. They had married at the church on 5th August 1933. Doreen followed in their footsteps when she too was married there, but she did not attend the reunion.

Barbara Sealy of Chesterton has sent her memories of the Priziborsky family of hairdressers. For some years in the 1920s and 1930s she used to stay with their son, Murray his wife May on their farm at Little Maplestead. He had changed his surname to Pearce after the First World War when he was a pupil at the Cambridge & County High School as any foreign-sounding name was looked on with suspicion. She would be picked up from Halstead in his scarlet MG and be returned to Cambridge by the Priziborsky family at the end of the holiday.

Pamela Ladd from Impington writes to say she was a member of "The Robins" that maintained a cot in the childrens' ward of old Addenbrooke's Hospital. She still has her “Robin” badge with its ‘Cambs Press and News’ inscription & wonders if there is a museum in the area that would like it.

Joan Moore from Ely found her attention caught by the mention in Memories, 28th November, about the big house at Wandlebury. She writes: “I remember playing in an informal concert there during the early part of the Second War to entertain patients who had been evacuated there from London Hospitals. They were all very severely disabled, most having to be carried or wheeled into the large ‘lobby type’ area where we performed. Mr Leslie North organised the event. Several of us sang well-known popular songs. Few of the audience were well enough to sing, but most managed to clap time to the music & some cheered. It made a rousing end to the evening. I have never forgotten the impact of seeing such dreadfully ill people. I was quite young at the time and may be the only player at the event still alive”. Does anybody else remember these concerts, or the patients

READERS’ REQUESTS

Robert Maltby from Longstanton seeks your assistance. He remembers a black dome-like structure that appeared in Warkworth Terrace, Cambridge, during the War. It was removed in the late 1950s – but what was its story?

Alan Carpenter from Cherry Hinton recalls when a Crimean war cannon appeared in front of the Senate House, but cannot quite remember the year. He thinks it was either 1935 or 1936. The gun was located in the grounds of Jesus College and could be seen from Victoria Avenue. Its wheels were secured to a concrete base to discourage its removal but one night a band of students who had previously greased the gun's axle and loosened the wheels' chains moved it as silently as possible through the streets to the town centre. It was difficult to tow a gun weighing more than a ton through the streets of night-time Cambridge without alerting the police, and there were elaborate diversions to draw the police away from the cannon's route. The gun was eventually returned to Jesus only to become a victim of the Government scrap iron collection in 1940.

Memories

The news that the main Cambridge to Huntingdon road, the A14, is scheduled for improvement will delight many motorists who endure the seemingly continuous delays it occasions. However we must not get too excited for any road improvement schemes seem to take forever to come to fruition. Indeed the public inquiry that preceded the building of the Cambridge Northern and Western bypasses were the lenthiest then known..

But perhaps the most delayed Cambridge road project was Elizabeth Bridge; which started in the 1880s because of another Cambridge problem – lack of houses. Cambridge councillors were anxious to expand the boundaries of their town and eyes turned to Chesterton, just across the river but still obstinately independent - though its residents easily crossed into Cambridge and made use of the facilities provided without contributing to the rates.

Suggestions for amalgamation received a cool response; as a dowry Cambridge suggested a new bridge making access far easier than the inconvenient ferries and far closer than the long trudge to Magdalene bridge. There was much local opposition but on a poll of ratepayers the idea was approved. An application for an Act of Parliament to build it (and another as well, while they were about it) was successful, though the amount of land they could take for the controversial main road across Midsummer Common was restricted to two acres.

In September 1889 operations began; the Engineers appointed were Messrs Webster of Liverpool and Waters of Cambridge, the contractor John Mackay of Hereford. The superstructure was to be of iron and steel with 6 main ribs spanning the river at an angle of 105 degrees given a clear rise above the water of 14 feet six inches. Its main ribs would be wrought iron plate capable easily of taking the weight of two traction engines. Further details were specified - a length of 40 feet, footways of 7 feet width giving a roadway of 26 feet - ample room for the two widest vehicles to pass with ease. It was to use local materials where possible, to employ a number of local men, be completed within 10 months and the cost, including the road across the common would be £10,000.

It was November 1889 when the Mayor of Cambridge left the Guildhall, escorted by ten policemen, to join the Chairman of the Chesterton Local Board, J. Bester, on the site. Together they performed the ceremonial lying of the of the foundation stone, each tapping it with the mallets and silver trowels that had been presented by the engineer and contractors. Beneath the stone was placed a vase containing copies of the local newspapers, an account of the background to the new bridge, a copy of the act of parliament and a list of the people involved. The speeches over councillors and crowds dispersed leaving workmen to remove the bunting and decoration that had formed the backdrop to the occasion and continue the work of construction.

The planned 10-month construction period became extended to 15 and it was 11th December 1890 before the great opening ceremony could be performed. The proceedings were scheduled to start at noon but council business delayed the departure of the official procession of 13 carriages from the Guildhall by half an hour. They proceeded to the start of the new road at the junction of Maids Causeway and Jesus Lane where a silk cord blocked their route. Mayor and Chairman formally untied the bow, named "The Victoria Avenue" and - to only feeble cheers from a few onlookers - proceeded slowly towards the bridge.

Here they found hundreds of onlookers, chilled by the weather and impatient at the delay, and another silken cord. Chairman declared the bridge open, Mayor named it and together they pulled at the rope from which dangled a bottle of champagne, intended to smash against the parapet in the traditional way. Sadly it was not to be - the bottle merely swung tamely and eventually had to be hurled by hand. The cheers that rang out were feeble in the extreme, the contingent of police had no disorder to contain - except for a restive horse who contrived to break the shaft of his carriage. The official party walked across, then rode across and returned to the Guildhall, having duly declared the Victoria Bridge well and truly open.

They left behind a remarkable monument to forward thinking - a bridge designed before the age of the motor car that was to carry the weight of heavy lorries. But by 1986 it was found to be rusting away and in need of urgent repairs which took as long to complete as the Victorians took to build it.

But what has this to do with Elizabeth Bridge. Well the Act of 1889 had anticipated the need for another river crossing. But although the permission was there and residents of De Freville Avenue were agitating for it, others became concerned that if it were built it would cause additional traffic chaos. "The class of traffic that makes East Road one of the most unpleasant thoroughfares in the town would pass through the Abbey estate" claimed residents in 1914.

Though this bridge was put on the back burner another was implemented with the construction of a new road and bridge across Coe Fen, Once more this had caused considerable opposition. When Fen Causeway, the new and important link between Newnham and the rest of Cambridge, was opened by the Mayor in December 1926 the bridge and its approaches were gaily decorated with bunting and presented a colourful scene. The Mayor recalled that the project of relieving Silver Street traffic had started as long ago as 1904 and discussion had gone on for nearly 20 years before the Town Council approved the plan in 1923. Nine proposals had been put forward and had it not been for the urgency of the unemployment question the same position would have existed today, only instead of nine there might have been nineteen different schemes.

Further plans were announced in the 1930s for a new bypass road around the east of the city, from Trumpington Road through Long Road and Brooks Road to Coldham's Lane. There would be a dual carriageway over Newmarket Road to Ditton Walk, a viaduct over the railway and river to Cam Causeway before the road would continue along Green End Road and Kings Hedges to Huntingdon Road. Nor would it stop there; more roads were planned to continue over Madingley Road, Barton Road and back to Trumpington. Some of the road was actually constructed before planners changed their minds and the scheme lapsed. An Inner Relief Road, a Railway Route, a Western Relief Road were all debated before the present Northern bypass and M11 opened in 1980.

But by then Cambridge's traffic problems had been solved. For Elizabeth Bridge had finally been opened in July 1971, roughly on the site of the second bridge envisaged in the 1888 act. Rush-hour queues along Victoria Avenue disappeared, every day was like 'motoring on Sunday morning'.

Les Isaacson has contacted me to correct my caption to the picture of a dance at the Embassy Ballroom, featured in last week's memories. That particular dance was not one organised on behalf of the British Limbless Ex-Servicemen's Association. However this week's picture was. It was held at the Guildhall in May 1952 when the host and hostess were Vic and Maude Brown and amongst the dancers are Les himself with his mother and father, Audrey Greenfield, Mrs Winter and Mr & Mrs Gifford, C. Bevis and Ron Smith. Meanwhile bandleader Freddie Webb's sister, Edith Jackson, who now lives on the Arbury, has contacted me to say she was delighted to see her brother on the earlier picture.

Another picture to tease the memories of people in the Huntingdon or Brampton area has been sent in by Mr R.S. Foreman of Girton. It is obviously a lad's football team from 1935. Are you or your dad on it. If so contact me since Mr Foreman would like to pass it on to somebody who would treasure it

Rosemary Preston has e-mailed to say that she does still have her copy of the programme for the Beatles concerts at the Regal when the main stars were Chris Montez Tommy Roe. She also has the programme for a visit by the Rolling Stones in 1963. The News photographers took some photographs of Mick and the rest being shepherded into a Black Maria – presumably to ensure their safe arrival – and snatched one shot of the fans who were waiting to greet them. It's not the best picture in the world, but are you on it?

Mrs Joan Hancock from Fulbourn has a picture that she is puzzling over. Her grandparents were Charles and Ada Phillips who lived in Abbey Walk. She has a photograph of them taken on board a boat of some sort – grandfather is the man with his elbow resting on the rail, his wife is sitting beside him, But does anybody know what the occasion was, or can you see anybody you know there?

Memories Dec 19 & 26th, by Mike Petty

I HAVE TRIED TO OFFER ENOUGH TEXT TO COVER BOTH WEEKS – THOUGH I MAY ADD MORE FOR 26TH
PART IS REPRISE OF THE 'KNOW YOUR CAMBRIDGE' SERIES OF 1956
WILL BRING IN PICS MONDAY PM

The news that the main Cambridge to Huntingdon road, the A14, is scheduled for improvement will delight many motorists who endure the seemingly continuous delays it occasions. However we must not get too excited for any road improvement schemes seem to take forever to come to fruition. Indeed the public inquiry that preceded the building of the Cambridge Northern and Western bypasses in the 1970s were the lengthiest then known.

But perhaps the most delayed Cambridge road project was Elizabeth Bridge; which started in the 1880s because of another Cambridge problem – lack of houses. Cambridge councillors were anxious to expand the boundaries of their town and eyes turned to Chesterton, just across the river but still obstinately independent .

Suggestions for amalgamation received a cool response; as a dowry Cambridge suggested a new bridge making access far easier than the inconvenient ferries and far closer than the long trudge to Magdalene bridge. There was much local opposition but on a poll of ratepayers the idea was approved. An application for an Act of Parliament to build it (and another as well, while they were about it) was successful, though the amount of land they could take for the controversial main road across Midsummer Common was restricted to two acres.

In September 1889 operations began; the Engineers appointed were Messrs Webster of Liverpool and Waters of Cambridge, the contractor John Mackay of Hereford. The superstructure was to be of iron and steel; its main ribs would be wrought iron plate capable easily of taking the weight of two traction engines. Further details were specified - a length of 40 feet, footways of seven feet width giving a roadway of 26 feet - ample room for the two widest vehicles to pass with ease. It was to use local materials where possible, to employ a number of local men, be completed within 10 months and the cost, including the road across the common would be £10,000.

It was November 1889 when the Mayor of Cambridge left the Guildhall, escorted by ten policemen, to join the Chairman of the Chesterton Local Board, J. Bester, on the site. Together they performed the ceremonial lying of the of the foundation stone, each tapping it with the mallets and silver trowels that had been presented by the engineer and contractors. Beneath the stone was placed a vase containing copies of the local newspapers, an account of the background to the new bridge, a copy of the act of parliament and a list of the people involved. The speeches over councillors and crowds dispersed leaving workmen to remove the bunting and decoration that had formed the backdrop to the occasion and continue the work of construction.

The planned 10-month construction period became extended to 15 and it was 11th December 1890 before the great opening ceremony could be performed. The proceedings were scheduled to start at noon but council business delayed the departure of the official procession of 13 carriages from the Guildhall by half an hour. They proceeded to the start of the new road at the junction of Maids Causeway and Jesus Lane where a silk cord blocked their route. Mayor and Chairman formally untied the bow, named "The Victoria Avenue" and - to only feeble cheers from a few onlookers - proceeded slowly towards the bridge.

Here they found hundreds of onlookers, chilled by the weather and impatient at the delay, and another silken cord. Chairman declared the bridge open, Mayor named it and together they pulled at the rope from which dangled a bottle of champagne, intended to smash against the parapet in the traditional way. Sadly it was not to be - the bottle merely swung tamely and eventually had to be hurled by hand. The cheers that rang out were feeble in the extreme, the contingent of police had no disorder to contain - except for a restive horse who contrived to break the shaft of his carriage. The official party walked across, then rode across and returned to the Guildhall, having duly declared the Victoria Bridge well and truly open.

They left behind a remarkable monument to forward thinking - a bridge designed before the age of the motor car that was to carry the weight of heavy lorries. But by 1986 it was found to be rusting away and in need of urgent repairs which took as long to complete as the Victorians took to build it.

But what has this to do with Elizabeth Bridge. Well the Act of 1888 had anticipated the need for another river crossing. But although the permission was there and residents of De Freville Avenue were agitating for it, others became concerned that if it were built it would cause additional traffic chaos. "The class of traffic that makes East Road one of the most unpleasant thoroughfares in the town would pass through the Abbey estate" claimed residents in 1914.

Though this bridge was put on the back burner another was implemented with the construction of a new road and bridge across Coe Fen. Once more this had caused considerable opposition. When Fen Causeway, the new and important link between Newnham and the rest of Cambridge, was opened by the Mayor in December 1926 he recalled that the project of relieving Silver Street traffic had started as long ago as 1904 and discussion had gone on for nearly 20 years before the Town Council approved the plan in 1923. Nine proposals had been put forward and had it not been for the urgency of the unemployment question the same position would have existed today, only instead of nine there might have been nineteen different schemes.

Further plans were announced in the 1930s for a new bypass road around the east of the city, from Trumpington Road through Long Road and Brooks Road to Coldham's Lane. There would be a dual carriageway over Newmarket Road to Ditton Walk, a viaduct over the railway and river to Cam Causeway before the road would continue along Green End Road and Kings Hedges to Huntingdon Road. Nor would it stop there; more roads were planned to continue over Madingley Road, Barton Road and back to Trumpington. Some of the road was actually constructed before planners changed their minds and the scheme lapsed. Part of the dual carriageways were ripped up before minds changed again and some of the original route reinstated. An Inner Relief Road, a Railway Route, a Western Relief Road were all debated and rejected.

But by then Cambridge's traffic problems had been solved. For Elizabeth Bridge had finally been opened in July 1971, roughly on the site of the second bridge envisaged in the 1888 act. Rush-hour queues along Victoria Avenue disappeared, every day was like 'motoring on Sunday morning'. Sadly it was not to last; traffic increased again; but then came the Northern bypass and M11 opening in 1980 having carved a great gash through the Cambridgeshire countryside. This would end Cambridge's traffic problems ... wouldn't it?

So now the old A604 has been widened and improved to become the A14; it will be improved again; perhaps not this decade, but surely this century. Writing in the 1850s John Brown remembered how as a lad he had trudged along the road driving some 300 to 400 sheep that had been bought by Cambridge butchers at the St Ives livestock markets. It was a long, straight, boring road and the animals were constantly breaking away and running into adjoining fields. By the time he reached Cambridge he was tired out. About 25 years ago that great Cambridge character, Snowy Farr, recalled how as a lad he saw more people walking along the road from Huntingdon than there were then cars driving along it. Does the road hold any memories for you?

**

Les Isaacson has contacted me to correct my caption to the picture of a dance at the Embassy Ballroom, featured in last week's memories. That particular dance was not one organised on behalf of the British Limbless Ex-Servicemen's Association. However this week's picture was. It was held at the Guildhall in May 1952 when the host and hostess were Vic and Maude Brown and amongst the dancers are Les himself with his mother and father, Audrey Greenfield, Mrs Winter and Mr & Mrs Gifford, C. Bevis and Ron Smith. Meanwhile bandleader Freddie Webb's sister, Edith Jackson, who now lives on the Arbury, has contacted me to say she was delighted to see her brother on the earlier picture. [SCAN]

Another picture to tease the memories of people in the Huntingdon or Brampton area has been sent in by Mr R.S. Foreman of Girton. It is obviously a lad's football team from 1935. Are you or your dad on it. If so contact me since Mr Foreman would like to pass it on to somebody who would treasure it [SCAN]

Rosemary Preston has e-mailed to say that she does still have her copy of the programme for the Beatles concerts at the Regal when the main stars were Chris Montez & Tommy Roe. She also has the programme for a visit by the Rolling Stones in September 1963. The News photographers took some photographs of Mick and the rest being shepherded into a Black Maria – presumably to ensure their safe arrival – and another of them waiting their turn to perform [SCANS]

Mrs Joan Hancock from Fulbourn has a picture that she is puzzling over. Her grandparents were Charles and Ada Phillips who lived in Abbey Walk. She has a photograph of them taken on board a boat of some sort – grandfather is the man with his elbow resting on the rail, his wife is sitting beside him, But does anybody know what the occasion was, or can you see anybody you know there? [SCAN]

Know your Cambridge

One of the items sent in to "Memories" this year were sketches made by Lewis Todd, cartoonist for the News in the 1950s. He teased readers in 1956 with a series of views of bits of Cambridge that often pass unnoticed. How many can you identify?

Suggest you crop pictures to remove the numbers and then renumber them 1-10.

answers : numbers refer to those under pictures

page 1

- 5 : statue of Jonas Webb that used to stand in the Corn Exchange, now moved to Babraham
- 6 : central section of Fitzwilliam Museum façade on which are figures representing the Nine Muses
- 23 : chimneys of old Vicarage House of St Clement's church in Bridge Street
- 14 : base of lamp standard in centre of Parker's Piece
- 13 : west door of St Clement's church, Bridge Street
- 1 : Rose Crescent

page 2

- 8 : Northampton Street corner
- 9 : carving of dog over kitchen entrance of Old Court of Corpus Christi college, seen from Free School Lane
- 10: Shelley Row
- 18: St Matthews church, off East Road

Memories 2002

Memories 2002 in one sequence

Memories 2nd January 2002, by Mike Petty

Raymond Parcell has written from Newmarket to recount his memories of the Via Devana, the A604, the A14 – the major route carrying traffic from the Midlands to the East Coast.

Raymond knew it in earlier days, for he grew up in Crochfield Villa not far from the former gallows at Five Bells Hill, almost in no-man's land on the boundary of Dry Drayton, Madingley and , - more easily described these days as next to Hacker's Fruit Farm and the Cambridge Crematorium.

Raymond's first encounter with the road was almost his last for, aged 18 months, he decided to explore it at close hand, crawling into the path of a passing bus and bringing it to a sudden stop. He also added to the traffic on the road, with his own 'Roadburner' – a steerable 4-wheel soapbox cart or practising roller-skating on quieter days – not something to be encouraged today.

Even then there would be some traffic that attracted attention; though steam ploughs & threshing engines were a common sight Raymond recalls how he stood in awe at the sight of a monster 'Gyro-tiller' moving sedately from farm to farm. Chivers regularly drove their herds of cattle or flocks of sheep along the road as the moved from field to field.

Then came the Second World War bringing convoys of Army and RAF vehicles; later came the Americans. Raymond recalls: "My father had a few goats which were tethered to feed on the grass verges; the Americans thought it great fun to startle the goats by making their vehicles backfire". On one occasion a convoy of army tanks were travelling East when one almost went West – the driver lost control and it slewed across the road, coming to a halt in the road-side ditch. It took several days before the army was able to retrieve it. The tank driver claimed that a fly in his eye caused the drama. But it was not just the big vehicles that suffered accidents; Raymond recalls even despatch riders on their motorcycles crashing head-on.

Speed is a major factor in accidents but some people know how to control it. Racing driver Archie Scott-Brown would sometimes startle everyone in the area with a fast run up in one of the Lister-Bristols or Jaguars en route from his home in Cambridge to a garage he managed further up the road. To make the road safer the Council dug four feet off the hill at Five Bells Corner, at the Oakington – Dry Drayton crossroads. The hump was claimed to be dangerous as it obscured vision. Some years later it was rebuilt to its original height because traffic was travelling too fast!

One group who make their way at a much more sedate pace were the Roadsters – or tramps, who were always knocking at their door for some hot water to make tea in their old tin can; often they then wanted a little tea to go with the water – oh and then a slide of bread!

Raymond has now moved into quieter pastures. "The six lane monstrosity they stupidly restyled the 'A.14' isn't my road any more. Bring back the Via Devana!", he pleads.

Two readers have written to identify the mystery photograph that Mr R. Foreman from Girton thought had been taken in the Huntingdon area. Not so. It shows Histon school first eleven football team. Valerie Phillips from Cambridge recognised her late brother, Arthur Docwra on the right in the front row and can name several of the others. But Cyril Moore of Impington has the complete team sheet: Ralph Charles in goal (top); standing left-right Victor Miller, Bill Lack, David Stops (of Stops' Shops newsagents), Ken Mansfield, Ron Parker. Sitting, left-right: Derek Driver, Morris Thurston, Harry (Johnny) Burton, Percy Brett and Arthur Docwra. Three of them still live in the Histon area. Cyril was playing in the school second eleven at the time but made the main team the following year. He recalls that the headmaster was Mr A.J. Parr who went on to become the first Warden of Impington Village College when it opened in 1939. [REPRISE FOOTBALL TEAM PHOTO FROM DEC 26TH]

Margaret Cullum (nee Reed) saw herself in the photograph a guide excursion to Hunstanton (Memories 12th December) and can name several of the others, including Megan Lewis who, as Megan Milton, regularly features in the News along with her husband Alan for their lavishly decorated home at Christmas time. Margaret also attended Sunday School in St Columba's Mission in the 1940s and has memories of playing a tambourine in the Gypsy Band. Does anybody have a photo? Marion Bavey from Cambridge was also there and has been sorting her archives to produce another snap to get readers puzzling. It was taken about 1945 and shows the 19th Cambridge guides and brownies in the York Street Mission Hall. Amongst those shown are June Fordham, Margaret Wright, Joyce Prestell, Betty Germany and Doreen Ruffles. [SCAN OF GUIDE PHOTO]

On December 5th I featured a photo of the Beatles posing with a couple of attractive young ladies. Now Eddie Higgins from Aylsham has phoned to say that the girl between Ringo and George is now his wife, Barbara and was probably taken in the coffee bar above the Regal. She was then Barbara Northrop from Sawston who used to queue all night to get tickets for the shows. Her friend is, he believes Sue Sanford. [REPRISE BEATLES PHOTO FROM 5TH OCTOBER]

Further details have come to light regarding the means of transport used to get the pop stars to the venue. Whereas nowadays they may arrive in a stretch limo, then it was more likely to be a police Black Maria. In November 1963 it was due to meet the Beatles in Trumpington, but there was no sign of them. An emergency message was passed to all cars and Det Sgt Harry Fox of Cambridge C.I.D. spotted their car near Lensfield Road. Once safely on board the fab four were safely delivered to the Regal, where queues had been forming all day. Getting them out again would be another matter. At the close of the performance the singers dashed down a flight of stairs, out the back door and into the van. As police cars pulled up at the front of the cinema the Black Maria headed along Downing Place to where the screaming fans were waiting. But the Beatles were not in it. They were being driven the other way, through a back gate into the University Downing Street site and along Tennis Court Road, Lensfield Road, Gonville Place and Parkside to arrive at another back door – that of the University Arms Hotel where they spent the night. Getting them out next morning was another matter as hundreds of fans blocked the road causing traffic chaos as they waited for the Beatles to continue their journey to the next venue, York. [BEATLES ARTICLE/ NEGS? INCLUDING MORE OF THE AUDIENCE FOR PEOPLE TO IDENTIFY?]

Now Christmas is over many people will not be looking forward to their Credit Card statement in the New Year. But for most debt is something to be managed; not so in years gone past. For those who could not pay the solution was simple – the debtors cell, like the one at Ely. Still today people can experience the horror of seeing the world through bars and learn that they would have to pay the gaoler for the necessities of life – though how can you pay if you are imprisoned for debt? At least debtors have a chance of release, for others it was the hangman's noose – and there are gallows scratched on the cell walls, perhaps by one of its victims. The story of the Ely gaols and of the building that is now the Museum have been told in two new publications just issued by the Ely Society – at prices that will not break the bank. If you have not experienced the cells for yourself then make it your New Year resolution to do so next time you are in Market Street; & as for local residents one ticket gives you free admission all year you may wish to take up residence! ‘Ely Prisons’ by Pam Blakeman, ‘Ely Museum at the old gaol: a history of the building’ by Kate Fearn.

Chris Godfrey was a man who would have appreciated the way the old Ely Gaol has been restored and converted. Chris was a conservation officer for Cambridgeshire County Council whose job was to ensure just such sympathetic use of historic structures; he died in January last year and now the council have published a book of his drawings of some of the county’s finest buildings. There is however one view that his colleagues cannot identify, a sketch of a quiet corner of a churchyard – but which one, or was it one he made up. Can you recognise the broken column or suggest where it might be? ‘Chris Godfrey’s Cambridgeshire’ costs £12.50 from Shire Hall or bookshops

Memories 9th January 2002, by Mike Petty

With the news dominated by the arrival of the Euro I thought it might be interesting to turn back to our own big currency conversion, the arrival of decimal coinage in February 1971.

What was wrong with the old system? We had a pound (represented by a ‘£’), which was made up of twenty shillings (‘s’) which in turn was made up of twelve pennies (‘d’ - short for ‘denarius’ an ancient Roman coin) which was made up of two halfpennies which was made up of two farthings (though these had been abolished in 1961).

There were various coins in circulation; some were silver in colour: a two shilling and sixpenny coin was ‘half-a-crown’, a two-shilling coin was a ‘florin’, a one-shilling coin was a ‘bob’, and a six penny coin was a ‘tanner’. Others were bronze; a three penny ‘joey’, a penny and a halfpenny, pronounced ‘haypney’. There were also ‘crowns’ and ‘sovereigns’ which I never saw and ‘guineas’ which was something one only heard about. Granddad had a collection of silver threepenny bits, but they were too valuable to play with.

Prices could be written as either 7s.6d or 7/6. What could be simpler?

In came three new decimal coins, the new 1p., 2p. and the halfpenny which would eventually replace the sixpence, the threepenny bit and the old penny. The two other existing coins, the shilling and the florin were to stay in circulation alongside the new silver five and ten pence coins. The £1, £5 and £10 notes remained the same, though the 50p coin had already succeeded the 10-shilling note.

On 15th February the News reported: “A wartime spirit could be felt in the city this morning as people helped one another over the hurdle of D-Day.” Shop assistants had been fully trained in the new money and some managers wore orange ‘decimal adviser’ rosettes to assist baffled customers. Some mums and dads made a point of taking their children shopping with them, so they could act as currency converters having been properly taught in school. In the event the expected chaos did not materialise, business was slow but smooth and confused customers few and far between.

In those days the Co-op would charge you 2s. for a packet of Cadbury’s Smash potato, 1s.7d. for a ¼ lb [QUARTER POUND] of its ‘99’ tea and 1s. for a tin of their baked beans – and on top of that they were promising double dividend stamps. All that converted to 10p, 8p, & 5p. in the new money.

If you fancied dining out then a set restaurant meal for four was £2.10s.0d. or you could escape for a week in Jersey, flying from Cambridge airport on Saturdays at £19.4s.0d return. A new two-bedroomed centrally heated flat on Milton Road, Cambridge, was on the market for £5,450 or you might prefer a three-bedroomed house in Highsett, Hills Road, with garage and fitted kitchen that would set you back £7,950. If you preferred to rent a cottage in the country there was a two-bedroomed property at Melbourn at £12 per week and for just £793.93 you could buy a new VW Beetle to commute to work. A brand new Austin 1100 was that bit dearer at £801.

If the prices seem cheap what were the wages like? Cleaners working two hours a night, five nights a week would earn £4 – if they were men, £3.10s.0s. for ladies. A Cambridge Water Company technician received about £1,400 a year; Eastern Counties bus drivers received a basic wage of £16.10s.9d while conductors – remember them? – earned 8s.9d. less per week and they had the hassle of customers who would not convert. William McMordie, a conductor in the Huntingdon area found it made his job much harder: “The majority of people did not take any notice of the decimal fares and told me the price in old money” he complained. Even in December a St Neots butcher was still using an old-style cash register and totted up the bills in old money, leaving his customers to work them out in decimal.

People thought decimalisation was bound to bring price increases, with figures being rounded up rather than down – not that you could understand them anyway. One granddad came home laden with 5lbs of lemons because he thought they were going cheap at threepence for two; another OAP complained “I just can’t believe people who say that the 2p pieces are worth fivepence. I spend the things and I know I don’t get fivepence worth”. Even a year after D-Day one pensioner still slapped his landlord on the back because he thought the price of beer had come down to sixpence.

But as well as being smaller the new coins were lighter. This presented problems for the banks during changeover. As D-Day neared banks experienced a last-minute scramble for cash before they shut down for four days. Like others Lloyds Bank in Sidney Street, Cambridge had spent years preparing for the change with staff acting the part of customers to test the procedures; but they also had the job of supplying other branches with the cash itself. They would deliver between 50 and 60 tons of new coins to banks, but then have to cart away the old coins – and they weighed between 150 and 160 tons. Nor could they relax security for the old money continued to be legal tender for eighteen months after D-Day.

Some lasted even more; it was two years after decimalisation when the old silver ‘tanner’ followed the ‘joey’ into oblivion. The News surveyed readers’ opinions in December 1972 and found almost all were happy to see it disappear; Shirley Batterbee, a housewife, said she got rid of them as soon as she could, Miss Margaret Squire of Balsham, a student at CCAT found it a nuisance. Shopkeepers like Paul Titchmarsh, from Mill Road said ‘Good riddance’, and Miss Ira Butcher, manageress of Salisbury’s handbag shop in Bradwell’s Court thought ‘The decimal system is much better. I thought it would be difficult because we were stuck in our ways. But now I can’t even add up in LSD’. One supporter however was young David Jopling of Chesterton who still accepted them, in fact he was going to start a collection because they may be valuable some time.

The authorities in 1971 were convinced that people would soon stop trying to convert prices back to LSD and that within a few years the old money would become just a hazy memory. How long before these sentiments will be aired again? [LIBRARY PIX OF OLD MONEY, CO-OP ADVERTISEMENT USED CEN 15.2.2001, BUS CONDUCTOR PIC]

**

Perhaps you might like to test your memories of old and new currency by turning back the years to the January sales of 1952 when queues of bargain hunters are to be seen outside various shops. So what were the bargains of the day in Cambridge shops?

At Coad's in Sidney Street the main demand was for all-wood lumber jackets reduced from 29s 11d (£1.50) to 14s 11d. (75p), though long-sleeve wooden jumpers were being snapped up at 10s 11d (55p). The Belfast Linen Warehouse had a full-size down quilt reduced from £16 10s. to £3 10s. it was bought by a woman who started queuing at 2 a.m. Pillow cases were at half price, 2s 6d (12p). The first arrival at Rose's Fashion Centre sale was there at 5 a.m. and by the time the store opened there were about 100 people waiting, so many that the doors had to be closed and a few shoppers let in at a time. The biggest run was on heavily reduced taffeta dresses. Joshua Taylor reported people coming in from a radius of 50 miles with the first bargain hunter arriving at 4 a.m. to secure a handbag which at £2 2s was one-third of its original price. Girls double-breasted school coats reduced to 25s (£1.25) were snapped up and there was a rush on children's felt hats at 1s (5p) each. In the men's department ninety dozen socks were sold at the pre-war price of 3s 11d (20p) a pair whilst other popular items were gabardine trousers and sports jackets.

Business was not quite so brisk at Laurie & McConnal in Fitzroy Street: "There's just not the money about", said Director A.E. Turner; "the sales are put on too soon after Christmas and before people have any money to spend on sale bargains; but the trouble is the shops all scramble to get in first". It was a different story at Messrs T. Tobin, of Mill Road whose specialised in outsize clothes. There was a queue of over 60 people by opening time and all previous records were broken. He felt it was down to country people who were now showing more interest in bargain hunting – and needed outsize clothes.

**

Whilst browsing through the News negatives I have come across part of an old black-and-white photograph being used as a marker. It shows a children's' choir probably in the large hall of Cambridge Guildhall and was probably taken in the early 1960s. Does anybody recognise themselves or know the occasion. [SCAN]

**

On December 5th I featured a photo of the Beatles posing with a couple of attractive young ladies. Now Eddie Higgins from Aylsham has phoned to say that the girl between Ringo and George is now his wife, Barbara and was probably taken in the coffee bar above the Regal. She was then Barbara Northrop from Sawston who used to queue all night to get tickets for the shows. Her friend is, he believes Sue Sanford. [REPRISE BEATLES PHOTO FROM 5TH OCTOBER]

**

Margaret Cullum (nee Reed) saw herself in the photograph a guide excursion to Hunstanton in 1947 (Memories 12th December) and can name several of the others, including Megan Lewis who, as Megan Milton, regularly features in the News along with her husband Alan for their lavishly decorated home at Christmas time. Margaret also attended Sunday School in St Columba's Mission in the 1940s and has memories of playing a tambourine in the Gypsy Band. Does anybody have a photo? Marion Bavey from Cambridge was also there and has been sorting her archives to produce another snap to get readers puzzling. It was taken about 1945 and shows the 19th Cambridge guides and brownies in the York Street Mission Hall. Amongst those shown are June Fordham, Margaret Wright, Joyce Prestell, Betty Germany and Doreen Ruffles. [SCAN OF GUIDE PHOTO ON LAST WEEK'S DISK]

**

Chris Godfrey was a conservation officer for Cambridgeshire County Council whose job was to ensure sympathetic use of historic structures; he died in January last year and now the council have published a book of his drawings of some of the county's finest buildings. There is however one view that his colleagues cannot identify, a sketch of a quiet corner of a churchyard – but which one, or was it one he made up. Can you recognise the broken column or suggest where it might be? 'Chris Godfrey's Cambridgeshire' costs £12.50 from Shire Hall or bookshops [SCAN ON LAST WEEK'S DISK]

Memories 16th January 2002, by Mike Petty

In January 1977 intrepid 'News' reporter, Richard Keeble, was sent out on a special assignment. It was, he was warned, potentially hazardous. For the people he was visiting were very wary of journalists, they had too much bad press and were being accused of depriving women of money that could be better spent on their children or on the rent.

He made his way to the addict's paradise near the very centre of Cambridge where every afternoon and evening hundreds congregated in theatrical, almost surreal surroundings, a brash, psychedelic mish-mash of colours – silver, yellow, red, green, rust, cream. It was a place with its own special vocabulary – last'un, flyer, ling double, quickie. And all concentrated on the confusing conglomeration of figures blazing out like the strange invention of a mad magician, and the relentless amplified voice that promised instant riches.

Yes, Richard had been sent to the Central EMI Bingo and Social Club in Hobson Street, Cambridge. The club was then just four years old and already boasted 10,000 members. But they would not let him in. First he had to complete a membership form; when he returned the following week the manager, John Jones, said he could not talk to any of the players, and none of the staff. There had been too many 'bingomania revelations' already. But, having phoned head office, he relented; Richard could speak to the players, if they would speak to him.

But none were prepared to give their name and address. If you played bingo you did not want your neighbours to know about it. EMI's spokesman blamed the reluctance on the 'class consciousness' of Cambridge. "If you go to Lancashire and Yorkshire, the real bingo playing country, people are happy to talk freely about playing bingo, but the further south you go the more careful people are", he complained.

Once Richard had broken through the players' reserve he found them all perfectly normal people – police officers, traffic wardens, doctors – and housewives. They were all quick to acknowledge that it was an addiction – especially the fruit machines that paid out up to £30 in 50-pence pieces; people dashed to them in the brief intervals between games, and long queues formed during the interval.

But the main money was to be made on Bingo itself; especially the jackpot when the Cambridge club linked up by phone with that at Oxford and there was £400 on offer.

Over ten years earlier, in July 1966 Dereck Harvey had made an earlier examination of the big bingo boom phenomenon with a visit to the Kinema in Mill Road, Cambridge. Then it was less high-tech. The caller sat at a large transparent container in which numbered ping-pong balls jostled with each other before being pushed up a tube into his hand; he called out the numbers and illuminated counter-markings on a big display board at the back. But this was impressive for its time. What used to be a simple family game for dark winter nights in an age before television, and as 'tombola' had been the only gambling game allowed on the mess-decks of Royal Navy ships, had become the ‘slickest best-organised, most mentally-futile money trick every devised by men’. It took off in old cinemas around the country, at the Regal, Littleport in 1966, the Rex, Ely on Sunday afternoons in 1967, at the Regal, St Ives and the Haverhill Conservative Hall.

Dereck found 300 people at the Kinema on the night he visited in 1966; the manager, Mr A. Pink told him: “I’ve never seen anything like it. We had 9,000 members in the first nine weeks”. But it was even bigger at the Rex in Magrath Avenue where there were bigger winnings to be had. Faced with such competition the New Chesterton Institute were having to subsidise two houses a week in order to get members into their club, charging them 2s. (10p) to come in and offering a full range of refreshments and entertainment. At the Romsey Labour Club it was members only and there were no big-money fortunes to be made.

Back in the Kinema it was eyes down again as people concentrated on the numbers, hoping for the big break – like the one enjoyed by Mr E. Brauerski, head porter at the Blue Boar Hotel, who had just the week before hit the jackpot with a massive £1,000 in a national competition.

But the papers were full of even bigger wins; in 1967 there was news of gigantic prizes of £2,164 and £4,370 in September alone, won through the National Golden Scoop Club – but that was judged illegal by Law Lords the following February. Then in the 1980’s the national newspapers discovered the magic of bingo. A Cambridge man won £40,000 in ‘The Sun’, a Cambridge woman won £20,000 with the ‘Mirror’; and there was another big payout by the ‘Daily Star’.

Once more a News reporter was sent into the bingo hall. This time it was Chris Elliott who took the afternoon away from his desk in March 1983 for a return to the Central. Now there was the additional attraction of Parti Bingo, the kind of 20p-in-the-slot machines found in seaside arcades, before the main games started. Queen of the Club was Mrs Daisy Driver who’d been playing bingo since 1948. She went four times a week, paying 23p admission – pensioner price – and £1.70 for a couple of books. It was a home from home where regulars had their favourite seats; they met their friends and enjoyed the social repartee, it got them out of the house and kept them mentally stimulated. There was even a club party with a cabaret – Emile Ford would be the entertainer. And if they won – and prizes went right up to £1,000 on a Saturday night – then that was a bonus.

Nowadays the winnings seem tame compared to the twice-weekly riches dished out by the National Lottery. But for thousands nothing can beat the thrill of ‘eyes down’, ‘all the twos’ ... ‘Kelly’s eye’ ... ‘two fat ladies’, ‘unlucky for some’ – or has the language changed since I last played a dozen or more years ago?

If you have memories of Bingo, write to Mike Petty at the News [I HAVE MADE A SELECTION OF PICTURES OF VARIOUS DATES – THEY ARE IN THE NEWS LIBRARY PICTURES FILE UNDER ‘GAMBLING – BINGO’]

**

Paul Loveday from Girton has contacted me with details of my mystery choir photo (Memories Jan 9th). He should know as he was the lad with the darker tie in the middle of the front row of sweet-voiced handsome lads from St Philip’s Boys School at the annual music festival for junior schools that culminated in a grand service at the Guildhall. It was a sort of Last Night of the Proms and all schools from the Cambridge area used to take part. The date he puts as either 1963 or 1964.

Another part-picture from the News files shows a group of dignitaries watching a billiards match – but where and who? It might be something to do with the police, fire or ambulance service. If you can help please contact me [SCAN]

Ted Austin from Over has been prompted by the recent opportunities for skating in the fens to write: “I wonder how many Cottenham readers remember Joe Norman. He was a masterpiece at acquiring ‘beer money’ and took full advantage of skating. He could be seen on his wooden skates at Bury Fen, Earith or Swavesey High. In his pocket a gimlet and a leather punch, round his neck a bundle of leather straps of various sizes and in his hand a three-legged stool. As he skated he called out ‘On, Off, or tightening’, repairing skates that were slipping where they shouldn’t. He loved to tell tales of his stool, since in the 1930’s the wearing of trousers by ladies was much less common than it is today! What a character!” Do you remember Joe, or similar ‘characters’

Cheryl Barden from Cambridge has sent me a copy of a Christmas card she found down the back of her fireplace. It shows the ‘Plough and Harrow’ on Madingley Road, Cambridge and was sent with a seasonal greeting by ‘Ivan and Chris’ to all their friends – and presumably customers. All we know by way of date is that the phone number was 55349 and that they offered hot snacks and parking. Does it ring any bells? [SCAN]

Edith Jackson from King’s Hedges, used to live in The Volunteer, Trumpington Road. She treasures a photograph of a line of old soldiers near the pub, proudly sporting their medals. There’s a Union Jack and a Band – but what was it all about. If you can help let me know [SCAN]

Memories 23rd January 2002

When reading one of my daily ‘Looking Back’ columns recently Ivy from Newmarket Road, Cambridge found her eyes drawn to a story that recorded the day she made headline news in January 1977.

The article read:

Polio case confirmed at Addenbrooke’s. A 19-year-old girl from the Royston area is in Addenbrooke’s Hospital, Cambridge, with polio. It is the first case reported in the region for several years. The Hospital stressed there was no need for undue concern but urged members of the public to check their own vaccinations, which is taken by mouth on a lump of sugar. In 1975 only one case of polio was reported nationally. Last year it rose to eight. It is believed the Royston girl is the second victim so far this year.*

Poliomyelitis was a word that spread panic half a century ago. In September 1950 the News reported that an Engineer from Brampton RAF Station had died in an Iron Lung. He’d been the third polio victim in Huntingdonshire that year and lived 200 yards from the home of another man who was progressing satisfactorily in Cambridge Isolation Hospital infected with polio. A Godmanchester man had died in Middlesex Isolation Hospital just the week before, within two days of contracting the disease. By 1956 a polio vaccine was declared safe and a wholesale vaccination programme put into operation.

Now for most of us polio is just a word. But for Ivy it is a sentence. Even last year, 25 years after her attack, she frequently goes back to Addenbrooke’s Hospital for continued treatment and care. It affected her immune system, kidneys, muscles; robbing her of an active life & causing her anger & frustration.

Ivy was a fit young, attractive, red-haired girl from Witchford who liked nothing more than working on the land, as all her family did – mum, dad, three brothers and three sisters. So when she had the chance to visit her aunt at Royston, with a bit of potato picking thrown in, she jumped at it. There was a lot of flu about that year and few escaped, so when she began not to feel well & her legs went weak she thought little of it and carried on. Then her legs went down and she had to take to bed; sickness followed, her aunt knew something was wrong.

It was December 1976 and there was a Hospital strike. Royston hospital would not take her in; an ambulance rushed her to Addenbrooke's Hospital as she slipped in and out of consciousness. She awoke in a hospital bed, feeling lousy. Her arm would not move, her leg would not move; in fact she was paralysed from her neck downwards. Ivy was in a single room, she was in isolation; everybody who visited her was swathed in masks and gowns – and numerous doctors and students came to prod and pull. “Why can’t they leave me alone!” she despaired

Slowly some movement did come back into her arms, but she wouldn’t tell the nurses. Secretly she exercised improving a little day by day. December stretched into January and February and by then she was subjected to the humiliation of being collected in a wheelchair and wheeled down to physiotherapy by a porter. She didn’t want therapy, she wanted to be left alone, & certainly not wired up to some stupid machine – especially one that suddenly went wrong, making strange noises. The nurse called the doctor, the doctor rushed over to diagnose the fault. He knew what it was. The machine had not malfunctioned. Ivy’s legs had started to regain movement. “I think you’ve got life!” he told her.

That was the turning point; now she felt she had a chance. Soon she was propelling herself in a wheelchair, then she moved on to crutches. Inevitably there were setbacks; she fell off the chair, she trapped herself in a lavatory – and it was the porter who found her. In fact he was always there.

As she slowly improved, Brian, her porter, asked the Sister’s permission to take Ivy to the cinema; later they dined at the University Arms Hotel. Finally Ivy was well enough to go home to Witchford, but she had not seen the last of the porter. They married six months later in March 1978 at Cambridge Registry Office and moved into a caravan he’d bought behind the pub at Teversham. Then they got on the housing ladder.

Ivy, still severely handicapped, did voluntary work looking after babies until she was well enough to take paid employment, cleaning at Fulbourn Hospital & packing beef burghers. They bought a tandem so she could travel into the countryside that she loved. It was not all plain sailing; she suffered the agony of a miscarriage but they have now three healthy teenage children, each doing well at college.

But still Ivy pulls on her callipers, still she makes regular journeys to Addenbrooke’s Hospital and always she stares at the window of the room where she was held in isolation for three months 25 years ago. A room she knows she would not have left were it not for the dedication of Dr Jenner her consultant & the doctors, nurses – and porters - who would not give up on her, even though she had given up on herself. [SCAN OF NEWS ARTICLE

[IVY PANTER OF 684 NEWMARKET ROAD, CAMBRIDGE (292104) WOULD PREFER NOT TO BE IDENTIFIED].

Residents in Cherry Hinton have been digesting the news that – for postal purposes - they are now definitely part of Cambridge, and certainly no longer a village. Cherry Hinton formally became absorbed in 1934 but urbanisation had been going on for decades before that. Between 1881 & 1891 the village had increased in size from 869 to 1,639 people.

Today such expansion is often the source of friction between ‘old’ and ‘new’ residents but writing in 1891 and old inhabitant marvelled at the improvements that new development had brought. “Cherry Hinton can now vie with most in the comfort and convenience of its cottages, with their furniture, the result of the combined industry of male and female; the former so largely employed on the railway, the waterworks and asylum etc. One great improvement in the new cottages has been the building of detached washing places, so that the steam and exhalations from wet clothes does not furnish so much inducement for the head of the family to resort to the public house.

“Drunkenness is a rarity in our streets, though the number of public houses is still far too many. With eleven public houses within our boundary the amount spent in beer and tobacco cannot be small. The standard of morals, together with that of the marriage tie, has been much raised.

“In my early recollection, fustian and a figured smock frock, with a red cloak for more elderly women, were the extent of the labourer's aspirations, now broad cloth is the rule, and the employing classes can hardly be distinguished, by their dress, from the employed.”

Nor did the increased population bring increased crime: he spoke of the present “comparative security of property ... compared with the henroost robbing and the general insecurity of property in those days. The possession of the labouring man of more than enough to keep ‘the wolf from the door’ has led him the more to respect the rights and possessions of his more favoured neighbours. I would not be insensible to the gradual fusion of classes, and the breaking down of those hard and fast lines of distinction which, in earlier days, so stood in the way of that mutual trust and confidence that should more pervade the various classes of the human fraternity”.

But more and more houses have kept arriving; by 1962 there were complaints that it was “a village that was swallowed”, its individuality drowned in blanket development. Certainly an estate agent’s advertisement of 1971 offering homes in “the quiet, peaceful English hamlet of Cherry Hinton” would raise eyebrows today. As more and more homes have been built & more and more people move in so old-time residents can reflect: “I may not have your money, I may not have your brains – but at least I had the good sense to be born here!” [CHERRY HINTON PIX FROM NEWS LIBRARY]

There is another historical reflection on the postal changes. After Chesterton was absorbed into Cambridge some residents in High Street were quick appreciate a change in their social status. For central Cambridge had a King’s Parade, a Trinity Street, a Sidney Street. It had no High Street. So if Chesterton was now Cambridge then High Street Chesterton must surely now be High Street, Cambridge! At least that was the opinion of photographer Ted Mott who started to re-caption his Chesterton postcards, possibly in the hope of increasing sales to tourists. [SCAN, BETTER PIX FROM NEWS LIBRARY?]

More readers have responded to pictures featured recently in ‘Memories’

Mrs Sylvia Cooper (nee Ellis) of Cottenham recognised herself amongst the 19th Cambridge Guides and Brownies along with her younger sister Rosemary Doggett and several others she can name. She knew wheel-chair bound Miss Easton well as she often used to push her to the meetings at the Mission Hall from her home in Stone Street

Eileen Ward of Impington saw her elder daughter Karen amongst the children performing at the Guildhall concert in 1965-66 (Memories 9th January). Karen is the little girl in the left-hand corner, wearing a white Alice band. She was a pupil at Morley Memorial School then but is now married and living in Cheltenham. The concerts obviously continued for some time since Mr M. Clements has another picture of the one in which he performed in the mid 1970s. [PICTURE FROM NEWS LIBRARY FILES?]

David Beynon is the first to E-mail to identify my picture of a billiards table (Memories 16th January). It was in the clubroom of the former Fire Station in Newmarket Road, Cambridge. He ought to know since he played many a game on it during a long career with the Brigade. The presence of the then Chief Fire Officer, Mr Bob Stepney, on the left of the line-up of worthies, suggests to him that it was taken during a traditional Christmas morning visit by members of the Fire Brigade Committee. This might account for the festive glass of sherry being enjoyed by those worthies in another fragment of a photograph taken at the same time

Joan Mitchell has telephoned to say that her grandfather, Frederick Marshall, was amongst the old soldiers gathered outside the Volunteer pub in Trumpington Road, Cambridge in the picture featured in Memories last week. It's pretty certainly a group of Trumpington men on an Armistice Day parade. Mr Marshall fought in both the Boer and First World War and returned badly injured to his home in North Terrace. He died in 1956 [REPRISE PHOTO?]

Way back in November I mentioned the large house that used to stand in the middle of Wandlebury ring. Pat White, keeper of accessions for Fulbourn village society, has now unearthed a very rare photo of the vanished home, virtually covered in ivy. Her Society are always looking to add to their archive of Fulbourn material so if you can help ring her on Cambridge 881037. [SCAN]

Memories 27th January 02, by Mike Petty

Last week's News broke two stories that seem destined to fill its pages for months to come – as they have done in the past.

The first was of the proposals for the possible restriction of traffic in Silver Street. This has for long been an inconvenient and narrow entry into Cambridge and plans for its improvement go back to at least 1889, when at the opening of Victoria Avenue there was a plea for a new road and bridge to carry traffic from Lensfield Road to Newnham, thus relieving Silver Street.

Perhaps closure was also envisaged in 1904 when the Cambridge Electric Traction Syndicate proposed the electrification of the existing horse trams with new lines down Silver Street & along the Backs, though this was opposed by those to whom the prospect of overhead power lines did not appeal. Another report of about the same time also received little support; it included filling in the Mill Pool – which might make space for an additional car park.

Motorists found the street difficult to negotiate, in 1911 there was a petition about notoriously bad egress from Silver Street into Trumpington Street. The situation dramatically improved in 1926 with the opening of Fen Causeway, but inevitably deteriorated again and in 1971 came plans for a Western relief road across Lammas Land, parallel to the Causeway

Then in 1958 came the most obvious comparison with the current plans. The great floods of 1947 had weakened Silver Street Bridge and a new one was needed; a temporary bridge was erected while rebuilding took place, it reopened in August 1959. Does anybody recall this disruption to traffic flow?

But one cannot permanently ban all traffic of every description from such an important thoroughfare and plans are being canvassed for barriers or rising bollards to enable emergency vehicles and others to have access. Should this happen it will be a repeat of the situation before 1824, when there was a toll-bar across the street. It's a long way back, but the story goes something like this – and if some of the dodges of those days seem familiar today it just shows that history goes round and round.

For as long as people could remember Cambridge Corporation had demanded a toll of 2d for every loaded waggon that came into town over Silver Street Bridge. If the waggon unloaded there was another 2d charge and if it took a fresh load that was 2d more.

James Ratcliffe had been a dealer in earthenware back in the 1790s and he had always paid the fee whenever he was caught by the toll-collector, although sometimes he went to Cambridge early and came out late so that he got away without payment. He later became a toll-collector himself. Then there was the old widow woman, Mrs Norris, who did the job in 1760. She hobbled along with a stick and put the money in a pitcher which she always carried. William Royston was a farmer at Hardwick as his father had been before him, as a lad he remembered going to Mr Beale's at Cambridge to deliver corn for milling or to collect coal; sometimes they went over the Small Bridges and down Silver Street, sometimes not. But if they were spotted they always paid the toll and had their waggon marked with chalk - a different colour for each day. Of course if they came in empty- or had arranged the load so that the collector could not see it above the side of the cart - they were not charged. If the carrier refused to pay then his goods were distrained.

In justification for the charge the Corporation claimed that it needed the money to pay for the upkeep of the streets and bridges. There had been a bridge at Silver Street for centuries and in the old days there used to be a hermit who took tolls and repaired the bridge. History recorded that when he had died in 1494 the Corporation had had to make the bridge passable again so quickly had it deteriorated. They'd rebuilt it in 1648 and were always being forced to pay out for repairs.

However others pointed out that as a result of an Act of Parliament in 1788 these responsibilities had been transferred to a new body, the Cambridge Improvement Commissioners who were authorised to levy taxes for road repair. Why then should people pay twice and what were the Corporation spending their toll-money on anyway. Was the £700 spent on the town's prison or prosecuting wrong-doers - no for that came from the High Constable's rate which also paid for the expenses of the Aldermen who undertook duties at the Petty Sessions. Did the money go to subsidise the poor, the disabled soldiers or sailors that were always present - no for that too came from other rates. Weston Hatfield was convinced that he knew where the money was going - "on scenes of riot and gluttony, on feasts monthly annual and occasional on every pretext, on midnight orgies" for councillors. It was an example of the corruption of the Corporation in the 1820s, just part of the sad state of affairs at that time.

So in 1824 Messrs Beales and Company refused to pay the tolls which he considered a "grievous tax upon the industrious people who bring provisions to the town to supply the necessities of its inhabitants". They were taken to court. The trial involved extensive readings from ancient documents dating back to the Domesday Book; charters and statutes were quoted legal arguments raised. The hearing lasted for a day and a half by the end of which the Lord Chief Justice "was so inaudible from exhaustion" that he could scarcely be heard as he summed up the case. The jury had no doubts: the case was found in Beales' favour the Corporation had no right to the tolls they had collected for so many years.

Two more cases followed; the Corporation won the second but lost the decider and the tolls came to an end. Anybody could cross Silver Street Bridge without let or hindrance – but for how much longer?

The other modern news story last week was the suggestion that part of Christ's Pieces might be taken for an extension to Drummer Street Bus Station. This recalls the controversy of August 1925 when the original proposals to take a slide of the Piece to create a bus station and car park generated a great protest. A meeting attracted a crowd of over 2,000 people to Drummer Street and after a resolution of protest had been passed the crowd decided to take it to the Mayor that night. Something like a 1,000 people staged a midnight march to the Mayor's house drawing a tumbrel wagon with their leaders on it, urging her to call another council meeting to overturn the decision. But the council stuck to its guns and the bus station went ahead.

Soon the new area was too small and another area of open space – New Square – was being canvassed for a car park. The News was asked to lead opposition to the proposals but declined. “Most people smile when they think of tremendous agitation worked up against Drummer Street ... but nobody is one penny the worse. The only fault is that Drummer Street is not big enough - hence the need for New Square” the editor opined in March 1929. We must watch the editorials to see his opinion this time round! [OLD DRUMMER STREET & NEW SQUARE CAR PARK PIC FROM NEWS FILES; CHRIST’S PIECES PIC SCANNED – OR FROM FILES]

**

Melissa Aves has E-mailed to solve the mystery of the Christmas card featuring the Plough and Harrow, Madingley Road, which was discovered behind a fireplace in Bermuda Road (News 16th January). She not only knows who sent it – Ivan Nathan the publican – but also who it was sent to – her dad Graham Pledger.

Another old Christmas card has come in from Anthony Chapman of Cambridge. It was sent to him at Addenbrooke's Hospital back in 1936 and was signed by the boys from class 2A of the Central School and their master, Dick Annely. In those days classes were 40 strong and 39 signed the card. Several went on to become bemedalled heroes, successful businessmen, University employees and salesmen. Sadly at least 15 have now passed away. [SCAN OF NAMES, BUT MAY BE TOO DARK]

Mrs Laura Simmons crochets items for Mayfield School Christmas fair and there met an old gentleman, probably in his 80's. He recalled learning to knit at the old St Luke's Infants School in Victoria Road, Cambridge. Boys and girls all had to make squares using thick 'dishcloth' cotton which were used for wiping their slates. After the slates they progressed to thick pencils, then the notorious dip-pens. Laura recalls these herself from the days she was a teacher in the 1950s. “The ink came in powder form and every week the ‘ink monitor’ came around to collect the inkwells for refilling – and extracting the bits of blotting paper stuffed in them!”

Local historian Allan Brigham is seeking memories just like this of the Sedley School for a history / scrapbook he is helping to write in advance of its closure in the summer. The school was built to cater for the new Coleridge Road Estate in the 1920s and in particular he would like memories of the period before the Second World War. Can you help? If so contact Allan at 17 Romsey Road, Cambridge CB1 3DD (tel 212189) or go along to the course he is running at the Folk Museum on Monday afternoons from 11th February to 4th March. You will not only learn about old Cambridge but also have a chance to explore the Museum at the same time. [PIC OF SEDLEY SCHOOL FROM NEWS FILES?]

Mrs M.P. Owen of Cambridge lent me a picture she has of the old coal chute at Cambridge station. Her husband worked as a guard on the railways for over 50 years but can't quite remember when it was taken. Can you help? [SCAN]

Memories 6th February 2002, by Mike Petty

NOTE : SPORTS DESK HAVE SAID THEY MAY DO A SURVEY OF SOME OF THEIR CONTACTS AND BRING THE STORY UP TO DATE

The origins of the sport of table tennis seem to have been lost in the mists of time. Encyclopaedia Britannica thinks it may have been invented in England in the early days of the 20th century

The Times dignified it with an article on 30th December 1901 when it reported: “the pastime of hitting a tiny ball to and fro across a net upon a table has become popular”. So popular indeed that a three-day tournament had been arranged in the Queens Hall which attracted a large entry of competitors with more coming to watch, and perhaps pick up tips on technique. It had all been arranged by the Ping Pong Association who had issued a set of rules: matches were “20 up” with service changing every five points and players changing ends every ten points. The ball had to be served from behind the table and no volleying was permitted. But it was no longer ping-pong for the latest fashion was for wooden rackets that neither ‘ping’ nor ‘pong’.

It was, thundered the Times, not something for serious competitors: “One is inclined to think that a game at which a child can compete on equal terms with grown men cannot make much of a claim to be considered as anything but an occupation for the idlest, slackest hours. For gentle after-dinner exercise table tennis can certainly be recommended to such as have no billiard table. But few people would be content with such mild exercise and fewer still ... would devote very much time to a game in which the possibilities of exercising skill and judgement as so strictly limited”

But already the game had caught on in Cambridge. As the News reported in February 1902:

In at least one thing Cambridge is abreast of the times. She has the craze for ping-pong, or to call it by its more dignified name, table tennis. For a long time past on quiet evenings the not unmusical the ping of the racket could be heard coming from the houses of the up-to-date. It was then a drawing room entertainment; but the passion for the little celluloid ball extended, and after the cheapening of the materials, there were few people who had not found amusement in the game, and obtained flushed cheeks from crawling under the tables in search of the elusive celluloid.

By Christmastime ping-pong parties had become quite general, political and social clubs had imported the game, ping-pong clubs were formed and now Cambridge has been brought into line with the metropolis by holding a tournament.

The contest was to be held at the Conservative Club, Market Passage, Cambridge but owing to the large entry it was decided to transfer operations to the Corn Exchange where six Whitmore patent table tennis tables were arranged under the gas jets. The new tables had a special rough surface to reduce bounce and enable the ball to take the screw, and give greater scope for real skill. Competitors played best of seven games of nine points each.

The tournament attracted a considerable entry for each of three categories: 60 entered the gentleman's singles, and 20 each the ladies and mixed doubles categories. Townsfolk took on University gentlemen on an equal footing. There were good players and indifferent players; tall players who relied upon speed and those of smaller stature who employed subtler arts, giving a wicked break in their service and making the ball fly in all directions. The one table reserved for ladies was always an attraction. The News commented: "The lady competitors, generally in smart costumes, played a milder game, though there were some who would have made the male sex jump about".

It was a thoroughly entertaining event, played for modest prizes and enjoyed by all. Then big money came in.

Next month, March 1902, an 'Imperial Ping-Pong Tournament' was arranged with handsome prizes valued at 45 guineas. This time it was more organised; four first-class tables by Messrs Feltham of London had been arranged in the Victoria Assembly Rooms on Market Hill. There were chairs in raised tiers so that spectators might have an uninterrupted view of the play and a refreshment bar had been provided.

But this time the crowds stayed away; only 31 gents and 10 ladies entered. They included G.F. Hotblack and R. Erstone Forbes, finalists in the earlier tournament, but the highlight of the first night's play was the match between E.P. Chance & R.S. Mills that contained one rally of 397 shots and three others over 200.

The tournament continued over the Wednesday and Thursday evenings and culminated in finals between R. E. Forbes & Norman Spicer, Spicer being victorious in a match kept interesting by the "absence of long and tedious rallies". In the ladies' final much interest was aroused in whether Mrs A.J. Ransom and Mrs E.W. Illsley would repeat their Corn Exchange finals battle again; they did and this time the much improved Mrs Ransom was victorious.

It appears that a national Ping Pong Association was formed in 1902, but broke up three years later; it was revived in the 1920s.

But what happened locally. Cambridgeshire Table Tennis Association celebrated its Silver Jubilee in May 1962 when its President, Mr W.J. Rogerson traced its history back to September 1936 when a Cambridge team comprising Messrs Humphries, Betterman, Stearn, Constable and Nunn beat a team from Bury St Edmunds. Then in September 1999 St George's Table Tennis Club celebrated its 50th anniversary with a barbecue behind St George's Church. News files contain dozens of pictures of young –and not so young – competing in tournaments, and the ping pong table used to be a prominent feature in youth and social clubs. But have they now been succeeded by pool tables.

[SCAN OF YOUNGSTERS PLAYING PING PONG AT THE FREEBOOTERS COFFEE BAR AND CLUB, WELLINGTON STREET, CAMBRIDGE 1961; I HAVE SELECTED SOME PICTURES AND PUT THEM IN A PASTIC BAG IN THE 'SPORTS TABLE TENNIS' FILES IN THE NEWS LIBRARY]

More information has come in from readers about the Fire Brigade social club photograph I featured on January 16th; Jim Higgins from Cambridge recognises two of the dignitaries as being Miles and Peggy Burkitt who lived in Grantchester.

The week before that I featured a sketch of a quiet corner of a country churchyard. It had been made by Chris Godfrey & appears in a posthumous collection of his sketches produced by his former colleagues in the County Council Conservation Department. But none of them could quite place it. Now Lady Richenda Huxley has written in to identify it as the south-east corner of Grantchester church, and another mystery is solved. Chris Godfrey's Cambridgeshire costs £12.50 from Shire Hall. [PRINT USED 9TH JAN – I CAN'T FIND SCAN, IT MAY BE ON DISK FOR THAT WEEK IF YOU HAVE IT STILL]

Brian Warboys from Oakington was so fascinated with a recent picture of Histon school football team, 1935 vintage, that he has trawled through his own archives to come up with a picture of the 1938-39 team that he captained – being the oldest and biggest of the lads. The goalkeeper was Bert Warrington and Brian can name all the others, including Ray Unwin, 'Puggy' Adams and Eric Tolliday. The reserve, not in kit, was Horace Clark. Although he lived in Oakington Brian – then known by his first name, George – went to Histon school at about 10 years old, cycling with Alan and Gordon Stearn. There was another family named Flack who walked there from Kings Hedges. [SCAN]

Bill Spencer from Waterbeach has lent me a picture that will tease anybody who had relations there in the 1950s. It shows a Waterbeach British Legion ladies' party in their hall – now the Beach Social Club. If you see anybody you know then please let me know [SCAN]

Memories 13th February 2002, by Mike Petty

The News of the death of Princess Margaret which broke at the weekend has plunged the Royal Family into a period of mourning; the Queen has lost a sister, the country a Princess.

Just 50 years ago the mourning was even more intense; for then the country had lost a King, the Queen had lost a father, and Cambridge felt she had lost a son.

This son moreover had been with them in the April of the previous year, 1951, accompanied by his Queen, Elizabeth (the present Queen Mother), and their younger daughter, Margaret Rose. When the car flying the Royal standard had drawn up to the city boundary at Newmarket Road many mothers from nearby houses had brought their children along with little flags and some enterprising onlookers climbed on to one of Marshall's buildings to get a bird's eye view. Carried away by their enthusiasm many toddlers had continued to cheer and wave small Union Jacks long after the Royal party had passed.

The Royals were here to attend a Thanksgiving Service to mark the restoration of the stained glass in King's College chapel windows following their removal during the war years. It was King George VI's first visit to the City of Cambridge – for he had been graciously pleased to grant, what he described as that "high and well-deserved honour on the ancient borough" only a month earlier.

But he had known the town decades before; in 1919-20 the future King – then Prince Albert, Duke of York - and his brother Prince Henry, later Duke of Gloucester, had attended Trinity college. Though they resided at Latham Road he had entered fully into undergraduate life, attended debates at the Union Society including one occasion when Winston Churchill was speaking. It was to prove a costly excursion for as he left the meeting the future King was accosted by a Bulldog – one of the University policeman – and later fined 6/8. His offence: smoking whilst in academic dress. The porter who 'progged' him was sent to collect the fine from the Prince himself and found himself quite put at ease by the Royal transgressor. Indeed he told the Prince that he had spotted him smoking on a previous occasion when leaving the Corn Exchange – but had mistaken him for one of the people who had been performing inside – a boxer!

The Duke had returned to the Union Society in 1921 to celebrate its centenary. Next year he was back in July to unveil a Memorial to Victory at the end of Station Road – though the actual bronze figure that was to stand on the plinth was not actually ready in time, and a plaster cast had been substituted – and a war memorial at the Leys School. He had also attended the Royal Show at Trumpington and the University Senate House where he had been made an Honorary Doctor of Law. In 1932 he had brought his Duchess for her first visit to Cambridge to open a new wing at Addenbrooke's Hospital for children and private patients.

But then had come the Abdication of his brother and the Duke of York had become King George VI. Many of his subsequent visits were ringed with secrecy, for during the Second World War the movement of members of the Royal Family were kept censored. Yet he was always here & there – inspecting bomber bases, chatting to Land Army girls in the fens, shaking hands at a new Royal Air Force Hospital at Ely.

In June 1947 he paid an official visit to his old college, Trinity, on the occasion of the 400th anniversary of its foundation. Mrs P. J. Anderson from Cherry Hinton Road remembered in “Memories” how: “I was working in a Government Office in Station Road at the time and as they came by train we all trooped into the road to cheer them on. To make it seem more impressive our departmental flag was flown along with the Union Jack and it wasn’t until the royal couple had passed that we realised it had been flying upside down”.

Now he was to pass through Cambridge one final time, for the train that was to convey his coffin from the Royal station at Wolferton, near Sandringham House where he had died, would make its stately way through the county towards King’s Cross. It would be crewed by Cambridge men. The driver would be Mr S. Harding who first drove the Royal train when the King came down to Trinity, and the fireman Mr C. Pearman from Weston Colville. Also on the train, as fitter, was Mr W.H. Simmonds of Kelvin Close, Cambridge. Another local link was that the stationmaster at Wolferton, Mr Bernard Hodge, had formerly been in charge of Whittlesford Station.

Long before the ten-coach funeral train bearing the body of King George VI, was due to arrive large crowds had gathered at the main vantage points along the track. At Littleport and Queen Adelaide people waited patiently and sombrely. At Ely station hundreds of people including American servicemen & workmen who had given up part of their dinner hour assembled on both sides of the crossing, whilst lines of traffic extended for some distance. The Chairman of the Ely Urban Council, Col G.L. Archer, requested councillors should meet him on the station platform to pay their last respects, only to be told the platforms were to be kept clear. The ruling was relaxed so that a small party, including Major Harry Legge Bourke, MP could be present as the train rolled smoothly through the station.

At the little village station of Waterbeach about 100 housewives, farmworkers and children gathered. A crowd of more than 800 people including undergraduates alongside boys from the Technical College lined the marshalling yards on either side of Mill Road bridge, Cambridge. The long black funeral coach, with its windows blacked out passed exactly on time.

The train steamed slowly through Cambridge station where 200 people lined the platform and more peered through the station entrance. One carriage had its blinds half drawn but the scarlet coats of Guardsmen could be glimpsed in another, contrasting with the black clothes of officials in a third. A group of railwaymen, standing caps off near Hills Road railway bridge were sure they glimpsed the pale pensive face of their new Queen, Elizabeth II, as it passed. They were there in case of emergency, as was, standing spick and span near Cambridge South signal box, the olive-green Welbeck Abbey, a Sandringham class locomotive, one of three trains standing by on the route in case of breakdown on the journey.

There were no breakdowns – at least none mechanical – as the funeral train continued passed groups of mourners at Foxton railway station and a busload of passengers in a Premier Travel coach, one of many that stood motionless at railway crossings while the King's final journey was made back to London.

Then came a period of mourning and intense preparation. Flags flew at half mast on college tower and church flagpole; one flew from ropes surrounding the hole made by Gas men excavating in Park Terrace; Cambridge was a city of flags.

When on Friday 15th February the King's funeral procession was winding its slow way through London's streets, so hundreds in Cambridge joined in Britain's mourning for her late Sovereign at services in the city. City and County dignitaries combined at Great St Mary's church where about a thousand people filled the church. Most of the men wore black ties. The scarlet robes of City aldermen provided the one touch of colour; even the gilt of the maces was subdued by a draping of black. There were those in the uniforms of the Territorials, police and fire brigade; Ambulance, W.V.S., Girl Guides and Boy Scouts and representatives from the Women's Institute. But many more could not get in and the service was relayed to an overflow gathering in the Guildhall. Then as the congregation slowly moved away the church was already beginning to fill with members of the University for their own service. All around the city, and throughout the county similar heads were being bowed in homage.

Then at two o'clock a crowd of some 300 people gathered on the Cambridge Market Place. Men removed their hats and heads were lowered. Cars and buses came to a halt as the explosion of a maroon marked the start of a two-minute silence. But by then the Mayor and dignitaries were no longer in Cambridge; like 2,000 others they had journeyed to Ely Cathedral for a last act of homage. Here they joined University officials alongside the chief citizens from around the county, the High Sheriff in his black velvet coat, cocked hat and silver-buckled shoes, the 15 Deputy Lieutenants - two ceremonially dressed in scarlet and blue complete with swords and plumed cocked hats - and the hundreds of ordinary men and women in their Sunday best. A 150-yard procession of clergy moved down the long pillared nave and under the great Octagon, then itself threatened with Death Watch Beetle. All joined in the official burial service for the King, as sanctioned by the Queen – a Queen that some in the congregation had proclaimed from the steps of their Guildhalls and Senate Houses just a few days earlier.

Then it was turn to return to their mansions or council houses and look forward to a time when it would be a smiling Queen's face that they saw in a golden carriage window.

But for some railwaymen the memory would linger of that face pale with grief seen through a railway carriage window of a train driven by her loyal Cambridge subjects as she took her first glimpse of the City her father had loved, and which had loved him as one of her own.

SCAN OF PICTURE OF KING, QUEEN (MOTHER) AND MARGARET AT KING'S COLLEGE 1951 & OF ARRIVAL OF THE COFFIN AT KINGS CROSS I HAVE SELECTED PICS OF HIS PREVIOUS VISITS WHICH ARE IN A PLASTIC ENVELOPE IN THE LIBRARY "ROYALS. GEORGE VI" FILE. THE ONE OF HIM WITH PRINCESS ELIZABETH AND HER CHILDREN SEEMS PARTICULARLY GOOD. PHOTOGRAPHIC ARE TRYING TO GET A PICTURE OF THE TRAIN FROM THE PA. I HAVE SOME PRINTS OF NEWSPAPER HEADLINES BUT THEY ARE NOT VERY CLEAR AND WILL MAKE ANOTHER WHEN IN LION YARD WHICH I WILL DELIVER MONDAY PM. THERE IS A PHOTO OF HEADLINES FOR DEATH OF KING – CHRIS ELLIOTT HAD IT THE OTHER DAY

Memories 19th February 2002, by Mike Petty

George Dethridge from Bar Hill has sent me some of his reminiscences. His family came to Cambridge during the London blitz after their house in the East End had been damaged by a bomb. Their first home was a small end terrace house in Clement Place, close to the Round Church, with a Morrison air-raid shelter in the front room, taking up much-needed space. Then in 1941 came a new sister; now there were nine of them with mum and dad and they needed somewhere bigger.

George recalls: “We moved to Gwydir Street, off Mill Road, an end terrace house with a back yard with three bedrooms, an outside toilet and tin bath hanging on the side wall. Not forgetting that there were now nine in the family the three bedrooms were not really big enough but it was home and it was the best that could be done at that time. Mum and dad slept with my young sister in their bedroom and my two other sisters had the other bedroom, so that meant us four brothers had to share the third bedroom. With one double bed this meant that we had to sleep top and toe. We slept like this for many years to come.

“Downstairs was the front room with a fireplace and one gas lamp for lighting; this room was known as best room and only used on high days and holidays such as Christmas. The next room was the dining and cooking room with a cast-iron black hearth and a fire was always on the go to supply hot water. In the next and final room was the scullery with a brick boiler heated by wooden blocks for washing the clothes. Near the window was a deep sink with just a cold tap for the whole house.

“That was the inside of our home and the backyard was about four yards square, not a lot of space. In the yard was the toilet but no toilet rolls, just pieces of old newspaper squares that dad had cut up and hung on a piece of string. At the back of the house was a large warehouse storing magnesium, for incendiary bombs. This in itself caused problems with rats and other vermin so we had a cat to help to control this aspect of our daily lives. The garden was for growing vegetables, but as my parents did not have a garden they had to buy most of their food from the local shop in the street and maybe scrounge from whoever had some to spare. Many friends’ parents kept chickens and those who had bigger gardens kept pigs and ducks, so if there were any scraps of food left over it was taken to the house with the pigs

“As there was no electric in the house our wireless was powered by an accumulator battery which had to be recharged every so often. This meant taking it to a shop in Newmarket Road, carrying it either in a cycle basket or walking with a baby’s pushchair, as they were very heavy. Coal merchants delivered coal for the fire but on some occasions when we had run low we would cycle to the Gas Works on Newmarket Road and collect a bag of coke, then try to balance it on the cycle frame to get it home. If it was wintertime and the house was very cold and damp dad would give us a hot brick wrapped in brown paper to take to bed as we did not own any hot water bottles

“Saturdays was our family bath night, the tin bath would be put in front of the fire. Dad would be in charge of this operation, and he would keep topping up the bath with hot water from a kettle off the fire. Our sisters always went first, we boys were too dirty so we would be waiting our turn. As soon as the girls were done we would then get into the bath and try to get clean. There was always a scum around the bath as by now it had five or six of us in the same water. After the bathing of us all we would sit in front of the fire to dry out and mum would then go through our hair on our heads to check for hair lice (fleas or nits). Dad would empty the tin bath with a saucepan; this took some time to complete and was the worst job of bath night. Mind you we always had Donald Peers singing on the wireless and his opening tune was “In a shady nook by a babbling brook” and we listened with a cup of warm drink, so that’s how Saturday nights bathing would end, this happened week in and week out.

“Another thing we all had to do, as a family was to go to the Auckland Road every so often to have a bath in some sort of disinfectant. This entailed attending the baths, undressing and a large woman in a white overall would usher us into a cubical in which there was a large bath full of horribly smelling white fluid. The female attendant would watch over us a make sure that we got into the bath and that our whole bodies were submerged and that we ducked our heads under the contents, making sure we were well and truly covered top to tail. I believe we had to spend ten minutes in the bath we were then allowed to get out, dry ourselves and go off home. I was told that the baths were to get rid of all types of lice and to prevent scabies. One thing for sure it was horrible and not recommended.

“My eldest sister was 16 & had now married a GI and moved to the USA, so it came that eight of us moved from Gwydir Street to a new home in Kings Hedges Road. The house itself was much bigger although it still only had three bedrooms, but it had a bathroom, for us a luxury, the toilet undercover outside, and a hot water system from the open coal fire. The house looked like a two story pre-fab house made of sheets of asbestos. I can remember our first bath night in the new house. As usual it was a Saturday; we had a fire all day and with the fire we should have had hot water. We got into the bathroom, undressed as mum ran the bath for us all and guess what! The water was stone cold and poor mum had to put up with us moaning about the cold water, but needless to say we still had to have a bath and get on with it. The hot water system never worked in all the years we lived in this house. So dad had to purchase a gas boiler to heat the water and then it had to be carried up the stairs in buckets.

“In the late forties and early fifties Kings Hedges Road was very country-like as two thirds was open fields all the way across to Arbury Road. At the end of the road was a very large wooded area, which went all the way to Impington. But the real pleasure of the woods was a massive store of army tanks that were parked in an old army camp on the edge of Cambridge with the entrance on Milton Road. This camp backed on to the wooded area so we would scale the fence and climb onto the tanks to play but keeping an eye out for guards, as we were trespassing. It was an adventure to explore and if we were seen the guards would shout at us and we ran like rabbits back into the woods. There was a rail siding into the camp where all sorts of goods would be delivered and moved out but it was also where the dead American servicemen’s bodies would be prepared for return to the USA for burial, sad times for many families.”

In 1963, twenty years after George’s family moved away, News columnist Erica Dimock surveyed Gwydir Street for her ‘Down Your Street’ feature. The terraced houses looked much the same as they had since they were built in the 1860s, but the atmosphere of the street had changed. It was becoming ‘the Soho of Cambridge’ as young families moved away to be replaced with people from Italy, Jamaica, Poland, Yugoslavia and a variety of other countries. One man who knew the street well was Harry Pateman, a magistrate. He had lived in the same house for 70 years and could remember when they had their own chemist’s shop amongst the facilities on offer. The number of shops had declined but still included three grocery stores: Ernest Mills had been trading for 14 years, S.F. Cockell had moved there in the mid 1950s, and C. Harpur’s shop had changed hands only recently. One newcomer was Sadie Segal who had brought her second-hand clothing shop from Norfolk Street, having been trading for 23 years, ever since she moved down from London during the war. But trade was not what it used to be, since people could now obtain almost anything on credit.

Shoes would always be needed, and would always need mending. The British Shoe Corporation had its repair works in Upper Gwydir Street where some 1300 pairs were repaired each week, as they had since 1914. But now things were changing and craftsmanship was being eliminated by new processes, stitching having been replaced by sticking.

Beer was an important part of the life of the street. Dale’s Brewery dominated the area near Mill Road. It had been founded in the 1890s, when there were no fewer than 22 breweries in Cambridge. But by 1963 it was being used as a distribution depot by Whitbread and its landmark seven-foot high cup, a reminder of the gold cup won for the best beer at the Brewers' International Exhibition in 1911, had been removed for safety reasons. Of the five public houses that had once traded, two were closed by 1963; the former Prince of Wales had been owned for a while by Peter Cook of Footlights and 'Beyond the Fringe' frame and was then a lodging house, the Gwydir Arms was a private house. The Brewer's Arms had a good darts team, but the Alexandra Arms had lost its once-famous skittles club and at the Dew Drop inn the licensee, Leslie Peck, was lamenting the recent closure of the Embassy Ballroom in Mill Road, that had considerably reduced his custom. The Beaconsfield Conservative Club had itself formerly hosted dances in its imposing hall, then being used as a furniture warehouse, but both city and university judo clubs continued to meet in upper rooms.

It is hard to associate urban Gwydir Street with exotic snakes, lizards or spiders, but they were a regular hazard for H.W. Barnes, director of Whitehead's wholesale fruit and vegetable warehouse. They had hanging space for 900 stems of bananas some containing creepy crawlies, a quite impressive sight, & something like seven tons were received and despatched each week. Although oranges and South African apples were still very popular there was an increasing demand for more unusual fruit and continental produce.

But perhaps the most important building in the street was the Bath House with its nine baths for men, nine for women. It had been established in 1927 at a time when few houses had bathrooms of their own. By 1963 it was open from Tuesday to Saturday each week, charging a shilling a person, for which you got a hot bath, towel and piece of soap – with a supplement for scented bath cubes – and was used by 300 men and 100 women each week. But as housing improved so fewer people had need of its facilities, by 1975 it was losing £7,000 a year and its boilers – second hand when installed – were on their last legs. The baths closed in 1977.

Did you use the Gwydir Street baths, or do you have other memories of bath night. Write to Mike Petty

Memories 20th February 2002, by Mike Petty

Skittles hit the News headlines in February 1977 when reporter Alan Kersey took himself off to the Burleigh Arms on Newmarket Road, Cambridge, to meet men of great skill and dexterity. These sportsmen were members of the Cambridge & District Skittles League. Not for them the game where you swung a ball on a bit of string to knock down a few puny pieces of wood. They pitted their wits against other eight-man teams in a three-dimensional game that had its own terminology. Well how would a novice attempt to demolish London Bridge or shoot crows? Did he know how to stay in the hockey while coming round or most important of all, could he register more floorers than tackers when the game depends on pins?

Alan soon discovered that despite the apparent gibberish of the terminology there was more skill involved than in tenpin bowling or old fashioned skittle alleys – or those little boards with ball and string.

In this macho game teams of eight would hurl, toss or spin a flat, flying saucer-shaped cheese at a table resembling a large, sparsely padded armchair upon which were spaced nine wooden pins. The object was to knock as many down as you could in as few throws as possible. Get them all down in one go and you have notched up a "floorer". Hit the front and there is a derisive groan: a "tacker".

Each player had a maximum of four throws to demolish as many as possible, next the other members of the team took their turn. Then it was time for their opponents to respond and if at the end the score was tied it was down to each player having one final throw, most down wins.

But 25 years ago the dedicated band of serious skittles players were a dying breed. Whereas players used to have three regular practice sessions a week, now they generally arrived just in time for a game and then turned their attention to the one-armed bandits or other attractions of the 'seventies pub scene. In the old days, he was told, coachloads of players used to arrive long before the game to limber up; though perhaps an account of how the team from the George and Dragon in Thompson's Lane, Cambridge used to travel by coach to the Maypole – just three hundred yards away – may have been somewhat improved in the telling.

For the world was changing. Many of the pubs had themselves closed and in others landlords had thrown skittles out because it was too noisy, drowning even the noise of the jukebox; the game was in danger of disappearing

Ron Mansfield recalled sadly that of the 12 teams belonging to the League in 1964, only three remained. It was still going strong at the British Legion Club in Mill Road where two teams practised regularly & Pye's had recently formed a club. There were innovations – there was now a cup for mixed doubles, and hopes for an all-women's team, but somehow it was not the same. "Why worry", said Dick Brown, captain of the Burleigh Arms team. "It's a good night out and we all have a laugh" But is it still played – and do you recognise any of the Burleigh Arms team of 25 years ago

[NEG 2147712 – ALAN KERSEY'S CONCENTRATION IS DIRUPTED BY SLIGHTLY INEBRIATED MEMBERS OF THE BURLEIGH ARMS SKITTLES TEAM. THE CHEESE IN MID AIR IS ABOUT TO KNOCK OVER THE REMAINING PINS AND WIPE THE CYNICAL SMILES FROM THEIR FACES; OTHER PICS IN NEWS 'SPORTS.SKITTLES' FILE]

Meanwhile just down Newmarket Road the regulars of the Five Bells public house were hoping to achieve greater fame – a World Record, no less. They had trained assiduously with the assistance of various Cambridge chippies; they had contacted the Guinness Book of Records, they had even been donated a commemorative trophy. But their hopes of setting up a World Mushy Pea Eating Championship were doomed to ignominious failure. The problem was the peas themselves. "You just wanted to be sick, they were so foul", said landlord George Low. "They were so terrible no one could eat them. I was looking to eat 10 bowls-full myself but could only manage two". The processed peas had been provided free by a commercial soup firm, who defended their product. They were blended to meet the delicate palates of customers in the North of England, Cambridge folk just did not appreciate them. Despite the taste – "like eating flour and water with nasty undertones" - Ronald Toates managed to down nine bowls-full to win the challenge trophy. Paul Currington won the race for the fastest half-pint bowl with a time of 14 seconds – "I reckon he did it so fast so he could get them down without having to taste them", said landlord Low. Despite their failure all were determined to try again – only this time they'd use their own home-made mushy peas.

[NEG 56377 – COMPETITORS TACKLE THE PEAS]

Tony Brothie has responded to my request for information on the early days of table tennis with a photograph of officials of the Cambridge and District Table Tennis Association taken in 1961 when they celebrated their 25th anniversary. He has another of a tournament in the Corn Exchange in 1962, the same venue that had been used 60 years earlier. My continuing delving through the files of the News have now turned up evidence of the formation of perhaps the earliest Cambridge 'Ping Pong' club, in February 1902. It was based in the New Town Conservative Club, Russell Street where two Whitmore patent tables had been provided, & was open to residents in the New Town district of Cambridge. The honorary secretary was Mr E. W. Illsley of 23, Bateman Street

[SCAN OF PIC OF TABLE TENNIS ASSOCIATION MEMBERS IN 1961 AND GAME IN CORN EXCHANGE 1962]

More readers have contacted me to say they've seen family members in recent 'Memories' photos; Gwen Lister from Girton saw her youngest son at the Schools Music Festival; they lived in Littleport then and the Martin School choir always took part. She also recognised the Mrs Joan Talbot of Ely at the piano

By peering through a magnifying glass Elizabeth Braybrooke (nee Halcrow) from Gt Shelford, recognised Bob Stepney, Ida Taylor and Captain A.C. Taylor on a visit to Cambridge Fire Station alongside her mother who was Mayoress of Cambridge in 1961-62. Joyce Todd from Bar Hill spotted her late husband Peter on the picture of Histon school football team.

Mr G.S. Spencer from Littleport saw his sister-in-law amongst the ladies attending Waterbeach British Legion party, and Mrs S. Howell (nee Bavester) tells me her mother was there too; she was born and brought up in the village before moving across the road to Landbeach in the 1950s

Mr J. Williamson saw his wife amongst the 19th Cambridge Guiders at York Street Mission Hall in 1945. He has lent me a copy of 'The authentic route map and guide and advertisers' directory for Cambridge' which must date back to the 1930s. Amongst the companies advertising are Cambridge Service Motor Company (incorporating Hunnybun & Co) of Hobson Street, W. Ridgeon corn and seed merchant of Sussex Street, Harper and Oliver corset makers from St Andrew's Street and Bunty's Restaurant "under the personal supervision of Misses Alison & Edgar", 22 Market Hill. Do any of these ring bells with you?

Derek Barham from Cambridge has supplied details of the Locomotive Cooling Tower at Cambridge railway station; he watched its demolition by explosives on 1st November 1964. Even then it took several days of pounding with a swing ball from a mobile crane to finally bring it down the sturdy structure, supporting the feeling of railmen that it was so well built it would stand upright on any one of its four legs. Derek knew it well: "I remember as a young cleaner just starting on the footplate grades (which led to firemen, then driver) climbing the staircase to the engine house at the top of the tower, which had a two rail handrail. By sitting on the top rail, locking my feet on the lower rail and leaning back as far as possible it was possible on a clear day to see Ely Cathedral"

Mrs Olive Osborne from Comberton remembers the old Silver Street bridge; she writes: "It was in May of 1953 when I took my first driving test in my father-in-law's 1934 Morris 8 Saloon car, after quite a few trips being taught by my husband. Starting at Parkside with the examiner I eventually drove along Silver Street across to the Sidgwick Avenue area for the three-point turn, returning back across the bridge for my assessment. The only adverse comment was that I overtook a cyclist on Silver Street Bridge, which possibly was more noticeable than it would be today. In spite of that he gave me the all clear, I had passed first time! Someday I must take a stroll over the bridge before they close it to traffic. Happy memories.

Memories 27th February 2002, by Mike Petty

With the prospect of road tolls once more in the news people will doubtless be thinking of ways to buck the system. Perhaps they could learn from the experiences of a Waterbeach man who, 25 years ago, found an efficient way of travelling to Cambridge: horse power. Only this time it was on four legs, not four wheels.

Dick Dunford arrived at Waterbeach during the Second World War as part of the ground crew with 514 Squadron, he later worked at Marshall's and then at Stansted Airport. His wife, Margaret, joined him a year or so later – she saw herself on the picture of the Waterbeach British Legion ladies I featured the other week.

Dick had always liked horses and when one winter he spotted Fred, a grey/ chocolate brown pony standing bedraggled in water down the fen he decided to buy him. He found stables at Milton and when it was time to do the shopping they made the trip together into Cambridge.

In those days the traffic was somewhat lighter but Dick experienced more parking problems than normal commuters. Well what do you do with a horse? Fred would be quite content being left in a car park – but car parks did not quote a parking rate for ponies. Cycle racks made convenient hitching posts, but in Cambridge they could be full of bikes. Fortunately in those days there were parking meters and the News photographer caught up with Fred waiting patiently in Fitzroy Street, his reins securely tethered, while his master made his calls.

Dick always paid the going rate for his stay but, unlike many motorists, he never got a parking ticket – “the traffic wardens seem to like him”, he claimed.

In the end Fred got too old to make the journeys and Dick himself died four years ago. But Margaret still has fond memories of her four-legged friend – even if she never actually rode him herself. [SCAN OF DICK DUNFORD AT METER, FRED IN FITZROY STREET]

While on the issue of ponies and traffic, can anybody shed any light on this intrepid rider waiting a chance to cross Hills Road in April 1968 – hopefully they're not still there! [SCAN OF PONY RIDER]

Another answer to transport problems is to let the train take the strain. But in early 1977 the folk at Somersham were agitating to get rid of their railway station. The old wooden buildings were, they claimed, an eyesore and a danger to children and they petitioned the owners, Cambridgeshire County Council to do something about it. Then the news broke that a mystery buyer had come forward who intended to dismantle the station and transport it, lock, stock and ticket office and re-erect it on a private railway line in Berkshire. Good riddance! was the villagers' reaction with parish council chairman hoping that the purchaser would take the signal box as well. But did the plan go through and does anybody know where Somersham station now is [SCANS OF SOMERSHAM STATION, ONE SHOWS CHILDREN]

In February 1977 the News carried another railway story, this one not about a station, but a carriage. It had been built in the 1890s and used on the London to Edinburgh express until 1921. When it came to the end of the line it was taken off the track at Offord Darcy where it served for 50 years as a home for Sid Dighton and his family. It was an ideal place to live, very cosy and with no draughts or anything, claimed Joan Athow who had lived there since she was a child. But now time had taken its toll, the old carriage had started to deteriorate and it had to go. Once more an enthusiast rushed to the rescue. A London businessman stepped forward to finance its restoration and the carriage was to be removed to a railway museum at Tenterden in Kent where it would give summer visitors a glimpse back into the steam era. News photographers took some snaps of the familiar landmark before it left Offord Darcy for the final time – do you remember it? [SCANS OF JOAN ATHOW AND THE CARRIAGE]

More readers have contacted me to say they've seen family members in recent 'Memories' photos; Gwen Lister from Girton saw her youngest son at the Schools Music Festival; they lived in Littleport then and the Martin School choir always took part. She also recognised the Mrs Joan Talbot of Ely at the piano

By peering through a magnifying glass Elizabeth Braybrooke (nee Halcrow) from Gt Shelford, recognised Bob Stepney, Ida Taylor and Captain A.C. Taylor on a visit to Cambridge Fire Station alongside her mother who was Mayoress of Cambridge in 1961-62. Joyce Todd from Bar Hill spotted her late husband Peter on the picture of Histon school football team.

Mr G.S. Spencer from Littleport saw his sister-in-law amongst the ladies attending Waterbeach British Legion party, and Mrs S. Howell (nee Bavester) tells me her mother was there too; she was born and brought up in the village before moving across the road to Landbeach in the 1950s.

Mr J. Williamson saw his wife amongst the 19th Cambridge Guiders at York Street Mission Hall in 1945. He has lent me a copy of 'The authentic route map and guide and advertisers' directory for Cambridge' which must date back to the 1930s. Amongst the companies advertising are Cambridge Service Motor Company (incorporating Hunnybun & Co) of Hobson Street, W. Ridgeon corn and seed merchant of Sussex Street, Harper and Oliver corset makers from St Andrew's Street and Bunty's Restaurant "under the personal supervision of Misses Alison & Edgar", 22 Market Hill. Do any of these ring bells with you?

Derek Barham from Cambridge has supplied details of the Locomotive Cooling Tower at Cambridge railway station; he watched its demolition by explosives on 1st November 1964. Even then it took several days of pounding with a swing ball from a mobile crane to finally bring it down the sturdy structure, supporting the feeling of railmen that it was so well built it would stand upright on any one of its four legs. Derek knew it well: "I remember as a young cleaner just starting on the footplate grades (which led to firemen, then driver) climbing the staircase to the engine house at the top of the tower, which had a two rail handrail. By sitting on the top rail, locking my feet on the lower rail and leaning back as far as possible it was possible on a clear day to see Ely Cathedral"

Mrs Olive Osborne from Comberton remembers the old Silver Street bridge; she writes: "It was in May of 1953 when I took my first driving test in my father-in-law's 1934 Morris 8 Saloon car, after quite a few trips being taught by my husband. Starting at Parkside with the examiner I eventually drove along Silver Street across to the Sidgwick Avenue area for the three-point turn, returning back across the bridge for my assessment. The only adverse comment was that I overtook a cyclist on Silver Street Bridge, which possibly was more noticeable than it would be today. In spite of that he gave me the all clear, I had passed first time! Someday I must take a stroll over the bridge before they close it to traffic. Happy memories.

Memories, 6th March 2002, by Mike Petty

The headlines last week were dominated by the news of the death of Spike Milligan, the last of the Goons and the tribute paid to him by one of his greatest fans, Prince Charles. Then came the furore caused by a flippant remark by Prince Philip, who is amongst other things Chancellor of Cambridge University.

But there is a connection between the University, the Prince and the Goons that seems so far to have gone unrecorded – and it concerns the ancient sport of Tiddlywinks

The pastime was first patented in London in 1888 and the game essentially consists of teams competing to squidge winks into a pot, players take turns, first one to get them all in wins.

Not much to it you might think. But then in 1955 great academic brains did begin to think about the technicalities and at Cambridge University a group of undergraduates got together to form a club for the sole purpose of playing tiddlywinks. It was the first in history – but being the first they had great difficulty in finding other groups to play against. They sent out challenges to well-known people. Gilbert Harding, the broadcaster, declined; he said he “gave up the sport at the onset of adolescence at the age of six”. Denis Compton the cricketer did not think he was fit enough – and anyway he could not find anybody else to form a team.

Then the C.U.Tw.C (Cambridge University Tiddlywinks Club) issued a challenge to the Goons offering to play them “anytime, anywhere, at your convenience”. They anxiously watched the post for a reply - the Goons’ convenience was unfortunately too small for a game of Tiddlywinks.

Eventually their challenge was accepted by Noel Whitcomb of the ‘Daily Mirror’ who formed a team composed mainly of girls from West-End shows and theatres. The University was victorious. It was some time before other challengers could be encouraged to compete; Addenbrooke’s Hospital fielded a team, as did Westminster College, but then things went quiet again.

While the fruitless struggle for fixtures continued the Club produced a thesis on the Science of Tiddlywinks. They analysed the flight, spin and roll of a tiddlywink, and the effect of external factors such as wine, women and song. They undertook expeditions to Eaden Lilley’s carpet showroom to experiment on the various varieties of playing surface before deciding that the ideal was the isotropic compressible Berkshire needleloom carpet.

Work also continued to redefine rules and tactics resulting in a new concept: the “squop”, or cover. Nobody could now play a wink that was being covered, however slightly, by another wink. When one team has all its remaining winks covered the opponents are allowed three shots for every wink of their own not covered or engaged in covering, after which they must free one of their opponents’ winks. The new rules were perhaps too complex for ordinary citizens to understand, the game seemed doomed to disappear.

Then in 1958 came the headline that changed the tiddlywinks world for ever. It appeared not in the Daily Mirror but in The Spectator. “Does Prince Philip cheat at tiddlywinks?” it screamed. Off went an official challenge to Buckingham Palace, this time it was accepted! But the Prince would need a team – and this time the Goons responded to his request. Spike Milligan, Harry Secombe, Peter Sellers would be there & together with BBC announcer Wallace Greenslade, Graham Stark, Max Geldray and writers Alan Simpson and Ray Galton would join Prince Philip on the mat against the might of the C.U.Tw.C

In late February 1958 the eyes of the world were trained on Cambridge Guildhall where the battle of the winks would be fought. The Cambridge University team practised, training on Babysham. The Royalists trained on Guinness supplied by the team leader. Quite what liquid refreshment was taken by the umpires, John Snagge of the BBC and Chris Brasher of Cambridge University, has not been passed down to history.

Then came tragedy; just before the match came the news of a Royal injury. John Snagge read a message from the Palace: “Unfortunately while practising secretly I pulled an important muscle in the second or tiddly joint of my winking finger”. It continued in suitably diplomatic terms. “Please give my best wishes to the two teams taking part in the great contest” ... but then Snagge was urged: “but try, if you can, to do it in such a way that you convey that I wish the Cambridge team to lose and my incomparable champions to win a resounding and stereoscopic victory”. It concluded: “Wink up; fiddle the game and may the Goons’ side win. Philip”

But without the presence of HRH the battle was doomed to defeat. From the moment Chris Brasher fired the squidge-off the University lead player, Peter Downs swept into action. In a brilliant opening session he succeeded in establishing a All-England record for the most points scored in the Cambridge Guildhall on a rainy Saturday by cupping all five of his winks without any of them being squopted first by the visiting players. In fact it was this element of the game that was to prove the Goons' downfall; only once in the entire match did they succeed in this essential strategy, and that was when Mr Harold Secombe managed to cover captain Spike Milligan's wink. The resultant language would have made even a Royal Prince blush.

During the half-time interval for refreshments of leeks, sticks of rhubarb and glasses of champagne perry the Goons were noticed to be perspiring badly. Knowledgeable exponents of the finer points of the game agreed out that their team uniform of voluminous yellow surplices, orange, yellow and black striped caps and grey ties bearing the insignia of the Royal Tiddlywinks Club was not helping Falling increasingly further behind the visitors tried various diversionary tactics. A riot almost broke out when "Slugger" Secombe was accused of bellying Blue winks away from the cup every time he bent down – but the umpire ruled that his stomach extended beyond the three-mile limit and so he had no jurisdiction over it. Then Peter Sellers stopped the proceedings by invoking Bluebottle but to no avail. The 600 screaming spectators saw the Goons massacred by a massive 120½ to 50½.

Prizes were awarded by the Mayoress of Cambridge, Mrs B.J.S. White and the tournament ended with an inspired rendering of the "Tiddlywinks Anthem" to the tune of "Men of Harlech" before the Royal champions slumped off, roundly defeated.

The reaction from the Palace was not recorded, but it was to be many years before members of the Goons received royal honours – and it was Prince Charles, not his father, who presented Spike Milligan with his honorary knighthood!

But Prince Philip's involvement with the Cambridge University Tiddlywink Club had not finished. In 1961 he awarded a Silver Wink, which still bears his name, to be competed in an annual championship between the University of Cambridge team and another – only in the absence of the Goons it is now the University of Oxford!

[IN THE LIBRARY 'SPORTS TIDDLYWINKS' FOLDER THERE IS A PLASTIC ENVELOPE WITH PAGES FROM THE OFFICIAL PROGRAMME AND PICTURES OF OTHER TIDDLY WINKS MATCHES. THERE IS ALSO A PICTURE OF PRINCE PHILIP TAKEN IN 1956 IN WHICH HIS TIDDLY FINGER IS SHOWN GRASPING A BATON AND SOME NEGATIVES OF SPIKE MILLIGAN TAKEN IN CAMBRIDGE IN 1974]

Does anybody know what became of the old Somersham station, I asked. Yes came the reply from several readers, including Judy Clegg and Mike Gates. They confirm that it was bought by Sir William McAlpine and re-erected on his private estate at Henley-on-Thames. The had a private track running through the grounds and his architect suggested he needed a station to complete his train-set, so he bought Somersham where it now does duty as a tea-room on the four times each year when it is opened up to selected groups. The Cambridge Railway Circle visited it some time ago and it also featured in a Sunday supplement article.

Julie Evans (nee Bavey) of Duxford was first on the phone to identify the mystery picture of schoolchildren taken in 1963. They were youngsters at Gt Shelford primary school and she can recognise several of the lads, including a Townsend, Pesky and Ellwood while the blonde in the background was Linda Platt

Charles Cornwell has e-mailed to say he recognises various of the skittle players (Memories 20th February), including Dick (Rustler) Brown, Alan Fordham (landlord), Johnny Brittain and Dave Barker. He used to play in the team himself, but escaped having his picture taken. Karen Fawcett from Harston also contacted me to say she recognised her dad, landlord Fordham; she describes him as “the one in front with the wobbly legs”.

Memories 13th March 2002, by Mike Petty

Mothering Sunday in the quiet little village of Steeple Bumpstead in March 1977 was proceeding peacefully, there was hardly a car to be seen as the congregation began to assemble in the parish church. Then things started to turn ugly. Suddenly a convoy arrived carrying people from Norfolk, Suffolk, Kent and London. They were not there to celebrate Motherhood but to protest.

The new arrivals were members of the Hunt Saboteur’s Association and the object of their anger was the Vicar, the Rev Eric Wheeler, a supporter of the local Puckeridge and Thurlow Hunt. Soon they were outside his church, waving their banners and blowing hunting-horns. The Vicar and villagers ignored them as best they could as they started their worship. Then the congregation inside the church suddenly increased in number when some 30 young demonstrators filed into the front pews. They refused to acknowledge the service until the end of the first hymn. Then they rose to their feet to sing: “All things bright and beautiful, all creatures great and small. All things wise and wonderful, the vicar kills them all”.

When the 69-year old, bespectacled cleric appealed for quiet he was greeted by chanting; undeterred but red-faced with anger he confronted the unruly youths ordering them out: “I will not have interference with the divine worship” he told them. His parishioners rallied round, chanting back at the demonstrators and helping to clear the church. Then they continued to pray.

At the end of the service the congregation refused to be cowed by the incessant noise of the protestors in the churchyard and escorted the vicar to his car. It was prompted attacked and rocked from side to side, while some anti-hunters jumped on to the bonnet. Police cleared a passage and the vicar left. “It’s no good saying anything to these people. They are not prepared to listen too anyone’s point of view”, he said later

A spokesman for the Hunt Supporters’ Association acknowledged that the demonstration did get a bit rowdy, but that they were essentially peaceful protestors. It was not a view shared by the mums at Bumpstead 25 years ago. [NEGS REF 81077 – SERVICE IN PROGRESS, 8117726 – PENSIONERS LEAVE SERVICE – SHOULD BE WITH NEGS]

**

As Cambridge continues to evolve so new plans emerge to revitalise or replace buildings and shops in various parts of the city. The latest involve the Chesterton Road “Mitcham’s Corner” area and one benefit claimed for the redevelopment will be the opportunity to improve congestion at what had long been a traffic bottleneck. With so many roads converging at one spot road engineers have over the years devised various improvements to ease the flow. It was during the Great War that somebody came up with a new idea. Each morning a wooden structure with posts was carried into the centre of the road, and motorists went round it; each evening it was removed, to the amusement of local residents. The mini roundabout had arrived. It was 1932 that “Milton Road merry-go-round” – Mitcham’s permanent roundabout – was installed and it was soon working so well that another was constructed at the Four Lamps at the other end of Victoria Avenue. In 1935 more roundabouts were being considered for the junctions of Cherryhinton Road with Hills Road and Perne Road and others followed. [PICS OF MITCHAM’S CORNER IN LIBRARY FILES, SCAN OF MITCHAMS 1930S]

In March 1977 the brave experiment of 1915 was repeated on another of Cambridge's traffic arteries: Newmarket Road which was then being widened and improved to cope with horrendous delays. The scheme called for new and better traffic lights at the junction with Coldham's Lane, but they were not quite ready. This time somebody had the idea of taking an old tractor tyre and laying it in the middle of the road. They called it an experimental mini-roundabout and its impact was immediate. Even at the height of the rush hour traffic was suddenly flowing smoothly. One driver said his driving time to his home in Chesterton had been cut from 20 minutes to five. Police Chief Inspector Maurice Murden said: "To think our problems have been solved by an old tractor tyre! It is something we have advocated for years, and now we just hope that it will become permanent".

The News sent a photographer to record the scene in pictures that are a reminder of just how much change there has been on this major approach to Cambridge over the last quarter-century. [SCANS OF NEWMARKET ROAD ROUNDABOUT 1977]

Can you help Steve Odell who runs three community and local history websites for the villages of Wimpole, Orwell and Arrington. He is specifically seeking information on the American Military Hospitals in Wimpole Park during and after the war. It was located just inside the Arrington Gates in what is now an empty field on the Wimpole Hall National Trust estate & no traces remain of the large complex of buildings that were finally demolished around 1960. Steve has received a significant number of e-mails from Americans who knew they were born at "Wimpole Park" & want to know what and where it was. The hospital site was effectively American territory, and babies born there qualified for automatic American citizenship. A Wimpole Park reunion of servicemen and 'babes' is held every year in the States.

Steve would like to locate some contemporary photographs of the hospital - both when it was a wartime Army Hospital and also when it reopened in 1952 as a United States Air Force Hospital. He'd also appreciate the loan of any Wimpole Park hospital memorabilia, maps or data. Related history, articles, information, memories and reminiscences from anyone who used or worked at the hospitals would be particularly welcome.

There's one specific puzzle. Joan Kjargaard (nee Knight) who worked at Wimpole Park from its re-opening in 1952 until she left in September 1957 to emigrate to Canada, has written to Steve to say: "I was the base seamstress and my office was in the Linen Control building. I met hundreds of Americans in the course of my work. Initially I furnished the hospital, then the Interdenominational Chapel, using my furnishing skills to provide for the three religions that practised there. I (together with most of the English staff) painted many of the Chapel windows during lunch hours - it was a gift to the Americans from us. I know several people are wondering if any windows survived when Wimpole Park was restored to its former Park setting, or perhaps there are former members who have photographs?" So can any News readers locate any of the original windows surviving in an attic somewhere or provide photographs of the chapel or the windows? If you can help please contact Steve Odell at 31 Cambridge Road, Wimpole, Royston SG8 5QD or e-mail him on steve.odell@dial.pipex.com [PIX OF US SERVICEMEN IN NEWS LIBRARY WAR FILES]

[HOLD THIS STORY BACK?] Another American military connection features in a letter from Colin Kidman of Great Shelford. He writes: "In 1943, faced with a growing number of fatal casualties resulting from the bombing raids on Germany, the American Army Air Force decided that there was an urgent need for a Cemetery in East Anglia. Initially it would provide a temporary resting-place for coffins until the end of the war following which they were to be sent to their home towns in the U.S.A. if the relatives so desired. A decision would then be taken if the cemetery should become a permanent home for those who remained.

“My late father, Major A.V.Kidman, MC was, in 1943, District Commander Royal Engineers for the Cambridge district. Part of his responsibilities were to liaise with the American Forces who had an enormous Supply Depot on Milton Road, where the Science Park is now located. The Commanding Officer at the Depot, Col. Barksdale discussed the problem with my father and asked him to seek out a suitable site. It had been decided that Cambridge would be a good area, providing ready access for relatives coming from America. After much discussion at home, looking at large scale maps of the district it was decided to suggest that Madingley Hill would be ideal. A sloping piece of land with distant views across the fens with Ely Cathedral clearly visible on a good day was chosen.

“Once the Americans accepted the idea Major Kidman made an approach to the owners, Trinity College, who readily agreed to the proposal. The legal requirements were quickly dealt with and what followed is now a well-known part of history.

“In recognition of his efforts my father was made an Officer of the American Legion of Merit the medal being accompanied by a Citation signed by President Truman. Colin has now given these back to the Cemetery and they are displayed in a glass topped table in the Reception Room.” [PIC OF MADINGLEY CEMETERY IN LIBRARY FILES]

One feature of the American Cemetery story that always intrigues me was that it was dedicated at the end of May 1944 with much publicity and headlines about the presence of famous service chiefs. But newspapers were severely restricted about what they could report during the war – so why so many column inches. Could it be that at the time the CDN was headlining the numbers of military men at Madingley the real centre of activity was down on the south coast where the D-Day invasion fleet was being assembled. Was it was all part of an effort to distract German attention from the forthcoming invasion – especially when planning for D-Day had taken place in Cambridge with Montgomery and Eisenhower visiting in March 1944. Does anybody have pictures of them?

And can anybody help Margaret Pearl who is seeking details of which troops were stationed in Cambridge during the Summer of 1918. She has heard that Australian and Welsh soldiers were billeted on private households in the Mill Road area. And there were also American soldiers in Cambridge at that time, for there is a picture of them playing baseball at Fenners cricket ground while some 250 Russian officers and their families from the Archangel area were encamped near Newmarket until 1920. It's all a long way back but does any of this jog memories?

Mr G. Flack from Quy has written to identify the pony and rider I featured in Memories on 27th February. The young lady rider was Val Belts whose parents then kept the Red Lion at Cherry Hinton and the pony's name was Skylark – it was a well-known jumping and gymkhana pony. They were on their way to Mr Webbs, the blacksmith in Russell Street. [PIC OF WEBB THE BLACKSMITH IN LIBRARY FILES, RUSSELL STREET]

Whilst on the subject of ponies does anybody have any pictures or information about the riding school in King Street, Cambridge? Margaret French of Stapleford reminded me of it. She also has very special memories of the Royal Tiddlywinks Match between the Goons and Cambridge University: she was actually there at the Guildhall and has a programme with the autographs of both sides. Even this has an unexpected twist for Harry Secombe had to leave quickly at the end of the match and had no time for signing. Not to be put off she finally managed to make contact with him in May 1989 – over 30 years later - and he then obliged. This must make her programme unique – unless you have one too [SCAN OF PROGRAMME AUTOGRAPHS & PIX]

More readers have added details of the whereabouts of the former Somersham railway station, including Mr A. Tall from Colne and John Gray from Cambridge. Mrs V. Ellwood from Gt

Shelford is the mum of one of the boys shown in the picture of Gt Shelford school in July 1963. She also attended the school along with her ten brothers and sisters.

Memories 20th March 2002, by Mike Petty

Next Sunday Cambridge United are up for the Cup. They and their supporters will make their way to the new, superb Millennium Stadium at Cardiff for the final of the LDV Vans Trophy against Blackpool.

It has not been the best season ever for the U's but if history is any guide they should do well, for the second year of the decade has traditionally been a good one for the team.

- 1912 : the club was formed, as "Abbey United" and played their first match under a street lamp in the Stanley Road area of Cambridge
- 1921-22 : played their first season of competitive football in the Cambridgeshire Football League Division Three, coming top of the league and winning promotion into Division Two
- 1922-23 : topped the League and were promoted to Division One; next season they moved to a new ground just off Newmarket Road which was known as the "Celery Trenches" because of the long furrows that ran the length of the pitch. It now forms part of the Whitehill Road housing estate.

The 1920s saw the most successful season in the Club's history when in 1928-29 the first team won five trophies and ended up topping the new Cambridgeshire League Division One section A.

- 1932 : in August the team moved to a new ground, their present Stadium. They had won promotion to the Cambridge League Premier Division in 1931 but the old 'Celery Trenches' were unsuitable for top-rate matches and the club had played home games on Parker's Piece. With a new ground Abbey United re-entered the F.A. Challenge Cup but on the first match on the new pitch they went down to Histon Institute 5-4

During the war years sport had to take second place to fighting but the team continued to play football to prevent the ground being requisitioned for military use. When competitions began again they applied to join the United Counties League and in October 1947 formed their own Abbey United Sporting Club. The 1949-50 season saw the team bring professional football to Cambridge for the first time

- 1951-52 : the team started the season with a new name, Cambridge United, so that when they became nationally known other teams would know where they were from. They appointed their first full-time manager, Bill Whittaker and completed the Supporters Club canteen and clubhouse. By the end of the decade their application to join the Southern League was accepted. For the first time in their history both Cambridge Town and Cambridge United would be in the same league.
- 1961-62 : Cambridge United started their first season in the Premier Division of the Southern League having taken the decision to make all their first-team players full-time professionals. The floodlights were improved and the ground was referred to for the first time as the "Abbey Stadium". The team had a fine cup runs, beating Margate in the Southern League Cup final, Hitchin Town in the final of the East Anglian Cup and only narrowly missed the Treble by losing to Cambridge City over two legs in the Cambridgeshire Professional Cup.

United were in Germany, playing an International Tournament – and losing to Bayer Leverkusen in the final - when the news broke at the end of May 1970 that they had been elected to the Fourth Division of the Football League. Supporters travelled to Royston to meet the team on their return home and drove into Cambridge in a triumphant cavalcade of vehicles. Thousands greeted them in the streets and there was a crowded reception in the Guildhall. [ANY PICTURES THIS IN NEWS FILES?]

- 1972-73 : excitement was intense as the final match of the season saw United face Mansfield Town; some 10,542 fans set a new attendance record and “the whole of Barnwell shook with a deafening roar” when Ronnie Walton hooked home the winning goal – for it secured promotion to Division Three. [SCANS OF PICTURES USED IN MEMORY LANE BOOK, THE ORIGINALS ARE IN LIBRARY FILES]. Sadly it was for one season only and they slipped back the following year. Following a poor start to the 1974-5 season Manager Bill Leivers was replaced by Ron Atkinson & they reached the third round of the F.A. cup before losing out to Mansfield Town. The club made more headlines in April 1977 when “pace-setting, record-breaking Cambridge United” became the first club in the country to reach 50 points in a 4-0 hammering of Halifax and they ended up champions of the League. Next season they gained promotion yet again and were in Division Two, though Atkinson had moved on to manage West Bromwich Albion. The Seventies ended on a high-note with a F.A. cup-run that saw a First Division team play at the Abbey Stadium for the first time; United held the visitors, Aston Villa to a 1-1 draw. The replay saw thousands of fans journey to Villa Park to establish a record crowd of 36,835 spectators – never had United played in front of so many people - and they took the lead, only to be finally defeated by four goals to one.
- 1982-83 saw more Cup action; in the Milk Cup (Football League Cup) they crashed out to Barnsley 5-2 on aggregate but held their nerve to beat them in the Fourth Round of the F.A. Challenge Cup before losing out to Sheffield Wednesday. It was a season of mixed fortunes, including a massive 6-0 defeat by Chelsea at Stamford Bridge but United still ended up mid-way in the Canon League, division Two. Then fortunes turned sour. Next season saw them relegated to Division Three, where they came bottom, some 25 points below the next team, Preston North End. The 1985-86 season was as bad, although they did end up above Preston they still faced the prospect of relegation to the Vauxhall Conference – but were re-elected. Disappointment in the League was forgotten next season with a fine run in the League Cup. Leighton Orient were despatched in the first round, Wimbledon in the second. Round three saw improved floodlights installed for a clash with Second Division Ipswich Town when United won by the single goal. Excitement rose to fever pitch when the news came of their next opponent – mighty Tottenham Hotspur. In November 1986 the Abbey Stadium was packed to its 10,033 capacity who roared as a Mark Cooper header cancelled out an early Spurs goal. But the class of the visitors – whose team cost a massive £3 million eventually told. Spurs later spent even more, acquiring United’s leading goalscorer – the man who had embarrassed them in the cup-tie. [PICTURES OF SPURS NOV 1986 FROM NEWS FILES?]
- 1992 – I DON’T HAVE ANY NOTES AT HOME, CHECK LIBRARY INDEXES & ADD WORDS – IF THERE ARE ANY!

Now in 2002 United languish at the bottom of the League and relegation once more stares them in the face. But history shows that in the big matches the team pulls through. On their last appearance at a National Stadium – Wembley in May 1990 – United beat Chesterfield to win promotion once more to the Third Division. It was followed by a triumphal procession through Cambridge in an open-topped double-decker bus to a civic reception in the Guildhall. It's time to repeat the experience and give another generation of football fans something to cheer about, another memory to cherish in the club's long history. [SCAN OF PICTURE OF CIVIC WELCOME – ORIGINAL IN NEWS FILES]

**

Ex-railwayman Ron Gooch from Gt Shelford has sent a photograph showing the old Somersham Station in its new location on Sir William McAlpine's private railway in Buckinghamshire [SCAN]

Thanks to the people who wrote in to identify the children at Gt Shelford school I have now managed to track down the negatives. They were taken at a Music Festival there in July 1963. One of them shows a wider group of children [THE NEG WAS SCANNED FOR USE THIS WEEK, SANDRA KNOWS ABOUT IT]

This week's mystery picture discovered amongst the News' archives is really a puzzler. It shows a group of youngsters on some sort of machine – could it be part of a fire engine? There's just one older gentleman standing with them. It was probably taken about 1963. [SCAN]

Memories 27th March 2002, by Mike Petty

I am very grateful to one of my regular correspondents, Mrs Daphne Foreman of Cambridge who has written with her memories of one of the old National Schools in Cambridge that she says people might easily overlook. But she has also opened up an area of the city that seems not to have been much discussed: Occupation Road, near the junction of East Road and Newmarket Road.

“A year or two after I came to live in Cambridge in the late 1940s I was asked to play the piano on Sunday afternoons at a Sunday School run by two ladies from St Paul's church, Miss Maltby and Miss Atkinson. This was held in the old National School in Occupation Road, their idea being to get off the streets on Sunday afternoons the many children who lived in Occupation Road, Gas Lane and the other small streets in that area.

“We sang simple hymns and choruses with prayers and bible readings by the ladies. I do not remember any of the children's names, except that there was a Charmaine, which seemed to amuse the ladies and one ‘big girl’ or young woman named Joyce Tinker who, I think, was a sort of pupil-teacher and was also from St Paul's. I remember one lovely Christmas party there

“The building was ‘L’-shaped, set back behind a rectangle of ground – perhaps the old school playground – with the main room gable-ended on to the road. The other premises, including toilets were in the other branch of the ‘L’, parallel with the road, behind the yard.

“For some years then I lived on the other side of the city, the two ladies have died and when I came back to live in the area the school had become an antiques shop and then later a bookbinder's workshop. By then it was in very poor condition, with buckets catching the drips from the roof, but the men produced splendid work under those adverse conditions and after it was finally demolished moved to Cobble Yard behind the Grafton Centre where they are still operating.

“Since the building of the college hostel, Varsity House, in Occupation Road, it is difficult to remember exactly where the school stood. As I remember it was at the end of some buildings, with a small 'lane' running behind it to the East Road roundabout. There was a large red-brick building with green doors on the right-hand side of the 'lane' which I believe had been a fire-engine house or even a fire station, but which had stood unused as long as I knew the area. I think the hostel covers both buildings, including the lane in between. It was an attractive-looking building even in its last derelict state and I always wished I had the money to buy it and convert it into a Roman-villa type dwelling"

To jog your memories further I have included a map of the area in 1927 and list of occupants back in 1904. By the mid 1970s the directories mention just Kingsway Tyres and the Cambridge Book Binding Company. One of the few photographs in the News' library shows a decaying area of abandoned cars; it was taken in 1966 at a time when Cambridge seemed to be mired in planning indecision. But what are your memories of this patch of the city? [PICTURE IN NEWS LIBRARY FILES 'CAMBRIDGE. OCCUPATION ROAD'] [SCAN OF MAP 1927 & DIRECTORY NAMES 1904]

One indicator of change is the developers' crane; a monster version was on King's Parade the other week lifting new accommodation modules to the roof of King's college. A recent radio programme indicated that there were now crane enthusiasts – just as other people watch out for railway engines or certain long-distance juggernauts. I have been delving in the News photo files for a few examples.

Lion Yard redevelopment seen from the Guildhall, January 1973 with and the north side of Petty Cury, Lloyds Bank and St Andrew the Great church [SCAN NEG 663/12A]
Construction work in the early 1970s on the New Museums site, off Corn Exchange Street when the crane seems about to add more spires to King's College chapel [DZ.Mus.K7 47427]
Cranes, like giant storks, at work on the Rosie Maternity Hospital, early 1980s [NEG 3695817]
Giant cranes erecting prefabricated houses in King's Hedges Road in 1927 [B.Milt.K27 36346]
Crane dismantling part of French's windmill off Victoria Road, 1970s

These days new developments need planning permission and when something goes ahead that seems out of place there is a tendency to suspect that somebody has had a word in somebody else's ear, that it's not what you know, but who you know that counts. It wasn't like that in the olden days – or was it?

Quy historian Peggy Watts has just produced a little book charting the early days of the Cambridgeshire Constabulary, 150 years ago. It was a traumatic time for those establishing the new force in the land, and there were rules to be followed. First they needed a Chief Constable; an advertisement was placed and 35 applications received from which five were short-listed. The job went to a coastguard officer, Captain George Davies, who just happened to be well-known to an influential member of the committee. There was one snag – he was 47 years old, and the Home Office regulations laid down a maximum age of 45. But knowing the right people helped and he was granted special exemption and allowed to keep the job. Six years later when Huntingdonshire finally got round to establishing their own police they decided to join up with one of the existing forces. Neither Godmanchester nor Huntingdon boroughs – who already had their own police – wanted to amalgamate with the county so it went in with Cambridgeshire. Chief Constable Davies was appointed to head both forces, despite now being legally far too old!

Then came the question of erecting police stations in the rural areas and in 1858 a committee drew up specifications and invited tenders to be submitted by the 5th May, with the strict proviso that the cost should not exceed £800. Professional architects submitted a large number of designs from which three were shortlisted. One was promptly disqualified as it had arrived after the closing date. But before the others were considered one magistrate rose to say that there was another set of plans that he thought should be looked at – even though they had not been sent it. His colleagues agreed and the new plans were produced. They were costed at 990 guineas – far above the limit – but were duly accepted! After all they ought to be what was wanted – for they had been drawn up by the chairman of the committee himself!

“The formation of the Cambridgeshire Constabulary 150 years ago”, by Peggy Watts costs £3 from the author at 8 Orchard Street Quy, CB5 9AE

Mrs Chris McLean from Cambridge was responded to Margaret Pearl’s question about the Welsh troops trained in Cambridge during World War I. She writes :

“Some years ago, my husband's grandfather Samuel Bagshaw, on hearing that we had moved to Cambridge, told me that both he and his brother, who had both served in the Royal Welch Fusiliers had been camped in tents on Parker’s Piece, before travelling to France. I have seen photographs of soldiers posed with the regimental mascot, a goat.

“My own grandfather, Frederick Webster, was a Welshman who had served in the 1st Monmouthshire’s. The regiment moved to Cambridge just before Christmas, 1914. They lived in tents, or were billeted with townspeople. Research shows that on 11th February 1915, the King inspected the First Welsh division. By the end of February 1915, the regiment had left for Southampton and France. Tragically, the 1st, 2nd and 3rd Monmouthshires were decimated at Ypres. By May 1915 the losses were so great that an amalgamated regiment was formed of just 900 men. Furthermore, throughout the war the regiment sustained high losses, for the men were very often in the frontline. If they were not fighting, they were digging trenches and tunnels for as miners they had valuable expertise. I join Margaret Pearl in seeking any information about the Welsh brigade's stay in Cambridge between 1914-1919”.

If you can help please write to Mike Petty at the News

Memories of the Queen Mother, by Mike Petty

I’M NOT SURE IF YOU WANTED A QUEEN MOTHER MEMORIES OR IF YOU’LL HAVE COVERED IN ON MONDAY. IF YOU NEED ANOTHER SUBJECT PLEASE RING – 01353 648106. IF YOU NEED ME TO COME IN TO FIND PIX PLEASE RING

The death of Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother has brought sadness to most people; few have known a time when she was not an important part of the scene, both nationally and locally, and Her Majesty had many connections with Cambridge.

Her husband, Prince Albert, Duke of York had attended Trinity college in 1919-20 and knew the town well but it was in July 1932 that he brought his Duchess for her first visit to Cambridge. They drove from Cambridge station to Papworth to open a new hospital, then back to Cambridge for lunch in his old college, Trinity. Later crowds flocked to see the Duchess and her husband drive to Addenbrooke's Hospital where they opened a new wing for children and private patients. [WE USED A PICTURE OF THIS ON 13TH FEB]

In January 1934 Elizabeth was back, this time with her Mother-in-Law, Queen Mary. First they visited the Cambridge Tapestry Works in Thompson’s Lane where they saw a tapestry being specially woven for Lord Fairhaven at Anglesey Abbey by a skilful team of weavers. Sylvia Clark from Newmarket Road Cambridge recalled in Memories two years ago how she spent many hours on this tapestry, working from the back and walking round to the front of the loom periodically to ensure everything was accurate. Like all the other girls she worked in silence as so many important visitors were always popping in – like Queen Mary and the young Elizabeth, Duchess of York who congratulated them on for the beauty of their work.

Then the Royal ladies were off shopping. Queen Mary was a connoisseur of antiques and paid regular visits to Stanley Woolston's antique shop in St Andrew's Street. People packed the street for a glimpse of the Queen & the young Duchess.

But then came the death of the King and the Abdication of his heir. The Duchess of York's husband was now King George VI and she was his Queen. In January 1937, five weeks after her accession but four months before her Coronation, the new Queen Elizabeth accompanied Queen Mary on another of her trips to Woolston's antique shop. It was a routine they were to repeat each January until the start of the war, and although unannounced news of their visits inevitably attracted crowds of well-wishers.

But many of the Queen's subsequent visits were ringed with secrecy, for during the Second World War the movement of members of the Royal Family were kept censored. Yet she was always here & there with her husband – inspecting bomber bases, chatting to Land Army girls in the fens, shaking hands at a new Royal Air Force Hospital at Ely, maintaining morale in days of danger. [SCAN OF KING AND QUEEN MEETING LAND ARMY GIRLS IN BURWELL FEN]

As soon as the war was over the Queens were back shopping in Cambridge during their New Year stay at Sandringham. But in 1947 there were more formal visits when, with the King, Elizabeth paid an official visit to Trinity College on the occasion of the 400th anniversary of its foundation. Mrs P. J. Anderson from Cherry Hinton Road recalled how: "I was working in a Government Office in Station Road at the time and as they came by train we all trooped into the road to cheer them on. To make it seem more impressive our departmental flag was flown along with the Union Jack and it wasn't until the royal couple had passed that we realised it had been flying upside down".

In June 1948 Queen Elizabeth paid her first solo official visit as part of the celebrations of another college, Queens'. As Marion Colthorpe reports in her book 'Royal Cambridge' the college court was crowded with undergraduates, most of whom were ex-Servicemen who gave three cheers as she entered. She dined on a celebration lunch of salmon, duckling, strawberries and cream before touring the ancient kitchens, an undergraduate's rooms and watching rehearsals for a student play. Later she mingled with a thousand guests at a Garden Party described as 'a kaleidoscope of colour, gaiety and elegance' – whose conversation was enhanced by music from bandmen of the Black Watch. Never, said the President, had the college seen a more auspicious occasion. For them 1948 would always be remembered as 'Queen's Year'. It was a visit she was to repeat in 1961 when the News cameramen captured the scene. [GOOD PIX OF THIS 1961 VISIT IN LIBRARY FILES]

But the real headline news came later in 1948 when nearly 740 years after its foundation the University of Cambridge awarded a Degree to a woman for the first time. That woman was Queen Elizabeth. She drove from Anglesey Abbey to Christ's College where she was welcomed by the Vice Chancellor before driving down Petty Cury to the Senate House for the historic ceremony during which she was conferred an honorary Doctorate of Law. There she spoke of the special affection she felt for the University and of the exciting new status of women's education at Cambridge. [SCANS OF QUEEN AT CHRISTS COLLEGE AND IN DEGREE PROCESSION]

Her final official visit as Queen Consort was in April 1951 when she accompanied King George VI & Princess Margaret to a Thanksgiving Service to mark the restoration of the stained glass in King's College chapel windows following their removal during the war years. It was their first visit to the City of Cambridge – for King had granted that status only a month earlier. [SCAN OF LEAVING KINGS CHAPEL]

The death of the King in 1952 was followed next year by the death of Queen Mary, but the Queen Mother continued to visit Cambridge, sometimes privately – shopping at Woolstons again in 1954, this time with Princess Margaret as her companion. But she undertook many official activities; opening a new wing at Homerton in 1957, a new Angel Court at Trinity in 1960 – when she also watched the May Races. There was the unveiling of an extension to the Leys School in 1961, and the first phase of Cambridge's third women's college, New Hall in 1965. [SCAN OF VISIT TO NEW HALL 1965]

Time after time crowds flocked to see her – at the Fitzwilliam Museum, Girton college centenary celebrations, Wesley House and more. [SCAN OF ARRIVAL AT FITZWILLIAM MUSEUM 1975 WITH LADIES BEHIND CAR]

HER LAST VISIT TO CAMBRIDGE WAS – PLEASE CHECK WITH LIBRARY

– and no matter what the occasion she was always graceful, always waving and – many were convinced – always smiling just at them – AS THE NUMEROUS PHOTOGRAPHS SNAPPED BY NEWS CAMERAMEN GIVE TESTIMONY

If you have memories to share write to Mike Petty at the News

Memories 10th April 2002 by Mike Petty

This Easter holiday the streets have echoed to the sound of four-wheelers; they have performed complicated manoeuvres, sometimes spinning on the spot, other times leaping high into the air before crashing down again. Were these feats performed by joyriding youngsters in motor cars then action would have been taken. But these are performed by thrill-seeking kids on skateboards.

Skateboards are the latest craze – or at least they were 25 years ago in April 1977 when they hit the Cambridge headlines for the first time. Keen lads were honing their skills in the safety of school playgrounds – and being banned from them. For said a county education spokesman: “If there is a serious accident at the school the educational authority would be responsible”. But, said a council road safety officer it was better to have skateboarding off the road “and on to places like school playgrounds”. The council promised a policy decision. Meanwhile the youngsters were honing up on their law; skateboards, they claimed, were conveyances propelled by the rider, the same as a cycle; so provided they used hand signals there was nothing to stop them using the roads.

Cambridge had what seemed to some a ready-made skateboard park, the little-used Heidelberg Garden above the shops in Lion Yard. By August up to 200 youngsters were gathering each evening to perfect ‘Catamarans’ (board jumps) or “three 60’s” spins. But with the proliferation of plate-glass windows and disapproving glares from librarians in the children’s department alongside, it was obviously not an ideal place. So the youngsters formed a group calling itself the Cambridge Sidewalk Surfers to press for a purpose-built skatepark. When the news broke in October 1977 that Prime Minister James Callaghan would be visiting Cambridge the Sidewalk Surfers assembled outside the Union Society building, anxious to seek his support in their cause. Sadly he had more important things on his mind.

Eyes turned to the old bandstand on Christ’s Pieces or to the underpass at the Newmarket Road roundabout. A proper park opened in Cheddar’s Lane in 1978, only to close in November the following year; as years have passed slowly facilities have been developed. But still youngsters practice their skills in the streets or sneak on to school playgrounds in the evenings, using seats and benches to provide the ramps they need for their thrills, as their fathers and mothers did before them. [PIX OF LADS IN THE SCHOOL PLAYGROUND, IN THE HEILDELBURG GARDENS AND WAITING TO LOBBY PRIME MINISTER CALLAGHAN]

Earlier generations of youngsters found excitement on two wheels, heading off on their bicycles to explore far from home, returning at nightfall tired, muddy and perhaps soaked to the skin. Two lads found themselves involved in a life-or-death struggle against the elements deep in the fenland as the waters rose in the rivers and started to overtop the banks, threatening the safety of those living in the cottages below – but it was only a story.

Last weekend some sixty people assembled at Ely to pay homage to a book published 50 years ago that most people in the city have never heard of. Yet such is its appeal that it brought devotees from the mountains of Wales and the rolling downs of the south coast to clamber to the top of fenland river banks in a lazy wind that did not bother to go around them.

They were members of the Malcolm Saville Society who make annual pilgrimages to places that form the settings for the children's books that he wrote as the 1940s turned into the 1950s. They combine adventures and localities, one set in Blakeney, Norfolk, another in the docklands area of London and a third the mountains of Cumbria. But 'The Luck of Sallowby' was set in and around Ely. The plot revolves around an attempt by unscrupulous antique dealers to steal Hereward the Wake's ancient battleaxe – the 'Luck' – from an ancient fenland manor house – 'Sallowby'. But all this takes place during a period of great fen floods – obviously based on those of 1947. Malcolm Saville researched his locations as well as his plots and now his own children were amongst those who had come to retrace their father's footsteps.

So the devotees took themselves off to Prickwillow, Ten Mile Bank, Denver sluice and Hilgay – to that ancient manor house, the 'Sallowby' of the title which was tracked down by researcher Peter Oates. There they were welcomed by the present owner, who had been unaware that his ancient home had ever featured in a book. Or was it actually the house at all – for although Saville always researched his stories he gave his imagination reign.

One mystery is the location of a tea-room in Ely run by an aunt of the central characters. The author calls it 'The Copper Kettle'. There are several clues: the house was very, very old. The café downstairs warm and comfortable with a log fire burning in a big fireplace with a wide chimney, and plenty of polished tables reflecting the flicker of the flames. The building was narrow with sloping floors and steps in unusual places, but the living room over the café was unexpectedly large. There were bedrooms on that floor and others up another flight of narrow stairs to a room high enough to see over the roof opposite right to the cathedral.

There is a picture of the cafe in Saville's book and it all looks so similar to 'Ye Olde Tea Rooms and Museum' in Fore Hill that was run for many years by Vernon Cross. That housed a combined bakery, confectionery shop, restaurant and private museum with articles displayed in cases, on the walls or hanging from the oak beams. But others think it may have been the Minster Tea Rooms which fits another of the author's criteria – its nearness to the traffic lights at the Lamb Corner. So can you help solve the mystery? Does anybody have a picture of the Minster tea rooms in the 1940s-1950s. Did you ever go to either of them as customer or waitress, and what were the rooms like upstairs?

And the biggest mystery of all is the present location of 'The Luck of Sallowby' – Hereward's battle axe, rescued by the intrepid children from the dastardly villains. Amongst the items that were auctioned off when Vernon Cross closed down his museum in April 1964 were pewter and brass, agricultural hand tools, clay pipes, Roman pottery, firearms, swords and bayonets. But was there ever a battle-axe dating back to Hereward's time. And if so, where is it now?

Or is it all just a figment of an author's imagination. But whether true or not it all makes for a jolly good read and if you can track down a copy of the book you can follow the clues for yourself and – like last weekend's visitors – discover just what a fascinating place the fens can be. [PIX OF CAFÉ – DRAWING AND PHOTO AND VERNON CROSS WITH HIS MUSEUM]

‘The Luck of Sallowby’ by Malcolm Saville was published by the Lutterworth Press in 1952.

**

Do you remember Occupation Road, I asked. Yes replied Michael & Barbara Rooney of Cambridge:

“We moved into 33 Occupation Road in June 1954: I was 23, Babs 18. Our neighbours on one side were a Mr & Mrs Fordham who were just a little older than us, and on the other side a nice elderly lady named Mrs Harvey. In the communal yard was a toilet block, not nice at all, very basic with many spiders! At the rear of the yard was Jack Reynold’s sweet factory; he had a shop of Newmarket Road and ran stalls on markets and fairs. Many mornings we head the noise of sweets being riddled and the smell was always strong.

“When we first got the key and saw the inside it was in a very sorry state, as it had been lived in by a tramp-type. It was a four room cottage and had obviously once been two cottages as there were two stairs – one front, one back. I boarded up the stairs in the front of the house as we thought it spooky with two sets. The rent was 10s (50p) per week. We worked hard to get it habitable and decorated before we actually moved in. I repaired the chimney and replaced some slates. In the front downstairs room there was no fire surround, but after much badgering I managed to get the agents, Haslows, to have a brick one built. After that was finished I fully decorated that room and we brought new furniture for it from Thompsons who were in Fitzroy Street.

“My wife Babs was now expecting a child and the front room had been finished and in use for about 6-7 weeks when one winter afternoon she was sitting by the fire reading and the old lathe and plaster ceiling collapsed upon her. The agent would not repair the room, so everything was covered up and the room not used again. The little house was condemned as unfit and we were re-housed to a new home in Alex Wood Road in January 1957.”

Miss Ruth Howell of Cambridge also has memories of the old school building in Occupation Road. Like Daphne Foreman she went there on Sunday evenings in 1939 and throughout the war years. She recalls: “The meetings were first held in the old church hall in Christchurch Street. We did physical jerks on Wednesday evenings and bible study on Fridays. Eventually it had to close but we continued bible study at Grange Road, the home of Miss Atkinson, and later Newton Road”. Miss Howell has lent me a picture taken in the garden of the school in 1940-41. It shows on the back row, Lillian Harvey, Miss Atkinson, Ruth herself – making a face at the camera at the wrong moment – and Margaret Wright. In the front row are Phyllis Tinkler, Hilda Trevalyan, & Jilly Cornwell [PIC OF THE GIRLS]

Memories 17th April 2002 by Mike Petty

The problem with history is that things that seem always to be there suddenly disappear and you can’t quite remember what they were like. Ron Ryder of 58 Montague Road, Cambridge cites an example:

“When you travel along the Elizabeth Way, Cambridge into town there are white boards behind which are being built 120 new houses of “St Andrew’s Park”. I am seeking information on the old Pye factory entrance in what was Cam Road to see who planted the trees which have now been removed. They had a stake and nameplate, which, I believe, said who and why they were planted – but what did it say?

“They were happy days when hundreds of Pye workers at lunch break came streaming along to the corner shop in Montague Road, with others on their way to Mitcham’s Corner. In the evening the buses came to take them home. Have any of the retired workers of the Pye factory produced any of their working day memoirs – I hope somewhere the Pye story is in print for future generations to read. It is a pity to just be forgotten”

The Pye Group started life in a back garden in Humberstone Road, Cambridge, where in 1896 William George Pye decided to put experience gained at the Cambridge Instrument Company and Cavendish Laboratory to good use by making apparatus for school laboratories or elementary university classes.. After a few years he leased premises in Mill Lane before in 1913 moving to a larger factory in Cam Road – part of the site now being redeveloped. During the Great War the firm produced gun-sights and other military instruments but when that market collapsed with the peace he diversified into a new development, wireless. As the radio side of the business grew so more and more space was needed and the site expanded. They also experimented with television and had sets in production by 1936. When war again came the company turned its attention to military two-way radios and radar, erecting a high mast which was later used in their pioneering work in television as an adjunct to their radio and stereo developments. Pye demonstrated colour television in 1949 but the Government of the 1960s was less focussed and indecision and delay over its introduction hit production and contributed to a drop in profits. In 1967 the company became part of the Philips empire. There was massive expansion on the site, with a new complex opening in 1988 – but only after the site had flooded. But the rest as they say is history – THIS MAY CHANGE AFTER VISIT TO NEWS – SEE PRINTED TEXT

But were you part of that history; were you one of those who worked from the factory in St Andrew’s Road & walked past those trees daily – and if so can you remember what the notice said and put Ron out of his agony?

[SCAN OF PYE WORKERS, PIX FROM NEWS LIBRARY]

**

One of the people who were helping to influence developments in the mid 1960s was John Forster, who now lives near Daventry. He treasures a picture the News took in 1967 when aged just 25 he became the youngest member of Cambridgeshire & Isle of Ely County Council. His election is being celebrated by fellow Labour councillors Frank Symons & John Hughes and Paddy Reilly who represented Cherry Hinton on the City council both as an official Labour Party member and an Independent. But who is the man with the hat on the right?

John served on the council for three years but did not seek re-election. In his day job he was Accountant and Company Secretary for Cambridge Consultants who then had premises in Histon Road. He moved to Warwickshire in 1977 and now, in retirement, compiles and presents general knowledge quizzes. [SCAN OF FORSTER ELECTION]

**

Brian Lane from Ely has responded to my request for a picture of the Minster Tea Rooms at Ely, one of the candidates for the teashop featured in Malcolm Saville’s book ‘The Luck of Sallowby’. In October 1934 it was rented by Vernon Cross, who also ran the tea shop in Fore Hill. He let the upper rooms as a flat and converted the ground floor into a tea room, with umbrellas in the garden during good weather. The teashop closed during the winter months and ceased in the early 1940s. It was connected with the SPCK bookshop run by H.G. Tyndall who was also an Ely photographer. It was a pretty Queen Anne house with a Victorian glass porch in the middle of the front and had once been home to Thomas Kempton, organist of Ely Cathedral in the early eighteenth century. The building was demolished in the mid 1960s to make way for Ely branch library which has itself now moved to the new Cloisters development. It now houses the Cathedral education office. [SCAN OF MINSTER TEA-ROOM – AND PRINT; SCAN/PIX OF ELY LIBRARY THAT REPLACED IT]

In those days old buildings were treated with less reverence than today. In Cambridge there were plans for the redevelopment of the corner of Bridge Street and Round Church Street where the early sixteenth-century buildings had been allowed to fall into decay. Their plight was highlighted in a major report on Cambridge Townscape drawn up by David Urwin and published by the City Council in autumn 1971. By then a more enlightened attitude to redevelopment was evolving with proposals to retain the historic frontage and redevelop offices behind. When the Mayor of Cambridge, Coun Bob Wright, formally opened the scheme just 25 years ago, in April 1977 he praised it as an outstanding example of how a new building could be fitted into its environment and how old buildings could be preserved. “If only”, he added, “the architects had been involved in Lion Yard then things might have turned out differently there”. [PIX OF BRIDGE STREET/ROUND CHURCH STREET CORNER BEFORE AND AFTER REDEVELOPMENT]

**

A couple of Saturdays ago all eyes were fixed on the Thames when Oxford and Cambridge rowers battled for supremacy in the traditional Boat Race. As we know, Oxford came home in front, despite trailing for most of the distance. But at least it was on neutral ground. It has not always been so. In February 1944 a large crowd turned out to watch Cambridge take the lead only to have Oxford storm past to record a victory by three-quarters of a length in a time of eight minutes six seconds. It was always known that the winning time would be a record – for this was the first time at boat race crews had battled over this particular course. For this was not the Thames, it was the Fens, more precisely the one-and-a-half mile stretch of the Great Ouse at Queen Adelaide Bridge near Ely. It was the third war-time boat race and is largely forgotten. But now Terry Overall from Ely is hoping to arrange for a re-run in two years time, to mark its jubilee, and he is anxious to track down anybody who took part or witnessed that original race 48 years ago. If you can help then contact Terry on 01353 610649 or write to me at the News.

**

Sid Lowe from Canada has sent a copy of a photograph of the Central School Football team who won the Schools Cup in April 1940 when they beat Coleridge School 3-0. He has a note of most of the names and would be delighted to make contact with any of his old team-mates. You can write to him at 605-5200 Lakeshore Road, Burlington, Ontario, Canada L7L1C5 or e-mail him at slowel123@cogeco. [SCAN OF PIC]

Memories 23rd April 2002, by Mike Petty

It is that time again when planners are contemplating the site of the next addition to the Cambridgeshire scene, once more considering just where the additional housing is to be accommodated to cater for the county's ever-increasing population.

But this is not just a 21st-century phenomenon. Cambridge has always needed to expand; from an initial settlement on the highland north of the river – Castle Hill – housing spread to colonise the slightly higher lands in the marshy south – Market Hill, Peas Hill, St Andrews

Hill, Senate House Hill and the rest. Along with houses were religious settlements, homes to friars and priors, and when riots at Oxford drove out the young men training to be priests there then many of them found a welcome amongst the other clerics in Cambridge. At first they lodged with townsfolk but then increasing numbers caused problems and hostels were established; hostels led to colleges, colleges needed land. The abolition of the monasteries by Henry VIII provided the expanding University with additional sites, but still they needed more. As land within the town came vacant the colleges had the funds to acquire it, ordinary people were squeezed more and more into less and less space. By 1800 Cambridge was still a small town, surrounded by water; for the Cam to the north and west was echoed by a ditch around the east and south, and the buildings clustered right up to it – like some modern-day bypass soon becomes the boundary for new development.

Then came the Inclosure of the open fields that had tightly surrounded the town – equivalent to the modern Green Belt. Once this land was available for development then building boomed. The small village of Barnwell expanded dramatically and there was a New Town – originally called New Zealand (it was so far from the old Cambridge) – in the area off Hills Road and a Sturton Town and a New Chesterton. Housing spread till it reached the line of the railway that was constructed in the distant fields in 1845. But this time the boundary did not check development; houses grew beyond with another new town - Romsey – and on to encompass the Newnham district of Grantchester & the old villages of Chesterton, Cherry Hinton, Trumpington.

But there were never enough houses for the expanding population; despite massive housing programmes in the 1920s more were needed. Through the 1950s Cambridge councillors continued to clear old slum properties – in the by now old New Town & Barnwell areas – and replace them with new. But there had to be somewhere to accommodate the population whilst rebuilding was underway. So the open fields between Milton and Histon Roads were developed as the Arbury Estate and joined by King's Hedges in what was described by some as a massive New Town on the edge of Cambridge – but a new town without the new facilities one normally associated with such developments.

But still more homes were needed and neighbouring villages were being expanded until they too reached capacity. The solution was a new village, just outside Cambridge which could cater for the increasing demands without submerging old villages under more housing estates. That village was Bar Hill, though it was not universally welcomed by the neighbouring parishes. But still more houses were needed.

By now there was an established planning procedure to meet the Government-dictated expansion. The Structure Plan mechanism ensured there would be debate as to where all the new houses would go. Once more there would be a new village, or was it one village and one town – nobody seemed quite sure. Various sites were canvassed – Swansley Wood, Six Mile Hill, Waterfenton, Westmere – but Cambourne was chosen. And once more fields are being turned into homes. Yet before that development is complete there is need for more.

Should it be an expansion of Cambridge itself, should Marshall's move their airfield to release land for homes – as they have done once before to allow the development of the Whitehill estate off Newmarket Road – or is there to be yet another new village? Once more the debate continues

But this is not something that just affects Cambridge; surrounding towns have seen their own massive changes, including the London overspill developments at Oxmoor, Huntingdon, St Neots and Haverhill. The City of Ely is currently undergoing a building boom, prompting concern about the provision of schools, doctors, dentists and all the other infrastructure needs – and of course roads. For people need jobs and if their jobs are not where their houses are then they need to travel, and roads become jammed, increasing travelling times and prompting people to move nearer their jobs, except that those houses are too expensive – and the circle continues.

But what would happen if they built a town and nobody came? The Romans found the answer to their cost when they constructed a new settlement at Stonea, near Chatteris. It had been the site of an earlier important settlement, an iron-age hill-fort deep in the fens that had seen the final resistance of local folk to these Roman invaders. The new rulers put in roads, built buildings, including a massive tower which dominated the district. But nobody wanted to live there and soon the structures were knocked down to lie forgotten until only recently the archaeologists have rediscovered them. But then in the 1630s came plans for another new town at nearby Manea, this time to be designed by King Charles I himself. It would be built as a lasting memorial of his achievement in doing what his subjects could not – draining the fens. But the King's dream of his magnificent 'Charlemont' was not to be realised and not even the plans remain, though Cambridge artist Robin Stemp has turned her talents in art and digital photography to produce her interpretation of Charles' vision in an exhibition at the Fire Engine House, Ely.

But what the Romans and the Royalists failed to do was finally achieved by a Methodist lay preacher. In 1838 William Hodson created a utopia for socialists at Manea, a community where money was abolished, where residents dressed alike in clothes of Lincoln green. Their houses would have all modern facilities, be brick built and centrally heated. Their children would enjoy the best of education, with their own schoolroom and teachers. They had a range of leisure facilities - their own boat and fishing in the nearby Old Bedford River. They had music while they worked but not for them incessant labour in the fields - they worked just four hours a day. But those who flocked to join this rural idyll were townsfolk, they did not understand agriculture and needed help from locals who were highly suspicious of this new hippy commune. And the residents were not what the developer intended – "penniless in pocket and bankrupt of moral qualifications" they gave up and went home "spreading gossip to disguise their own inadequacies". So within three years utopia was abandoned and the colony disappeared back into the earth from which it had arisen.

And now new planners design new visions of modern lifestyle, with houses, schools & leisure facilities to give new residents new chances for a new life – new pioneers in a new community, just as generations of others have been before them.

Have you been a pioneer in a new community, be it Arbury, Bar Hill or Cambourne – and what are your memories of seeing it grow, develop and change. Send your memories to Mike Petty at the News

**

Various ex-Pye employees have responded following my request for details of the trees planted at the gateway in Elizabeth Way. Peter Prime from Ely says that after the new bridge was put in and the traffic increased tremendously the gate was sealed for safety reasons and the trees planted by Mr Pye's granddaughter or great-granddaughter. He worked there from the 1950s producing television sets for the Coronation – and recalls that the ladies and girls who worked on the production line delighted to chase their male colleagues around the factory at Christmas time! Peter worked on an underwater television camera which they tested at Banham's boatyard, lowering it into the water on the cranes they used for boats. It was to facilitate under-water research and the location of wrecks and was fitted to the recovery vessel H.M.S. Reclaim. It could operate at a great depth than any diver and its visual range was far greater – but when it was demonstrated at Pye's Radio works in May 1952 the camera was set up in front of a goldfish tank owing to the high mud content of the River Cam! Derek Wilkin completed 50 years of service with the company and retired in 2000. He still has a booklet they used in staff training.

Can anybody help solve another mystery. Andrew Brett from Teversham has been busy recording and transcribing the memories of his gran, Grace Hinchcliffe, who lived in the Milton Road area of Cambridge during the Great War. Grace always remembered groups of dirty and tired looking men being marched up Milton Road by guards on horseback. She was then only a small child, but thought that they were German prisoners of war. She was told that they were being marched to an encampment beyond the railway gates. Lydia (Grace's mother) took pity on them and handed them scraps of bread as they passed the Bretts' house. Grace always remembered the contrasts in the scene: the guards on their fine horses - smart and upright - and the dishevelled men shambling along beside them. Does anybody else have memories of details of a prisoner-of-war encampment in this area in about 1917 that will back-up her recollections?

John Sparrow from Littleport remembers seeing an American glider that came down there in September 1944, about the time of the 'Bridge too Far' raids on Arnhem. It was full of orange crates and biscuits. It was on the ground for three months and then 'snatched' up by a Dakota, but the elastic rope broke and it came down again at Ape's Hall. Did anybody else see it or know more about it?

Memories 1st May 2002, by Mike Petty

Friday 3rd May 1977 started like any other for the residents of the Oxmoor Estate at Huntingdon. Children went off to school, as usual, people went to work, some on building sites, some in factories, some cutting grass on the estate itself. There was the familiar drone of the Canberra returning to its base at nearby RAF Wyton.

As 12.15 approached the children of the Sapley Park School heard the familiar and welcome sound of the school lunch-time bell and prepared to walk home across the playing field for their snacks. But there was something unfamiliar about the noise from the sky. For the drone had ceased and there was silence. Then there came a high-pitched whine. Looking up they saw that the plane that had been flying level was now nose-diving, spiralling as it fell, apparently aiming straight at their school.

All eyes were fixed on the sky as the stricken plane plunged to the ground; it missed the school, it missed the houses and ploughed into the ground with an almighty crash with part of its wing resting against houses in Norfolk Road. There was no explosion. But aviation fuel sprayed out and ignited causing a fireball that swept through a terrace of seven homes. Windows cracked in the heat, smoke billowed out and neighbours rushed towards the scene of the inferno, fearful that there might be people trapped in the by now fiercely blazing buildings.

But there was nothing they could do, although they grabbed ladders to get to the upstairs bedrooms they were beaten back by intense heat and smoke. They could hear children inside calling for help, but they could not help them.

Firefighting crews were there within minutes and were well rehearsed – there had been a major air disaster exercise at Wyton just a month before – and the flames were contained, but even they could do nothing for the three youngsters trapped inside. Two little girls and one boy died and the whole of Huntingdon – old town and new estate, locals and Londoners – wept. Hundreds packed the funeral service, which was held in St Barnabas church – because the nearby Catholic churches were too small to hold so many mourners.

As people recalled their own memories of the tragedy it became apparent that it could have been even worse. If it had happened just moments later dozens of children from Sapley Park School could have been caught in the inferno as they made their way home to lunch. If the plane had continued in the air just a few seconds longer it would have ploughed into the school itself. If the pilot had ejected from his stricken aircraft, instead of fighting the controls to aim it away from houses he might have saved his own life – though the body of his navigator was found dead in his ejector seat.

People asked how could it happen, why should flying be allowed over the homes of hundreds of people. But the airfield had been there first and the London overspill estate built under the flightpath. Later it transpired that the plane had been practising what to do in the event of engine failure – and something had gone tragically wrong.

As Oxmoor tried to cope with its losses the bulldozers moved in to demolish the shattered and blackened wreck of seven houses. As they did so children's toys tumbled from upstairs bedrooms, piles of invitations to a christening fluttered in the wind and the remains of a lunch that was never eaten disappeared under a shower of rubble. Rebuilding would begin as soon as possible, the Council said; the houses would be rebuilt exactly as before, the Greater London Council were searching their files for the original plans and lists of building materials.

But nothing could replace the lives that had been lost or erase the terrible memories of that May day of 25 years ago.

**

May Day used to be an important day in the calendar, a day associated with fertility rites and trade union rallies; a day when early risers might see the ghosts of those who had been drowned in the fen rivers, when labourers could renew their credit with landlords, children parade their dolls around the village or young men express their opinions of village girls – while a girl of amiable disposition might find a branch of whitethorn beside her cottage door, a girl of loose manners could find a blackthorn by hers, whilst a bunch of nettles tied to the latch was a sure sign that inside their dwelt a nag.

“Such Old English customs are, unhappily, dying out slowly but surely. Even the romantic revels which formerly attached to May Day have to a large extent disappeared and but little remains to mark what was an important day in the calendar” – so said the News of 100 years ago. But, it added: “May Day is essentially a day for youthful jubilation and in one place in Cambridge is at least observed as such. Scholars at Eden Street Higher Grade Schools annually take part in a quaintly pretty ceremony of choosing a May Queen. Queen Nellie – last year's queen was escorted to her throne and formally abdicated. Votes were taken and it was announced that Miss Daisy Coulson had been elected and she was crowned with a crown of roses”

One person who remembers the tradition continuing until more recent times is Pat Kendall from Hemingford Grey. Whilst browsing through some old photographs she came across a reminder of the day that she herself was crowned May Queen at the Central School for Girls in Melbourn Place, Cambridge in May 1942. There was to be only one more May Queen after her for the lovely celebrations came to an abrupt end in – she thinks – 1944. Pat says that there is a May Queen book in existence which photographs dating back to 1896, an absolutely magical reminder of a tradition that has passed away – or has it.

Do you have memories of Maypole dancing or other celebrations of the coming of spring – write to Mike Petty at the News [SCAN]

Can anybody help solve another mystery. Andrew Brett from Teversham has been busy recording and transcribing the memories of his gran, Grace Hinchcliffe, who lived in the Milton Road area of Cambridge during the Great War. Grace always remembered groups of dirty and tired looking men being marched up Milton Road by guards on horseback. She was then only a small child, but thought that they were German prisoners of war. She was told that they were being marched to an encampment beyond the railway gates. Lydia (Grace's mother) took pity on them and handed them scraps of bread as they passed the Bretts' house. Grace always remembered the contrasts in the scene: the guards on their fine horses - smart and upright - and the dishevelled men shambling along beside them. Does anybody else have memories of details of a prisoner-of-war encampment in this area in about 1917 that will back-up her recollections?

John Sparrow from Littleport remembers seeing an American glider that came down there in September 1944, about the time of the 'Bridge too Far' raids on Arnhem. It was full of orange crates and biscuits. It was on the ground for three months and then 'snatched' up by a Dakota, but the elastic rope broke and it came down again at Ape's Hall. Did anybody else see it or know more about it?

Memories 8th May 2002, by Mike Petty

It seems that almost every week brings some new plan for the future, some will come to fruition, most disappear under a pile of paper – and perhaps it's just as well.

Just 50 years ago Cambridge city and Cambridgeshire county councils were at war over just such a plan. Known universally as the "Holford Report" it had been produced by planning consultants Profession William Graham Holford and Henry Myles Wright on behalf of the County as part of their new powers under the Town and Country Planning Act of 1947. But right from the start there was controversy; the city felt it had not been properly consulted and that its objections were not taken notice of. For a full assessment of the issues and opinions you should see Anthony Cooper's study of 'Planners and Preservationists' issued by the Cambridge Preservation Society in 2000 (ISBN 0-9510655-2-1) but today I thought it would be interesting to consider some of the suggestions that occupied minds in May 1952

The proposals and counter-proposals then being put forward by councillors and planners would have produced a Cambridge radically different from that we know today. There would have been new roads carving through the city from Castle Hill to Corn Exchange Street via Jesus Green and Christ's Pieces. The ancient buildings in Magdalene Street would have been torn down to make way for a wider road that would continue to Jesus Lane. In the city centre the church St Andrew the Great would become marooned in the centre of a traffic island & houses in Emmanuel Road pulled down for a new bus station

So who was suggesting what & what, if anything, happened

Spine Relief Road

The County proposed the creation of a new wide inner by-pass running from the top of Castle Hill to Jesus Lane. It would start by cutting through houses in the Hertford Street area & there would be a roundabout on Chesterton Lane with a new bridge over the Cam at Jesus Green. Park Parade would be widened and the road would cut across Jesus College hockey field to Jesus Lane.

The City said no: the tremendous dislocation would be out of all proportion to the advantage gained. There was little doubt that if it was approved it would then continue into King Street and on to join with Emmanuel Street, cutting across Christ's Pieces and they were not prepared to sacrifice this valuable and beautiful open space. It was an amenity to be preserved intact

What happened? Following widespread protest the road was never built.

Chesterton Bridge

The need for a new bridge between Chesterton and Newmarket Road was agreed by both parties.

The County wanted it to be built along the line of Walnut Tree Avenue and down East Road.

The City said no: it would cut through Banham's Boatyard and cause East Road to become a through trunk route, increasing congestion at the junction with Mill Road and at the Catholic Church. They would prefer a new bridge to be built opposite River Lane and divert through traffic down Coldham's Lane and Brooks Road to Trumpington and the London Road, thus relieving congestion in the centre of the city

What happened? Elizabeth Bridge was built where the County suggested; part of East Road was widened.

Magdalene Street

The City said Magdalene Street should be widened to provide a new better approach into the centre – a continuation of the work already undertaken to widen Bridge Street. This would involve removing the ancient buildings – described as “obsolete property” - opposite Magdalene College – as the College itself had proposed in 1932. Magdalene Bridge should be remodelled to allow traffic to flow more easily down the already-widened Bridge Street.

There would be a new road from the Round Church to Jesus Lane and the one-way system in Trinity Street-Bridge Street should be reversed.

The County proposed Magdalene Street be closed to vehicles

What happened? Today Magdalene Street is regarded as one of the jewels of the Cambridge streetscape; the ‘obsolete property’ that the city council wanted to rip down has been preserved and new college building put up behind them.

Magdalene Bridge was strengthened but kept in its original state. Magdalene Street, Bridge Street and Trinity Street are now closed to most traffic

Bus Station

The County proposed a new county bus station on the site of Christ's Lane – the narrow street linking Drummer Street with St Andrew's Street

The City said no: this was not big enough and would create a bottleneck; a new bus station should be built to the East of Emmanuel Road, replacing houses; until this land could be acquired New Square car park should be used. Drummer Street would then become the stopping place for country buses.

What happened? Drummer Street bus station was retained but has been remodelled and is still subject of debate. New Square car park reverted to grass following the opening of the Grafton Centre. Christ's Lane was closed when Bradwell's Court shopping arcade opened.

City centre roads

The County wanted a wide street leading southwards from the Guildhall across the Lion Yard, parallel with Corn Exchange Street, with a new car park on the ground between them. There would also be a new road north of Downing Street continuing through to Emmanuel Street.

The City preferred a road running south from the junction of Petty Cury and Sidney Street with a widened St Tibb's Row. Corn Exchange Street should be widened to improve traffic circulation with a new road linking Wheeler Street, down Post Office Terrace and via a widened Christ's Lane to Drummer Street. This would leave the church of St Andrew the Great on an island site with a new multi-storey car park on the remaining portion of Lion Yard

What happened? The proposed roads were not built; much of the area from Petty Cury to Downing Street was razed for the Lion Yard redevelopment, with a second phase now under way. There are plans for a Grand Arcade to continue the scheme. A multi-storey car park was constructed in Corn Exchange Street and is to be demolished and rebuilt.

Time will tell whether these plans come to fruition, or whether, like so many others, they will become a part of the Cambridge that never was.

Readers write

Lynn Green (nee Stamp) of Melbourn believes she was the last May Queen to be crowned at Milton Road Junior School, Cambridge in 1963; she is standing next to the abdicating Queen but can't remember any of the names of the other children in the photograph. Can you? [THIS WAS E-MAILED TO NEWSDESK FROM COLYNNGREEN@TALKGAS.NET ON 2ND MAY. THERE IS AN ATTACHMENT WITH THE MESSAGE, BUT I'VE ONLY GOT THE WORDS SO DON'T KNOW WHAT IT LOOKS LIKE!]

Dick Roberts from Dry Drayton has responded to my article about Pye by sending a snap of an outing to Southend in 1936 of staff in the short wave section. Where are they now, he wonders. [ON DISK] John Howes from Stapleford recalls W.G. Pye, electrical engineers on Newmarket Road, Cambridge, opposite the old News offices way back in the 1930s.

Mrs M. Wright from Soham has written to say that it was her late husband, Wilfred, who had the idea of using the old tractor tyre as a mini-roundabout at the junction of Coldham's Lane and Newmarket Road in 1977. He was road foreman for the County Council and thought it would prevent accidents to the public and increase the safety of his own workmen at this busy junction. He himself had been hit by speeding vehicles at the site

Can you solve a mystery that has been plaguing an Ickleton reader? She remembers that about 50 years ago x there used to be a shop opposite Woolworth's in Sidney Street, Cambridge, with a brown lino floor. It also had a lift with a concertina gate that was worked by girl who wore a dark green pillbox hat at a jaunty angle. Was it Coad's?

Memories 15th May 2002, by Mike Petty

Susan Mintern from St Ives has sent in some interesting notes on her family's involvement with Pye of Cambridge

Both my Dad – Frank Mintern - & Mum worked for Pye. In fact they met in the register office – more properly called the registration department – when they were listing all the shareholders. I have the romantic notion of boss and secretary, especially as I think they tried to keep it quiet to start with. They married in 1955 so if it had been a secret it was out then.

Dad spent his 21st birthday on the beach at Dunkirk & when the war was over had a short time working at Boosey and Hawkes in London before moving up to Cambridge to work for Pye as a Cost Accountant. Initially he lodged at Trumpington Hall where his Aunt was companion to the "Old Mrs Pemberton" (as we knew her). Later he rose through the ranks to become Financial Accountant, having spent several years completing his accountancy qualifications at night school.

Mum worked in the typing pool and used to travel in to work from Bartlow on the Haverhill works bus. She recalls that every morning C.O. Stanley walked through the offices and – as the staff saw it – checked that everyone was in and working. She moved on to become a personal secretary & in 1953/4 was sent off to London for the launch of PAM Radio – a radio station set up by Pye. He first office there was a room above Boosey and Hawkes – so the circle goes round. She left the company to become a full time Mother just before I was born in 1956.

During their courtship a work colleague, an Australian girl, became a good friend to them both and became my Godmother. She was secretary to Freddie Keys, at that time the Company Secretary, & later left Pye to work at Cambridge University Press. She has now retired and is back in Australia.

As a youngster I remember going to the Cam road factory to pick up Dad from work. For some reason I remember the building as a pale blue colour - maybe it was the paintwork? Mr Day was always on the gate with some friendly words (and at Christmas he always gave my sister and I a box of Milk Tray chocolates). We would then go into the offices - they had windows between them that started half way up the walls so you could see into the next one - it was always relatively quiet as Dad usually worked late so we could run about and make plenty of noise and make sure he packed up and came home!

During this time my sister and I were both proud owners of the Pye musical televisions. Small models of TVs in plastic orange cases that used to play "D'ye ken John Peel" - they drove Mum mad! I think one had a very square angular screen whilst the other was a little more curved. Both stood on short silver coloured stands and were replicas of the TVs being manufactured at the time.

On occasions Dad would bring a TV set home to trial (black and white of course in those days), either a new model or one that had been repaired. It was quite a special occasion for an otherwise TV less household. Radiograms were another thing, we had this piece of Pye furniture in the house for years. A coffin like box on legs, with a centre section that opened up to reveal a record deck and radio tuner with two big speakers, one on each end.

Dad was then transferred to the Newmarket road offices for a short time before a move to those at Prittwell Park in Southend. That was probably around the time Pye became part of Phillips. Prittwell Park closed down after a couple of years and we were moved back to Cambridge where Dad worked in the Gwydir street office until retirement in 1982

In this day and age it's hard to imagine working for the same company for all those years. Whether I'm recalling things through rose coloured specs or not I don't know, but I have the impression Pye in particular was a good company to have worked for, it didn't just look after it's workers it was mindful of the family as well. [THERE WAS AN E-MAIL FROM SUSAN MINTERN [smintern@waitrose.com] on Thurs 18 April 10.44 pm that had an attachment – possibly a picture. CAN WE CHECK TO SEE WHAT THIS WAS AND IF APPROPRIATE USE IT. SCAN OF CAM ROAD FACTORY IN 1920S, SCAN OF NEWMARKET ROAD FACTORY 1973]

##

Bridget Ulmann from Bishop's Stortford has been studying a picture of the Volunteer pub in Trumpington that I featured in Memories in January. It had been lent by Edith Jackson who used to live there and always wondered what the picture actually depicted.

Bridget believes it may show Trumpington Air Raid Personnel on parade at the beginning of the war. Bert Johnson, of the building firm Johnson & Bailey, lived in Long Road, and was a member of the ARP; it may be him on the right of the line of men with his coat over his arm. She points out the cottages on the left where Mr Dilley the policeman lived and the police box where he used to stand if not attending to other duties.

She continues: Having live in Long Road since 1936 it brings back great memories. In Long Road the gas man used to manually pull on and off the gas street lights each morning and evening, carrying his ladder on a bicycle. Milk would be delivered by horse and cart from Clay Farm and the inhabitants of The Old Mill cottages would sit outside at the front of the cottages on Saturday and Sunday afternoons. The cottages had one gas light in their back rooms and used candles in the rest of the house. Between the cottages and the telephone exchange were the Trumpington allotments; one man kept pigs and it was fun watching them being put into a small trailer to be taken to market. Corn crops were cut by harvesters and baled and then a traction engine would hoist it up to stacks which were thatched. At the end of a field one was allowed to glean corn for chickens. Mrs Peck (whose husband had three chemist shops in Cambridge) used to keep chickens and everyone used to take her their potato peelings.

Everyone rode bicycles. There was one bus per hour from Bishop's Road to the Guildhall which was always full with as many people standing as could be fitted in. The fare was one penny.

During the war soldiers were camped between Clay Farm and the bridge with quite a large gun – very noisy! Leyton House (now the Perse School) was occupied by the RAF for administrative purposes. The Home Guard used to go out if the siren went – they gathered at Stone Bridge, where Brooklands Avenue joins Trumpington Road – and their headquarters were under the bridge. One bomb fell in Barrow Road, killing one man. He and his wife had just sent their children to the States a few days before. There was a Prisoner of War camp just past the present Park and Ride site on the Harston Road. To begin with they were mostly Italians. They used to work on the farms in their uniforms with a spot on the back and went by lorry with a soldier (and gun) with them. Towards the end of the war they were allowed to walk into Cambridge – I believe two at a time – without guards. [SCAN OF TRUMPINGTON GROUP]

##

When the war was over Cambridge remained a major centre for men in uniform; but it can be a lonely place for visitors. So the Women's Voluntary Service contacted the City Council for a site for an Anglo-American and Allied Services Club to give them somewhere pleasant to go when they were on leave in Cambridge.

A year later, in spring 1952, two large huts were erected on a piece of waste land at the top of Castle Street, Cambridge. They were tastefully and brightly decorated and provided with old furniture renovated by the W.V.S. One would serve for games of various kinds and the other for dancing. There was a snack bar and that "must" for Americans, a juke box. But there were still some essentials lacking and an appeal was launched for a wireless set, a gramophone and records, garden furniture, a ping-pong table and a clock – particularly the clock.

The complex was opened by the Foreign Secretary, Mr Anthony Eden, on 2nd May 1952. He praised the work of the WVS and the assistance of the U.S. Air Force and the Air Ministry. The club would be open every evening during the week and, Mr Eden said, would lure out American Service men from the attractions of their camps so they could learn "what extraordinary animals the English are"

The WRVS continued to run the centre for many years but it is now operated by the County Council. It is now called the Hilltops Day Centre and is based in Primrose Street, off Victoria Road. Over the years I have spoken to various groups of elderly people with wonderful memories but sadly many of them have now passed away. Now the County Council are planning to celebrate the Golden Jubilee of the centre with a day of events on May 29th and would appreciate readers' help in filling in gaps in its story. So if you were you in at the birth of this organisation or have you any memories you can share then Bronni Bruce would love to hear from you. Ring her on Cambridge 712056 or contact me at the News

##

Mrs P. Anderson from Cherry Hinton Road, Cambridge found her attention caught by an article in the News about the former station master's house in Great Shelford, which may become an Italian restaurant. She seems to recall reading somewhere that the father of Sir Peter Hall, the theatrical producer, was station master for a while and Sir Peter lived there when a schoolboy at the Perse. Or is her memory playing tricks, she asks. Can anybody put her mind at rest? [PIC OF SHELFORD STATION HOUSE – 38861 PUB'D IN NEWS]
##

Mystery Picture

This mystery picture from the News files of 1963 shows a thatched cottage overshadowed by a giant crane constructing Cambridge's first multi-storey car park – can you identify it and add any information as to its fate? [SCAN]

Memories 13th May supplement

Readers have been quick to identify the young May Queen and her attendants at Cambridge's Milton Road school in 1963. Mrs J. Buchanan was a teacher there then and remembers most of them including Rosemary Pearson on the left, the tall Angela Soltys, Lynn Stamp the Queen and Sally Hitchborn. The girl on the right she remembers but can't recall the name. That leaves the girl second from left, somebody Tiplady, she thought – and she's right. For that girl is now Sandra Ashton from Cambridge who has also written in. She recalls the young page-boy was called Trevor – but Trevor who? And who is the girl on the extreme right? [REPRIESE PHOTO FROM LAST WEEK]

Both Mrs C. Slater from Longstowe and Miss Mary Rayner from Cambridge confirm that it was Coad's shop in Sidney Street, Cambridge that had puzzled our Ickleton reader (Memories 8th May). It did indeed have the brown lino floor, lift with the gates and the girl with the pillbox hat. But, as they both tell me, I got the location wrong. Coad's was sandwiched between the "old" Woolworth's and the splendid "old" Sainsbury's in Sidney Street. Miss Rayner recalls that it had a partly hidden entrance with display windows round an oval with a central "island" display window before you got into the shop & one of those overhead pulley systems to whiz money round the shop. She actually has two summer skirts that she bought there which, being 'proper' cotton, are still wearable. [PICTURE OF SIDNEY STREET]

My article on the Oxmoor plane crash tragedy brought particular memories for Bob Francis of Whittlesford. He is a professional photographer who had been commissioned to take the photographs at a wedding a few months later. The pilot killed when he steered his doomed plane away from the school was to have been best man when his sister married another RAF officer. The couple decided that the wedding should take place as planned – but without the best man. The ushers and many of the guests were all RAF officers from the same squadron and everyone was in their place – but with a gap deliberately left for the missing man. This was extended to the photographs afterwards and in all the pictures of the family there was a gap where her brother would have been. Bob says it was the most difficult wedding he has ever photographed. All mention of the accident was avoided until the speeches in a local riverside restaurant when the dead pilot was remembered in the traditional way.

Memories, 22nd May 2002, by Mike Petty

PLEASE DOUBLE CHECK THAT THERE IS A BEER FESTIVAL – I HEARD IT ON THE RADIO BUT DID NOT SPOT A MENTION IN MONDAY’S PAPER.

As another Cambridge beer festival gets under way connoisseurs of real ale, and many others, will be making their way to [MIDSUMMER COMMON?] in search of a favourite ale or a new discovery. It has become a ritual event for many years & there have been several venues. But somehow intrepid News photographers have sought them out to capture the atmosphere and some of the participants, though others doubtless disappeared once they saw the cameras, just in case their bosses saw them in the paper, rather than at that business meeting as they claimed! But if you see yourself – or your boss – in these pictures taken at the Beer Festival inside the Corn Exchange about 30 years ago please let me know. [PIX FROM NEWS FILES]

Over that period the Campaign for Real Ale have lobbied for traditional British beers served in the traditional way. In 1976 there were only 32 pubs in Cambridge serving “real ale” – in 1934 there had been 181!

Pubs need beer; 100 years Cambridge had 16 breweries; this number had dropped to six by 1925, five of which were still working in 1950. The last of these, The Star Brewery in Newmarket Road ceased brewing in 1972 and was demolished a decade later. The fame of their products lingers on in old advertisements like this of 1900. In that year the public analyst inspected Bailey and Tebbutt’s Panton Brewery and proclaimed: “I am unable to detect any trace of Arsenic or other deleterious matter; I consider the beer is perfectly pure”. Dale’s Brewery in Gwydir Street won a gold cup for their beers at an International Exhibition in 1910 and erected a replica of the cup on the front of their building. It was taken over by Whitbreads in 1955 and brewing ceased three years later, although the premises continued to be used as a store and depot. [SCAN OF PANTON PRICES AND ADVERT FOR THE STAR BREWERY, 1900, SCAN OF DALE’S BREWERY, & STAR BREWERY]

The pressure on pubs had come from various areas, including the Temperance Movement. Writing in 1906 Eglantyne Jebb summarised the problems of continual drinking which, she claimed, was common amongst college servants in Cambridge.

- It lowers the physique and the evils it produces are hereditary, being traceable to the third and fourth generation
- It conduces to various forms of disease
- It is often a cause of early deaths, for a constitution undermined by the drink-habit makes a weaker resistance to the attacks of disease and cannot derive support from the use of medicines which have been deprived of their stimulating power
- It impoverishes the family. In the present state of society men are often compelled to live and bring up their families on earnings which can only provide the bare necessities of life. The money spent on drink must then be taken away from the children’s’ food
- It lowers a man by causing him to associate with bad company
- It degrades his character, deprives him of his self-respect, undermines his will-power, tends to produce inertia, moroseness and bad temper and inevitably lowers his whole standard of conduct.

In those days there was one pub per 138 inhabitants and along Newmarket Road there was a pub every 36 yards, all competing for business. Landlords dare not offend customers by refusing to serve them and when – as often happened – he himself needed to go out to work then the pub was managed by his wife. This, said Eglantyne, contributed to female intemperance, “as the woman is naturally tempted to gather her friends around her and they pass the time drinking together”.

Over the years many of the old pubs have closed down as Cambridge itself has changed. Massive redevelopment in the 1950s and 1960s saw the clearance of 'slum' housing and street-corner pubs that had served them. They were replaced with new housing estates with their own public houses. Other old pubs have been renovated and in 1976 the first 1,000 pints were on the house when friends of traditional British draught beer packed the Salisbury Arms, Tenison Road, Cambridge for its reopening under the ownership of CAMRA Investments Ltd. The pub had been bought from Whitbread for £22,000 and renovated from top to bottom; it was their first pub in East Anglia.

In the city centre some pubs have disappeared, others been modernised and new ones established, some in old cinemas such as the Tivoli and Regal.

But in the 1960s there was major controversy over the loss of a pub that did not serve beer. The Central Hotel on the corner of Peas Hill and St Edward's Passage had at one time been one of Cambridge's most famous inns, the Three Tuns, patronised by Samuel Pepys and generations of members of the University. In the 1860s Cambridge University & Town Coffee Palace Company was established to attract custom from gin palaces and supply the needs of artisans; they acquired various premises, including the Central Hotel, but was wound up in 1950. The building was featured in the Royal Commission on Historical Monuments survey of Cambridge in 1959 but by then its future was in doubt for King's College had announced plans to demolish the old Hotel and build a new hostel on the site. This proposal came in for great debate by the conservation lobby but the development went ahead. [SCAN & PICTURES OF CENTRAL HOTEL]

Do you remember the Temperance pubs, or did you work for a local brewery – your memories please

##

Did Sir Peter Hall really live in the station master's house at Great Shelford, asked

Yes replied a number of readers, including Albert Truelove who remembers that he had his interest in the theatre at that time. Mr G.S. Spencer from Littleport was a relief signalman who used to work at Shelford station from time to time; he recalls a Mr Hall being station master at Whittlesford for a number of years, though he does not recall him at Shelford. Miss Irene Curtis got to know Sir Peter well; she writes: "When he first came up to Cambridge to St Catharine's College he had two rooms and was lodged with us when he lived in Fulbrooke Road. My mother told me he used to come home covered in greasepaint (as of course he was into acting & drama). I used to help mother with things and helped her make beds, so saw this for myself, as she used to wash the pillowslips so often. His mother and father used to come and visit him from Shelford". Nigel Richardson, headmaster of the Perse School sends a few pages from Peter Hall's autobiography "Making an exhibition of myself". In it he recalls how his railwayman father was promoted to "relief", replacing stationmasters who were on holiday or sick at a variety of stations over a large area of East Anglia. This meant that the family had to move to Cambridge but neither Peter nor his mother wanted to make the change. He was then a shy child but made friends at the Morley School in Blinco Grove & when he moved to the Perse. About half-way through his time there his father was again promoted, this time to become stationmaster at Shelford. "Once more we lived over the shop, but now forty or fifty trains went thundering past the bedrooms every night on the busy Cambridge to Liverpool Street line. Shelford was already virtually a suburb of Cambridge, but you could still see the village. There were a few shops, a post office and a church; and fields where I could fly ...". What? Sadly the photocopied pages end! Do you have a copy of the book that tells us more?

One of those friends from the Morley School days was Mr Bryce-Smith who can also add details about the thatched cottage and Park Street car park. He writes: "I was an Engineer with the City Engineer's Dept & was involved with supervision of the car park's construction by Messrs Truscon Ltd, the Contractor. The thatched cottage in Clement Place belonged to Dr. Erich Schaefer who would not sell it at the time. So the car park was built round it in the shape of a 'U' to preserve the cottage and its rather beautiful garden. A few years later Dr Schaefer died, and the City bought the cottage and land that went with it. The cottage was demolished, Clement Place disappeared, and the car park was completed in the shape it is today". The cottage also rang a bell with Sally Carlton who recalls that Dr Schaefer had a workshop or laboratory in Thompson's Lane. He was a physicist eminent in the development of plastics, recalls Ryszard Lesik, a decorator who worked on the cottage for him from 1954 to the Doctor's death on 31st December 1965. The house was kept in pristine condition and featured beautiful gardens that and provided a great deal of pleasure to countless passers-by. Then it was demolished to complete the car park in all its concrete glory! [SCAN OF RETHATCHING COTTAGE IN CLEMENT PLACE]

The picture of the Pye outing to Southend (Memories 8th May) came as "a really nice surprise" to Mrs Janet Lawrence of Histon for the lady centre front was her mother, Olive Goodchild who died in 1988.

Pat Kendall's picture of the Central School May Queen interested Roger Neal from Hauxton as his sister – then Joyce Sandfield – was at the school then but has no photographs of those times. Are there any pictures that might show her anywhere, he wonders?

Barrie Coombes of Cambridge has dug out an old News photograph of Milton Road School May Queen just 50 years ago, the year he left the school. There are a wealth of faces to pour over, including his own – disguised as a pikeman at the front left. Amongst the names jotted down on the back are D.Lilley, R. Porter, Michael Rumbelow, R. Blows and P. Fluck - is this another connection with the entertainment world? [SCAN OF MILTON ROAD MAY QUEEN 1952]

Memories 29th May 2002, by Mike Petty

As the country gears up for the Queens' Golden Jubilee celebrations it seems impossible to believe that 25 years have passed since the last one. June 1977 was Jubilee month; Cambridgeshire went red, white & blue with people dressing, decorating, drinking, planting, buying selling and even eating anything that stayed still long enough to have a Union Jack printed on it. Everything that is except the official Cambridge Jubilee Year souvenir books, even at half price some thousand copies were left. Nor did everybody join in the spirit of Jubilee as the original bill of £500 for street decorations soared to £988 because of the cost of replacing vandalised bunting.

The planning for it all had taken some months; Stapleford was not alone in starting its deliberations in October the year before. They, like many others, were having to contemplate just what sort of events ought to be organised. Again like many others, decided to include Jubilee sports, decorated vehicles and a Street party for the youngsters, with other celebrations for the not so young, who could actually remember the Coronation in 1953 and even the previous Silver Jubilee way back in 1935.

Cambridge itself sought inspiration from even further back, basing its programme of sports on Midsummer Common on the rustic sports that were themselves revived for Queen Victoria's coronation. But now Supermarket Trolley races were included along with more traditional fireworks, bands and parades

"J" stood, it was said for "Jollity, Joy and Jubilation". Almost inevitably it also stood for "Juveniles", the children's day, to be remembered in years to come as "the day I went to the street party and the sandwiches got soggy and the crisps got soggy"; in fact "all the food was soggy so we did not eat it". The inside story of the Cambridge Jubilee was published by children from Kings Hedges School in the July 1977 issue of their magazine "Rooftops", capturing the child's eye view of the day.

Some of the pupils watched the Queen on the telly; there in the golden chariot was the lady "nobody hates, because she is nice to everyone and everything ... she even cares for the insects which is very nice of her".

But there were other things to do besides watching telly. Street parties had been arranged, at Crathern Way 300 people came, but the weather was unkind. "It was raining and we had some nice food and first of all we went to the Magic Man and then we had the food. It was still raining so we went to the community centre to have our food. I had two jam tarts and four slices of bread and we had two cakes"

Then there was the Carnival: "it was quite fun and was very exciting". "I was a bear in the carnival. I did a dance; it was scary", "and then the dragon came, scaly back, fiery mouth, then the St George came to the rescue, throwing spears and thrusting swords, then the dragon goes and in comes Robin Hood playing games with his Merry Men in the woods". "My mask had a nose like a pigs. My brother thought I was a pig when I went by him. When I came home I had a meringue cake with a cherry and a cup of tea". "I was a prince on a float. The floats were lorries decorated with flowers and flags... on the float it was very cold. Every time we went round a corner we nearly fell off". I did not like it one bit because it was freezing cold"

But not all children could play all day: "I got up and I did the washing up, the wiping up and putting away. Then I did the dusting, swept the carpet, then I had a wash. After that I had my breakfast". "I took a Jubilee cake up to an old lady for her tea and I pushed an old lady in the procession and we all got a flag and a red, white and blue lolly"

Food and fun meant thirst. For most it was a glass of orange squash, for others "a drink of coke and a drink of punch and I did not get drunk". But for at least one eleven year old "my mum got us some cider to drink and some cakes as well. I got drunk and I was sick so I went to bed. Next day I was a little bit better and I really enjoyed it"

And so did thousands of others throughout the county and throughout the country in celebration of a Jubilee like no other, and yet like all others.

At Haverhill there were flag-draped homes and organised sports and entertainments with parties organised by streets and courts on the town's estates. On Jubilee Day itself there was a basketball match on the recreation ground between Haverhill Girls & the USAF. It would all culminate with a torchlight procession and bonfire. At Linton there was a wheelbarrow race & all old age pensioners received free food tokens with jubilee crowns distributed to schoolchildren. Horseheath staged a village fair with a fancy dress competition, while Clare had a four-day junket starting with an Old Tyme Music Hall in the country park. Kedington had ladies comic soccer and a knobbly knees contest and Great Wratting arranged a conjurer to entertain the youngsters at a tea party. A town crier in full period dress heralded the jubilee message around Wickhambrook, visiting each of the eleven 'greens' which make up the parish. Church floodlights were turned on at Great and Little Thurlow who also arranged a flower festival and the crowning of a Rose Queen, 18-year-old Sharon Atherton, by the village's oldest resident, Mrs Enid Farrow, aged 90. Histon and Impington combined for a village gala – and another knobbly-knees competition, whilst something even odder captivated people at Willingham where Owen Lee constructed a wonderful contraption featuring a small motor turning an array of levers and pulleys made from old bedsteads and cycle wheels.

The News reporters & photographers were there to record it all – but what do you now remember? PICS FROM NEWS FILES / NEGS 1593.77.18 – Robert Brown, Ross St, 1620.77.27 – Akeman St

##

Martyn Seekings' attention was caught by recent memories of milk being delivered by horse and cart. His father, Charles Seekings, used to deliver milk this way & he has send a photo taken in Alpha Terrace, Trumpington sometime before the war. Martyn adds that the horse knew which houses to stop at and where it would get titbits. But who is the tot in the doorway? [THIS WAS E-MAILED TO THE NEWS ON 18TH MAY FROM W.SEEKINGS@TESCO.NET]

Shirley Brown from Trumpington would be interested in other pictures like this for a new book of old photographs she is producing of that area, past and present. Any snaps of buildings that have gone, ordinary people doing ordinary things, interesting events – even the Waitrose site as it was before the supermarket was built – like when it was an army camp – would be useful. If you get a picture accepted you can buy the book at half-price when it's published. Contact Shirley Brown at 85 Bishop's Road, Trumpington, CB2 2NQ or phone her on Cambridge 841559

##

Many readers have contacted me to correct Mary Rayner's positioning of Coad's shop in Sidney Street – including Miss Mary Rayner herself – but then it was a long while ago.

Mrs B. Edwards from Landbeach has found an old directory from 1940 which lists the shops from

Lloyds Bank onwards as:

no.6	Miller & sons, Music dealers
no.7	Stiles Ltd, Bakers and confectioners
nos.8-11	Marks and Spencer
no.12	Coad, W.A. Draper & ladies & gentlemen's outfitters
nos.13-15	Woolworth Ltd
nos.16-17	Sainsbury Ltd
nos.18-19	Heffer & sons Ltd
nos.20-14	Hawkings Ltd, caterers and confectioners; over the top of the shop was the Dorothy Café.

She backs this up with her own memories that Coads was incorporated into Woolworths and their escalator stands on the site of Coads old shop.

Roger Coleman from Cambridge confirms: "I remember their incredibly narrow frontage looking intimidated between the two 'nationals' as I stood queuing as a child with my mother waiting for the 101 bus opposite the church railings. The wording 'Coads' was in large art deco styling taking the full width of the shop and was on a yellow background in blue neon. Marks had expanded in the late '50's to the night, absorbing the space occupied by Stiles cakeshop where my aunt Grace worked and we used to collect beautiful crisp bread rolls! Not to be outdone, Woolworths took over Coads a short while later, about 1960-61, and built the new Otis escalator (the first in Cambridge) in the space. We used to ride continuously on it as it seemed such a sensation! The old wooden staircase on the right of the shop was then removed. Finally in the late 1960's Marks finished its expansion towards Lloyds Bank when it took over Millers Music Shop, with its distinctive 1930's curved glass frontage, and this is how both shops remain to this day"

Mrs Pearl Reed of Cambridge remembers the overhead pulley system they had as it kept her amused as a child, while Mrs RA. Clarke (nee Parr) from Cambridge used to operate it as she worked there from the time she left school until the shop closed – and she knows the name of the girl who operated the lift – it was Rhona Rank who lived in Bottisham. Mrs Jean Clements remembers she had a bad limp

But Coad's had been in Cambridge much earlier; the Cambridge Chronicle of 19th June 1929 has a picture of their inaugural sale from premises at 7-12 Burleigh Street; they were in Sidney Street by 1936 as a cutting from 17th October shows when part of the footpath was widened. [SCAN].

##

Nick Wise has e-mailed with more details of the thatched cottage in Clement Place: "The house, originally two if not three separate tenements, and possibly originally occupied by grooms servicing the adjacent stable yards and inn yards, had the distinction of being the last thatched property in the centre of Cambridge and was probably built in the late 18th century. Other properties were built in the early 19th century around the access to this house - these properties and the roadway serving them were to become known as Clement Place. The thatched cottage survived the damning report of all the other Clement Place properties recommended for demolition by the Public Health Committee in 1938. The cottage next survived the 1957-8 proposals by the City Council for compulsory purchase of all the Clement Place houses, the owner Dr Erich Schaefer securing on appeal to the local Magistrates bench agreement whereby No.10 and No.13 remained but adjoining land was sold to the Council. The first phase of the construction of Park Street multi-storey car park took place from 1962 to 1963. Sadly No. 10 did not survive the car park's later extension in the early 1970s."

##

More memories of Sir Peter Hall once having lived at Shelford station have come in from David Jones & David Gillingham of Cambridge. He recalls that Mr Hall senior was a highly respected relief station master who would on occasion have to travel to the station at Hunstanton when the late Mr Walter Westley was station master. Michael Payne recalls Sir Peter in his earlier days; he e-mails: "I remember, while a pupil at The Perse School between 1945 and 1951, I was given six of the best with a gym slipper across my nether regions by him for being cheeky! I remember I was used as a prompter by a Mr P. Tanfield, when he was given the title role in "Hamlet" in, I believe 1949 or 1950 and even then I considered him to be a genius". Winnie Foulger of Cherry Hinton has a copy of Sir Peter's autobiography – she knew his mother when they lived in the railway houses on Mill Road, while Godfrey Waller from Cambridge University Library – where of course they have virtually every book on everything – has sent a photocopy of the page that tells me what Sir Peter flew – it was a model aeroplane. He also occasionally joined his father for a drink in The Railway Tavern beside the level crossing at Shelford – but didn't enjoy it! When he was 13 he supplemented his pocket money by hand-pumping the church organ at Stapleford – a strenuous occupation if the hymns were long or if the organist became over-excited in the last verse and pulled out all the stops. Has anybody else such memories of pumping church organs?

Memories 5th June 2002, by Mike Petty

This week one Jubilee, next week another; only this time it is not the Queen whose long service is commemorated, it is her husband, Prince Philip

For come Monday 10th June he will be celebrating the silver jubilee of his formal installation as Chancellor of Cambridge University.

Many an eminent personage has been appointed to that office over the centuries and when the post became vacant in February 1976 the University authorities started to compile a list of likely candidates. Lord Ramsey, the former Archbishop of Canterbury, and Mr Selwyn Lloyd, then recently retired as speaker of the House of Commons were considered, but perhaps there might be a Royal candidate. "Informed sources" disclosed that Prince Charles, recently graduated from Trinity College, was offered the post but turned it down because of his naval commitments with HMS Bronington. But if not the Prince of Wales, why not the Duke of Edinburgh: he had for many years maintained a close formal and informal interest in Cambridge and had seen Cambridge life from the student viewpoint through unannounced visits while Prince Charles was up at Trinity. The Duke was formally nominated in November 1976 and his accession duly agreed.

So it was that on his 56th birthday, having watched jubilee fireworks until late the previous evening, the Duke flew by helicopter to land at St John's College playing field. There to greet him was the Lord Lieutenant, Sir Peter Brassey, the Mayor of Cambridge, Coun Maurice Garner and a flag-waving crowd of about 1,000 people, including teenagers Jenny Nedderman and Katheryn Horsfall who were carrying a hastily-made banner wishing the Duke a happy birthday. Later at the Senate House he was to receive a surprise birthday card and present from 16-year-old Julie Dunham while crowds sang 'Happy Birthday'.

But, it appeared, not all were happy to see him. For outside the railings some 70 women chanted slogans and waved banners – not this time of birthday greetings, but of protest. The Prince seemed to have some difficulty in understanding the aim of the demonstration – but it was not aimed at him. It was directed at another of the celebrities, who had claimed that children up to the age of five should be looked after full-time by their mothers – whereas the mothers wanted the university to provide nursery facilities for their young children.

But the protest was only a temporary hiccup in the ancient ceremonial that saw Prince Philip, dressed in golden gown led in procession for his formal installation as the new Chancellor. He was greeted at the door by the Vice-Chancellor, Miss Rosemary Murray and guided into the Senate House by two of the University's most senior dons, Lord Butler, the Master of Trinity College and Professor Owen Chadwick, Master of Selwyn College. Then in accordance with tradition he was presented with copies of the university's statutes and ordinances which – speaking in Latin - he gave a solemn pledge to uphold.

Next it was time to perform his first official duty, one which, he said, served no useful purpose – the award of honorary degrees. But how else, he asked could universities demonstrate their admiration for people who had made particularly valuable contributions to human civilisation. People like Mother Teresa of Calcutta, who as Dr Frank Stubbings, University Orator, put it "saw the multitudes and had compassion on them; she went alone, in poverty, to the homes of the poorest, tended their illnesses and set up a school in the midst of the slums".

Later the new Honorary Doctor of Divinity told a congregation of more than 1,500 people packed into Great St Mary's church about her work amongst the dying and destitute of India and asked them "not to give from abundance, but from their love, till it hurts". She also touched briefly on social problems in the Western World

But Cambridge had that very day solved one of its own social problems. For whilst all this was going on, just across the Market Place in the Guildhall another tradition was taking place. Another well-known character took centre stage. He was to some a personality in an age of conformity. He was, said others, an awkward and difficult old drunkard who cursed and swore at those who passed by as he half lay propped up against the base of the old fountain on the Market Hill. He was both, but as Trevor

Hughes entered the city's magistrates court and said "Good afternoon everybody", he looked thinner than usual and unfamiliar without his famous bobble hat or bushy beard. He pleaded guilty to being drunk and disorderly in the Market Square. "I won't deny it, but I can't remember", he said. "I like a little drop of tiddly, but I'm not abusive. But people say: 'look at that dirty old so and so', and I lose my temper". He was sent to prison for a month. It was not his 25th, nor yet his 50th – for on 10th June 1977 he reached his century of convictions. He was to have 13 more before dying in December next year aged 66. A congregation of fifty people, including police, solicitors, market traders & a college Dean gathered for his funeral. Then they exchanged reminiscences about the man whose service they were attending, paid tribute to his memory and went away.

If you have memories of meetings with Trevor Hughes or the Chancellor of Cambridge University write to Mike Petty.

PICTURES OF PRINCE PHILIP AT THE SENATE HOUSE ETC ARE WITH CHRIS ELLIOT. THEY INCLUDE ONE OF PRINCE CHARLES WHEN HE WAS A STUDENT – "FOLLOWING IN HIS SON'S FOOTSTEPS" PERHAPS. THERE IS A PIC OF MOTHER TERESA AS WELL. I ATTACH A SCAN OF TREVOR HUGHES, THERE WILL BE OTHERS IN LIBRARY

Do you remember the Cambridge breweries I asked.

Yes replied Hubert Cutting of Cambridge; he was an office boy at the Star Brewery on Newmarket Road, Cambridge from 1941-47; the managing director was a real gentleman named Frederick Freeman, the brewer a Mr Ramsay and Alderman Meadows – then over 80 years old – was chief clerk. Mr M. Parker from Fen Ditton tells me his father looked after the sixteen shire horses that were used to pull their drays around the various pubs in the 1940s. Freda Smith phoned to say she started at the Panton Street Brewery on the day war broke out and worked through all the department while Mr E. Purchase from Meldreth has sent me an unusual reminder of Dale's Brewery in Gwydir Street. It is an advertisement for their Gold Cup Champion Beers printed on the back of a one penny Ortona bus ticket [SCANS]. He used to work for G.F. Levitt, haulage and removals of Milton, who used to trade with the brewery. Do you remember them? [SCAN OF LEVITT CARD]

Joan Bulloch (nee Peck) from Swavesey E-mails to say that her grandparents, Ted & Ellen Peck kept the Central Hotel in Peas Hill right up to its closure. During the war it opened from 9 to 11 pm for the aircrews from the surrounding bases to get tea and sandwiches while waiting for the buses back to camp. In the hotel there was a passage that led under Kings Parade to King's College, there was also a room on the top floor which was only accessible from the roof, supposedly used for "priests' women friends". The hotel was haunted by a lady dressed all in black who appeared on Christmas Eve – her grandmother saw her the basement.

My picture of the Cambridge Beer Festival brought particular memories for Mrs M. King of Shepreth. She writes: "I was thrilled to see my late father, Albert Bebee's photo at the Beer Festival in 1976. He would have been so pleased to think you had still got it, as he was on the day it was taken. He came home that day and said he thought he could be in the paper."

With everybody apparently going football crazy can anybody identify any of these supporters from the 1960s and tell me where they were off to? [SCAN]

Memories 12th June 2002, by Mike Petty - draft

It was some years ago that my wife saw a dinosaur; I was too timid to go.

In June 1952 the News broke the story of how Great Ouse River Board workmen had been tipping a lorry load of clay on a river bank when their attention was caught by a number of bones. Many exciting discoveries have been made in such operations and the archaeology of the county is full of accounts of ancient swords or spears, and sometimes old boats, but this was special.

Work was halted while a telephone call was made to the Sedgwick Museum of Geology at Cambridge University who sent out some of their experts. They returned to the site of the excavation, a clay pit on the Wicken Road at Stretham. There they discovered more of the bones, buried just five feet beneath the surface, though sadly much of the skeleton had been destroyed, including the animal's small head.

Nevertheless they were able to identify it as a giant Pliosaur, a marine creature that had probably died and then been eaten, its bones being disturbed in the process and also by immersion in the water that had then covered the area. The experts took many of the bones that formed the creature's paddle, rib and shoulder, wrapped them up in sacking and newspapers and had them transported to the basement of their museum in wooden boxes. They left the rest.

News of the discovery quickly spread, PC Bill Lythell was delegated to stand guard over the body and scores of people travelled to the site to view the remains, many leaving with dinosaur pieces as souvenirs.

Only later when they had made more detailed studies did the experts discover that what they had found was unique – a new species – and they needed a new name. It was called a 'Stretosaurus' after the place of its discovery. But as it was unique they really needed to get as much of it as they could – and by now many of the other bones had been removed. Hence it was that in 1956 senior University palaeontologists came to Stretham school and asked 'Can we have our bones back please'. Many were surrendered, many others still survive within the village. Those that were returned are on display in the University Museum of Geology, Downing Street, Cambridge, as for the rest – well that remains a secret.

Such a discovery must surely have been a once-in-a-lifetime event. But no. For in July 1966 the excavators were back again to the same clay pit, by then being used as a rubbish dump. Bernie Miller of Pymoor and Derek Hills of Little Downham, who worked for Darby's Sand and Gravel of Sutton were digging steps down the slope when they found more giant ancient bones. Hopes that this might be more of the Stretosaurus were dashed however once Dr C.L. Forbes of the Sedgwick Museum arrived on the site. He identified it as a water reptile – reckoned to be about 150 million years old -and the bits that had come to light were parts of its vertebrae. By the times the News reporter got to the scene Dr Forbes had reached the beast's shoulder and was working forward along six or eight feet of neck towards the head. But once more it made a wonderful excursion for children from Stretham school who attended en masse for their close acquaintance with prehistory. [SCAN].
Do you recognise yourself or anyone you know amongst the onlookers?

##

Mrs J.D. Mansfield, nee Phillips, writes from Cambridge to recall an a different schooldays incident that sticks in her mind – it was the day her schoolmistresses wore lipstick! It was when she was a pupil of the Chesterton Senior School between 1941-44 and they were visited by an American Officer who came to give a talk on schools in America. After the talk Miss Farnsworth asked for a demonstration game by the school netball team. "No shouts or games skirts then, it was navy nicks with legs rolled up as high as decency would allow!" she recalls. They had previously been to Fenners to watch a baseball match between two American service teams where they had been given a doughnut by one team member with instructions to yell out “Up the river and down the lake, the pitcher’s got a belly ache” while the other side were batting.

##

“I thought I was too young to feel nostalgic!” e-mails Andrew Brett following the Memories article on the Silver Jubilee celebrations in Akeman Street, Cambridge.

Andrew continues: “I attended the party in Akeman Street. It was organised by local residents and shopkeepers and open to the whole district. Fay and Maurice Magasiner ran the general store. They had a cine film of the area before and after the bunting went up. I wonder what happened to it?

“We were all given pin-on tags made of silky material with the Jubilee crest on to prove that we were bona fide guests. I also wore the fashionable 1977 look - huge flared trousers, Terry Wogan style hair and a Punk scowl. I cheered up a bit when the boy next to me gave me his ham sandwiches, but I drew the line when the music began - 'The Hustle'! How un-punk could you get?! I went home - scowl intact.

“The woman on the far right of the photograph is my aunt, Christine Hinchcliffe, who still lives in Bateson Road today.”

In fact Andrew himself wrote an article in 1985 for 'Neighbourhood News', the city council's newsletter when he interviewed Mrs. Chapman, who ran the Akeman Street bakery with her husband from the 1st of June 1959 to the late 1980s. She recalled: “We had a big long table at the front of the shops for all the local youngsters”. Andrew says he loved their shop. “Mr. Chapman would be up at 4.15 every morning - earlier on Saturdays - and off down to the brick bakehouse in his garden. Their fresh bread, cakes etc. were highly popular (I adored their hot sausage rolls!) and they contributed to the jubilee party food supplies. They were a lovely couple and their shop was well frequented!”

Do you have other memories of bakeries?

Other readers have asked to see any pictures of the Arbury Carnival of 1977 that I mentioned in the article. Do you recognise anybody from 25 years ago. [NEGS 1603.77.19A & 26A]

##

As the Queen continues her Golden Jubilee tours throughout the realm I wonder if her powers of observation might, like those of Queen Alexandra, avert a railway disaster. The following snippet appeared in 'The Boy's Own Paper' for 23rd August 1902. “Not far from Sandringham a road is crossed by a railway bridge. One day Her Majesty took a snapshot of a train crossing the bridge. On developing the negative the bridge seemed to be lower in the middle than at the ends. Thinking something was wrong with the plate, she took another of a train crossing the same bridge. With the same result. She thought it well to send copies of the photographs to the railway authorities, who had the bridge examined, and found that it was in a most unsafe condition, and needed immediate repairs. Thus Her Majesty's snapshot probably averted a serious calamity” Can anybody identify the bridge referred to?

The old volume was lent me by Mrs Joan Smith, from the Arbury area, together with of the magazine “Holly Leaves” for Christmas 1950 which contains some excellent pictures and articles on various aspects of the area. It includes a fine painting of Ely cathedral from Stuntney with the old Hall in the foreground. After a considerable period of dereliction work is now underway to rebuild some of the old house that occupied such a prominent position on the hill. [SCAN].

It's an area known to Mick Lambourn-Brown of Girton who used to drive through the village every day in the late 1960s. Stuntney farmer, Cole Ambrose, was one of the last farmers to use shire horses, some of which the News photographed on a frost morning in January 1965 [SCAN]

Meanwhile last week Sutton folk were reminiscing about the olden days – when it was common to see cows being driven through the streets. Such sights seldom get recorded, though the News were there in November 1964. Does anybody else have such pictures of what were once everyday happenings that have now vanished? [SCAN OF SUTTON COWS]

Everybody recalls schooldays, but does anybody recognise members of their family on a snap of Elsworth school taken about 60 years ago. It was sent in by Mrs Dorothy Johnson (nee Brand) who can spot herself along with Bernard Wolfe, Fred Mobbs and Douglas Hodson – in fact she can name them all! [SCAN]. Michael Chandler has a different problem; he has obtained a photo of a group at Bartlow School taken in 1937, it has the name of Mrs K. Taylor hand-written on the back. Can anybody tell him anything of the school or Mrs Taylor?

Can anybody assist Christine Woodhouse of the Martin Centre, University Department of Architecture in Chaucer Road. She writes: "In the basement is a metal-clad door which presumably was used as a cold room when the house was used as a domestic building – Lord Acton the historian, once lived here. This room is always referred to as 'the morgue'. We understand the body of somebody who was killed in Cambridge by enemy bomb during the war was placed in this room". Sadly there were a number of people killed in air-raids but is there anything in this story. Please write to me & I'll pass the message on.

Memories 19th June 2002, by Mike Petty

Following all the excitement of the Royal celebrations, Mrs Joan Smith, from the Arbury area, has lent me a copy of the magazine "Holly Leaves" for Christmas 1950. This contains some excellent pictures of the well-known Cambridge royal celebration – that of Queen Victoria's Coronation in 1838 when thousands of people sat down to an outdoor meal on Parker's Piece. It all took a tremendous amount of organisation, as those who have celebrated the Royal Jubilee will appreciate. [SCAN OF VICTORIA'S CORONATION CELEBRATIONS, PARKERS PIECE, JUNE 1838]

Then in June 1902 came the Coronation celebrations for Queen Victoria's successor, King Edward VII. Once more there were months of planning, debates and discussion but everything was finally in place as the great day neared. The organisers planned another meal on Parker's Piece for those Cambridge folk who were over 60 years of age. Some 2,500 people would be fed, this time under the shelter of maquees. Then as the great day neared came an alarming announcement – the King was seriously ill and needed an operation. The Coronation would have to be postponed. Amidst fears for His Majesty's health came the realisation that all the events planned would have to be cancelled, but there was a major problem. The food for the old folks' meal was already in the ovens. Cooks from Trinity College and Trinity Hall had already baked 68 large meat pies and 58 big gooseberry and cherry tarts – and what were they to do with them?

It was agreed that rather than waste it the food should be distributed to its intended recipients, they would have to eat it in their own homes rather than on the Piece. What happened next was described in the pages of the Cambridge Daily News for 27th June 1902

"Several hundred of the poorest inhabitants of Cambridge gathered outside the Corn Exchange when the distribution began. Along all the streets those who had come for a share of the good things hastened towards the entrance as quickly as their too-evident infirmities would allow them. The halt, the lame and the blind were there. Some hobbled along on crutches, others moved slowly with the aid of sticks. Baskets, bags and all manner of receptacles had been brought. Some with less forethought had brought nothing in which to receive their share. Quite a number who had come empty-handed wrapped up quantities of fruit tarts in newspapers – grimy newspapers – that could hardly have improved the semi-liquid contents. One old lady no sooner got clear of the table than she dropped the basin in which she was carrying her tart. She appeared to be keenly anxious as to whether she would be given any more. This was soon settled. ‘Bring her back and give her an extra lot for luck’, said a committee man, and the aged dame was soon departing, her face wreathed in smiles.”

So many turned out that extra food had to be found; 400 lbs [POUNDS] of ham, 300 lbs [POUNDS] of gelatine of veal, 200 lbs [POUNDS] of roast beef, 144 packets of Kops’ lemonade and a large number of packets of Chivers’ jellies were disposed of – and still the people came. The doors had to be closed for a time until a fresh supply could be obtained. Five lambs were obtained and cut up into pieces of about 1¼ lbs [ONE AND A QUARTER POUNDS] and this just about met the demand.

All this is a very long time ago, but sometimes history has a habit of repeating itself. Next Thursday, 27th June – 100 years ago to the day – the Mayor of Cambridge is preparing to entertain hundreds of old folk at the Guildhall. I only hope she has learned from the lesson of the past and not under-estimated the appetites of the modern senior citizens of Cambridge! [SCAN OF FLAGS ON MARKET HILL, 1902]

Unusual Jubilee memories have been sent in from Miss Kath Skin of Cambridge. She was in the Elburz Mountains in Iran in 1977 as head teacher of a school for the children of the English contractors who were building a dam and other projects. It was a multi-national project with firms from Italy, Germany and Scotland also engaged. Kath decided to celebrate the Silver Jubilee and invited the other schools to join in. The Germans were enthusiastic, provided she collected the children by hired bus; the Italians were happy, the Scottish less so. One belligerent Scot was having none of it: “Not my Queen”, he said. He changed his mind when Kath pointed out that his firm’s children would miss all the fun. Then it was off to make the arrangements, bake cakes, organise balloons and jellies. Thus it was that the Jubilee was marked with a street party, puppet shows, games and dancing round the Maypole while in the background the Iranian mountains were covered with snow. Next day the German headmaster wrote a charming letter thanking the English children for the happy day his pupils had enjoyed “on the occasion of the Silver Jubilee of Queen Elizabeth the Great”. Even the belligerent Scot was won round at a drinks party next day – despite celebrating with bottles of Japanese Suntory whisky – and proposed the Loyal Toast. But there was a cruel ending to the celebrations, as Kath writes: “On my way back to my house, I was attacked by several shepherds’ dogs and was rushed down to the French clinic in Tehran. There, every day for a week I had an injection into my stomach against rabies. Yes I remember the Silver Jubilee celebrations in that far-off land. How can I forget?” [SCAN OF INVITATION CARD TO THE CELEBRATIONS IN IRAN]

Meanwhile the other week Sutton folk were reminiscing about the olden days – when it was common to see cows being driven through the streets. Such sights seldom get recorded, though the News was there in November 1964. Does anybody else have such pictures of what were once everyday happenings that have now vanished? [SCAN OF SUTTON COWS ON LAST WEEK’S DISK]

Various readers have written following recent Memories articles.

Mrs J. Jenner from Bourn had her memory stirred by reference to the Central Hotel in Peas Hill. She writes: “I was in the ATS stationed on Donkey’s Common (now Parkside swimming pool) in 1947. My friend Betty (better known as Punchy) and I had our 48-hour pass together and our boyfriends, later our husbands, booked us into the hotel. When I was posted to Guildford, Surrey, I still came back on leave and Betty arranged to have hers at the same time. We always had the King's Room which overlooked the Guildhall and market place. It was a very large room which could quite easily sleep six. Residents had a side door as a second entrance down the passage. My late husband stayed there whenever his landlord and landlady were away. None of us ever knew why the King's Room was so called and I would love to know". Can anybody enlighten us? [SCAN OF CENTRAL HOTEL 1935]

Michael Biggs from Cambridge saw his former home at 47 Bridge Street, Cambridge (Memories 8th May) with the room in which he was born. His parents kept a fruit and vegetable shop and his mother looked after a lodging house at the rear. Amongst her lodgers was Cecil Beaton. The buildings were demolished for St John's college development in the late 1930s. [SCAN OF BIGGS SHOP, BRIDGE STREET]

Christine McRitchie Pratt of Fulbourn was struck by the reference to Trevor Hughes. She writes: "Trevor was very much part of our childhood. My father, Rev Arthur Dowle, was the Chaplain of St Edward King and Martyr and I think as a clergy family we were regarded as a soft touch. Trevor was a regular visitor to our house where he would be given a meal and sometimes an old suit of my father's – never money. We had an arrangement with the Salvation Army Hostel, the White Ribbon, where he could always go. He called my father 'padre' and we were told that he had never managed to settle down after the war. He always tried to commit some petty crime just before Christmas so that he could spend the festive season in Bedford Jail!

Megan Timbrell from Bristol, tells me that her great uncle, Ernest Banks, was regularly to be found in the Plough and Harrow on Madingley Road, Cambridge – where he was landlord in the 1920s. He was photographed outside with his wife, Laura in the late 1920's, with his son, Harry, who took over from him and married a girl named Winifred – but then they lost touch. The doors labelled 'Bar Parlour' and 'Public Bar' seem the only clues that the building was indeed a pub. [SCAN OF PUB]

Can anybody assist Christine Woodhouse of the Martin Centre, University Department of Architecture in Chaucer Road. She writes: "In the basement is a metal-clad door which presumably was used as a cold room when the house was used as a domestic building – Lord Acton the historian, once lived here. This room is always referred to as 'the morgue'. We understand the body of somebody who was killed in Cambridge by enemy bomb during the war was placed in this room". Sadly there were a number of people killed in air-raids but is there anything in this story. Please write to me & I'll pass the message on.

Memories, 26th June 2002, by Mike Petty

Aviation artist Rod Kirkby has been mad about aircraft since the age of eight and having gained a Physics Degree joined Hawker Siddeley Dynamics' Future Projects Department in the Aerodynamics Research Group before coming to Cambridge with British Telecom's Overseas Liaison and Consultancy Division. He ended up running the largest intelligence-gathering database in Europe, outside of the military.

But he has a problem that he wonders if anybody can solve. And its all to do with an inn sign that he was commissioned to paint at St Ives.

He writes:

"At 6:30, on Saturday evening, 23rd March, 1918, 19 year old student pilot Kenneth Wastell landed his DeHavilland DH6 biplane on Hemingford Meadow, St Ives.

He had flown there from the nearby Royal Flying Corps training base at Wyton, and, so the official story goes, had landed to ask directions to return to Wyton.

It has been said that you can never underestimate the ability of student pilots to lose their way, and the official line was that it was misty, so it is possible that the pilot was indeed lost, and seeking directions. In clear weather, Wyton could have been seen from the air from St Ives. Of course, in those days, it was quite normal for pilots of the day to land in a suitable field, to check some aspect of their aircraft or their whereabouts before setting off again, since those early biplanes could take off at speeds which seem impossibly slow to us today.

However, an eye-witness report casts some doubt on the official explanation. When author Noel Hudson wrote "St Ives, Slepe by the Ouse" in 1989, he spoke to Fred Favell, who saw the 'plane land on the meadow'. Fred Favell, a 15 year old boy in 1918, reported seeing an RFC sergeant get out of the 'plane, so, in all probability, 2nd Lieutenant Wastell had just given the sergeant a lift to St Ives for a Saturday night on the town. Since it was forbidden for a student pilot to carry a passenger, the 'official line', about mist and seeking directions was possibly concocted afterwards, to shield 2nd Lieutenant Wastell, or the sergeant, or both.

At about 6:45, Kenneth Wastell took off again, and the 'plane climbed steadily, heading in a westerly direction, with everything seemingly in order. Then, according to eyewitnesses, the 'plane was suddenly seen to swerve to the right, and almost immediately struck the south side of the steeple of the St Ives 15th century Parish Church of All Saints.

The 'plane must have struck the steeple head on, because the upper 40 feet of the steeple broke in two as the 'plane rebounded from it, and the light and flimsily constructed biplane could not have done this much damage with its airframe alone. A 'direct hit' by its engine would have been needed to cause so much damage.

As the two parts of the steeple crashed through the aisles on both sides of the south-west end of the church, the aircraft was seen to drop, tail downwards, into the interior of the church, amidst a cloud of dust and debris. The unfortunate pilot died instantly from a dislocated neck, and his body was later found amidst the pews.

The official report says that the court, having duly considered the evidence and also visited the scene of the accident are of the opinion that –The aeroplane and engine were in perfect condition and that the accident was caused through an error of judgement on the part of the pilot. The Casualty Card reads, "Collided with Church Steeple in mist".

So, why did the aircraft suddenly swerve to the right and into the steeple? I would hazard a guess that the pilot was climbing close to the stall, and the starboard wing suddenly stalled, flipping the 'plane sharply to the right. But was it merely incredibly bad luck that caused the stall to happen so close to the steeple, or is there some other reason for the stall occurring at the worst possible moment?

I have yet to discover whether there are weather records to show if there was any wind that fateful evening, but, if there was a wind, it could explain the tragedy. In the lee of an object such as a spire, the wind leaves the spire twisting first one way, then the other. In aerodynamicist's language, (and I used to work in Aerodynamics Research) there is a 'vortex street' on the downwind side of the steeple.

If Kenneth Wastell was flying fairly close to the steeple, which is something that might indeed have appealed to an inexperienced pilot, the sudden loss of airspeed on the starboard wing as that wing flew into the vortex street would have caused it to stall, with catastrophic results.

The cost of restoration to the Church was over £7,090, towards which the Government agreed to pay £3,873-15shillings, leaving St Ives's population (3,015 in the 1911 census) to find the rest! It was 1920 before the Church could be used again for services, 1924 before the spire was rebuilt, and 1930 before the bells were re-hung”.

So, knowing so much, what is the problem. Rod was given the job of repainting the Pub Sign of “The Aviator”, that stands near the church. The sign depicts Kenneth Wastell’s DH6, the Church, and the pub. He followed the previous artist’s liberal use of ‘Artistic Licence’, in highlighting the Church, the Pub and the Aeroplane, and washing the background away into the distance with as little detail as possible.

The difficulty was the Aeroplane itself. The DH6 is not often depicted in the usual reference works & could have one of two engines: an American Curtiss which had the engine cowled in a rather clumsy looking housing & a British engine which was very exposed. No amount of research, either at the RAF Museum Hendon, the Norris Museum in St Ives, or from Squadron Leader Kevin Dalley at RAF Wyton, could establish which engine was fitted to Kenneth Wastell’s DH6. But this was important, from the point of view of the aircraft’s appearance. Rod decided to depict the British engined version, which also looked suitably flimsy, in keeping with the stick and string nature of these early aircraft.

But can anybody prove it, he asks.

The answer might lie in a sketch by the Cambridge artist, Harry Moden. By day he was a quiet office worker who became buyer & stores manager for the Cambridge Scientific Instrument Company. By night he was a shrewd observer of the Cambridge scene who translated his observations into cartoon drawings that he issued as postcards & sold to the ‘Cambridge Chronicle’ newspaper. Along with his contemporary Frank Keene he provided a wry commentary on local issues between 1903 & 1914 when his health began to fail &, on doctor’s orders, he cut back on his cartooning though he brought his pens out again to record the celebration of peace in 1918. He died aged 79 in 1960.

In one such commentary on the Cambridge traffic scene he produced a postcard depicting the possible impact of plans to electrify the Cambridge horse trams. In the background is a pilot exclaiming ‘Great Scott, it beats me!!’ as his plane is left behind. And in front of the plane’s engine is a church steeple with the top being sliced off. This scheme was being discussed in 1904 – 14 years before the St Ives crash. But in 1918 Moden took up his pen again to depict the crash at St Ives. The original cartoon was amongst a wealth of unpublished sketches deposited in the Central Library some years ago but sadly this particular view has, for the moment, flown itself off into some obscure corner. So does anybody else have any clues to help put Rod’s mind at rest.

You can see examples of his work on Rod Kirkby’s www.rodsart.com or phone him on Cambridge 833136

Memories, 3rd July 2002, by Mike Petty

Last week I had the privilege of attending the Mayor’s Day In at the Cambridge Guildhall – though I had to sing for my lunch by showing some slides to the 200 or so other people who had also accepted her invitation.

They too had earned their lunch, participating in a large-scale discussion of the needs of the more elderly citizens. Topics such as ways the council might improve the system of mobile wardens in sheltered accommodation and others needing Government backing – give a decent state pension of £250 a week for everyone and a Christmas bonus of three times the weekly pension, £750. It was part of the Phoenix 2000 Project which is dedicated to helping the older folk across the city by providing information and advice, including their own web page, and liaising with other agencies such as Age Concern and Directions Plus.

But well before the day itself many of them had been contributing their own memories of the Cambridge they had helped to shape, some of which had been compiled by project members to form a display of photographs and newspaper headlines that will tour various venues in the weeks to come. [NEWS PIC OF DISPLAY TAKEN IN GUILDHALL LAST THURSDAY]

Carolyn Biggs, one of those responsible for the interviews, tells me that their principal memories had been of the 1950s – a period I refer to as the ‘forgotten fifties’ – between the ‘fighting forties’ and the ‘swinging sixties’. So what do we remember of those now long-distant years.

The war may have been over – but there was another one on the way. In 1950 North Korean communists invaded South Korea and the country became synonymous with battles far more deadly – and even more competitively fought than those which have kept us glued to our television sets recently.

And Cambridge felt war had been declared by the County Council with the publication of the Holford Report on the future planning of what was very shortly to become the City of Cambridge. One minor battle of that war was fought in front of both the protagonists’ own headquarters.

On Market Hill the ornate canopy of the fountain in the middle of the Square was crumbling. The structure was not yet a century old, having been erected following the great fire of 1849 that had devastated the houses which formerly stood adjacent to the east wall of Great St Mary’s church. Renovation would be costly, it would be better to remove the top completely said the city. No said the county – it was an important structure. Rot! said the city [MARKET HILL FOUNTAIN AND PARKING]

Rot prompted the second round of the battle for it infected the very symbol of county government, the Assize Courts on the top of Castle Hill. Dry rot was found to be rampant and anyway the building was old and no longer needed – there was a nice new Shire Hall just behind it. But, said the city it was an important structure and should be preserved. In that case you can have the frontage and the figures that stand on the top, replied the County. [ASSIZE COURT, CASTLE HILL]

It a situation like this there was one obvious compromise and in 1953 both the historic top to the fountain and the historic Assize Courts were demolished. Honours even.

The year saw other battles; on the East Coast a vicious combination of wind and tide saw the sea surge through the shore defences to gush inland, destroying hundreds of buildings, washing away scores of caravans. Cambridge was not directly affected but was in the front line in the fight back, with the Women’s Voluntary Service mobilising hundreds of helpers and taking over a former aircraft hangar at Madingley as a base to pack donated clothing for the flood victims. University students also responded to the call, journeying north to join river workers and other volunteers to close a breach in the river bank near Kings Lynn. [1953 FLOOD]

Other youngsters used up the excess energy in other ways. Teddy Boys with drainpipe trousers, velvet-collared jackets and bootlace ties burst on to the scene as the rock’n’roll revolution hit Cambridge. In 1956 the City Council banned jiving at dances in the Guildhall but people kept jiving to waltz music & magistrates asked cinemas to ban the film ‘Rock around the Clock’. But the Rex Ballroom allowed rock and roll sessions, the Kinema in Mill Road showed the banned film in 1957 – and even installed a juke box. Next year the Central screened 'Jailhouse Rock' and vast crowds turned up at the Regal to see the latest, sexy singing sensation, Cliff Richard in 1959. On Thursday those youngsters who had grown up in the era of flick knives were tucking into ham salad with the aid of plastic cutlery. [KINEMA, JIVING, PERHAPS NEG – 1939.77.11 OF NETHERHALL SCHOOLBOYS CHRIS ROSE, SHANE CARTER & GARY SCOTT WHO RECREATED THE FASHION FOR A SCHOOL PROJECT IN JULY 1977]

Some remember the 50's was the era when we had 'Never had it so good'. Rationing ended but there was still little money for meals out. A British Restaurant that had been established in the University's prestigious Pitt Club had closed and been superseded by a Civic Restaurant at the corner of Petty Cury where "it was cheap, it was good. Everything was home-made. None of that fast food there". The affection with which this is still held was obvious when spontaneous applause broke out when I showed a photograph taken just before its closure as part of the Lion Yard redevelopment. [CIVIC RESTAURANT]

Soon one in five Cambridge houses had a TV aerial and a little television set with a nine-inch screen – "we put a magnifier over the screen to make it bigger", one person recalled. But many people in the post-war years did not have a home of their own and were having to live with parents, or apart from their families. This was being addressed by the council with a massive slum clearance and new house building programme, the first home being completed on the new Arbury estate in 1955 - which some remembered when it had been all meadows. The new houses might have indoor toilets but the area was initially felt to be bleak and unwelcoming, certainly when compared to the small back street houses off Lensfield Road where pedlars sold from a horse and cart, and pie men brought hot meal pies. Milk came in churns and there were few fridges in those days – "we always had a larder and a meat safe outside for butter, cheese and meat" one recalled [PEDLAR'S HORSE AND CART OFF LENSFIELD ROAD, ARBURY ESTATE]

The price of petrol rose but for many that was academic as few had cars. Those who did parked them on the Market Hill, on New Square or at the back of the Lion Hotel. City and county were debating about a new car park being constructed somewhere behind Petty Cury. But others were saying parking should be outside the city centre, or under Parker's Piece, or in a multi-storey car park on Park Street – this idea of parking above the streets was feasible, as undergraduates demonstrated when they hoisted an Austin 7 van to the roof of the Senate House. [PARKING AREA AT BACK OF LION HOTEL]

One person whose table I shared on Thursday was Mr A. Sloots who spent his career catering at Trinity Hall. He pointed out, many the young men who came to Cambridge in the early 1950s had been fighting for king and country. They may have seen Gay Paris, may have been Corporals or Captains – but now they were undergraduates and colleges had rules about locking the gates at reasonable hours. But that did not stop ex-soldiers & 'Climbing in' became the norm. Porters had instructions to keep an eye open for such transgressions – though often it was a blind eye. To deter such infringement of college rules the Master of Trinity Hall decreed that barbed wire should be erected along the tops of the walls. Contractors worked long and hard to make the college secure. The very next morning the newly-erected barbed wire was neatly rolled up in front of the college – the new undergraduates were proving they had escaped from far more secure accommodation than that! [NIGHT CLIMBERS]

Some things carry on as ever. Midsummer Fair continued to attract visitors by the thousand; but has this now changed, asks Barbara Rooney from Chesterton after a visit last week. She writes; "We were amazed that on a lovely warm dry evening just how few people there were about. And what has happened to all the stalls that used to be there – the Mad Bag Man, the stalls selling china and linen. As young newly weds we walked home carrying a roll of lino from "Miller the Lino King", thrilled to bits with it! And the old rides, the Moonrocket, the Jollity Farm and the Cake Walk, all gone. I suppose they would be called tame by today's standards. But we found one children's ride still there, just as it was when it was built about 1936, as the lady who owned it was telling us. We have a photo of our two children, Martyn and Helen having a ride about 1960. They would choose where they wanted to sit and then had changed places the next time they came into view! But summer wouldn't be the same without the Midsummer Fair, however much it's changed and we enjoyed our visit." [SCAN OF THE ROONEY CHILDREN AT FAIR 1960]

If you have memories of old Cambridge, or just like to hear tales of days gone by then why not come along to the Manor and Mid-day on Mondays from September. At the Manor Community College opposite Arbury Court we shall be looking back on Cambridge's history over 10 lunchtimes – bring your sandwiches and your thinking caps and come and join us. Phone Tessa Mitchell on 508740 for details.

One person whose table I shared on Thursday was Mr A. Sloots who spent his career catering at Trinity Hall. He pointed out, many the young men who came to Cambridge in the early 1950s had been fighting for king and country. They may have seen Gay Paris, may have been Corporals or Captains – but now they were undergraduates and colleges had rules about locking the gates at reasonable hours. But that did not stop ex-soldiers & 'Climbing in' became the norm. Porters had instructions to keep an eye open for such transgressions – though often it was a blind eye. To deter such infringement of college rules the Master of Trinity Hall decreed that barbed wire should be erected along the tops of the walls. Contractors worked long and hard to make the college secure. The very next morning the newly-erected barbed wire was neatly rolled up in front of the college – the new undergraduates were proving they had escaped from far more secure accommodation than that! [NIGHT CLIMBERS]

Memories 10 July 2002, by Mike Petty

Last week a gathering of residents at Lt Thetford said a sad farewell to one of their most popular villagers, Tony Badcock, who is starting his retirement by starting a new life in Ireland. Tony was for a time the village Father Christmas, donning his Santa robes on Christmas morning to deliver presents directly to delighted children, and being rewarded by a mince pie and a glass of sherry. At each house. Thus it was one particularly busy Christmas day that there was a somewhat red nose making its way past the church – a nose that did not belong to Rudolph. Inside the church the congregation were in full voice with a Christmas Morning hymn – and somehow it did seem to Tony that it would be an appropriate gesture if Father Christmas should wish each and every one of them as Merry a day as he himself had already experienced!

Many of us spend Christmas in front of the television, and Tony in his earlier years was a television aerial erector. When a schoolboy it was sometimes my job to climb nervously up the ladder that reached up to the roof and 'take the strain' as Tony shinned up another laid across the tiles to the chimney, carrying not a sack of toys but a large H-type aerial. From his lofty perch on the chimney-pot he would call out to people passing below who'd look around in alarm at this greeting from the sky.

Today the exploits of such aerial gymnasts are celebrated with a BBC television trailer showing a man jumping from rooftops and performing a handstand high above the pavement – and of course by the Spider-Man film currently packing people into cinemas.

But Cambridge had its own climbing heroes - undergraduates. Cambridge colleges had strict rules. Their gates closed at ten o'clock and at midnight the college porter took to his bed; after that nobody could enter without a late pass from the proper source, dean or tutor and such privileges were grudgingly granted. Even for coming back between ten and twelve there was a penalty of a few pence to be paid as gate money. So to save that expense, or to get in once the gate was barred the students considered the option of climbing in. What happens next was recorded in a book found by Pat Hull of Norwich in a charity shop. 'The Night climbers of Cambridge' by 'Whipplesnaith' was published in 1953 and its language captures the spirit of the time

"Now comes his first difficulty. He finds that the authorities have anticipated his naughtiness and barred the ground-floor windows. Wandering round the college, he finds that the obvious ways are guarded by revolving spikes, which are apt to spin under the drunkard's foot and drive into his thigh. Every year there are a number of minor accidents of this sort in Cambridge.

"So he wanders round, trying a side door here, testing a bar there, wondering whether he can squeeze round some spikes, or surveying longingly an easy drain-pipe running up past a first-floor window. Usually he has been told of an easy way in - 'An absolute cinch, any fool can do it' - but when the time comes he finds it somewhat fearsome. Twelve feet of easy drain-pipe is not so easy when he is eight feet from the ground; stepping over spikes is an operation requiring flexibility of joints and great delicacy of balance. He hesitates, and keeps looking round to see if a proctor is coming to catch him and send him down from Cambridge to his weeping parents. At last, the ordeal ended, he hinds himself in college, not quite sure whether to be proud or ashamed of himself. After the first few minutes, sure he is safe, he is no longer doubtful, and he will often climb in again."

At the Mayors Day In the other week I shared a table with Mr A. Sloots who spent his career catering at Trinity Hall. He pointed out that after the war, many the young men who came to Cambridge had been fighting for king and country. They had seen Gay Paris, had been Corporals or Captains – but now they were undergraduates and colleges had rules about locking the gates at reasonable hours. 'Climbing in' became the rule and to deter such infringement of college rules the Master of Trinity Hall decreed that barbed wire should be erected along the tops of the college walls. Contractors worked long and hard to make the college secure. Next morning the newly-erected barbed wire was neatly rolled up in front of the college – the new undergraduates were proving they had escaped from far more secure accommodation than that!

It was a small step from climbing in out of necessity, to climbing up out of devilment – a n activity known as roof-climbing or night-climbing. The result of such nocturnal adventures are sometimes to be seen on the Cambridge skyline. Tales abound of sundry unusual items found decorating spires and pinnacles, of 'Peace in Vietnam' banners strung from King's college chapel and the rest. But the University takes very seriously such dangerous – and potentially damaging activities - and the penalties for discovery can be severe. Although on one occasion in 1943 'official' photographs of students climbing into Peterhouse were taken to be published in a Russian magazine.

Generally the only people who were on the alert to detect roof-climbing were the porters, as 'Whipplesnaith' confides in his book: "The weary policeman trudging round his beat is usually a friendly fellow, as unwilling as the climbers to break the peace of the night. If they meet him on their way home, most climbers treat him as a confidant, tell him what they have done and swap stories with him. And if no damage has been done- as it never is - all will be well. The Robert is a friend.

“The dons also give no trouble. A clumsy party sometimes causes a, petulant old head to come to a window to see what all the clatter is about, but that is all. Even then he probably thinks of it, not as a heinous offence, but merely as an exhibition of bad manners to wake him up. The younger dons, indeed, are often roof-climbers themselves. In fact, if you tactfully broach the subject to your supervisor, he may be able to help you considerably. And if you are very fortunate, he may even lead a midnight expedition in person. But like a naughty monk who slips out of the monastery after bed-time, he prefers the matter to be concealed from his colleagues. It is only the official side of authority which disapproves of roof-climbing. Let no man think, however, that because many of the High Table are sympathetic, the punishment of offenders will be any the less if they are caught.

“There are numbers of night-climbers about, but you will seldom see them. They seldom even see each other. As furtively as the bats of twilight, they shun the eyes of the world, going on their mysterious journeys and retiring as quietly as they set out. Out of the darkness they come, in darkness they remain and into darkness they go, with most of their epics unrecorded”

“You may meet them in the early hours, or soon after sunset, padding along the streets in gym-shoes and old clothes. Perhaps, standing motionless in a dark doorway, they will startle you as you pass, as they study some building which they are about to climb. Or, capless and gownless, one of them may speed past you on his feet, pursued by a relentless and athletic anachronism in a top-hat, the proctor's bulldog”

It all seems like something out of the movies, but if [PLEASE ADD NAME OF THE ACTOR WHO PLAYS SPIDERMAN] were to play the undergraduate night-climber who would they cast in the role of University Bulldog?

**

Mention of the St Ives aeroplane crash of 1918 brought back memories to 92-year-old Mr A. Mansfield of Cambridge; he writes: As a boy of eight years I was living in a lane called the Wilderness at the back of St Ives railway station which was a very important station and had a Smiths book stall. At the time of the crash I was in the garden with my father. About a week later another plane crashed in Meadowland, the lane behind our house. The plane landed in a field but the field was not long enough and it finished up in a ditch. At the time my friend's grandmother lived in the house on the old bridge which had an upstairs then.

Keith Hamilton writes from Cambridge about the decline of Midsummer Fair traders, as raised by Barbara Rooney last week: As she rightly says the old time traders have all but disappeared taking away a lot of the colour of the fair and its appeal to perhaps a slightly older generation. Possibly the reason for this is that things one could once obtain cheaper at the fair such as lino, carpets and reasonably-priced china are now so readily available in every high street and the superstores. I recall when I was a kid it seemed every other person walking away from the fair was carrying some goods or other they had purchased from the stalls. A number of old time rides still exist but they now have limited appeal to the teenage market and generally only be seen on the odd occasion at events such as vintage and engine rallies and shows. Only one Moon Rocket ride still exists in working order and this only opens a couple of times a year at shows. Some of the most popular fairs continue to be those held in the streets and among those that come to mind fairly locally are those in the autumn in Baldock and Stevenage old town. One of the biggest of these is in Scotland where the Esplanade in the coastal town of Kirkcaldy is closed for the week long fair which stretches a good mile in length. I can't see our city and university fathers ever agreeing to a fair along the length of Regent Street and St Andrews Street however popular it might be!

Memories 17th July 2002, by Mike Petty

Last Friday the News broke the story of a possible new river crossing over the Cam, linking Chesterton with Cambridge's Riverside area. It would be the first river crossing since Elizabeth Bridge which opened in July 1971.

But unlike that bridge this one will be for pedestrians and cyclists only and it is a considerable time since such a structure was last built, that of a bridge linking the Green Dragon, Chesterton with Stourbridge Common in 1936. It would have made it much easier for people to visit Stourbridge Fair, except that the fair had been abolished in 1934. This new bridge replaced two ferries; one was a heavily built craft that could carry horses and cattle across to Stourbridge Common, alongside it a light passenger ferry. When the river was been lowered in October 1920 to allow repairs at Baitsbite lock the two had been placed across the river with planks crossing the gap between them but this was only a temporary expedient. Throughout 1935 people watched as foundations were put in & listened to the thud of the pile driver in November but it was May 1936 before the bridge was actually open. The smaller ferry was moved to become a private ferry for Banham's boatyard and was used by the engineers constructing Elizabeth Bridge. [SCAN OF GREEN DRAGON BRIDGE BEING ERECTED WITH FERRY ALONGSIDE, SCAN OF ELIZABETH BRIDGE CONSTRUCTION & FERRY SCAN OF GRADS PUNTING PAST GREEN DRAGON]

Several ferries once plied across the river, the ferrymen making a useful living from the tolls they charged and the residents not being too inconvenienced by the delay in crossing. Sometimes when the ferryman had gone home people took themselves across, turning the handle that engaged the chain that ran across the bed of the river although when the ferry was on the other side it had to be pulled over by tugging on the chain itself, slimy - and worse - from the depths of the river.

The first to disappear had been the one operated by William Bates which was made redundant after the opening of Victoria Bridge in 1890. It was part of a bribe to encourage the ratepayers of the then independent Chesterton to become part of greater Cambridge – a bribe that failed. Chestertonians welcomed the new crossing, but rejected amalgamation

A little further along the residents of Ferry Path continued to cross the river in the traditional way by ferry despite the tragic loss of life at Fen Ditton when the Red Grind ferry sank during the Bumping races and people were drowned in 1905. In 1913 the Borough council, having won its battle to absorb Chesterton, decided that a bridge was needed between Ferry Path & the Fort St George though it was another 14 years before it actually opened. William Pauley had operated the ferry since 1887 and carried an estimated one and a quarter million passengers. Those waiting to make a last nostalgic crossing were disappointed when the ferry sank just before the new bridge opened. [PAULEYS FERRY WITH BIKE ON BOARD]

Meanwhile occupants of the new houses on the De Freville Estate had been campaigning for a footbridge to replace a ferry, worked for years by the Dant family. They finally got it in May 1927 when people lamented it had been a very long time coming. Within five years the ferry was back in use while work was put in place to reconstruct the approaches to the new Pye footbridge.

There were other footbridges; in about 1836 locks at the Fort St George which had left the pub on an island were moved to Jesus Green as part of a scheme to improve navigation. There a new bridge was built across the river which featured a steep rise over the new locks. It survived until being replaced in 1892 by the present, more convenient design, similar to the other footbridge spanning the Cam at Robinson Crusoe Island, which had been erected some five years earlier. It still stands, largely overlooked, alongside the present Fen Causeway bridge which opened in 1926. [SCAN OF JESUS GREEN BRIDGE DURING FLOOD OF 1879 – 64.46]

But the most important footbridge also crossed to an island. Findsilver Lane was the last of the public thoroughfares that once linked the centre of Cambridge with the river, the others having been closed following the construction of the various colleges that now form 'The Backs'. Although the island has long disappeared the right-of-way survives as Garret Hostel Lane and provides a most useful cycle-link into the city centre. Various bridges have been erected at this point, including the original wooden bridge, of which the 'Mathematical Bridge' at Queens' College is a copy. This was replaced first in 1814 and later by a cast iron bridge which survived to 1960 when it was succeeded by the existing award-winning modern structure, making it the last public footbridge to be constructed across the Cam – until now. [LIBRARY PIX OF MODERN GARRET HOSTEL BRIDGE]

The newly proposed bridge will serve both pedestrians and cyclists and already there is discussion about a suitable design to accommodate the needs of each class of user. It may not be easy.

Anybody who has tried to cycle over Garret Hostel bridge will know that the approaches are particularly steep, making extremely difficult to climb up – though exhilarating to speed down the other side. And in July 1927 a letter appeared in the Cambridge Daily News relating to the then newest footbridge – the one linking De Freville and Midsummer Common, the Pye footbridge. It reads: "Sir: There was a good deal of grouching before the inhabitants of Chesterton had a footbridge over the Cam at Dant's Ferry. Now they have got one they have found something else to grouse about. At five minutes to eight every morning the instrument workers at Pye's are hurrying to work from the other side of the river. They curse and groan, trip and stagger under the burden of carrying their bicycles up and down a steep double flight of steps. Sooner or later some panting person carrying a bicycle will fall backwards or pitch into the river" [SCAN OF PYE FOOTBRIDGE]

The new bridge, wherever it goes and whenever it opens will not repeat the mistakes of the last two – will it?

##

LEFT OVER FROM LAST WEEK

Mention of the St Ives aeroplane crash of 1918 brought back memories to 92-year-old Mr A. Mansfield of Cambridge; he writes: As a boy of eight years I was living in a lane called the Wilderness at the back of St Ives railway station which was a very important station and had a Smiths book stall. At the time of the crash I was in the garden with my father. About a week later another plane crashed in Meadowland, the lane behind our house. The plane landed in a field but the field was not long enough and it finished up in a ditch. At the time my friend's grandmother lived in the house on the old bridge which had an upstairs then.

Keith Hamilton writes from Cambridge about the decline of Midsummer Fair traders, as raised by Barbara Rooney: "As she rightly says the old time traders have all but disappeared taking away a lot of the colour of the fair and its appeal to perhaps a slightly older generation. Possibly the reason for this is that things one could once obtain cheaper at the fair such as lino, carpets and reasonably-priced china are now so readily available in every high street and the superstores. I recall when I was a kid it seemed every other person walking away from the fair was carrying some goods or other they had purchased from the stalls. A number of old time rides still exist but they now have limited appeal to the teenage market and generally only be seen on the odd occasion at events such as vintage and engine rallies and shows. Only one Moon Rocket ride still exists in working order and this only opens a couple of times a year at shows. Some of the most popular fairs continue to be those held in the streets and among those that come to mind fairly locally are those in the autumn in Baldock and Stevenage old town. One of the biggest of these is in Scotland where the Esplanade in the coastal town of Kirkcaldy is closed for the week long fair which stretches a good mile in length. I can't see our city and university fathers ever agreeing to a fair along the length of Regent Street and St Andrews Street however popular it might be! [SCAN FROM LAST WEEK]

#

Another reader has added her contribution to the story of Coad's shop in Sidney Street. Muriel Mayes (nee Benstead) from Papworth Everard started working there when she left school in 1955 and knew Rhona, the lift girl. Muriel writes: "When I went for my interview Mr Lunnis the manager's office was right at the top of the building across a creaky wooden corridor". She however worked at the front of the shop: "I used to sit just inside the front door mending nylon stockings. I wonder if anyone remembers me", she asks.

Kathy Skin from King's Hedges adds her reminiscences about pumping the church organ. She writes: "When we lived at Little Eversden my brother Cecil pumped the organ for Mrs Fossey the organist at both Little and Great Eversden, while the rest of us (3) sang in the choir. This was in the 1930s when the Rev E.E. Wilkinson was the vicar. Towards the end of his sermon, perhaps on a pre-arranged signal, the organ began to wheeze and gasp as my brother began to pump madly and Mrs Fossey found her place in the hymn book. Once or twice Cecil was day dreaming at the required time, and a sudden clout brought him out of his reverie, his head being conveniently close to the organ seat" [LIBRARY PIX OF EVERSDEN?]

Memories 24 July 2002, by Mike Petty

Catherine Moubray is a Society Wedding Photographer from Surrey who used to have her studios beside the Tower of London. For many years she took the 'girl with the pearls' photograph in "Country Life" and regularly finds member of the Royal Family in front of her lens. She offers a full wedding service, including the tiaras and was up in Cambridge recently while covering an event at Woburn Abbey.

But Catherine has a particular wedding photograph that is driving her mad. She has been staring at it so long that she feels she knows the people concerned, even though they were married long before she was born.

Some ten years ago Catherine bought a box of old glass negatives at an auction sale in Surrey. For a long while they lay in her darkroom but recently she has got around to printing them. She was faced with the question as to where were they taken, what and who did they show – and who took them. It is these mysteries that she is seeking to solve.

